But Mercer upon Geneſis conceiveth rightly of theſe rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (ſaith he) ſtream into four branches, two of which keep their ancient names, and the other two are called Piſon and Gehon. The reaſon why theſe two rivers joyned in one (below Apamia) loſe their names, and are called Piſi-tigris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguiſhed, is, becauſe the beſt part of Euphrates running through the channel of Gehon, ſinketh into the lakes of Chaldea, not far from Ur, the city of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Perſian ſea, as Tigris accompanied with Piſon doth.

This error, that Piſon was Ganges, was firſt broached by Joſephus (whoſe fields, tho' they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authority to be ſufficient in matter of deſcription, whereupon depended no other important conſequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Auguſtine, and Jerome, take this for current; whereof it followed, that as Piſon was tranſported into the Eaſt India, to find out Havilah: ſo was Gehon drawn into Africa, to compaſs Ethiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moſes ſpeaketh in the deſcription of Paradiſe, be found to be a region, adjoyning to Babylon on the one ſide, and Cuſh (which is falſly interpreted Ethiopia) faſtned to it on the other ſide, we ſhall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impoſe upon men the tranſportation of rivers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other uſes) were made to tranſport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cuſh the ſon of Ham firſt ſat down with his ſons, Sheba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the ſon of Cuſh, did that region take name, which Piſon compaſſeth; and the land (called Cuſh) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cuſh himſelf. For as the ſons of Joctan, Ophir, and Havilah, ſeated themſelves as near together as they could in India, ſo did the ſons of Cuſh in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah or Chavilah was firſt Chuſea of Cuſh; then Chuſa, Suſa, and Suſiana.

From this Havilah unto the deſarts of Sur, did the Iſraelites and Amalekites poſſeſs all the interjacent countries: for [g] Saul ſmote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur the Chaldean paraphraſt converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red ſea; but this was not meant from Sur upon the red ſea, to Havilah in the Eaſt India; for Saul was no ſuch traveller or conqueror, and therefore Havilah muſt be found nearer home, where the ſons of Iſmael inhabited, and which country Saul waſted: for Amalek and the Amalekites poſſeſt that neck of country, between the Perſian ſea, and the red ſea; Havilah being the extreme of the one towards the eaſt, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the weſt, leaving that great body of Arabia Fœlix towards the ſouth; and they ſpread themſelves with the Midianites and Edumeans, from the eaſt part, or back-ſide of the holy land, to the banks of Euphrates, compriſing the beſt parts of Arabia Petræa and Deſerta.

SECT. XIV.

Of the river Gehon and the land of Cuſh: and of the ill tranſlating of the Ethiopia for Cuſh, 2 Chron. xxi. 16.

NOW, as Havilah in the Eaſt India drew Piſon ſo far out of his way thither, ſo I ſay did Cuſh (being by the Seventy tranſlated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cuſh being taken for Ethopia by the Greeks, whom the Latins followed, Gehon conſequently was eſteemed for Nilus. But [h] Ethiopians are, as much, as black or burnt faces, whoſe proper country is called Thebaides, lying to the ſouthward of all Egypt. And altho' there be many other regions of Ethiopians, and far ſouth in Africa, yet thoſe of Thebaides are thoſe ſo often remembered in the Egyptian ſtories, and out of which nation they had many times their kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopians are very near, or elſe directly under the Equinoctial line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chuſites; who are neither black of colour, nor in any ſort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this tranſlation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualify in this manner. There are (ſaith he) two Ethiopia's, the eaſt, and the weſt: and this diviſion he findeth in Strabo, out of Ho- mer-

mer. Now becauſe there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Cuſh and the land of the Chuſites (which is Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the happy, with the region of Midian) to be the eaſt Ethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Cuſh and the land of the Chuſites, be that tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the ſcriptures: [a] Habitavit Iſmael ab Havilah uſque Sur, quæ reſpicit Ægyptum introeuntibus Aſſyrios; Iſmael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goeſt towards Aſſyria: The ſame ſufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a river which watereth Cuſh, and not Ethiopia. But this place of ſcripture Habitavit Iſmael, &c. hath this ſenſe: Iſmael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Aſſyria, or the country bordering Aſſyria; and Sur, which lyeth towards Egypt, which is as much to ſay, as, the [b] iſſues of Iſmael (whereof there were twelve princes) whom God had promiſed to make a great people, inhabited all thoſe regions between the border of Egypt and Aſſyria. And that they were (according to the word God) ſo increaſed and multiplied, it well appeared, when [c] Zerah the Chuſite, which others call Tharantha, brought an army of ten hundred thouſand againſt Aſa king of Juda. Which army came not out of Ethiopia beyond Egypt; for that had been a ſtrange progreſs for ſuch a multitude, as ten hundred thouſand, having ſo mighty a king as the king of Egypt, between Paleſtina and Ethiopia. But theſe were the Chuſites, Amalekites, Midianites, Iſmaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Aſa (ſtrengthned by God) had defeated this world of an army, he in following his victory took ſome of the cities of king Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a city of the Ethiopians, it cannot be ſuſpected: for theſe be the words of the ſcripture diſproving it: [d] And Abraham departed thence towards the ſouth country, and dwelt between Cadeſh and Sur, and ſojourned in Gerar; Now Sur is that part, upon which Moſes and the Iſraelites firſt ſet their feet after they paſſed the red ſea, where the [e] Amalekites in Rephidim ſet on them, ſuppoſing that they had been weary, and unable to reſiſt. Again, in the ſtory of Iſaac it is written, [f] Wherefore Iſaac went to Abimelech, and the Philiſtines unto Gerar: and I am ſure Abimelech and the Philiſtines were no Ethiopians. And laſtly, Moſes himſelf, where he deſcribeth the bounds of Canaan, hath theſe words: [g] Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comeſt to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the north, and Gerar by Gazah towards the ſouth. But indeed, howſoever Pererius doth with an honeſt excuſe ſalve his tranſlation of Chus for Ethiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint, and Joſephus did altogether miſunderſtand this place. And firſt, for Homer's eaſt and weſt Ethiopia, they are both found elſewhere. For Pliny in his fifth book and eighth chapter, citeth Homer for an author, of theſe two Ethiopia's. But the eaſt Ethiopia is that which compaſſeth Nilus to the ſouth of Egypt, and is the ſouth border thereof; now a part of the empire of the Abyſſines, under Preſter John; and the weſt Ethiopia is that, which joyneth it ſelf with the river Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are theſe Ethiopians, called Perorſi, Daratites, with divers other names, which [h] Pliny numbereth. But all theſe are in Africa, and beyond the deſarts thereof, ſaith Pliny out of Homer, Agrippa, and Juba, which regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Preſter John, and the Troglodites) lie due eaſt and weſt. But as for Cuſh, and the region of the Iſmaelites, &c. they are extended directly north from that Ethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Joſephus was exceeding groſs herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moſes when he ſerved Pharaoh, in the wars againſt the Ethiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Ethiopia) he tranſporteth Midian by miracle over the red ſea, and beyond all Egypt, and ſetteth it in Ethiopia, as ſhall be ſhewed more at large in the chapter of the world's plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly tranſlated Nilus, Pererius confeſſeth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek copy, than otherwiſe. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the prophet Jeremy. [i] And what haſt thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Ægypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? To this ſaith Pererius, profecto Hebraice ibi non eſt vox Gehon ſed Sichor, quæ ſignificat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (ſaith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which ſignifieth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifeſt and unanſwerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Ethiopia. [k] Moſes married the daughter of Jethro, prince and prieſt of Midian, whom both the Greek and Latin call a Midianite, and not [l] Ethiopiſſam, as (with Joſephus) the Geneva converts it, though it helps it a little with a marginal note. Now it is without diſpute, that Zipporah was of the country of Midian, which is that part of Arabia Petræa, bordering the red ſea; for it is written in Exodus, that Moſes [m] fled from Pharaoh into the land of Midian, and ſat down by a well, &c. and again, [n] When Moſes kept the ſheep of Jethro his father-in-law, prieſt of Midian, &c. Indeed, theſe four nations are every where mixt in the ſcriptures, becauſe they dwell confuſedly with one another (to wit) the Madianites, the Iſmaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chuſites, which were all in one general word, Arabians, and in the ſcriptures ſometimes called by one of thoſe names, and ſometimes by another, as in Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, that Joſeph was ſold to the Iſmaelites; and again, v. 36. it is written, that the Midianites ſold Joſeph to Potiphar, Pharaoh's ſteward. The Genevians, in a marginal note (to avoid this confounding of the nations) ſay, that Moſes wrote according to their opinion, who took the Midianites and Iſmaelites to be all one. But Moſes wrote not after any man's opinion, he wrote the truth, and theſe were all Arabians, and ſo in this very place it appeareth by their merchandiſe, which they brought with them, when they bought Joſeph: for their [o] camels were laden with ſpicery, and balm, and myrrh, which are the trades of Arabia Fœlix, from whence chiefly, and from the Eaſt India, all the world is ſerved with myrrh and frankincenſe; and their ſpices they received from the eaſt ſide of the Arabian Gulf, as aforeſaid. And in chap. 39. ver. 1. it is ſaid: That Potiphar bought Joſeph of the Iſmaelites, which the Chaldean paraphraſt in the ſame place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifeſt, it is written, in Judges vi. 3. That when Iſrael had ſown, then came up the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the eaſt, and came upon them: they of the eaſt, were Arabians of the Deſart; ſo as where before, in the buying of Joſeph, the Midianites and the Iſmaelites were confuſed, here the Midianites and Amalekites, are made one nation. For in the proſecution of the ſtory of Gideon, the [p] Midianites only are named as comprehending both nations; and these nations are all called [a] Ismaelites, and neither Midianites nor Amalekites. As when Gideon desired, that every man would give him the golden ear-rings, which they had taken, after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, kings of Arabia, amounting to seventeen hundred sheckles of gold, it is written: [a] For they had gold earrings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant nation, and ever in action of war. [b] Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of Ismael) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenitæ. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Josephus) use poison upon their arrows, as the Indians do. Towards the south-east are the Midianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Ethiopia for Chus, is, amongst other places, made most apparent, in Chronicles, in these words: [c] So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabians, which confine the Ethiopians; so Jerome reads it; the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Ethiopians. Now, how far it is off, between the Philistines, and the Negroes, or Ethiopians, every man that looketh in a map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians do mix and join with the land of the Chusites, and are distant from Ethiopia about 32 or 33 degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur, and Pharan, are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirits of the Philistines, and Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. [d] Nulla supereſt dubitatio, quin Æthiopia in ſacris literis ſit Arabiæ propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Ethiopia in the scriptures is taken for that country, which joineth to Arabia.

Now may we think it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No; he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gehon for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the river (into which he was cast upon reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the [e] daughter of Pharaoh) a river of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the river of Nilus is often named in the scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a river of Paradise, they might justly have thought that he had derided them: for they had lived there all the days of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith [f] Pliny) there was nothing found in his time, but wild olives instead of golden apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in [g] Isaiah, and once in the prophet [h] Jeremy; and yet in those places it is not said to be a river of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the south; but the enemies, which they had on the south, and east parts, were these nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Midianites: who being often governed by many little kings, or reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the fathers and heads of those nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the north-side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlesyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest cities upon the sea-coast, as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Jerusalem itself was with-held from Israel (from the days of Moses even unto the time of David) by the Jebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty is, that it doth not appear, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was, that Matt. Beroaldus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two rivers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah, for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon Nilus: so where to find them elsewhere, it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this river of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterranean at Gaza, and whose springs he findeth far east in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the current by Gaza is but a small stream, rising between it and the red sea, whose head from Gaza itself is little more than twenty English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the flood, Chus and his children never rested, till they found the valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself with his sons first inhabited. Havilah took the river-side of Tigris chiefly on the east, which after his own name he called Havilah (now Susiana:) Raamah and Sheba farther down the river, in the entrance of Arabia Fœlix. Nimrod seated himself in the best of the valley, where he built Babel, whereof that region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the lakes of Chaldea, and in process of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more westerly towards the red or Arabian sea: from whence Mizraim pass'd over into Egypt, in which tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now because there could be no such river found in Arabia the stony, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Ethiopia, and Gehon Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this island, had arrived upon the river Thames, and calling the island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a river that watered Britannia: and when afterwards, in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he alſo entituled by the ſame name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, becauſe the river Tems is not found therein. Or let us ſuppoſe that Europa, the daughter of the king of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, lib. 1. & 4. and that the firſt diſcoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of ſome river in Thrace, which then watereth as much of Europe, as he firſt diſcovered, ſhall we in like ſort reſolve, that France, Spain, and Italy, &c. are no part of Europe, becauſe that river is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it ſaid by Moſes, in his deſcription of Gehon, that it watered the whole land of Chus; but not the whole land which the Chuſites ſhould or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, ſeeing in after-ages they became lords of many nations, and they might (perchance) have been maſters in time (as the Saracens which came of them were) of a great part of the world. For tho' the Babylonian empire, which took beginning in Nimrod the ſon of Chus, conſiſted at the firſt but of four cities (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his ſucceſſors within a few years after commanded all the whole world in effect: and the fame of Babel conſumed the memory of Chuſea. For of this tower of confuſion did all that land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatneſs of that empire, founded by Nimrod a younger ſon, obſcured the name and nation of his father Cuſh in thoſe parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian empire, where the Chuſites retained their names, which alſo they faſtened to the ſoil and territory by themſelves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not think that Chus or any of his could in haſte creep thro' thoſe deſert regions, which the length of 130 years after the flood had (as it were) fortified with thickets, and permitted every buſh and briar, reed and tree, to join themſelves (as it were) into one main body and forreſt. For if we look with judgment and reaſon into the world's plantation, we ſhall find, that every family ſeated themſelves as near together as poſſibly they could; and tho' neceſſity enforced them, after they grew full of people, to ſpread themſelves, and creep out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times reſort, and ſuccour one another by river, the fields being then (without all doubt) impaſſable. So Nimrob, who out of wit and ſtrength uſurped dominion over the reſt, ſat down in the very confluence of all thoſe rivers, which watered Paradiſe: for thither it was to which the greateſt troops of Noah's children repaired; and from the ſame place whence mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increaſe. The firſt father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The ſecond father of mankind Noah, began from thence his diſperſion.

Now as Nimrod the youngeſt, yet ſtrongeſt, made his choice of Babel (as aforeſaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleanſed and enriched; ſo did Havilah place himſelf upon Piſo-Tigris: Raamah and his ſon Sheba farther down upon the ſame river, on the ſea coaſt of Arabia: Chus himſelf upon Gehon, the faireſt branch of Euphrates. And when they began to ſpread themſelves farther off, yet they always faſtened themſelves to the rivers ſides: for Nineveh, Charran, Reſeph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldea, and the other firſt peopled cities, were all founded upon theſe navigable rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give ſuccour and aſſiſtance to the other, as is already often remembred.

SECT. XV.

A concluſion by way of repetition of ſome things ſpoken of before.

BUT now to conclude this diſpute, it appeareth to me by the teſtimonies of the ſcriptures, that Paradiſe was a place created by God, and a part of this our earth and habitable world, ſeated in the lower part of the region of Eden, afterwards called Aram fluviorum, or Meſopotamia, which taketh into it alſo a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this region ſtanding in the moſt excellent temper of all others (to wit) 35 degrees from the Equinoctial, and 55 from the north pole: in which climate the moſt excellent wines, fruits, oil, grain of all ſorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this ſaid ſoil and temper, than the abundant growing of the palm-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein ſoever the earth, nature, and the ſun can moſt vaunt, that they have excelled, yet ſhall this plant be the greateſt wonder of all their works: this tree alone giveth unto man whatſoever his life beggeth at nature's hand. And tho' it may be ſaid, that theſe trees are found both in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, which countries are alſo bleſſed with a perpetual ſpring and ſummer, yet lay down by thoſe pleaſures and benefits the fearful and dangerous thunders and lightnings, the horrible and frequent earthquakes, the dangerous diſeaſes, the multitude of venomous beaſts and worms, with other inconveniences, and then there will be found no compariſon between the one and the other.

What other excellences this garden of Paradiſe had, before God (for mans ingratitude and cruelty) curſed the earth, we cannot judge; but I may ſafely think that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular garden exceed all parts of the univerſal world, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the trees of life, of knowledge; plants only proper, and becoming the Paradiſe and garden of ſo great a lord.

The ſum of all this is, that whereas the eyes of men in this ſcripture have been dim-ſighted (ſome of them finding Paradiſe beyond our known world: ſome, above the middle region of the air: ſome, elevated near the moon: others, as far ſouth as the line, or as far north, as the pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be ſufficiently ſatisfied, that theſe were but like caſtles in the air, and in mens fancies vainly imagined. For it was eaſtward in Eden (ſaith Moſes;) eaſtward, in reſpect of Judea, that God planted this garden, which Eden we find in the prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in ſome part) remaineth to this day. A river went out of Eden to water this garden, and from thence divided it ſelf into four branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates ſwimming thro' Eden do join in one, and afterward taking ways apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moſes: the true ſeats of Chus and his ſons then being in the valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Piſon was Ganges, the ſcripture, reaſon, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joined cannot be divided. Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the rivers of Eden; that Gehon was Nilus, the ſame diſtance maketh the ſame impoſſibility, and this river is a greater ſtranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for altho' there are between Tigris and Ganges above four thouſand miles, yet they both riſe in the ſame quarter of the world; but Nilus is begotten in the mountains of the moon, almoſt as far off as the Cape of Good Hope,

Hope, and falleth into the Mediterranean ſea: and Euphrates diſtilleth out of the mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the gulf of Perſia: the one riſeth in the ſouth, and travelleth north: the other riſeth in the north, and runneth ſouth, threeſcore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leaf following, I have added a chorographical deſcription of this terreſtrial Paradiſe, that the reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding diſcourſe; and this is the reward I look for, that my labours may but receive an allowance ſuſpended, until ſuch time as this deſcription of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief trees in the garden of PARADISE.

SECT. I.

That the tree of life was a material tree: and in what ſenſe it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made ſubject to death.

FOR eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradiſe, in exilium vitæ temporalis, into the baniſhment of temporal life, ſaith Beda. That theſe trees of life and knowledge were material trees (tho' figures of the law and of the goſpel) it is not doubted by the moſt religious and learned writers: altho' the the wits of men, which are ſo volatile, as nothing can fix them, and ſo ſlippery as nothing can faſten them, have in this alſo delivered to the world an imaginary doctrine.

The tree of life (ſay the Hebrews) hath a plural conſtruction, and is to be underſtood, Lignum vitarum, the tree of lives, becauſe the fruit thereof had a property, to preſerve both the growing, ſenſitive, and rational life of man; and not only (but for [a] Adam's tranſgreſſion) had prolonged his own days, but alſo given a dureful continuance to all poſterity; and that, ſo long as a body compounded of elements could laſt.

And altho' it is hard to think, that fleſh and blood could be immortal, but that it muſt once periſh and rot, by the unchanged law of God impoſed on his creatures, man (notwithſtanding) ſhould have enjoyed thereby a long, healthful, and ungrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of moſt divines) he ſhould have been tranſlated, as Enoch was. And as before the flood, the days of men had the long meaſure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and ſoon after the flood, of two hundred years and upwards even to five hundred: ſo if Adam had not diſobey'd God's firſt and eaſy commandment, the lives of men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longeſt times of the firſt age, as many learned men have conceived. Chryſoſtom, Rupertus, Toſtatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adam's fall and tranſgreſſion) Adam and his poſterity had been immortal. But ſuch is the infinite wiſdom of God, as he foreſaw that the earth could not have contained mankind; or elſe, that millions of ſouls muſt have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the firſt number, wherewith the earth was repleniſhed, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chryſoſtom muſt be underſtood of immortality of bodies, which ſhould have been tranſlated and glorified.

But of what kind or ſpecies this tree of life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which reſpect many have conceived, that the ſame was not material, but a mere allegory, taking their ſtrength out of Solomon, where wiſdom is compared to the tree of life, and from other places, where alſo Chriſt is called the tree of life, and out of the Apocalypſis, [b] I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the tree of life, which is in the Paradiſe of God. But to this place St. Auguſtine's anſwer may ſuffice (which is) that the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terreſtrial Paradiſe, ſo there was a celeſtial. For altho' Agar and Sara were figures of the Old and New Teſtament, yet to think that they were not women, and the maid and wife of Abraham, were mere fooliſhneſs. And ſo in this place the ſenſe of the ſcripture is manifeſt. For God brought out of the earth every tree fair to ſight, and ſweet to taſte; the tree alſo of life in the midſt of the garden: which ſheweth, that among the trees, which the earth by God's commandment produced, the tree of life was one, and that the fruit thereof was alſo to be eaten. The report of this tree was alſo brought to the ancient poets: for as from the indigeſted matter or chaos, Heſiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others, ſteal the invention of the created world; ſo from the garden of Paradiſe, they took the platform of the orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Heſperides: and from the tree of life, their Nectar, and Ambroſia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, ſignifieth making young, and Ambroſia, immortality; and therefore ſaid to be the meat and drink of the Gods.

SECT. II.

Of Becanus's opinion, that the tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOW for the tree of knowledge of good and evil, ſome men have preſumed farther, eſpecially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himſelf the honour to have found out the kind of this tree, which none of the writers of former times could ever gueſs at, whereat Goropius much marvelleth. But as he had an inventive brain, ſo there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himſelf. Surely howſoever his opinion may be valued, yet he uſurpeth the praiſe due to others, at leaſt if the invention be at that price at which he ſetteth it. For Moſes Bar-Cephas faſtened on this conjecture above ſix hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himſelf referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his author Philoxenus Maburgenſis, and others, whoſe very words Goropius uſeth, both concerning the tree, and the reaſons wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Moſes Bar-Cephas in his treatiſe of Paradiſe (the firſt part, and fol. 48.) ſaith, that the tree of knowledge was ficus Indica, the Indian fig-tree, of which the greateſt plenty (ſaith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Aceſines, one of the rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his fleet of gallies in, or near the kingdom of Porus.

This tree beareth a fruit of the bigneſs of a great pea, or (as [c] Pliny reporteth) ſomewhat bigger, and that it is a tree ſe ſemper ſerens, always planting it ſelf; that it ſpreadeth it ſelf ſo far abroad, as that a troop of horſemen may hide themſelves under it. [d] Strabo ſaith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no leſs than a ſhield. Ariſtobulus affirmeth that fifty horſemen may ſhadow themſelves under one of theſe trees. Oneſicritus raiſeth this number to four hundred. This tree (ſaith Theophraſtus) exceedeth all other in bigneſs, which alſo Pliny and Oneſicritus confirm: to the trunk of which theſe authors give ſuch a magnitude, as I ſhame to repeat. But it may be, they all ſpeak by an ill-underſtood report. For this Indian fig-tree is not ſo rare a plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who, becauſe he found it no where elſe, would needs draw the garden of Paradiſe to the tree, and ſet it by the river Aceſines. But many parts of the world have them, and I my ſelf have ſeen twenty thouſand of them in one valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moiſt grounds, and in this manner. After they are firſt ſhot up ſome twenty or thirty foot in length (ſome more, ſome leſs, according to the ſoil) they ſpread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or ſtem: for from the utmoſt end of the head-branches there iſſueth out a gummy juice, which hangeth downward like a cord or ſinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no ſooner toucheth but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh it ſelf a tree exceeding haſtily. From the utmoſt boughs of theſe young trees there fall again the like cords, which in one year and leſs (in that world of a perpetual ſpring) become alſo trees of the bigneſs of the nether part of a launce, and as ſtrait as art or nature can make any thing, caſting ſuch a ſhade, and making ſuch a kind of grove, as no other tree in the world can do. Now one of theſe trees conſidered, with all his young ones, may (indeed) ſhroud four houndred or four thouſand horſemen, if they pleaſe; for they cover whole vallies of ground where theſe trees grow near the ſea-bank, as they do by thouſands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the ſea, ſhooting always downward to find root under water, are in thoſe ſeas of the Indies, where oyſters breed, intangled in their beds, ſo as by pulling up one of theſe cords out of the ſea, I have ſeen five hundred oyſters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, that oyſters grew on trees in India. But that they bear any ſuch huge leaves, or any ſuch delicate fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles together under them. But to return to Goropius Becanus. This tree (ſaith he) was good for meat and pleaſing to the ſight, as the tree of knowledge of good and evil is deſcribed to be.

Secondly, This tree having ſo huge a trunk (as the former authors report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this tree that Adam and Eve hid themſelves from the preſence of God, for no other tree (ſaith he) could contain them. But firſt it is certain, that this tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or ſtem, for among ten thouſand of them it is hard to find any one bigger than the reſt, and theſe are all of a mean ſize. Secondly, the words of Moſes traſlated in medio ligni, are by all the interpreters underſtood in the plural number (that is) in the midſt of the trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moſes Bar-Cephas, word for word) is, that when [a] Adam and Eve found themſelves naked, they made them breeches of fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the tree it ſelf was a fig-tree, or that a fig-tree grew near it: becauſe Adam being poſſeſs'd with ſhame, did not run up and down the garden to ſeek out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it ſelf; and theſe leaves of all others were moſt commodious, by reaſon of their largeneſs, which Pliny avoweth in theſe words; [b] Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazoniæ habet, the breadth of the leaves hath the ſhape of an Amazonian ſhield: which alſo Theophraſt confirmeth; the form of which target Virgil touches:

Penthesilæa furens.

The Amazon with creſcent-formed ſhield
Penthesilea leads into the field.

Here Becanus deſireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed diſcovery, uſing this confident (or rather cholerick) ſpeech. Quis erit tam impudenter obſtinatus, ſi hæc a nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis ſcriptoribus cum Moſis narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inveniri poſſe, quæ cum illa magis quadret; Who will be ſo impudently obſtinate, if he compare theſe things, which we have reported of this fig-tree, and out of ancient writers delivered, with the narration of Moſes, as to dare to avow, that any other tree can be found, which doth more properly anſwer, or agree therewith. But for my ſelf, becauſe I neither find this tree, ſorting in body, in largeneſs of leaves, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: that the earth never brought forth any of theſe trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind: only thereby, and by the eaſy commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleaſed God to make trial of his obedience: [d] Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum puræ ac ſimplicis obedientiæ bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other reſpect, than thereby to commend the goodneſs of pure and ſimple obedience.

SECT. III.

Of Becanus's not unwitty allegorizing of the ſtory of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I muſt do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this tree, allowing his ſuppoſition of the tree it ſelf to be true. The effects whereof, becauſe his diſcourſes are exceeding ample, I have gathered in theſe few words. As this tree (ſaith he) ſo did man grow ſtraight and upright towards God, until ſuch time as he had tranſgreſſed and broken the commandment of his Creator; and then like unto the boughs of this tree, he began to bend downward, and ſtooped toward the earth, which all the reſt of Adam's poſterity after him have done, rooting themſelves therein, and faſtening themſelves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiouſneſs of this tree he compareth to the dark and ſhadowed life of man, thro' which the ſun of juſtice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the ſhadow of death, till it pleaſed Chriſt to climb the tree of the croſs for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among ſo many large leaves, may be compared (ſaith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived knowledge among ſo large vanities, which obſcure and ſhadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding ſweet, and delicate to the taſte and palate; ſo are the delights and pleaſures of the world moſt pleaſing while they dure. But as all thoſe things which are moſt mellifluous, are ſooneſt changed into choler and bitterneſs: ſo are our vanities and pleaſures converted into the bittereſt ſorrows and repentances. That the leaves are ſo exceeding large, the fruit (for ſuch leaves) exceeding little, in this, by compariſon we behold (ſaith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their ſollicitude, their outward ſhews and publick oſtentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we ſeek for the fruit, which ought to be their vir-tuous and pious actions, we find it of the bigneſs of the ſmalleſt pea; glory, to all the world apparent; goodneſs, to all the world inviſible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body, and boughs of this tree, by ſo much exceed all other plants, as the greateſt men of power and worldly ability ſurpaſs the meaneſt: ſo is the little fruit of ſuch men, and ſuch trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthieſt ſhrub, and humbleſt briar, or the pooreſt and baſeſt man, than ſuch a flouriſhing ſtatelineſs and magnitude. Laſtly, whereas Adam, after he had diſobey'd God, and beheld his own nakedneſs and ſhame, ſought for leaves to cover himſelf withal, this may ſerve to put us in mind of his and our ſins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which we uſe ſo many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

SECT. IV.

Of the name of the tree of knowledge of good and evil: with ſome other notes touching the ſtory of Adam's ſin.

NOW, as touching the ſenſe of this tree of knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the property of the tree itſelf, Moſes Bar-Cephas, an ancient Syrian doctor (tranſlated by Maſius) giveth this judgment, that the fruit of this tree had no ſuch virtue or quality, as that by the taſting thereof, there was any ſuch knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius alſo noteth, Arbor ſcientiæ boni & mali (id eſt) experientiæ boni & mali ab eventu; The tree of knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phraſe) by the workmanſhip of God's own hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created plant, out of whoſe ſeed all men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the breath or ſpirit of God, he could not (for theſe reſpects) be ignorant, that the diſobeying of God's commandment was the fearfulleſt evil, and the obſervation of his precepts the happieſt good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithſtanding) conceive, that ſickneſs is grievous, and yet in no ſuch degree of torment, as by the ſuffering and experience in themſelves they afterwards witneſs: ſo was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the puniſhments due to neglect and diſobedience; and yet felt by the the proof thereof in himſelf another terror than he had forethought, or could image. For looking into the glaſs of his own guilty ſoul, he beheld therein the horror of God's judgments, ſo as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchaſed evil, which could not be expreſs'd. He then ſaw himſelf naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of God's grace and former felicity: and therefore was this tree called the tree of knowledge, and not becauſe the fruit thereof had any ſuch operation, by any ſelf-quality or effect: for the ſame phraſe is uſed in many places of the ſcriptures, and names are given to ſigns and ſacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In ſuch ſort as this tree was called the tree of knowledge, becauſe of the event (as is aforeſaid) ſo was the well of [a] contention therefore called [b] Eſek, and the well of hatred [c] Sitnath, becauſe the herdſmen of Iſaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heap of ſtones, called the [d] heap of witneſs, between Jacob and Laban, not that the ſtones bare witneſs, but for a memory of the covenant. So Jacob called the houſe of God [e] Bethel: and [f] Hagar, the well in the deſart, viventis & videntis.

But Adam being both betray'd and maſtered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himſelf, and looking but ſlightly (as all his iſſues do) into the miſeries and ſorrows incident, and greatly affecting the ſuppoſed glory which he might obtain by taſting the fruit forbidden, he was tranſported and blown forward by the gentle wind of pleaſing perſuaſions unawares; his progreſſion being ſtrengthened by the ſubtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to poiſon mankind in the very root, which he moiſtened with the liquor of the ſame ambition, by which himſelf periſhed for ever.

[g] But what means did the devil find out, or what inſtruments did his own ſubtilty preſent him, as fitteſt and apteſt to work this miſchief by? even the unquiet vanity of the woman; ſo as by Adam's hearkening to the voice of his wife, contrary to the expreſs commandment of the living God, mankind by that her incantation became the ſubject of labour, ſorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a counſellor. [h] But becauſe thou haſt obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (ſaith God himſelf) Curſed is the earth for thy ſake, in ſorrow ſhalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is alſo to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; even by the moſt ugly and unworthy of all beaſts, into whom the devil entred and perſuaded.

Secondly, What was the motive of her diſobedience: even a deſire to know what was moſt unfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath ever ſince remained in all the poſterity of her ſex. Thirdly, What was it that moved the man to yield to her perſuaſions? even the ſame cauſe which hath moved all men ſince to the like conſent, namely, an unwillingneſs to grieve her and make her ſad, leſt ſhe ſhould pine and be overcome with ſorrow. But if Adam in the ſtate of perfection, and Solomon the ſon of David, God's choſen ſervant, and himſelf a man endued with the greateſt wiſdom, did both of them diſobey their Creator, by the perſuaſion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not ſo wonderful as lamentable, that other men in ſucceeding ages have been allured to ſo many inconvenient and wicked practices by the perſuaſions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and ſhadow many malicious purpoſes with a counterfeit paſſion of diſſimulate ſorrow and unquietneſs.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things between the fall of Adam, and the flood of Noah.

SECT. I.

Of the cauſe and the revenge of Cain's ſin: and of his going out from God.

THE ſame pride and ambition which began in angels, and afterwards poſſeſs'd Adam, Cain alſo inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptation of his brother's prayer and ſacrifice) ſlew him, making himſelf the firſt man-ſlayer, and his brother the firſt martyr: the revenge of which unnatural murder, although it pleaſed God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his puniſhment was greater than he could bear. For the ſame offence chiefly (wherewith the ſons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he deſtroyed all mankind, but Noah and his family: for it is written, [a] The earth alſo was corrupt before God: of which in the ſame place Moſes giveth a reaſon; for, ſaith he, The earth was filled with cruelty: and anon, after God himſelf made the cauſe known unto Noah, ſaying, An end of all fleſh is come before me, for the earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will deſtroy them with the earth, or from the earth: Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men only, but in all ſorts of injuſtice and oppreſſion. After this murder of Abel, [b] Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, towards the eaſt-ſide of Eden: in which words, the going out of Cain from the preſence of the Lord, is not to be underſtood after the literal ſenſe; God being wholly in all parts of the world. [c] Totus in cœlo eſt, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, ſed utrumque ſimul; God (ſaith S. Auguſtine) is wholly in heaven, and wholly in earth, and not by interchanged times, but all at once: and that this is true, David witneſſeth. [d] If I be in heaven (ſaith David) thou art there; if in hell, thou art there alſo: but what is meant thereby? [e] Exiit a facie Dei (ſaith Chryſoſtom) Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord, that is, he was left of God, diſfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

SECT. II.

Of Cain's dwelling in the land of Nod: and of his city Enoch.

THIS word Nod, or Naid, [f] St. Jerome and many others underſtand to ſignify wandering, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation, ſaith Junius: but the Seventy convert it otherwiſe, and take Nod for the proper name of a country, and ſo doth [g] Joſephus. But it ſeemeth to me, that Cain was rather a vagabond or wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing elſe, and that his thoughts and conſcience had no quiet or reſt, in regard of the murder committed, juſtly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: [h] And whoſoever findeth me (ſaith Cain) ſhall ſlay me. Now that Nod, or Naid, was a region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word [dwelt] for dwelling ſignifieth an abiding: and we call thoſe people wanderers and vagabonds that have no dwelling-place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifeſt, [i] Moſes teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the eaſt-ſide of Eden. Secondly, It is ſaid by Moſes, that after Cain departed from the preſence or favour of God, he built a city, and called it by the name of his firſt-born, Enoch; which ſheweth that he feared to wander, and rather ſought to fortify himſelf againſt revenge. Cyrillus ſaith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Chriſt and of the Jews; and that as Cain, after that he had ſlain Abel unjuſtly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the world: ſo the Jews, after they had crucified the Son of God, became runnegates: and it is true, that the Jews had never ſince any certain eſtate, commonweal, or prince of their own upon the earth. Now this land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deſerta, a region of Nomades; but Arabia the Deſart is not eaſtward, or on the eaſt-part of Eden, neither are theſe Nomades any particular people or nation. For all theſe, in what part of the world ſoever, which in old time lived by paſtorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white-meat without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latins Paſtores vagi, as the northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britons, and the northern Iriſh: yea, ſuch were the inhabitants of Italy itſelf, till ſuch time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the huſbandry of tillage uſed at this day. But the region eaſtward from Eden is that part of Aſſyria, called by Ptolemy, Calena, which alſo might be derived of Carena, the county of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in thoſe parts it may be gathered by the firſt poſſeſſion of his father Adam; for thus it is written, [k] Therefore the Lord God ſent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the verſe following, Thus he caſt out man, &c. and at the eaſt-ſide of the garden of Eden he ſet the Cherubins: which ſheweth that the entry into Paradiſe was from the eaſt, by which entrance Adam was caſt out, and therefore inhabiting on that ſide of Paradiſe which was eaſtward, according to the text: Cain alſo in the ſame region ſought his dwelling-place. Now, if the word Nod, or Naid, do ſignify profugus, that is, a fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, than till he built the city of Enoch, the firſt of the world, which he incloſed either for his own defence, or (as Joſephus writeth) to oppreſs others thereby. So as for my own opinion, I am reſolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a region; and for the word [vagabond] which Cain uſeth of himſelf, it ſeemeth by the percloſe of the ſame verſe, that [vagabond] is therein underſtood for ſuch an one as travelleth in fear of revengement: for whoſoever findeth me (ſaith Cain) ſhall ſlay me; or elſe [vagabond] is taken for a man without protection, and caſt out from the favour of God.

And becauſe theſe Henochians, ſo called of the city Henoch, were the firſt ſociety and civil aſſembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of theſe people (either for cruelty, ſtrength, or other actions) lived in the memory of Noah and his ſons; ſo that after the flood (as there were of all ſorts of natures, ſome virtuouſly, ſome impiouſly, diſpoſed, and every active mind ſetting before it whom to follow or imitate) thoſe people, which delighted in cruelty and oppreſſion, took on them their names whoſe natures they moſt liked and allowed; of whom theſe Enochians were not the leaſt. Perchance the place it ſelf where Enoch ſtood before the flood, and whereof the monuments might remain (as the pillars or the foundation of Joppe did) gave occaſion to the planters of that place to call themſelves by the ſame names: for of thoſe Enochians there were many nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the ſame name many mountains, as thoſe which are otherwiſe called Coraxici. And ſeeing that it is hard to find out the truth of theſe things, which the moſt aged time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counſel of [l] Plato) exceedingly rejoyce, and therewith ſatisfy our ſelves, if of ſo great and almoſt worn-out antiquity, if of the eldeſt people's names and nations, there remain any print or footſteps to poſterity.

In [a] Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find thoſe Henochei deſcribed, though diverſly written, as in Pliny ſometimes Heniochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus, Heniochi, in Lucan Enochii, all which inhabit upon the ſea Euxinus, but yet none of theſe are on the eaſt ſide of Eden, or (according to Moſes's words) eaſtward from Eden. For Moſes, in all places where he deſcribeth any region, was ſo exceeding preciſe, as ſometimes he uſeth the word eaſt or ſouth without borrowing, or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as eaſtward or ſouthward, or towards the eaſt or ſouth. In the place of Geneſis xi. ver. 2. he writeth the word [eaſt] ſimply and directly. And as they went from the eaſt, they found a plain in the land of Shinar, but this of Cain he addeth the word [towards] as, in the land of Nod towards the eaſt ſide of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining ſome one point or two either to the north or to the ſouth of the eaſt.

But as we may conjecture that theſe nations took name of Henoch, the city of Cain, or of the region wherein it ſtood, when the ſame was repeopled after the flood: ſo it is probable that theſe Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoyning, were not the firſt of that name, after the ſons of Noah began to fill the world again: becauſe, had this Henoch the city of Cain ſtood in any of theſe parts, it had then been ſeated north, and not eaſt or eaſtward from Eden. But as [b] Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, ſo afterwards he goeth on eaſtward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth theſe of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; [c] Ptolemy Zani; beyond which, an hundred and fifty miles eaſtward, he findeth another nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond theſe again he diſcovereth a third nation, from whence all the reſt took beginning, which inhabited on the weſt ſide of the mountains of Paro-paniſus, between them and the great river of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the north ſide; and theſe Henochii are due eaſt from the region of Eden, and eaſtward from the very garden it ſelf.

And altho' we cannot be aſſured, that theſe Henochii took name from the memory of the city of Henoch directly, yet becauſe they inhabited due eaſt from Paradiſe, and afterwards ſpred themſelves weſtward (as all Noah's ſons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable, than that of Annius the frier, who ſets Henoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moſes's word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden being directly weſt.

And beſides theſe ſeveral nations of the Henochii, [d] Stephanus findeth a region called Henochia, and the ſame alſo in the eaſt, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana of the ſame name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things elſe) out of the word [Heniochi] which ſignifieth carts or coach-men, make theſe nations to have ſprung from the waggoners of Caſtor and Pollux (to wit) [e] Amphipes and Telchius, who attended them in the enterpriſe of Jaſon into Colchis. And tho' I do not deny, but that Jaſon with other Greeks ranged the coaſts of Aſia the leſs, in an open boat or kind of ſmall galley, [f] of whom I ſhall ſpeak in his own time: yet no man doubteth but that the tale of the golden fleece was for the moſt part poetical; and withal that in ſuch an open boat, which could hardly carry their own rowers, being fifty-four, there was no place, and leſs uſe of coach-horſes or waggoners.

SECT. III.

Of Moſes's omitting ſundry things concerning Cain's generation.

BUT of the remembrance and teſtimonies of the name of the city of Henoch in prophane ſtory, thus much may ſuffice; now it followeth to anſwer ſome few objections againſt certain particulars in the fourth and fifth chapter of Geneſis: againſt which for the firſt it is demanded, how it was poſſible for Cain (having no other aſſiſtance than his ſon Henoch) to perform ſuch a work as the building of a city, ſeeing there is thereto required ſo many hands, and ſo great a maſs of all ſorts of materials? To which it is anſwered, that we are firſt to conſider, that of Cain (becauſe he was the parent of an impious race) Moſes uſeth no ample declaration; and ſo it beſt agreeth with his divine reaſon, ſeeing that he containeth the whole ſtory of the firſt race, which waſted by the leaſt account 1656 years, in five ſhort chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakeſt reaſon, that ſeeing it pleaſed God to beſtow on the firſt generations of mens lives, ſo long a meaſure, as 800 and 900 years, that in ſuch a ſpace Cain had not want of leiſure and means to build many ſuch cities as Henoch, be the capacity anſwering to what other of the world ſoever: for in what age of Cain's life he built it, the ſcriptures are ſilent: as of thoſe times, and the times of his iſſues Moſes had the leaſt care. And as it was ſaid of Cain, that he built a city: ſo was it ſaid of Noah, that his three ſons peopled all the world: but in both, the proceſs of time required to be underſtood: which advice ſeeing Moſes uſeth where the ſpace leſs requireth it, as knowing that he writ the ſcriptures to reaſonable men, we may eaſily underſtand, that ſuch was his meaning alſo in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and oblation of Cain, he ſpake it in this ſort, Fuit autem poſt dies multos, or a fine dierum (that is) in proceſs of time it came to paſs that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like ſort to be underſtood of Cain, that many years fore-gone, and when his people were increaſed he built the city of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, ſo of [g] Solomon, that he built the temple of Jeruſalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he employed in that work 150000 labourers: for this phraſe or ſpeech is common with our ſelves to ſay, the king invaded; when he cauſed an invaſion to be made: and he built, when he commanded ſuch a building. And therefore ſeeing we find, that Moſes had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cain's iſſues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he alſo paſſeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumſtance: for of Cain, Moſes writeth in this manner: [i] Cain alſo knew his wife, who conceived and bare Enoch, and he built a city, and called the name of the city after the name of his ſon Enoch. And to Enoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Mehujael, and Mehujael begat Methuſael, and Methuſael Lamech.

Now of Seth, Moſes writeth far otherwiſe, and in this manner. [k] And Seth lived 105 years, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807 years, and begat ſons and daughters: ſo as all the days of Seth were 912 years, and he died, as for the years and times of the wicked they were not numbered in libro viventium, ſaith Cyril. But in Seth was the church of God eſtabliſhed, from whom Chriſt deſcended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and work Moſes walked in, and finiſhed it with care, paſſing over the reprobate generation (as aforeſaid.) Of the line of Adam by Cain, Moſes remembreth but eight generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam alſo therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

2. Cain.
3. Henoch.
4. Irad.
5. Mahujael.
6. Mathuſael.
7. Lamech, who by Ada had
8. Jubal and Tubal, and by Silla Tubalcain and Noëma.

2. Seth.
3. Enos.
4. Cainan.
5. Mahaleel.
6. Jarad.
7. Henoch.
8. Methuſalem.
9. Lamech, and
10. Noah.

Theſe be the generations of Adam by Cain, which the ſcriptures mention: but Joſephus giveth unto Lamech threeſcore and ſeventeen ſons and daughters, by his two wives Ada, and Silla: and to theſe three ſons of Lamech, Moſes aſcribeth the invention of paſtorage, of muſick, and the working in metal; for it ſeemeth that [a] Jubal firſt gathered together, and made familiar thoſe beaſts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into herds and droves: [a] Tubal invented muſick, and [a] Tubalcain the working in braſs and iron: the one being addicted to huſbandry, the other was mechanical, the third given to idleneſs and pleaſure. In whom began theſe three meaner degrees of ſhepherds, handy-crafts men, and muſicians. And in the iſſues of Seth began the ſervices of God, divinity, prophecy, and aſtronomy: the children of the one beheld the heavens, the other the earth.

SECT. IV.

Of the diverſities in the ages of the patriarchs when they begat their children.

A Second ſcruple hath been made, how it came to paſs that the patriarchs begat their children at ſo divers ages as Cainan or Kenan at ſeventy years, Mahaleel and Enoch at threeſcore and five years, whereas Jarad begat not any of his until he was 162 years old: Methuſalem begat at 187; Lamech at 182, and Noah at 500 years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, becauſe it cannot be conjectured, that either Jarad, Methuſalem, or Lamech abſtained from marriage out of the religion of abſtinence, ſeeing that Enoch, who was tranſlated by God for his ſingular ſanctities, begat children before he was threeſcore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariſeth in this, that Moſes did not number the generations before the flood preciſely, according to the firſt-begotten and eldeſt ſons of the patriarchs; but he drew down the line of Noah from Seth, and afterwards from Noah to Abraham, by their true anceſtors, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Enoch was not the eldeſt of Jarad, nor Lamech the firſt-born of Methuſalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many ſons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though theſe three were only named, and ſurviving, and which by God were reſerved to be the fathers of mankind after the flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threeſcore and ten years who was the firſt ſon of Kenan, and then reckon that Methuſalem begat Lamech in the 187th year of his life, the difference ſeemeth ſtrange, where Lamech is taken for the eldeſt. But Moſes rejecteth all the other ſons of Methuſalem but Lamech only, becauſe he was the father of Noah as aforeſaid. Of this St. Auguſtine hath ſomewhat elſe in his 20th and 21ſt chapters de civitate Dei.

But as Moſes counted the generations of the firſt age, and ſo to Abraham, and the children of the promiſe after him; ſo doth St. Matthew recite the genealogy of Chriſt, not by the eldeſt ſons, but from thoſe whom God had choſen and bleſſed, without reſpect of the firſt-born, who have hereby the prerogative in eſtates, worldly and tranſitory only; and therefore the [b] Evangeliſt nameth Iſaac and not Iſmael, tho' Iſmael were firſt in time: ſo doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Eſau the elder; neither is Chriſt derived from any of the three eldeſt patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth brother, and ſo from David a younger ſon of Jeſſai; and laſtly we find, that the kingdom it ſelf of Juda was not given to the heir in nature, but to the heir of grace, namely [c] Solomon.

SECT. V.

Of the long lives of the patriarchs: and ſome of late memory.

THE third objection is, that the great difference of years between thoſe of the firſt age, whereof ſome of them had well near ſeen a thouſand years, makes it diſputed, whether the account of times were of the ſame meaſure is in after-ages, ſeeing that ſoon after the flood men lived not a third part of that time, and in ſucceeding ages and to this day not the tenth.

[d] They that have hereon reſolved that thoſe years were but Lunary years (to wit) of a month or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are eaſily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enos in the year of his life one hundred and five, if thoſe years be taken but for months, then had Seth lived but eight years and one month when he begat Enos: and if the time of Enos have the ſame allowance, when he begat Cainan, then could Enos at that time have been but ſix years and forty-eight weeks old; and ſo it may be gathered of the reſt excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the trees in their kind, bearing fruit and ſeed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at ſix, ſeven or eight years, agreeth with the ſhort lives of the pigmies, and not with the conſtitutions of our firſt fathers, who being deſcended from Adam, the workmanſhip of God's hands, and begotten and born in the ſtrong youth of the world, had length of days and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary years, then there would follow this extremity, that thoſe which lived longeſt, and upwards of nine hundred years, had by that account but the time of fourſcore and ten and odd years; which were not only leſs by far than the patriarchs lived after the flood, but ſhort of many mens lives in this decrepit age of the world, wherein many exceed fourſcore, and ſome an hundred years. Further (if need be) to diſprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. xxv. that Abraham died in a good age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former account were of Lunary years) makes but ſeventeen and an half of our years.

And if we ſeek for a cauſe of this long life in nature, then is it reaſonable, that the firſt man, created in higheſt perfection, ſhould alſo beget children of equal ſtrength or little differing: for of the firſt and pureſt ſeed there muſt of neceſſity ſpring up the faireſt and fruitfulleſt plants. Secondly, the earth it ſelf was then much leſs corrupt, which yielded her increaſe, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any ſuch mixture of harmful quality, as ſince that time the curſe of God for the cruelty of man's heart brought on it and mankind: neither had the waters of the flood infuſed ſuch an impurity, as thereby the natural and powerful operation of all plants, herbs, and fruits upon the earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the ſun have one time of ſtrength, and another of weakneſs, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: ſo time it ſelf (under the deathful ſhade of whoſe wings all things decay and wither) hath waſted and worn out that lively virtue of nature in man, and beaſts, and plants, yea the heavens themſelves being of a moſt pure and cleanſed matter ſhall [a] wax old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferiour creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative virtue from the ſuperiour.

But beſides the old age of the world, how far doth our education and ſimplicity of living differ from that old time? the tender bringing up of children, firſt fed and nouriſhed with the milk of a ſtrange dug; an unnatural curioſity having taught all women (but the begger) to find out nurſes, which neceſſity only ought to commend unto them: the haſty marriages in tender years, wherein, nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her, and replant her branches, while her ſelf hath not yet any root ſufficient to maintain her own top; and ſuch half-ripe ſeeds (for the moſt part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their infancy. But above all things the exceeding luxurioufneſs of this gluttonous age, wherein we preſs nature with overweighty burdens, and finding her ſtrength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of ſtrong waters, hot ſpices, and provoking ſauces; of which Lucan hath theſe elegant verſes:

[b] —— O prodiga rerum
Luxuries, nunquam parvo contenta paratu:
Et quæſitorum terra pelagoque ciborum
Ambitioſa fames, & lautæ gloria menſæ,
Diſcite quam parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum natura petat.
Non auro myrrhaque bibunt: ſed gurgite puro
Vita redit: ſatis eſt populis fluviuſque cereſque.

O waſtful riot, never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of cates by land and ſea far fetcht and ſent:
Vain glory of a table ſumptuous,
Learn with how little life may be preſerved.
In gold and myrrh they need not to carouſe,
But with the brook the people's thirſt is ſerved:
Who fed with bread and water are not ſtarved.

The [c] Ægyptians affirm, that the longeſt time of man's life is an hundred years, becauſe the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to ſtrength fifty years, and afterwards by the ſame degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his philoſophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Beroſus to a hundred and ſeventeen years. Theſe opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the laſt taxation, number and review of the eighth region of Italy, there were found in the roll (ſaith [d] Pliny) fifty-four perſons of an hundred years of age: fifty-ſeven of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred twenty-five: four, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and thirty-five, or an hundred and thirty-ſeven years old: and laſt of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this ſearch was made in the times of Veſpaſian the father and the ſon.

The ſimple diet and temperate life of the [e] Eſſæans gave them long account of many years: ſo did it to the ſecretaries of Egypian ceremonies, to the [f] Perſian Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirm out of Homer, that Neſtor lived three ages, and Tireſias ſix, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the leſs Aſia, little leſs: alſo Maſiniſſa of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred years (ſaith Ephorus) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that ſome of them live full two hundred years: and ſo doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: and that theſe reports are not fabulous, Joſephus bringeth many witneſſes with himſelf, as Marethon, Beroſus, Mochus, Eſtius, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecatæus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an hiſtorian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian preſented to Solyman, general of the Turks army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I my ſelf knew the old counteſs of Deſmond of Inchiquin in Munſter, who lived in the year 1589, and many years ſince, who was married in Edward the fourth's time, and held her jointure from all the earls of Deſmond ſince then; and that this is true, all the noblemen and gentlemen of Munſter can witneſs. Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Maffæus, and the like authors, telleth of ſome that have not only far exceeded the term preſcribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered eſtate of decrepit age to freſh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in thoſe days wherein Galen the phyſician lived, it may eaſily prove unto us what reeds we are in reſpect of thoſe cedars of the firſt age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood ſix pound weight, whereas we (for the moſt part) ſtop at ſix ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting conſtellations) which are the natural cauſes of a long and healthful life (to wit) ſtrong parents, a pure and thin air, and temperate uſe of diet, pleaſure, and reſt: for thoſe which are built of rotten timber, or mouldering ſtone, cannot ſtand long upright; on air we feed always and in every inſtant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppreſs and overcharge nature, maketh her to ſink unawares in the midway; and therefore with a good conſtitution, a pure air, and a temperate uſe of thoſe things which nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

SECT. VI.

Of the patriarchs delivering their knowledge by tradition: and that Enoch writ before the flood.

A Fourth ſcruple hath been made, how the certain knowledge of the creation came to Moſes, ſeeing there was no ſtory thereof written, and if any ſuch had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of antiquity periſhed in the univerſal flood.

But if we conſider the curioſity and policy of elder ages, we ſhall find that knowledge was the greateſt treaſure that men ſought for, and which they alſo covered and hid from the vulgar ſort, as jewels of ineſtimable price, fearing the irreverent conſtruction of the ignorant and irreligious: ſo as whatſoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in nature, the ſame was not left to publick diſpute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wiſe men to poſterity equally zealous, [a] Ex animo in animum ſine literis, medio intercedente verbo; From mind to mind without letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Eſdras, Origen, and Hilarius (as [b] Mirandula conceiveth) that Moſes did not only upon the mount receive the law from God, but withal ſecretiorem & veram legis enarrationem, a more ſecret and true explanation of the law, which (ſaith he out of the ſame authors) he delivered by mouth to Joſhua, and Joſhua to the elders: for to teach theſe myſteries, which he called ſecretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare ſanctum canibus, & inter porcos ſpargere margaritas, than to give holy things to dogs, and to caſt pearls before ſwine. In ſucceeding times this underſtanding and wiſdom began to be written in ciphers, and characters, and letters bearing the form of beaſts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught only to ſuch, as ſerved in their temples, and to their kings and prieſts. Of the firſt the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is inſcribed to Zoroaſter, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falſly.

This [c] Cabala importeth a law received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latin, and a receiving in Engliſh. And this cuſtom was alſo held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Britons, and of later times by the Iriſh chroniclers called rymers. If then ſuch as would ſeem wiſeſt in the uſe of reaſon, will not acknowledge, that the ſtory of the creation or beginning of all things was written by inſpiration, the Holy Ghoſt guiding the hand of Moſes; yet it is manifeſt, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then uſed) be delivered unto him by a more certain preſumption, than any or all the teſtimonies which prophane antiquity had preſerved and left to their ſucceſſors: which their wiſe men (as they term them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam inſtructed Seth, and Seth his children and ſucceſſors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifeſt, that Methuſalem lived together with Adam himſelf two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methuſalem no leſs than five hundred years: and before Noah died Abraham was fifty and eight years old; from whence this knowledge, by an eaſy and ordinary way, might come to Iſrael, and ſo to Moſes.

But beſides this tradition, it is queſtionleſs, that the uſe of letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by thoſe prophecies written on pillars of ſtone and brick by Enoch: of which [d] Joſephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike ſome ruin or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are aſcribed to Seth. But of theſe prophecies of Enoch [e] St. Jude teſtifieth; and ſome part of his books (which contained the courſe of the ſtars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia fœlix in the dominion of the queen Saba (ſaith [f] Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had ſeen and read ſome whole pages. It is not therefore ſtrange, that Moſes came to the knowledge of the creation and ſtory of the firſt age, ſeeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the ſpirit of God inſtructed and inſpired him as he did: which alſo his many and ſtrange miracles (performed before he wrote the ſcriptures) make more manifeſt.

Now for the books of Enoch, howſoever ſome men make queſtion of them, ſure I am that Tertullian, [g] Origen, Auguſtine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, alledgeth that pope Gelaſius among other the Apocryphal ſcriptures (which he rejecteth) named not theſe of Enoch; but that whatſoever was remembred out of them, the ſame was delivered by tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius that ſuch a book there was, and that the ſame was corrupted after the death of the apoſtles, and many things added thereunto by hereticks, who took occaſion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the devil about the body of Moſes, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greateſt arguments againſt theſe books, is that neither Philo, nor Joſephus (the moſt diligent ſearchers of antiquity) make mention thereof. But againſt it I will ſet this opinion of St. Auguſtine, Scripſiſſe quidem nonnulla divina Enoch illum ſeptimum ab Adam negare non poſſumus; That Enoch the ſeventh from Adam did write divers divine things we cannot deny. Now his writings, which came afterwards to light, were ſuſpected becauſe of the antiquity, and of fables of giants ſuppoſed to be begotten of angels, and others; and by ſo much the more, becauſe no ſuch book was found among thoſe canonical ſcriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew prieſts in Armario Judaico (ſaith [h] Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this might be preſerved by Noah. Surely that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembred by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to poſterity I know not, whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the ſame is but man's conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge aſcribed to Noah of the motions of the heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the ſtars; and afterwards to ſome of his ſons, to Zoroaſter, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had ſeen and might preſerve this book. For it is not likely, that ſo exquiſite knowledge therein (as theſe men had) was ſuddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been ſaid before. And therefore if letters and arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methuſalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah: it is not ſtrange (I ſay) to conceive how Moſes came to the knowledge of the firſt age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the undoubted word of God need of any other proof than ſelf-authority.

SECT. VII.

Of the men of renown before the flood.

NOW let us conſider the relation of Moſes, who named ſeven deſcents of Cain's children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being given by God inſtead of Abel; and of Seth was Enoch begotten, in whoſe time men began to profeſs religion, and to offer ſacrifice in publick. For altho' Adam inſtructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the ſacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it ſeemeth that after the birth of Enoch, men began publickly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they ſerved and praiſed God by communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the ſons of God or the godly diſtinguiſhed from the wicked. From the birth of Enos the ſon of Seth, to the time of Enoch the ſon of Jarad, there is nothing remembered by Moſes, but their own births, the births of their ſons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, [a] that he walked with God, and he was no more ſeen: for God took him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a juſt and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obey'd God. For the ſame phraſe Moſes uſeth of Noah. [b] Noah was a juſt and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleaſed God. And altho' Aben-Ezra and others underſtand this place [tulit eum Deus] ſcilicet, mortuus eſt, God took him away (that is) he died, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phraſe of the ſcripture, and with our manner of ſpeech to this day, to ſay, God took him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moſes maketh between the piety of Enoch and the reſt of the patriarchs, and by omitting the word [death] which he uſeth to all elſe, makes it manifeſt, that Enoch was not diſſolved as the reſt. For to all the reſt of the patriarchs, Moſes uſeth theſe words, and he died; but of Enoch he ſpake otherwiſe, ſaying only, he was miſſing, or he was not ſeen. Et non inveniebatur (ſaith the apoſtle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum tranſtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the ſame place it is expreſly added, that he ſaw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the ſame kind of changing, which St. Paul promiſeth when he ſaith, that [c] when the end ſhall come, we ſhall not all die, but all ſhall be changed, I leave it to the learned divines.

After Enoch, Moſes paſſeth over to Methuſalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the reſt) the times of their birth and death: ſaving that Lamech propheſied of his ſon Noah, ſaying, [d] This ſame ſhall comfort us concerning our work, and ſorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath curſed. Of Noah, Moſes writeth more amply, than of any of the reſt of Adam's children by [e] Seth, being the laſt of the ten generations of the firſt age, whom God (with his family) preſerved, becauſe he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the war, peace, government, and policy of theſe ſtrong and mighty men, ſo able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining, whoſe ſtories if they had been preſerved, and what elſe was then performed in that newneſs of the world, there could nothing of more delight have been left to poſterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their ſtrength of body and natural wits had the experience added of eight hundred and nine hundred years) how much of neceſſity muſt the ſame add of wiſdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatſoever can be told of after-times, eſpecially in reſpect of this old age of the world, when we no ſooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates, [f] Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus præceps (which is) life is ſhort, art is long, and time is headlong. And that thoſe people of the firſt age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of theſe words of Moſes, [g] Theſe were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But theſe men of renown (whom the ſcripture afterwards calleth giants, both for ſtrength of body and cruelty of mind) truſted ſo much to their own abilities, as they forgot altogether the piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Enoch walked: [h] for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil, and continually evil. And this wickedneſs was not only found in the iſſues of Cain, but it was then univerſal, when the children and ſons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and miſled by their idolatrous wives, the daughters of Cain, or of thoſe other men loving themſelves and the world only.

That theſe [i] ſons of God were angels, which being taken with the beauty of women accompanied them and begat giants, ſome of the fathers ſuppoſed, namely, Lactantius and Euſebius miſled by Joſephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterwards changed their former opinions. And of this miſtaking many writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themſelves with large anſwers and very needleſs: the queſtion being uncapable of diſpute, eſpecially ſince St. Chryſoſtom and St. Auguſtine have anſwered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of God's children, it doth every where appear in the ſcripture; and on the contrary, to think that angels, who (as Chriſt witneſſeth) behold the face of God (that is) always attend his commandments, ſhould, after a ſeparation from the reſt which fell with Lucifer, forſake the glorious preſence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to nature and grace, were more than madneſs to imagine.

SECT. VIII.

That the giants, by Moſes ſo called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as alſo divers in latter times.

OF theſe giants which Moſes calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antwerpian (who thought his own wit more gigantical than the bodies of Nimrod and Hercules) hath written a large diſcourſe, intituled Gigantomachia, and ſtrained his brains to prove, that there were never any ſuch men: his reaſons (whoſoever deſires to loſe time) he may find them in the treatiſes before named. It is true, that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian poets for their monſtrous fictions: who affirm ſhameleſly, that the giants have in elder times not only caſt up mountains upon mountains, but removed iſlands out of the ſea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of caſting up hills, and making war with the gods, no doubt but that the ſame was borrowed out of the ſtory of Nimrod, as before remembred; and even out of this ſcripture, that the ſons of God ſaw the daughters of men, of whom the firſt giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Heſiodus, that giants were the ſons of the heaven and the earth; meaning by the heavens the ſons of God, and by the earth the daughters of men: which verſes of Orpheus are by John Caſſam (who hath written a witty diſcourſe of this ſubject) thus changed into Latin:

Nomine cœleſtes illos dixere gigantes,
Orti quod terra fuerint & ſanguine cœli.

From the earth, and from thy blood, O heaven they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did giants name.

But what will not opiniators and ſelf-believing men diſpute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the firſt age ſuch kind of men; and of which there have been in all times ſince? ſeeing the ſcriptures avow the one manifeſtly, and common experience the other?

And

And for that ſuperlative ſtraining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of giants was given to oppreſſors and tyrants, and not to ſtrength of body and eminent ſtature: ſuch men might with better reaſon call them oppreſſors becauſe they were giants, and therefore had ability to oppreſs, than ſay, that they were called giants only becauſe oppreſſors. For firſt Moſes himſelf calleth them mighty men; which ſheweth a ſtrength ſurpaſſing others: and afterwards, men of renown (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous action. And if the ſame ſtature of body, and ability had not been found among divers nations after the general flood, then might this place of Moſes have more willingly hearkened to a diſpute, and yielded to interpretation.

But beſides all theſe famous giants found in prophane hiſtories (which I will reſerve to accompany the giants of Albion in the ſtory of Britany) the ſcriptures do clearly and without all allegorical conſtruction avow, that, beſides Nimrod, there were found of theſe giants in the time of Abraham, of Moſes, of Joſhua, and of David; namely, the [a] Rephaims in Aſteroth; the Zuzæi or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the land of Moab: whom Moſes (for ſtature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they alſo were taken for giants as the Anakims: likewiſe where Moſes ſpeaketh of the land of Ammon, he uſeth theſe words, [b] That alſo was taken for a land of giants, for giants dwelt therein aforetimes: and whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And theſe giants called Rephaims in Aſteroth and Kernaim, and the Zuzæi or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam overthrew, aſſiſted by other kings his aſſociates. Alſo the prophet [c] Amos found among the Ammonites men of giant-like ſtature, whom he compareth to the cedar, and whoſe ſtrength to the oaks; and the prophet [d] Baruch, Theſe were the giants famous from the beginning, that were of ſo great ſtature, and ſo expert in war. Particularly it is written of [e] Og, king of Baſan, that his bed of iron was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad: for only Og king of Baſan remained of the remnant of the giants, who commanded the kingdom of Baſan, four hundred years after the expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover thoſe diſcoverers and ſearchers of the land of promiſe (ſent by Moſes from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their return of the great ſtature of thoſe people in general, and eſpecially of the ſons of Anak, in theſe words. [f] All the people which we ſaw in it are men of great ſtature: for there we ſaw giants, the ſons of Anak which come of the giants, ſo that we ſeemed in our ſights like graſs-hoppers, and ſo we were in their ſight (that is) the ſearchers found in their own judgments a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themſelves: inſomuch that the Iſraelites were ſo ſtricken with fear, as they rather ſought and deſired to return again into [g] Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former ſlavery, than to fall by the ſtrokes of thoſe fearful nations. Furthermore the ſcriptures put us out of doubt, that [h] Goliah the Philiſtine of Gath was a giant of ſix cubits and a ſpan long: the armour which he wore weighed five thouſand ſheckles of braſs: the ſhaft of his ſpear was like a weavers beam, and his ſpear-head weighed ſix hundred ſheckles of iron. Alſo in [i] Samuel there is mention of another Goliah ſirnamed Getheus, becauſe he was of Gath: and of three other giants; of which the firſt was ſlain by [k] Jehonathan, David's nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great ſtature, and his fingers were by ſixes, even four and twenty.

Alſo that [l] Sampſon was of ſurpaſſing ſtrength no man doubteth, who tore a lion as it had been a kid, and after [m] ſlew thirty of the Philiſtines, and (after that) a thouſand more of them with a jaw-bone of an aſs; and laſtly he took the [n] gates of Azzah, and the two poſts, and lifted them away with the bars, and put them upon his ſhoulders, and carried them to the top of the mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgment, that both nature and the heavens wax old, and that the great age of time hath (with it ſelf) infeebled and almoſt worn out the virtue of all things; then I ſay, that as in all other kinds the earth (before that ſin had increaſed the curſe and corruption) brought forth her young ones more ſtrong and beautiful than it did in after-ages: ſo alſo thoſe giants, thoſe mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature and ſtrength of thoſe giants remembred by Moſes of his own time, and after him their ſucceſſors, as the ordinary proportion of all men in general, ſoon after the flood and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born in the withered quarter and winter of the world: If therefore giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the firſt flouriſhing youth and newneſs of the world.

But the wickedneſs (eſpecially in cruelty and oppreſſion) of theſe men was ſuch, as God therefore by the flood gave end to all fleſh, but to the juſt Noah and his family. [o] And God repented him that he had made man; which St. Auguſtine thus expoundeth: [p] Neque enim ſicut hominem, ita Deum facti ſui pœnitet, cujus eſt de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa ſententia, quam certa præſcientia. Sed ſi non utatur ſcriptura talibus verbis, non ſe quodammodo familiarius inſinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult eſſe conſultum: ut & perterreat ſuperbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes. God (ſaith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men uſe to do:) but if the ſcripture did not uſe thoſe words, or the like, it ſhould not (in a ſort) inſinuate it ſelf familiarly to all ſorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrify the proud, ſtir up the negligent, exerciſe the ſearchers of truth, and nouriſh thoſe that underſtand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly riſing, and hardly at length vaniſhing in the world: and of the reliques of truth touching theſe ancient times, obſcurely appearing in fables and old legends.

SECT. I.

That in old corruptions we may find ſome ſigns of more ancient truth.

HERE before we proceed any further, the occaſion offereth it ſelf for us to conſider, how the Greeks and other more ancient nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the ſtory of the creation, and by delivering it over in a myſtical ſenſe, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have ſought to obſcure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive thoſe intermix'd diſcourſes of God and nature for the inventions of poets and philoſophers, and not as any thing borrowed or ſtolen out of the books of God. But as a skilful and learned Chymiſt can as well by ſeparation of viſible elements draw helpful medicines out of poiſon, as poiſon of the moſt healthful herbs and plants (all things having in themſelves both life and death) ſo, contrary to the purpoſes and hopes of the heathen, may thoſe which ſeek after God and truth find out every where, and in all the ancient poets and philoſophers, the ſtory of the firſt age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively expreſs'd.

SECT. II.

That the corruptions themſelves were very ancient: as in the family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

BUT this defection and falling away from God, which was firſt found in angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning mankind it took ſuch effect, that thereby (the liberal grace of God being withdrawn) all the poſterity of our firſt parents were afterwards born and bred in the world, ſuffering a perpetual eclipſe of ſpiritual light. Hence it was that it produced plants of ſuch imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general flood could not ſo waſh out or depure, but that the ſame defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, even among the few ſons of Noah there were found ſtrong effects of the former poiſon. For as the children of Shem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; ſo the ſons of Cham did poſſeſs the vices of the ſons of Cain, and of thoſe wicked giants of the firſt age. Whence the Chaldeans began ſoon after the flood to aſcribe divine power and honour to the creature, which was only due to the Creator. Firſt, they worſhipped the ſun, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phenicians did not only learn to leave the true God, but created twelve ſeveral gods, and divine powers, whom they worſhipped; and unto whom they built altars and temples. For Herodotus ſaith, [a] Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in uſu habuiſſe, atque Græcos ab illis cepiſſe mutuatos, eoſque prius aras, & imagines & templa Diis ſibi erexiſſe. The Egyptians (ſaith he) firſt deviſed the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who firſt erected unto themſelves altars, images, and temples for the gods.

SECT. III.

That in proceſs of time theſe leſſer errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the groſs ſuperſtitions of the Egyptians.

BUT as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travel towards their eternal perdition: ſo did theſe groſs and blind idolaters every age after other deſcend lower and lower, and ſhrink and ſlide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby err in worſhipping mortal men only, but they gave divine reverence, and had the ſame reſpect to beaſts, birds, fiſhes, fowls, winds, earth, water, air, fire, to the morning, to the evening, to the plants, trees and roots, to paſſions and affections of the mind, to paleneſs, ſickneſs, ſorrows, yea to the moſt unworthy and baſeſt of all theſe. Which barbarous blaſphemy Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner.

Tu maximum anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obſoniorum credidi ſuaviſſimum,
Carnes ſuillas tu caves, at gaudeo
Hijs maxime: canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem ubi deprehendo forte obſonium.

I ſacrifice to God the beef, which you adore:
I broil the Egyptian eels, which you (as God) implore:
You fear to eat the fleſh of ſwine, I find it ſweet.
You worſhip dogs, to beat them I think meet,
When they my ſtore devour.

And in this manner Juvenal.

[c] Porrum aut cæpe nefas violare aut frangere morſu:
O ſanctas gentes, quibus hæc naſcuntur in hortis Numina!

The Egyptians think it ſin to root up, or to bite
Their leeks or onions, which they ſerve with holy rite:
O happy nations, which of their own ſowing
Have ſtore of gods in every garden growing.

SECT. IV.

That from the reliques of ancient records among the Egyptians and others, the firſt idols and fables were invented: and that the firſt Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

BUT in ſo great a confuſion of vanities, where among the heathens themſelves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of theſe inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the firſt age, and of whatſoever was done therein; partly from ſome inſcriptions upon ſtone or metal remaining after the flood; and partly from Mizraim the ſon of Cham, who had learnt the ſame of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient kings and date of times cannot be feigned. And tho' other nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters alſo, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the reſt which [d] St. Auguſtine out of Varro; Euſebius out of many prophane hiſtories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have obſerved, to wit, the Phenicians, Phrygians, Cretans, Greeks, and other nations; yet was Cain the ſon of Adam (as ſome very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the firſt and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the firſt Saturn: for Jupiter was ſaid to have invented the founding of cities; and the firſt city of the world was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Enochii before remembred. And ſo much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which alſo Higinus in his 275th chapter confirmeth. For beſides that many cities were founded by divers men, Tamen primam latiſſimam a primo & antiquiſſimo Jove ædificatam; yet the firſt and largeſt was built by the firſt and moſt ancient Jupiter, ſeated in the eaſt parts, or in India, according to that of Moſes: [e] And Cain dwelt towards the eaſt ſide of Eden, &c. where alſo the Enochii were found after the flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a founder of cities, and Herceios, an incloſer or ſtrengthner of cities; (ſay [a] Phornutus and Pauſanias;) and that to Jupiter Herceios there were in very many places altars and temples erected. And that there were cities built before the flood, Plato alſo witneſſeth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that ſoon after mankind began to increaſe, they built many cities; which as his meaning he delivereth in plain terms, in his third book of laws: for he ſaith, that cities were built an exceeding ſpace of time before the deſtruction by the great flood.

This Jupiter of the Ethnicks was then the ſame Cain, the ſon of Adam, who marrying his own ſiſter (as alſo Jupiter is ſaid to have done) inhabited the eaſt, where Stephanus de urbibus placeth the city Henochia. And beſides this city of Henoch, Philo Judæus conceiveth that Cain built ſix others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Jeſeta, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the firſt Jupiter, and from whom alſo the Ethnicks had the invention of ſacrifice: ſo were [b] Jubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inventors of paſtorage, ſmiths-craft, and muſick) the ſame, which were called by the ancient prophane writers [c] Mercurius, Vulcan and Apollo: and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan; ſo doth Auguſtine expound the name of Noema or Naamah, the ſiſter of Tubalcain, to ſignify Venuſta, or beautiful, voluptas, or pleaſure: as the wife of Vulcan is ſaid to be Venus, the lady of pleaſure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and firſt Saturn, Cain the eldeſt Jupiter, Eva, Rhea, and Noema or Naamah the firſt Venus: ſo did the fable of the dividing of the world between the three brethren the ſons of Saturn ariſe, from the true ſtory of the dividing of the earth between the three brethren the ſons of Noah: ſo alſo was the fiction of thoſe golden apples kept by a dragon taken from the ſerpent, which tempted Evah: ſo was Paradiſe it ſelf tranſported out of Aſia into Africa, and made the garden of the Heſperides: the prophecies, that Chriſt ſhould break the ſerpent's head, and conquer the power of hell, occaſioned the fables of Hercules killing the ſerpent of Heſperides, and deſcending into hell, and captivating Cerberus: ſo out of the taking up of Enoch by God was borrowed the converſion of their Heroes (the inventors of religion and ſuch arts as the life of man had profit by) into ſtars and heavenly ſigns, and (withal) that leaving of the world, and aſcenſion of Aſtrea; of which Ovid.

Aſtrea laſt of heavenly wights the earth did leave.

For altho' thereby the [e] Ethnicks would underſtand juſtice it ſelf to have failed, as it is a virtue abſtract, and may be conſidered without a perſon; yet as it is uſual among the ancient poets to deſcribe virtues and vices by the perſons of men and women, as deſire by Cupid, valour by Mars, beauty or luſt by Venus, ſo do they alſo the perſons of men by like virtues and vices; and therefore by juſtice and Aſtrea, Enoch: the juſtice and piety of Enoch being in the ſame manner expreſt, as that of Noah was by Moſes, for Noah was ſaid to be a juſt man; [f] And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, [g] that he walked with God, and he was no more ſeen: for God took him away.

From this ſtory alſo of the firſt age, and from that part where Moſes remembreth the giants begotten by the ſons of good men upon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moſes calleth mighty men, and men of renown) did they ſteal thoſe wondrous great acts of their ancient kings, and powerful giants and again their war undertaken againſt the Gods, from the building of the tower of Babel by the giant Nimrod, as [h] St. Auguſtine termeth him. Which war of their giants Cornelius Severus thus deſcribeth:

Tentavêre (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captivique Jovis transferre gigantes:
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cœlo.

The giants did advance their wicked hand
Againſt the ſtars, to thruſt them headling down;
And robbing Jove of his impartial crown,
On conquered heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purpoſed to raiſe the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the ſtars, ſhould bury them under the moiſture of a ſecond flood, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the law to heaven it ſelf. Alſo the making of leagues, peace and covenants among heathen nations and kings, confirmed by ſacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneids hath a touch, was as it ſeemeth borrowed from Moſes, Exod. 24. Who, when he read the book of the covenant, ſprinkled the people with blood.

[i] We find alſo many remembrances of Seth, the paternal anceſtor of Enoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the ſame king of Egypt, which reigned at ſuch time as Moſes carried thence the children of Iſrael (as of late ſome learned men, miſtaking his time, ſuppoſed) called his ſon and ſucceſſor Setho, of Seth, and of the ſame Seth (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the princes of Thrace called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. [k] But herein was the memory of Seth moſt manifeſtly preſerved, that the Egyptians worſhipped Seth, as their moſt ancient parent, and of the firſt tradition, in honour of whom they called a principal province Setheitica. [l] We alſo find in Bithynia the city of Sethia, and others of the ſame name elſewhere. And ſure from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of theology, tho' they ſcorned to acknowledge any antiquity preceding their own; and that they might not ſeem to learn elſewhere, they gave the ſame names to their own idols which the Egyptians did to theirs.

SECT. V.

Of the three chiefeſt Jupiters; and the ſtrange ſtory of the third.

BUT of all thoſe armies of Jupiters remembred by the ancients, Cicero maketh but three, becauſe thoſe were of moſt fame: which other writers have alſo done, who ſought out, and laboured in their originals.

The firſt was Jupiter, the ſon of Æther and Dies, ſo called, becauſe the one had reference to his celeſtial conditions (for Æther is as much as ſhining or pure fire) the other diſcovered his natural virtues, which days and times make more perfect, and are the witneſſes of mens actions.

The ſecond was ſaid to be the ſon of Cœlum or heaven, for the ſame former reſpect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and king of Athens.

The

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were deviſed, was of Crete (now Candie) the ſon of Saturn and Ops. The name derived from the Latin is taken of Juvans Pater, from the Greek word Zeus, it ſignifieth life, but ſomewhat ſtrained. Boccas in his genealogy of the Gods conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the planet; but whether that ſtar had ſuch a name, before the ſame was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moiſt, temperate, modeſt, honeſt, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful (that is) giving theſe inclinations. And therefore thoſe ancient kings beautified with theſe conditions, might be called there after Jupiter; but howſoever they were, or were not with thoſe virtues enriched, yet, by imitation, all kings in the eldeſt times aſſumed thoſe titles and ſurnames: great princes affecting as high titles of honour and reputation of the world (howſoever deſerved) as the worthieſt, that ever were, acquired by their well-deſervings. Joves omnes reges vocarunt antiqui; The ancients called all kings Jupiters, as Tzetzes in his varia hiſtoria confirmeth: Reges olim Joves vocarunt omnes: In old time all nations called their kings Jupiters. But where this laſt and moſt remembred Jupiter was born it is uncertain. [a] Some there are that make him of Crete: others, that he was but ſent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be foſtered and hidden from the fury of Titan his uncle: becauſe it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger brother, and reigning (for his own life) by Titan's permiſſion, he ſhould put to death all his male children, leſt the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their ſucceſſion; which agreement becauſe Saturn performed in his firſt born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latin.

Haud ſit pinguior,
Crudis ſepulchrum quod ſit ipſe filiis.

Saturn to be the fatter is not known,
By being the grave and burial of his own.

This compoſition between Titan and Saturn, Sibylla alſo witneſſeth in theſe:

Conceptis verbis; Titan jurare coegit
Saturnum, de ſe natum ne nutriat ullum,
Quo poſſint regnare ſenis poſt fata nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturn ſwear,
No ſon to nouriſh; which by reigning might Uſurp the right of Titan's lawful heir.

But Opis, the mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno, conveyed Jupiter (firſt called Lyſanias) into Crete, as ſhe did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnoſſus, the chief city of that iſland, by [b] Creſta the king, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Theban: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Meſſena. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and firſt foſtering. Some affirm, that he was fed by honey-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and ſkins into yellow; a reward well fitting ſuch a God: others, that he was nouriſhed by bears: others, by goats: and of all theſe the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturn had broken his faith, he ſet on him, and took him and his wife priſoners, whom Jupiter again reſcued and delivered.

But laſtly, the father and the ſon equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the leſs powerful fled into Italy, and left his kingdoms in Greece to his ſon. And altho' this prince at the firſt purchaſed great honour, and for his many virtues the name of Jupiter was given him; yet, after he was once ſettled and became potent, he gave himſelf over wholly to palliardiſe and adultery, without all reſpect of honour, law, or religion. And it is reported by ſuch, as do aſcribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith ſatisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the ſin of Sodom with Ganymedes and others; and did not only begin with inceſt, marrying his own ſiſter Juno, but he raviſhed, betrayed, ſtole away, and took by ſtrong hand all the beautiful women born in his time, within the limits of his own kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom theſe hereafter written were of greateſt fame, Niobe, Laodemia and Alcmena the wife of Amphitryon, by whom he had Pelaſgus, Sarpedon, Argus and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the mountain Taygetus took name, with another ſon called Saon, of whom Savona: by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Caſtor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemneſtra: by Danaë Perſeus: by Jordana Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protogenia he had Athlius the father of Endymion; and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that country took name, for ſo the Greeks afterwards called Africa. He raviſhed Ægina, the daughter of Æſopus, and carried her into the iſland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterwards called Ægina, on whom he begat Æacus: by Torhebia he had Archeſilaus and Carbius: by Ora Colaxes: he had alſo Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterwards Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis Hiarbas. He had beſides theſe (if they belie not their chief God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inventors of bakers craft, and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all theſe, who were born in ages ſo far differing. And of theſe his ſeveral raviſhments, betrayings, ſtealing away of mens wives, daughters and ſons, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all thoſe ancient fables of his transformations into ſhowers of gold, eagles, bulls, birds, and beaſts, and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this monſter, Optimus Maximus, tho' Cicero in his ſecond book de natura deorum affirms, that he deſerv'd nothing leſs: And in his oration pro domo ſua reproacheth Clodius for his inceſt, by the name of Jupiter. His burial was in Crete (ſaith Lucian) [c] Cretenſes non ſolum natum apud ſe & ſepultum Jovem teſtantur, ſed etiam ſepulchrum ejus oſtendunt. The Cretans or Candians do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they ſhew his grave and ſepulchre: which Epiphanius alſo confirmeth, for in his time there remained the monuments of his tomb in the mountain Jaſius. This Callimachus in his hymns alſo witneſſeth, but as offended thereat, ſaith thus:

The Cretans ever liars were, they care not what they ſay:
For they a tomb have built for thee, O king, that [liv'ſt alway.

[d] Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as he ſaith) by ſome Greek writers, that the original of theſe gods was from the weſtern parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantidæ reigned one Uranus (which ſignifieth heaven) called ſo for his great skill in Aſtrology, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many wives, forty-five ſons; but by his principal wife Titea he had ſeventeen ſons and two daughters, all which were called after their mother's name Titanes. Of Titea likewiſe it is ſaid, that ſhe for her goodneſs was canonized as a goddeſs, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was ſtiled Heaven. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Baſilea (which name ſounding as queen in Engliſh, ſhe is by the Latin tranſlator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the reſt as far in virtue as in years, was by general conſent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as queen after her father's death, being as yet a virgin. She took to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom ſhe bare a ſon and a daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardlineſs of theſe children moved her brethren to envy, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the ſucceſſion: wherefore they took the boy and drowned him in the river Eridanus, now called Po. The loſs of this child cauſed his ſiſter to break her own neck; and the loſs of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with cymbals, after a wild faſhion, in ſight of all the people, before whom ſhe is ſaid to have vaniſhed away. Ere ſhe died, her ſon (as the fable hath it) ſignified unto her in a dream, that he and his ſiſter by the providence of God ſhould become immortal, that alſo the Sun and Moon ſhould be called by their names, and that their death ſhould be revenged upon their murderers. According to which it is ſaid, that the people did ſo call thoſe two planets, and withal held herſelf as a goddeſs, and termed her the great mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cheriſhing her brethren whilſt they were young. Hyperion and his race being extinguiſhed, the other ſons of Uranus divided the kingdom. Of theſe Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the countries lying about the mountains, which afterwards bare his name; a juſt and wiſe prince, deeply ſkilful in Aſtrology, and for invention of the ſphere ſaid to have ſupported heaven. He had many ſons, but the principal of them, called Heſperus, being of his father's qualities and ſtudies, was ſaid to have been carried away by the wind, from the top of an high hill in the midſt of his contemplations, and his name, in honour of him, impoſed by the people upon the morning ſtar. The ſeven daughters of Atlas were alſo ſaid to have been excellent ladies, who accompanying ſuch as came to be deified, or regiſtred among the worthies, brought forth children, anſwerable in quality to thoſe that begat them. Of theſe it is held, that the ſeven ſtars called Pleiades took name. Saturn the brother of Atlas reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italy. Jupiter, another of the ſons of Uranus, reigned in Crete, who had ten ſons which he called Curetes; he called that iſland after his wife's name Idea; in which iſle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter muſt not have been that great one, but uncle to the great Jupiter, if theſe fables of the Libyans were true. Saturn (as theſe Libyans tell the tale) was a great tyrant, and fortified ſtrong places, the better to keep his people in ſubjection. His ſiſter Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in ſome part of Africk. Hammon loving others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerva, near to the river Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He alſo begat on Amalthea a ſon called Bacchus, whom he cauſed ſecretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nyſa, an iſland in the river Triton, under the tuition of his daughter Minerva, and certain nymphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly country, that lay on the ſea coaſt, bending in form of a horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentiful horn, famous among the poets. When Rhea heard this news, ſhe fled from her husband to her brother Saturn, who not only entertained her as a ſiſter, but took her to wife, and at her inſtigation made war upon Hammond, vanquiſhed him by the aſſiſtance of the Titans, and made him fly into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before-mentioned, held the iſland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the king's daughter, whom he took to wife, and had with her (women as may ſeem being very gracious in thoſe times) the kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of wine, the art of planting trees, and many things elſe commodious for mankind, before the flight of his mother-in-law. Now therefore hearing report of all that happened, and that Saturn was coming againſt him with the Titans; he levied an army, to which the Amazons, living not far from Nyſa, added great forces, in love of Minerva who was entred into their profeſſion. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they ſet forward againſt Saturn, met him, overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans priſoners, returned to Nyſa; where pardoning the priſoners, that promiſed to become his true followers, he prepared for a ſecond expedition. In the ſecond expedition he behaved himſelf ſo well, that he won the love of all the people by whom he paſſed; inſomuch, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous government, he was greatly ſtrengthened, and the enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the city of Hammon, he won a battle of Saturn, before the very walls. After which Saturn with his wife Rhea fled by night, ſetting the town on fire to deſpite Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturn had a young ſon by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus took with him in a great expedition that he made into the eaſt countries; and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a boy, governor of the country; but appointed unto him as an overſeer, one Olympius, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilſt Bacchus travelled thro' all nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titans had found out his father Hammond in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India; with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his ſiſter Minerva, together with the reſt that afterwards were held as gods, joining all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chaſed them, took, and ſlew them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammond and Bacchus were dead, they were deify'd; and the great Jupiter the ſon of Saturn ſucceeding them, reigned lord alone over all the world, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to diſturb him. Between this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Oſiris, there is a rude reſemblance, that may cauſe them both to be taken for the crooked images of ſome one true hiſtory. For the expeditions of Oſiris, and of Bacchus; the wars of the giants in the one ſtory, of the Titans in the other; the kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Libycus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Iſis, and the cymbals of Baſilea, with many petty circumſtances, nearly enough reſemble each other, howſoever not alike fitted to the right perſons. Sanchoniato choniato (as [a] Euſebius cites him) would have all theſe to be Phenicians, and is earneſt in ſaying, that it is a true ſtory, and no allegory. Yet he makes it ſeem the more allegorical, by giving to Uranus or heaven for daughters, Fate and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, tho' Diodorus have enough. To the genealogy he adds Elius or the Sun, as father of Uranus; and among the children of Uranus, Japetus, Bætilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withal to Uranus the proper name of Terrenus or indigena, and of Illus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The pedigree of them is this.

SECT. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof ſome got, ſome affected the name of gods.

OF Jupiter Belus, the ſon of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwiſe Nimrod, it ſeemeth that Cicero had not heard (at leaſt by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after theſe times were the Greeks but ſalvages, if they ſeek no farther off for their gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the flood, began (ſomewhat before this Chaldean Jupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their own Mizraim, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the etymology of this word [Hammon] which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the ſands, is ridiculous (ſaith [b] Peucer) neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hammath, which ſignifieth heat: becauſe the ſaid temple of Jupiter Hammon was ſeated in Libya, where the air is exceeding hot and ſcorching. And as for the antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the moſt renowned) it is certain that he was born not long before the war of Troy, as by many of his ſons is made manifeſt; namely, Caſtor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom, Troy was deſtroyed.

Now ſeeing that mortal men, and the moſt wicked, were eſteemed immortal among the heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tiberius, Nero, Caligula, and others ſought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monſters as the reſt: For by what reaſon could the ſame deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus? ſeeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as ſhe was.

SECT. VII.

That the wiſer of the ancient heathen had far better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of theſe fooleries, it cannot be ſuſpected, tho' ſome of them (over-buſily) have mixed their own inventions with the ſcriptures: for, in puniſhment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Heſiod in hell, where he feigned that they were perpetually ſtung and pinched with ſerpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the books of Moſes, as by places ſtolen thence almoſt word for word, may appear; of which Juſtin Martyr remembreth many in that treatiſe converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, tho' he diſſembled in ſome things, for fear of the inquiſition of the Areopagites, yet St. Auguſtine hath already anſwered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice iis delectatus eſt, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, ſaith Juſtin Martyr. Now however Lactantius pleaſed to reprehend Plato, becauſe (ſaith he) Plato ſought knowledge from the Egyptians and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Jews and books of Moſes: [a] Euſebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reaſon to believe the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or ſavouring of divinity: and the ſame opinion had St. Ambroſe of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the ſame vanity, which poſſeſs'd all thoſe learned philoſophers and poets, that Plato alſo publiſh'd (not under the right authors names) thoſe things which he had read in the ſcriptures; or fearing the ſeverity of the [b] Areopagites, and the example of his maſter Socrates, by them put to death by poiſon, I cannot judge. Juſtin Martyr (as it ſeemeth) aſcribeth it wholly to Plato's fear, whoſe words among many other of the ſame effect, are theſe, [c] Plato Moſis mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum ſolumque Deum docuerat, ſibi apud Athenienſes tutum non putavit, veritus Areopagum; Plato fearing the Areopagites thought it not ſafe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moſes, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that divinity which he hath written in Timæo; Id ipſum de Deo diſſeruit quod & Moſes; He diſcourſed and taught the ſame of God (ſaith Juſtin Martyr) which Moſes did. For where it pleaſed God by his angel to anſwer Moſes, Ego ſum exiſtens (which is) [d] I am; and exiſtens miſit me ad vos, I am hath ſent me unto you; herein did Plato (ſaith Juſtine Martyr) no otherwiſe differ than that Moſes uſed the word [qui] and Plato the word [quod:] Moſes enim qui exiſtit (inquit,) Plato quod exiſtit. For Moſes ſaith, He who is; Plato, That which is. Now of God's incomprehenſible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or expreſs the ſame, he giveth this teſtimony: [e] Genitorem univerſitatis tam difficile eſt invenire, quam inventum impoſſibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the univerſal, as it is impoſſible, if he were found, to ſpeak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the majeſty of God's nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? [f] Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus cauſa bonorum; malorum autem omnium non cauſa; God is abſolutely good, and ſo (aſſuredly) the cauſe of all that is good; but of any thing that is evil he is no cauſe at all: and again, Charitas Dei fuit cauſa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cauſe of the world's creating, and the original of all things. Apuleius the Platoniſt, Summus Deus infinitus eſt, non ſolum loci excluſione, ſed etiam naturæ dignitate: & nihil eſt Deo ſimilius & gratius, quam vir animo perfecto bonus; The moſt high God is alſo an infinite God, not only by excluſion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God, than a man of a perfect heart. [g] Thales affirmed, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the moſt ancient, quia nunquam eſſe cœpit, becauſe he never had any beginning: Zeno, that God beheld even the thoughts of Men: Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, becauſe God was every where preſent, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moſes's ſtory of the creation, than this opinion and deſcription of the world's beginning in Euripides, ſcholar of Anaxagoras?

Cœlum terraque unius formæ fuit:
Sed cum fuiſſent abjuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emerſit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aves, feræ, quaſque affert mare,
Genuſque mortalium.

Heaven and earth one form did bear:
But when disjoined once they were
From mutual embraces.
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beaſts, fiſhes, and men
The ſtill remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: ſo we find the ſame excellent underſtanding in Orpheus, who every where expreſſed the infinite and ſole power of one God, tho' he uſes the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envy and danger of the time; but that he could attribute thoſe things to the ſons of men and mortal creatures, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (ſaith Mirandula) quos Orpheus canit, non decipientium dæmonum, a quibus malum & non bonum provenit; ſed naturalium virtutum divinarumque ſunt nomina; The names of thoſe gods whom Orpheus doth ſing, are not of deceiving devils, from whom evil comes, and not goodneſs; but they are the names of natural and divine virtues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and ſpeaketh of God himſelf, this his inſtruction to Muſæus, and the hymn following teach us. Reſpiciens vero ad divinum hunc ſermonem ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem aſcende viam, & ſolum aſpice mundi regem. Unus eſt ex ſe genitus, ex eo omnia nata ſunt: ipſe vero in illis verſatur, nec quiſquam eum intueri poteſt mortalium, ſed ipſe nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my ſacred ſpeech, but truly lend
Thy heart, that's reaſon's ſphere, and the right way aſcend,
And ſee the world's ſole king. Firſt, he is ſimply one Begotten of himſelf, from whom is born alone
All elſe; in which he's ſtill, nor could it ere befall
A mortal eye to ſee him once, yet he ſees all.

And again the ſame author.

Now beſides theſe former teſtimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not ſo ſtupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the reader to thoſe large and learned collections of Juſtin Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Euſebius, Eugubinus, Peucer, Pleſſis, Danæus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, deſcrib'd him by theſe attributes and properties, Bonus, juſtus, ſanctus, ſeipſum poſſidens, utilis, ſpecioſus, optimus, ſeverus, liber, ſemper commodus, tutus, glorioſus, charitas, &c. Good, juſt, holy, poſſeſſing himſelf, profitable, beautiful, beſt, ſevere, free, always doing good, ſafe without fear, glorious, and ſelf-charity. Epicharmus affirm'd, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus. Rex omnium ipſe ſolus; He is the only King of all kings; and with Pindarus the poet, Deus unus, Pater, Creator ſummus, atque optimus Artifex, qui progreſſus ſingulis diverſos ſecundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the moſt high Creator, and beſt Artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deſerts. This God (ſaith Antiſthenes) cannot be reſembled to any thing, and therefore not elſewhere known; Niſi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes; Save only in that everlaſting country, whoſe image thou haſt none at all. Hereof alſo Xenophanes Colophonius, Unus Deus inter Deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus ſimilis; There is one God among Gods and men moſt powerful, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quieſcere facit, magnus potenſque, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma ſit, nemini patet, niſi ipſi ſoli, qui luce ſua omnia perluſtrat; God who ſhaketh all things, and ſetteth all thing at reſt, is great and mighty, as is manifeſt to all: but of what form he is, it is manifeſt to none, ſave only to himſelf, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato ſaith, Totius rerum naturæ Cauſa, & Ratio, & Origo Deus, ſummus animi Genitor, æternus animantium Soſpitator, aſſiduus mundi ſui Opifex, ſine propagatione Genitor, neque loco neque tempore ullo comprehenſus; eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the Cauſe, Ground, and Original of the whole nature of things, the moſt high Father of the ſoul, the eternal Preſerver of living creatures, the continual Framer of his world, a Begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can expreſs what he is. Therefore was it ſaid by St. Jerome, [a] Si enim cunctos philoſophorum revolvas libros, neceſſe eſt ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vaſorum Dei, ut apud Platonem, Fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud Zenonem Stoicorum principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou conſider all the books of the philoſophers, thou canſt not but find in them ſome part of the veſſels of God, as in Plato, God the Creator of the world: in Zeno prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal ſouls. And this is certain, that if we look into the wiſdom of all ages, we ſhall find, that there never was man of ſolid underſtanding or excellent judgment; never any man whoſe mind the art of education hath not bended; whoſe eyes a fooliſh ſuperſtition hath not afterwards blinded; whoſe apprehenſions are ſober, and by a penſive inſpection advis'd; but that he hath found by an irreſiſtible neceſſity, one true God, and everlaſting Being, all for ever cauſing, and all for ever ſuſtaining; which no man among the heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly expreſs'd, than that Egyptian Hermes, howſoever it failed afterwards in his poſterity: all being at length by deviliſh policy of the Egyptian prieſts purpoſely obſcur'd; who invented new Gods, and thoſe innumerable, beſt ſorting (as the devil perſuaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fitteſt to keep in awe and order their common people.

SECT. VIII.

That Heatheniſm and Judaiſm, after many wounds, were at length about the ſame time under Julian miraculouſly confounded.

BUT all theſe are again vaniſhed: for the inventions of mortal men are no leſs mortal than themſelves. The fire, which the Chaldeans worſhipped for a God, is crept into every man's chimney, which the lack of fuel ſtarveth, water quencheth, and want of air ſuffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's jealouſies; death hath perſuaded him to chaſtity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it ſelf, hath alſo eaten up both the bodies and images of him and his: yea, their ſtately temples of ſtone and dureful marble. The houſes and ſumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the earth; nor any monument of that glorious temple conſecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Theſſalia, or elſewhere, that can aſk counſel or help from Jupiter. The great God Pan hath broken his pipes; Apollo's prieſts are become ſpeechleſs; and the trade of riddles in oracles, with the devil's telling mens fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and cozening aſtrologers.

But it was long ere the devil gave way to theſe his overthrows and diſhonours: for after the temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief manſions) was many times robbed, burnt, and deſtroyed; yet by his diligence the ſame was often enrich'd, repair'd, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himſelf it received the laſt and utter ſubverſion. For it was firſt robbed of all the idols and ornaments therein by the Eubean pirates; ſecondly, By the Phlegians utterly ſack'd: thirdly, By Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles: fourthly, By the army of Xerxes: fifthly, By the captains of the Phocenſes: ſixthly, By Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen images: all which were new made, and therein again ſet up at the common charge. But whatſoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Conſtantine, the Chriſtian army made ſpoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithſtanding all this it was again glorioufly rebuilt, and ſo remain'd till ſuch time as Julian the Apoſtate ſent thither to know the ſucceſs of his Parthian enterpriſe, at which time it was utterly burnt and conſumed with fire from heaven; and the image of Apollo himſelf, and all the reſt of the idols therein molten down and loſt in the earth.

The like ſucceſs had the Jews in the ſame Julian's time, when by his permiſſion they aſſembled themſelves to rebuild the temple of Jeruſalem: for while they were buſied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an earthquake, and many thouſands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruins, and others ſlain, and ſcattered by tempeſt and thunder: though [a] Am. Marcellinus reports it more favourably for the Jews, aſcribing this to the nature of that element. For, ſaith he, Alypius and the ruler of the province of Judea, being by Julian buſied in the re-edifying of this temple, flaming balls of fire iſſuing near the foundation, and oft conſuming the workmen, made the enterprize fruſtrate.

SECT. IX.

Of the laſt refuges of the devil to maintain his kingdom.

NOW the devil, becauſe he cannot play upon the open ſtage of this world (as in thoſe days) and being ſtill as induſtrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men; and inhabiting in the temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himſelf than ever. For whereas he firſt taught them to ſacrifice to monſters, to dead ſtones cut into faces of beaſts, birds, and other mix'd natures; he now ſets before them the high and ſhining idol of glory, the all-commanding image of bright gold. He tells them that truth is the goddeſs of dangers and oppreſſions; that chaſtity is the enemy of nature: and laſtly, that as all virtue (in general) is without taſte: ſo pleaſure ſatisfieth and delighteth every ſenſe: for true wiſdom (ſaith he) is exerciſed in nothing elſe, than in the obtaining of power to oppreſs, and of riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his pupils any remorſe, any feeling or fear of God's future judgment, he perſuades them that God hath ſo great need of mens ſouls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timeful return towards God, by laying thoſe great blocks of rugged poverty, and deſpiſed contempt in the narrow paſſage leading to his Divine Preſence. But as the mind of man hath two ports, the one always frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other deſolate and overgrown with graſs, by which enter our charitable thoughts and divine contemplations: ſo hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miſery paſſing by the one, worldly proſperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our ſufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our cruelties, covetouſneſs, licentiouſneſs, injuſtice, and oppreſſions (the harbingers of moſt fearful and terrible ſorrow) ſtaying for us. And as the devil, our moſt induſtrious enemy was ever moſt diligent: ſo he is now more laborious than ever: the long day of mankind drawing faſt towards an evening, and the world's tragedy and time near at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAH's flood.

Of God's fore-warning: and ſome human teſtimonies: and ſome doubting touching the truth of Noah's flood.

OF this deſtruction it pleaſed God to give warning unto Noah: who (ſaith [b] Joſephus) fearing to periſh among the reſt, Secedens cum ſuis, in aliam regionem migravit; He departwith his children, and travelled into another region. And of theſe giants, from whom Noah withdrew himſelf, Beroſus writeth in this manner: That they exceeded in all ſorts of inhuman and unnatural wickedneſs, and that they were contemptores & religionis & Deorum; Contemners of religion and of the Gods: among which mighty men (ſaith Beroſus) Unus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat Noah; There was one more wiſe and reverencing the Gods than the reſt, whoſe name was Noah: who with his three ſons Sem, Japhet and Cham, and with their wives, and the wife of Noah (namely Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preſerved themſelves in the ark. This ark God commanded Noah to prepare: [c] And God ſaid unto Noah, make thee an ark of pine-trees: thou ſhalt make cabins in the ark, and ſhalt pitch it within, and without, with pitch. For God made [d] Noah to know that an end of all fleſh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel generations were already faſhion'd in the clouds, which ſoon after ſhould ſwallow up and cover all living creatures, which breathed in the air: Noah and his family excepted.

But this univerſal grave of waters, and general deluge, hath not been received by all: for divine teſtimonies do not perſuade all natural men to thoſe things, to which their own reaſon cannot reach: [e] Dum obvoluta in obſcuro veritas latet; Whilſt the truth lieth wrapp'd up in obſcurity. Many there are who have diſputed againſt the univerſality of this overflowing, and have judged that this flood of Noah fell but in ſome particular places and kingdoms: moved ſo to think, becauſe in elder ages there have been many other floods (as they ſuppoſe) of that nature. Hereof Nicolaus Damaſcenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Joſephus, [f] Eſt ſuper Minyadam excelſus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes ſermo eſt diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam ſimul in arca devectum in hujus vertice hæſiſſe, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conſervatas, qui fortaſſe is fuit, de quo etiam Moſes Judæorum legiſlator ſcribit: thus far this author. There is (ſaith he) above Minyada (or the country of Minyæ) an exceeding high mountain in Armenia, called Baris; on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were ſaved in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an ark, and reſted upon the top of the mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the ſame, of which Moſes the law-giver of the Jews maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudiſts (ſaith Annius) that many giants ſaved themſelves upon mount Sion.

But Beroſus (who after Moſes was one of the moſt ancient, howſoever he have been ſince deformed and corrupted) doth in the ſubſtance of all agree with Moſes as touching the general flood, taking from thence the beginning of his hiſtory in theſe words: Ante aquarum cladem famoſam, qua univerſus periit orbis, &c. Before that famous deſtruction of waters, by which the world univerſal periſhed: witneſſing withal, that Noah, with his wife Titea, and his three ſons, with their wives (in all eight perſons) were only ſaved.

SECT. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noah's flood.

BUT from the vanity of the Greeks, the corrupters of all truth (ſaith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their antiquity, came the error firſt of all: who therein flattering themſelves alſo, ſought to perſuade the world, that there was no flood preceded the flood of Ogyges, king of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore ſaith Rhodoginus, [a] Ogygium id appellant poëtæ tanquam pervetus dixeris, ab Ogyge vetuſtiſſimo; The poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the moſt ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as thoſe men can make him, yet it is manifeſt, that he lived but in Jacob's time (tho' [b] Euſebius makes him later, and in Moſes's time) and was born 67 years after him.

There is alſo an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he far later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth book of his antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Ægypto regnaſſe autument hunc; unde ſit Cadmus qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à bove jugulato ſic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (ſaith he) who think that this Ogyges did reign in Egypt, whereby he ſhould be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece built Thebes, ſo named of a beef ſlain: becauſe in the Syrian language a beef is called Thebe.

But this flood of Ogyges fell in the year of the world 3440, according to Euſebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the flood of Noah in the year 2242, after the ſame account; and ſo there came 1200 years between theſe floods, wanting but two, though herein Euſebius was much miſtaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronology. Now although the very year and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not preciſely ſet down, but that there is a great difference among writers, yet whoſoever makes it moſt ancient, finds above 500 years difference between that and the general flood.

For [c] Paulus Oroſius affirms, that this tempeſt fell upon the Athenians but 1040 years before Rome was built. Bucholzerus ſaith it was 1043 elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the ſame Bucholzerus) in the world's year 3219, tho' after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reaſons in the ſtory of Abraham) it was built in the world's year 3280. Now the general flood preceded the building of Rome (ſaith Bucholzerus) 1563 years: and the flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by eaſy calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between theſe two floods muſt be 520 years, to which we (allowing 60 more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the ſame of Noah (except we call Noah Ogyges priſcus, [d] as ſome do) it appears by this, that the flood of Ogyges then king of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it ſelf any farther than the banks of Archipelago, or Ægean ſea. For whereas [e] Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witneſs, that the city of Joppe in Judea was founded before the flood; and that (notwithſtanding the weight of waters) their remained on certain altars of ſtone the title of the king, and of his brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their religion: ſure, it is no where found among prophane hiſtorians, nor in the ſcriptures, that ever the flood of Ogyges ſpread it ſelf over any part of Syria, much leſs over all the earth. But that it drown'd both the regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponneſus, it is very probable. For it ſeemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were ſwallowed up (cities ſeated on the north part of Peloponneſus) of which Ovid.

Bura and Helice on Achaian ground
Are ſought in vain, but under ſea are found.

Of this flood of Ogyges was invented the fable of [g] Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Cœus, the ſon of Titan, being beloved and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they ſay) no part of the earth to be delivered on; and withal cauſed the monſtrous ſerpent Python to follow and affright her, whereſoever ſhe travelled, till at length arriving at the iſle of Ortygia ſhe was there received: in which ſhe was delivered, firſt of Diana, and then of Apollo, being twins; whereof Barlaam makes this expoſition: That at ſuch time as the deluge (which happened in Ogyges's reign) ceaſed, out of the abundant moiſture of the earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mix'd) there were exhaled ſuch thick miſts and fogs, that in Attica, and along the coaſts of the Ægean ſea, neither the beams of the ſun by day, nor of the moon by night, could pierce the air, or be perceived by the inhabitants: ſo as when at length (the earth being dried, and theſe vapours diſſipated) the air began to be clear, the people of [h] Ortygia eſpied the light of the moon ſomewhat before day, and in the ſame morning the ſun alſo appeared: fabulouſly (becauſe Diana repreſented the moon, and Apollo the ſun) they were reported to be born in the iſle of Ortygia thereof afterwards called Delos, which ſignifieth manifeſtation.

And ſurely it is not improbable, that the flood of Ogyges, being ſo great as hiſtories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the air ſenſibly diſcerned in thoſe parts, and ſome unuſual face of the ſkies. Varro in his books De gente populi Romani (as he is cited by [i] St. Auguſtine) reporteth out of Caſtor, that ſo great a miracle happened in the ſtar of Venus, as never was ſeen before, nor in after-times: for the colour, the greatneſs, the figure, and the courſe of it, were changed. This fell out as Adraſtus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the courſe of that or any planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read of ſo good aſtrologers flouriſhing among the Greeks, or elſewhere, in thoſe days, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the planets ſo exact, that it ſhould need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I ſee no reaſon why the difference found in the ſtar of Venus ſhould be held miraculous; conſidering that leſſer miſts and fogs, than thoſe which covered Greece with ſo long darkneſs, do familiarly preſent our ſenſes with as great alterations in the ſun and moon. That the figure ſhould vary, queſtionleſs it was very ſtrange: yet I cannot hold it any prodigy; for it ſtands well with good reaſon, that the ſide of Venus which the ſun beholds, being enlightened by him, the oppoſite half ſhould remain ſhadowed; whereby that planet would, unto our eyes, deſcrying only that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the moon doth ſeem; if diſtance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehenſion of our ſenſes.

Galilæus, a worthy Aſtrologer now living, who by the help of perſpective glaſſes hath found in the ſtars many things unknown to the ancients, affirmeth ſo much to have been diſcovered in Venus by his late obſervations. Whether ſome watery diſpoſition of the air might preſent as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Galilæus hath ſeen thro' his inſtrument; I cannot tell: ſure I am, that the diſcovery of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince man of ignorance, than nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of St. Auguſtine) accompanied with ſuch unuſual (and therefore the more dreadful, tho' natural) ſigns teſtifying the concurrence of cauſes with effects in that inundation; whereas the flood of Noah, which was general and altogether miraculous, may ſeem to have had no other token, or foreſhewing, than the long preaching of Noah himſelf, which was not regarded: [a] for they were eating and drinking, when the flood came ſuddenly, and took them all away.

SECT. III.

Of Deucalion's flood: and that this was not Noah's flood: nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any univerſal flood.

A Second flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Theſſalia, of which St. Auguſtine out of Varro. His temporibus (ut Varro ſcribit) regnante Athenienſibus Cranao, ſucceſſore Cecropis (ut autem noſtri, Euſebius & Hieronymus) adhuc eodem Cecrope permanante, Diluvium fuit, quod appellatum eſt Deucalionis; (that is) In theſe times (as Varro reporteth) Cranaus the ſucceſſor of Cecrops governing the Athenians, or (as our Euſebius and Jerome ſay) Cecrops yet living, that flood (called Deucalion's) happened.

And in the beginning of the 11th chapter of the ſame 18th book, he uſeth theſe words. Eduxit ergo Moſes ex Ægypto populum Dei noviſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium regis, cum apud Aſſyrios regnaret Aſcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Triopas. Moſes led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter times of Cecrops king of the Athenians, Aſcatades reigning over the Aſſyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Triopas: ſo as leaving the curioſity of a few years, more or leſs, it appeareth, that this flood of Deucalion was either at the egreſſion of the children of Iſrael out of Egypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753 years, according to Funcius, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the world 2409, or if we follow Mercator, then 739 years after Noah, and in the year of the world 2395. But if Deucalion were born in the age of the world 2356, according to Codoman; then giving unto Deucalion 40 years of age when this flood happen'd, it falleth within one year of Mercator's account. But Deucalion by all approved hiſtorians is ſaid to have been 82 years old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëton's time, by the reign of Crotopus king of the Argives; but Crotopus lived king of the Argives 6 years after Iſrael departed Egypt, which makes 20 years difference according to Funcius, who will have this flood and burning to have fallen 14 years before Moſes left Egypt: for he gave of the world's years to the flood and burning the year 2440, and to Moſes's egreſſion the year 2454. And yet [b] Cedrenus thinks that Moſes was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the flood of Ogyges, which is deny'd by all: for that of Theſſaly (called Deucalion's) follow'd that of Attica (called Ogygia) at leaſt 250 years, or thereabouts. Euſebius, in his Chronology, makes it 230 years, and ſo doth P. Oroſius: Euſebius about the 50th year of Moſes's life, and Cyrillus about the 67th, and both after Noah's flood 770 years: for theſe be Clemens Alexandrinus's words: [c] Fuit autem in Græcia tempore quidem Phoronei, qui fuit poſt Inachum, inundatio quæ fuit tempore Ogygis; There happened in Greece in the time of Phoroneus, who lived after Inachus the flood of Ogyges. Now if the flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020 or 1016 years before the firſt Olympiad, according to Euſebius and Oroſius (as before) then is it manifeſt, that taking 763 out of this number of 1020, it falls out that Ogyges's flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250 years, or 260 years, according to the difference between the opinions of [d] Euſebius and Oroſius. And for my ſelf (who rather follow thoſe Chronologers, which give 60 years more to Abraham after the flood, than the reſt) I reckon the times which come between theſe floods in this ſort. The general flood was in the year of the world 1656. Jacob was born in the year of the world 2169, ſo as from the beginning of the flood to Jacob's birth, there were conſum'd 513 years. Ogyges's flood happened 100 years after Jacob was born; and therefore after the general flood 613 years. Now Deucalion was born in the year of the world 2356, and had lived 82 years, when his kingdom of Theſſaly was overwhelmed (which added to 2356, make 2438) his flood was after Noah's flood ended 782 years. And hereto Annius's Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700 years between the general flood and Deucalion's birth; to which add 82 years of his age (as before) and then the flood of Theſſaly followed the general 782 years. The words of that Xenophon are theſe: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, ſecundo anno Sphæri, ſeptingenti ſupputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Theſſaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the world to the birth of Deucalion, in the ſecond year of Sphærus are numbred 700 years, and when Deucalion was 82 years old, he ſaw Theſſalia drowned. This flood happened in the winter time about Parnaſſus: witneſs [e] Ariſtotle in the firſt of his Meteors. And Varro (whom St. Auguſtine ſo often citeth for his excellent learning, eſpecially in antiquities) findeth this flood of Deucalion to have happened in the time of Cranaus, who ſucceeded Cecrops: Oroſius thinks it ſomewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Theſſaly it ſelf, and the regions adjoining weſtward; but it covered the greateſt part of Italy: and either the ſame, or ſome other particular flood then happening oppreſs'd Egypt, ſaith Euſebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feign it to be univerſal; and Deucalion, then king, ſaving himſelf and ſome others on the mountain of Theſſaly (of all other the higheſt, ſaith [a] Solinus) was by reaſon thereof (as [a] Strabo witneſſeth) ſaid to be the preſerver of mankind. That this flood covered a great part of Italy, [a] Pliny and Solinus make it probable: who affirm that the people then inhabiting Italy were therefore called Ὄμβριοι, quia ab imbribus diluvii ſuperfuiſſent; and therefore alſo were they eſteemed the moſt ancient nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his firſt book, and Trezenius in his ſecond: which Umbri theſe authors make the parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutii, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterranean ſea. But that theſe Umbri were not the inhabitaints of Italy before the flood of Noah, and ſo took name by ſaving themſelves upon the Apennine mountains, the ſcriptures teach us: ſhewing who, and who only, then were preſerved, which is ſufficient. [b] Report hath adventured further, telling us that the firſt people, which after the general flood inhabited Italy, were the Cameſenes (ſo named from Cameſe, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annius's authors, names for a conſort of Janus) which people lived altogether a ſavage life; till ſuch time as Saturn arriving on thoſe coaſts, deviſed laws to govern them by; the memory of whoſe acts in that region Diodore and Thallus among the Greeks, Nepos, Caſſius and Varro among the Latins have preſerved; and of whom Virgil;

[c] Primus ab æthereo venit Saturnus Olympo,
Arma Jovis fugiens, & regnis exul ademptis.
Is genus indocile, ac diſperſum montibus altis
Compoſuit, legeſque dedit, Latiumque vocari Maluit.

Saturn deſcended from the heavens high,
Fearing the arms of Jupiter his ſon,
His kingdom loſt, and baniſh'd thence doth fly.
Rude people on the mountain tops he won
To live together, and by laws: which done,
He choſe to call it Latium.

And afterwards in the verſes following he ſpeaketh of the Auſones, and after them of the Sicani: nations, which again ſought to diſplant the ancient inhabiters:

[d] Tum manus Auſonia, & gentes venêre Sicani.

Then came th'Auſonian bands, and the Sicanian tribes.

Of theſe Sicani (which left Spain and ſat down in Italy) [e] Thucydides and Pliny give teſtimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, ſaith Thucydides. After all theſe plantations and replantations came the Umbri, deſcended of the Gauls (ſaith [f] Annius) not of thoſe Gauls of France, but of thoſe of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania, as [g] Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionyſius, have aſſured us; and therefore this flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all thoſe nations were planted in Italy, and diſpoſſeſs'd of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that kingdom was firſt called Camaſene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Auſonia, then Sicania, before the Umbri (in whoſe time Deucalion's flood happened) poſſeſs'd the ſame, about 306 years before the war of Troy: Lycaon then governing Arcadia; who being the father of twenty-two ſons, the youngeſt, called [h] Oenotrius, invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the ſame nation chang'd it into Italy, after his own name, about [i] 250 years before the fall of Troy. After theſe came the Pelaſgi, of whom Pliny in his 3d book and 5th chapter; and Strabo in his 5th; Thucydides in his 6th ſpeaks at large: and after them the Lydi under Tyrrhenus their captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni; who caſting thence the Umbri, took from them three hundred caſtles, and built therein twelve cities; to which (after they had poſſeſs'd and paſs'd over the Apennine mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telſina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently ſuch a nation, as theſe Umbri, in thoſe parts, I do not affirm: having reſpect to the teſtimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that theſe Umbri of Italy were deſcended of the nation of Scythians (called Galli) it ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

SECT. IV.

Of ſome other records teſtifying the univerſal flood: and of two ancient deluges in Egypt: and of ſome elſewhere.

ST. Auguſtine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latins made not any mention of the univerſal flood, becauſe they had nothing of antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus before remembred) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in Engliſh commonly call worm-eaten, or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the earth were ſucceſſively planted and peopled; and as all nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the inſtant: ſo did every family which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of divine letters was not received, find no parent of more antiquity, than ſuch as they had themſelves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, ſo did others vaunt themſelves to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the earth, or invent ſome other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certain knowledge of Noah's flood, as Beroſus witneſſeth; and Nicolaus Damaſcenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforeſaid) tho' he alſo affirm by hearſay, that ſome giants ſaved themſelves upon the mountains Baris in Armenia, but ſpeaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: uſing the word ſermo eſt, that ſuch a ſpeech there was. And [k] Euſebius remembreth a place out of the ancient hiſtorian Abydenus: who writeth that Siſſithrus, to preſerve himſelf from a flood foretold him by Saturnus, fled to the hills of Armenia by ſhip, ad Armeniam navigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) ſent forth birds, that finding no land to reſt on, returned again; which he alſo did a ſecond time, but at the third return the birds feet were covered with mud and ſlime. To this effect are Euſebius's words out of Abydenus, which may ſeem a true deſcription (tho' in other terms) of Noah's flood.

Cyrillus alſo affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhiſtor maketh mention of this general flood. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian prieſt, who recounted to Solon out of the holy books of Egypt, the ſtory of the flood univerſal, which (ſaith he) happened long before the Grecian inundations. Xenophon Xenophon remembreth a flood, which alſo [a] Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, ſomewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the general flood for the firſt, which happened (ſaith he) under the old Ogyges, ſub priſco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the ſecond Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then living 44 years before that of Attica, in the 34th year of Belochus king of the Aſſyrians, tho' I do not believe him as touching the time. But this flood covered a great part of the nether Egypt, eſpecially all that region ſubject to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus's liver, afterward ſlain by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliver-eth in theſe words: [b] Fluvium propter curſus velocitatem profunditatemque aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculem cum conſilii magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt e veſtigio compreſſiſſe, & aquarum impetum ad priorem curſum convertiſſe: unde & Græci quidam poetæ rem geſtam in fabulam vertentes, Herculem tradunt aquilam Promethei jecur depaſcentem occidiſſe. This flood (meaning of Nilus) for the ſwiftneſs of his courſe, as alſo for the depth, was in thoſe days called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great judgment and virtue did again compreſs and ſtrengthen this river, ſo far extended and overſpread, turning it into the old channels: whence certain Greek poets (converting this labour and work of Hercules into a fable) deviſed that Hercules ſlew the eagle, which fed on Prometheus's liver; meaning, that he delivered Prometheus of that ſorrow and torment, which for the loſs of his people and country (by the waters deſtroy'd and cover'd over) he ſuffered.

A fourth flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this brief ſort writeth of all theſe inundations; [c] Inundationes plures fuêre: prima novimeſtris inundatio terrarum ſub priſco Ogyge: ſecunda Niliaca, &c. There were many inundations (ſaith the ſame Xenophon) the firſt which was univerſal of nine months, and this happened under the firſt Ogyges: the ſecond was Niliaca, and of one month's continuance in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two months under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three months in Theſſalia under Deucalion; and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helen's rape. Diodorus in his 5th book and 11th chapter, taking the Samothraces for his authors, remembreth a flood in Aſia the leſs, and elſewhere, of no leſs deſtruction than any of the other particular inundations, ſaying, that the ſame happened before that of Deucalion: the ſea of Pontus and Helleſpont breaking in over the land.

But there have been many floods in divers times and ages, not inferiour to any of theſe two laſt remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the year of our redemption 590, when, in October of the ſame year, Gregory then being biſhop of Rome, there happened a marvellous overflowing in Italy, and eſpecially in the Venetian territory, and in Liguria, accompanied with a moſt fearful ſtorm of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reaſon of the many dead ſerpents caſt up and left upon the land, after the waters decreaſed and returned. And in the year 1446, there periſhed 10000 people by the breaking in of the ſea at [d] Dordroch in Holland: of which kind I take that flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and the year 1283, [e] Trithemius ſpeaketh of an earthquake which ſwallowed many thouſands: and after that of a flood in Frieſland, in which there periſhed 100000 perſons. Strozius Sigog. in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an inundation in Italy, in the time of pope Damaſus, in which alſo many cities of Sicily were ſwallowed: another in the papacy of Alexander the ſixth: alſo in the year 1515, Maximilian being emperor. He alſo remembreth a perilous overflowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people periſhed. Likewiſe Viginier, a French hiſtorian ſpeaketh of a great flood in the ſouth part of Languedoc, which fell in the year of our Lord 1557, with ſo dreadful a tempeſt, as all the people attended therein the very end of the world and judgment day; ſaying, that by the violent deſcent of the waters from the mountains, about Niſmes, there were removed divers old heaps and mountures of ground, and many other places torn up and rent: by which accident there was found both coin of ſilver and gold, divers pieces of plate, and veſſels of other metal, ſuppoſed to be hidden at ſuch time as the Goths invaded that province, in the year 1156.

SECT. V.

That the flood of Noah was ſupernatural, tho' ſome ſay it might have been foreſeen by the ſtars.

NOW howſoever all theſe floods and many other, which have covered at ſeveral times ſeveral regions, not only in theſe parts of the world, but in America alſo (as I have learned of ſome ancient ſoothſayers among them) may be aſcribed to natural cauſes and accidents; yet that univerſal flood (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the earth by a power above nature, and by the ſpecial commandment of God himſelf, who at that time gave ſtrength of influence to the ſtars, and abundance to the fountains of the deep: whereby the irruption of waters was made more forcible, than any ability of nature could effect, or any ſecond cauſes by whatſoever union could perform, without receiving from the fountain of all power, ſtrength, and faculties ſupernatural. Henricus Meclinienſis, a ſcholar of Albertus Magnus, in his commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Albu Maſar, obſerveth, that before the flood of Noah, the like conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn happened in the laſt degree of Cancer, againſt that conſtellation ſince called the Ship of Argos; by which the flood of Noah might be foretold, becauſe Cancer is both a watery ſign, and the houſe of the moon, which is the lady of the ſea, and of moiſture, according to the rules of aſtronomy, and common experience. And this opinion [f] Petrus de Aliaco upon Geneſis confirmeth, affirming, that altho' Noah did well know this flood by divine revelation, yet (this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the ſecond cauſes thereof: for thoſe were not only ſigns, but alſo working cauſes, by ſtrength received from the firſt cauſe, which is God himſelf: and further, that by [g] Catarractæ cœli (Engliſhed the windows of heaven) Moſes meant this great and watery conjunction; the word [Catarractæ] ſignifying flowing down or coming down. Now (ſaith P. de Aliaco) it pleaſed God to ordain by the courſe of the heavens ſuch a conſtellation, by which all men might behold therein their deſtruction towards, and thereby forſake thoſe wicked ways wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

Of this judgment was Gul. Pariſienſis, who underſtood that the words Catarractæ cœli, or windows of heaven, were to be taken for the former conjunction, or for theſe watery ſigns, Cancer, Piſces, Pleiades, Hyades and Orion, and of the planets, Mars, Venus and the Moon: which are the forcible cauſes of the greateſt inundations. His own words are theſe, Nondum intelligo prophetam Hebræorum catarractas cœli vocâſſe, niſi partes illas cœli, quæ generativæ ſunt pluviarum & inundationum aquarum, quales ſunt ſigna aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforeſaid. As yet (ſaith he) I perceive not what the prophet of the Hebrews meaneth by thoſe words [Catarractæ cœli, or windows of heaven] unleſs he thereby underſtands thoſe celeſtial powers, by whoſe influences are engendered the rain, and inundations of waters, ſuch as are the watery ſigns of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might pleaſe God, that in the courſe of his unſearchable wiſdom this conjunction ſhould at ſuch time be: ſo did he (as aforeſaid) add vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increaſe of virtues, violent eruptions to ſprings and fountains, commanding them to caſt out the whole treaſure and heap of their waters; taking retention from the clouds, and condenſing air into water by the miniſtry of his angels, or howſoever elſe beſt pleaſed his all-powerfulneſs.

SECT. VI.

That there was no need of any new creation of matter to make the univerſal flood; and what are Catarractæ cœli, Gen. vii. 11.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new (for God reſteth the ſeventh day, that is, he did not then after create any new ſpecies) which granted, it may ſeem that then all the earth and air had not waters ſufficient to cover the habitable world fifteen cubits above the higheſt mountains. Of this propoſition, whether God hath ſo reſtrained himſelf or no, I will not diſpute; but for the conſequent (which is) that the world had want of water to overcover the higheſt mountains, I take that conceit to be unlearned and fooliſh: for it is written, that the fountains of the great deep were broken up, that is, the waters forſook the very bowels of the earth; and all whatſoever was diſperſed therein, pierced and broke thro' the face thereof. Then let us conſider that the earth had above twenty-one thouſand miles: the diameter of the earth according to that circle ſeven thouſand miles; and then from the ſuperficies to the center ſome three thouſand five hundred miles: take then the higheſt mountain of the world, Caucaſus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountains of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all others the higheſt) in Tennerif, and I do not find, that he who looketh higheſt, ſtretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impoſſible, anſwering reaſon with reaſon, that all thoſe waters mixed within the earth three thouſand five hundred miles deep ſhould not well help to cover the ſpace of thirty miles in height, this thirty miles upright being found in the depths of the earth one hundred and ſixteen times: for the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the earth. Secondly, If we conſider what proportion the earth beareth to the extenſion of the air over and above it, we ſhall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleaſed God to condenſe but ſo much of this air as every where compaſſeth and embraceth the earth, which condenſation is a converſion of air into water, a change familiar in thoſe elements, it will not ſeem ſtrange to men of judgment, yea but of ordinary underſtanding, that the earth (God ſo pleaſing) was covered over with waters without any new creation.

Laſtly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Pariſienſis, and Aliacenſis, to which I may add Beroſus and others, that ſuch a conjunction there was, foreſhewing that deſtruction by waters which followed; and that by the words Catarractæ cœli, or windows of heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other anſwer than that obſervation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth that by the graveſt aſtrologers it was obſerved, that in the Year 1524, there ſhould happen the like conjunction, as at Noah's flood, than which (ſaith he) there was never a more fair, dry, and ſeaſonable year: the like deſtruction was propheſied of the year 1588. But Picus earl of Mirandula proveth that there could not be any ſuch conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other myſtery in the words Catarractæ cœli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moſes uſing the word windows of heaven (if that be the ſenſe of the words) to expreſs the violence of the rains, and pouring down of waters. For whoſoever hath ſeen thoſe fallings of water, which ſometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the ſpouts (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a reſiſtleſs violence in one body) may properly uſe that manner of ſpeech which Moſes did; that the windows or flood-gates of heaven opened: (which is) that waters fell contrary to cuſtom and that order which we call natural. God then looſened the power retentive in the uppermoſt air; and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (ſaith [a] Job) he which holdeth the waters, and they dry up; or better in Latin, Et omnia ſiccantur; And all things are dried up; but when he ſendeth them out, they deſtroy the earth: and in the 26th chapter, he bindeth the waters in the clouds; but theſe bonds God looſed at that time of the general flood, and called up the waters which ſlept in the great deep: and theſe joining together covered the earth, till they had performed the work of his will: which done, [b] he then commanded them to return into their dark and vaſt caves, and the reſt (by a wind) rarified again into air, formerly condenſed into drops.

Of ſome remainder of the memory of Noah among the heathen.

NOAH commanded by God, before the fall of thoſe waters, entred the ark which he had built, with his own wife, and his ſons, and his ſons wives, taking with them of every creature, which took life by generation, ſeven of the clean, and of the unclean two. Noah, according to Philo, ſignifieth quietneſs: after others, and according to the prophecy of his father Lamech, ceſſation; to whom after-times gave many names anſwering his antiquity, zeal, virtue and other qualities: as, the firſt Ogyges, becauſe in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was alſo a great flood of Achaia: Saturn they called him, becauſe he was the father of nations: others gave him the name of Prometheus, who was ſaid to ſteal away Jupiter's fire; fire in that place being taken and underſtood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was ſo called for his excellent wiſdom and foreſight. He had alſo the name of Janus (id eſt) vinoſus, becauſe Jain ſignifieth wine in the Hebrew. And ſo Tertullian finds him written in libris rituali-

libus, in the books of ceremonies, preceding both Saturn, Uranus and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancienteſt feigned gods. And this name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latin; for it was in uſe before there was any Latin nation, or any kingdom by that name known. Of the antiquity of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this teſtimony. Jani ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæſerat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & far primus populos docuit Janus ad ſacrificia: primus enim aras & pomœria & ſacra docuit; In the time of Janus (ſaith he) there was no monarchy: for the deſire of rule had not folded it ſelf about the hearts of men. Janus firſt taught the people to ſacrifice wine and meal: he firſt ſet up altars, inſtituted gardens and ſolitary groves, wherein they uſed to pray; with other holy rites and ceremonies. A greater teſtimony than this there cannot be found among the heathen, which in all agreeth ſo well with the ſcriptures. For firſt, whilſt Noah flouriſhed, there was not any king or monarch: Nimrod being the firſt that took on him, ſoveraign authority. Secondly, [a] Noah after the flood was the firſt that planted the vine, and became a husbandman; and therefore offered the firſt-fruits of both (to wit) wine and meal. Thirdly, He was the firſt that raiſed an altar, and offered [b] ſacrifice to God, a thankſgiving for his merciful goodneſs towards him. Noah was alſo ſignified in the name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) becauſe he beheld the times both before and after the flood, [c] Quia præterita noverit, & futura proſpexerit, ſaith Arnobius. Becauſe he knew what was paſt, and provided for what was to come. He was alſo in the perſon of Janus ſhadowed by the name of Chaos, and ſemen orbis, The ſeed of the world; becauſe as out of that confuſed heap was drawn all kinds of beaſts and plants: ſo from Noah came all mankind: whereof Ovid in the perſon of Janus:

[d] Me Chaos antiqui (nam ſum res priſca) vocabant, Aſpice quam longi temporis acta cano.

The ancients called me Chaos: my great years
By thoſe old times, of which I ſing, appears.

He was alſo entituled Cœlum & Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledge in aſtronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus, and Alexander Aphrodiſeus ſo call, becauſe he was the reſtorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in reſpect of the flood. For the Greeks called Liber ῦς, and his nurſes Hyades, of rain, becauſe Noah entered the ark, when the ſun join'd with the ſtars Hyades, a conſtellation in the brow or neck of Taurus, and ever after a monument of Noah's flood. He was alſo by others ſurnamed Triton, a marine god, the ſon of Neptune: beceauſe he lived in ſafety on the waters. So was he known by the name of [e] Dionyſus, quaſi Διανύσσων, mentem pungens, bite-brain or wit-ſtinger, tho' Diodorus conceives otherwiſe, and derives that name à patre & loco, of his father and the place of his birth (to wit) of Jove, and Nyſa, a town of Arabia Fœlix, ſaith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had alſo the by-name of [f] Taurus, or Taurophagus; becauſe he firſt yoked oxen and tilled the ground, according to that of Moſes; [g] And Noah became an husbandman. Now howſoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwiſe Dionyſus) it is certain that the name was borrowed, and the invention ſtolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more anciently Boachus, was taken (ſaith [h] Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus) from Noachus [N] being chang'd into [B]; and it is the more probable, becauſe it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the firſt planter of the vine after the flood: and of Noah (the firſt and ancient Bacchus) were all thoſe fables deviſed, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth book and fifth chapter. This firſt Bacchus (to wit) Noah was ſurnamed Nyſius of the mountain Nyſa in India, where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatſoever themſelves feign of his enterprizes; and theſe mountains of Nyſa join with thoſe of Paropaniſus, and thoſe other eaſtern mountains, on which the ark of Noah reſted after the flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this ſecond parent of mankind might the better be preſerved, there were founded by his iſſues many great cities which bare his name; with many rivers and mountains: which oftentimes forgat that it was done in his regard, becauſe the many names given him brought the ſame confuſion to places as to himſelf. Notwithſtanding all which, we find the city of Noah upon the banks of the Red-ſea and elſewhere: the river of [i] Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolemy, Danus; dividing Illyria from Panonia. Thus much for the name.

Of ſundry particulars touching the ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, faſhion and name.

NOW in what part of the world Noah built the ark, it doth not appear in the ſcriptures, neither do I find any approved author that hath written thereof; only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiveth, that Noah built his ark near the mountains of Caucaſus, becauſe on thoſe hills are found the goodlieſt cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among a people called Nyſæi, inhabiting the other ſide of Caucaſus, he found all their burials and ſepulchres wrought over with cedar. To this place (ſaith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to ſeparate himſelf from the reprobate giants, who rebelled againſt God and nature, as alſo becauſe he would not be interrupted in the building of the ark; to which alſo he addeth the conveniency of rivers, to tranſport the timber which he uſed, without troubling any other carriages.

Only this we are ſure of, that the ark was built in ſome part of the eaſtern world; and, to my underſtanding, not far from the place where it reſted after the flood. For Noah did not uſe any maſt or ſail (as in other ſhips) and therefore did the ark no otherwiſe move than the hulk or body of a ſhip doth in a calm ſea. Alſo becauſe it is not probable, that during theſe continual and downright rains there were any winds at all, therefore was the ark little moved from the place where it was faſhioned and ſet together. For it is written; [k] God made a wind to paſs upon the earth, and the waters ceaſed; and therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the waters, there was not any ſtorm or forcible wind at all, which could drive the ark any great diſtance from the place where it was firſt by the waters lifted up. This is alſo the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the ark had fundum planum; A flat bottom, and not rais'd in form of a ſhip with a ſharpneſs forward, to cut the waves for the better ſpeed.

This kind of veſſel the Hebrews call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for ſo they termed Deucalion's ſhip:

ſhip: and ſome ſay, that the hill Parnaſſus, to which in eight days he arrived, was firſt called Larnaſſus, and by the change of [L] into [P] Parnaſſus; but [a] Pauſanias thinks that it took name of a ſon of the nymph Cleodoræ, called Parnaſſus, the inventor of auguration.

[b] Peuceros finds the word [Parnaſſus] to have no affinity with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nahas, which ſignifieth auguration and divination: or from Har or Parai, as in his chapter of oracles in the leaf before cited.

[c] Joſephus calls the ark Machina, by the general name of a huge frame: and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Aron; but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thevet, that Aron ſignifieth properly the ark of the ſanctuary, but Thevet ſuch a veſſel as ſwimmeth, and beareth it ſelf upon the waters.

Laſtly, this ark of Noah differed from the faſhion of a ſhip in this, that it had a cover and roof, with a creſt in the midſt thereof, and the ſides declining like the roof of an houſe; to the end, both to caſt off the waters, and that thereunder [d] Noah himſelf and his children might ſhelter and ſeparate themſelves from the noiſomeneſs of the many beaſts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the ark.

Of what wood the ark was built it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher, once, and in this place only, uſed, is diverſly underſtood; and tho' the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, that the Geneva tranſlation calls it pine-tree; the Rabbine, cedar; the Seventy, ſquare timber; the Latin, ſmooth timber. Others will have it cypreſs-trees, as dedicated to the dead, becauſe cypreſs is worn at funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher ſignify any ſpecial kind of timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promiſe of God, and his grace and mercy for his defence. For with Noah God promiſed [e] to eſtabliſh his covenant. [f] Pliny affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the uſe to build ſhips of cedar, which the worms eat not; and he avoweth, that he ſaw in Utica, in the temple of Apollo, cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the city, and that they were ſtill found in his time, which was above 1188 years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not ſubject to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is eaſy to cut, light to carry, and of a ſweet ſavour, laſting alſo better than any other wood, and becauſe near the place where the ark reſted, there are found great ſtore of theſe cedar-trees, as alſo in all the mountains of the eaſt, beſides thoſe of Libanus, it is probable enough that the ark might be of that wood: which hath beſides the other commodities the greateſt length of timber, and therefore fitteſt to build ſhips withal. Pererius conceiveth that the ark had divers ſorts of timber, and that the bottom had of one ſort, the deck and partition of another; all which may be true or falſe, if Gopher may be taken for timber in general. True it is, that cedar will ſerve for all parts of a ſhip, as well for the body, as for maſts and yards. But Noah had moſt reſpect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into cabins, thereby to ſever the clean beaſts from the unclean, and to preſerve their ſeveral ſorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he caſt his confidence wholly on God, who by his angels ſteered this ſhip without a rudder, and directed it without the help of a compaſs or the north-ſtar. The pitch which Noah uſed, is by ſome ſuppoſed to have been a kind of bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the valley of [g] Sodom and Gomorrah, now the dead ſea or Aſphaltes: and in the region of Babylon, and in the Weſt-Indies: and herein it exceedeth other pitch, that it melts not with the ſun, but by the fire only, after the manner of hard wax.

SECT. IX.

That the ark was of ſufficient capacity.

THE ark, according to God's commandment, had of length three hundred cubits, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion it had ſix parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which St. Auguſtine, [h] Proculdudio figura eſt peregrinantis in hoc ſæculo civitatis Dei (hoc eſt) Eccleſiæ, quæ fit ſalva per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Chriſtus Jeſus: nam & menſura ipſa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudiniſque ejus ſignificat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænunciatus eſt venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (ſaith he) it is a figure of the city of God, travelling in this world as a ſtranger (that is) of the Church, ſaved by the tree whereupon the Mediator between God and man, the man Jeſus Chriſt did hang: for even the very meaſure of the length, height, and breadth, anſwereth the ſhape of man's body, in the truth whereof the coming of Chriſt was foretold and performed.

By what kind of cubit the ark was meaſured, it hath been a diſputed queſtion among the fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect theſe: the firſt kind of cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a half, meaſured from the ſharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The ſecond (the palm cubit) which taketh one handful more than the common. The third is called Regius cubitus, or the Perſian cubit, which exceedeth the common cubit three inches. The fourth is the ſacred cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Laſtly, there is a fifth cubit, called geometrical, which containeth ſix common cubits. But of all theſe ſorts, which were commonly meaſured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens ſtatures hath made the difference. For as there is now a leſs proportion of bodies: ſo is the common cubit, from the ſharp of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of leſs length than it was in elder times.

St. Auguſtine conſidering the many ſorts of beaſts and birds which the ark held, with their food and water, was ſometimes of opinion, that the ark had proportion after the geometrical cubit, which containeth almoſt ſix of the common. For [i] meaſuring the ark by the vulgar cubit, it did not exceed the capacity of that veſſel built by Hiero of Syracuſe, or the ſhip of Ptolemy Philo-pater. But St. Auguſtine (who at the firſt was led by Origen) changed his judgment as touching the geometrical cubit; and found upon better conſideration, that there needed not ſo huge a body to preſerve all ſorts of creatures by God appointed to he reſerved. For it was not needful to take any kinds of fiſhes into the ark, becauſe they were kept living (ſaith St. Auguſtine) in their own element. [k] Non fuit neceſſe conſervare in arca quæ poſſent in aquis vivere ; non ſolum merſa ſicut piſces, verum ſupernatantia ſicut multæ alites ; It was not needful to conſerve thoſe creatures in the ark, which could live in the waters ; and not only fiſhes, which can live under water, but alſo thoſe fowls which ſit and ſwim on them. And again, Terra, non aqua, maledicta ; quia Adam non hujus, ſed illius fructum vetitum comedit ; It was the earth, and not the waters, which God curſed: for of the forbidden fruit of the earth, and not of the ſea, did Adam eat ; ſo as St. Auguſtine gathereth hereupon (as aforeſaid) that ſo huge a frame needed not.

And if we look with the eyes of judgment hereunto, we ſhall find nothing monſtrous therein ; altho' the imaginations of men, who (for the moſt part) have more of miſchief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reaſon, find many impoſſibilities in this work of God. But it is manifeſt, and undoubtedly true, that many of the ſpecies, which now ſeem differing and of ſeveral kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For thoſe beaſts which are of mix'd natures, either they were not in that age, or elſe it was not needful to preſerve them : ſeeing they might be generated again by others, as the mules, the hyena's, and the like : the one begotten by aſſes and mares, the other by foxes and wolves. And whereas by diſcovering of ſtrange lands, wherein there are found divers beaſts and birds, differing in colour or ſtature from thoſe of theſe nothern parts, it may be ſuppoſed by a ſuperficial conſideration, that all thoſe which wear red and pyed ſkins, or feathers, are differing from thoſe that are leſs painted and wear plain ruſſet or black : they are much miſtaken that ſo think. And for my own opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, between the cat of Europe, and the ounce of India ; and even thoſe dogs which are become wild in Hiſpagniola, with which the Spaniards uſed to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to wolves, and begin to deſtroy the breed of their cattle, and do alſo oftentimes tear aſunder their own children. [a]The common crow and rook of India is full of red feathers in the drown'd and low iſlands of Caribana ; and the black-bird and thruſh hath his feathers mix'd with black and carnation, in the north parts of Virginia. The dog-fiſh of England is the ſhark of the ſouth ocean : for if colour or magnitude made a difference of ſpecies, then were the negroes, which we call the black-mores, non animalia rationalia, not men, but ſome kind of ſtrange beaſts : and ſo the giants of the ſouth America ſhould be of another kind, than the people of this part of the world. We alſo ſee it daily that the natures of fruits are changed by tranſplantation, ſome to better, ſome to worſe, eſpecially with the change of climate. Crabs may be made good fruit by often grafting, and the beſt melons will change in a year or two to common cucumbers by being ſet in a barren ſoil. Therefore taking the kinds preciſely of all creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the earth by his ordinance produced ; the ark, after the meaſure of the common cubit, was ſufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed : for if we add but half a foot of meaſure to the common cubit, which had a foot and a half of giantly ſtature (and leſs allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the ark contain 600 foot in length, and 100 foot in breadth, and 60 foot in depth.

But firſt of all, to make it manifeſt that the geometrical cubit is not uſed in the ſcripture, the ſtature of the giants therein named may ſuffice. For if the bed of [b] Og king of Baſhan had been nine geometrical cubits long, it had taken 54 cubits of the common, which make 80 foot : and [c]Goliah, who had the length of 6 cubits and a handful (which makes nine foot and a handful, a proportion credible) if theſe cubits had been geometrical, then had been 54 foot in height and upwards, which were monſtrous and moſt incredible : for (according to this proportion) the head of Goliah had been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger than all David's body, who carried it away.

Again, If the geometrical cubit had been uſed for a meaſure in the ſcripture, as many commentators have obſerved, then would the altar (appointed to contain five cubits of length, five of breadth and three of height) have reached the length of 27 foot upright, and ſo muſt their prieſts have aſcended by ſteps or ladders to have performed their ſacrifices thereon, which was contrary to God's commandment given in theſe words : [d]Thou ſhalt not go up with ſteps unto mine altar, that thy ſhame be not diſcovered thereon ; and therefore was the altar but three common cubits high, which make four foot, that their prieſts ſtanding thereby might execute their office : wherefore I may conclude, that the cubit mentioned in the ſcriptures was not the geometrical, but the ordinary cubit of one foot and a half, according to the meaſure of giantly ſtature ; which meaſure (doubtleſs) might give much the more capacity to the ark, altho' it be alſo probable, that as the men were, ſo were the horſes whereon they rode, and all other creatures, of a correſpondent ſize. And yet, as I take it, tho' by this means there were not any whit the more room in the ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the diſtinct ſpecies of animals, whoſe lives cannot be preſerved in the waters, might according to their preſent quantities be contained in a veſſel of thoſe dimenſions which the ark had ; allowing to the cubit one foot and a half of our now uſual meaſure : whence it followeth of neceſſity, that thoſe large bodies which were in the days of Noah might have room ſufficient in the ark, which was meaſured by a cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures, to be ſaved, that is, ſeven of the clean, two of the unclean (with neceſſary food) might have place in the ark, Butæo hath very learnedly declared : the brief ſum of whoſe diſcourſe to that purpoſe is this : The length of the ark was three hundred cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty cubits, and the product by the height of thirty cubits, ſheweth the whole concavity to have been 450000. Now whereas the poſts, walls, and other partitions of lodgings may ſeem to have taken up a great part of the hollow : the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one cubit) contained 7500 cubical cubes, was a ſufficient recompence : if therefore in a ſhip of ſuch greatneſs we ſeek room for 89 diſtinct ſpecies of beaſts, or (leſt any ſhould be omitted) for 100 ſeveral kinds, we ſhall eaſily find place both for them, and for the birds, which in bigneſs are no way anſwerable to them, and for meat to ſuſtain them all. For there are three ſorts of beaſts, whoſe bodies are of a quantity beſt known ; the beef, the ſheep, and the wolf : to which the reſt may be reduc'd, by ſaying (according to Ariſtotle) that one elephant is anſwerable to four beeves, one lyon to two wolves, and ſo of the reſt. Of beaſts, ſome feed on vegetables, others on fleſh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater ſort, feeding on vegetables : of which number, only three are clean, according to the law of Moſes, whereof ſeven of a kind entered into the ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odd for ſacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind; ſo that in all there were in the ark one and twenty great beaſts clean, and ſix and fifty unclean, eſtimable for largeneſs as 91 beeves; yet for a ſupplement (leſt perhaps any ſpecies be omitted) let them be valued, as 120 beeves. Of the leſſer ſort, feeding on vegetables, were in the ark ſix and twenty kinds, eſtimable with good allowance for ſupply, as fourſcore ſheep. Of thoſe which devour fleſh, were two and thirty kinds, anſwerable to threeſcore and four wolves. All theſe 280 beaſts might be kept in one ſtory or room of the ark in their ſeveral cabins; their meat in a ſecond: the birds and their proviſion in a third, with place to ſpare for Noah and his family, and all their neceſſaries.

SECT. X.

That the ark reſted upon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucaſus) between the Eaſt-Indies and Scythia.

A preterition of ſome queſtions leſs material: with a note of the uſe of this queſtion, to find out the Metropolis of nations.

WHAT time Noah took to build the ark, I leave to others to diſpute; but he received the commandment from God 100 years before the waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leiſure ſufficient. As for the number of decks and partitions, which Origen divides into four, St. Auguſtine into three, I will not trouble the reader with the controverſy: or whether thoſe creatures, which ſometimes reſt on the land, other times in the waters, as the crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the ſea-cows or ſea-horſes, were kept in the ark, or no, I think it a needleſs curioſity; and yet to this ſaith Pererius, and others before him, that a fiſh-pool might be made as well within the ark, as in Hiero's ſhip of Syracuſe. Laſtly, to conſider or labour to diſprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who ſuppoſe that the ark was lightened by a carbuncle, or had windows of cryſtal to receive in light, and keep out water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I ſeek moſt to ſatisfy my ſelf and others in, is in what part of the world the ark reſted after the flood: becauſe the true underſtanding of ſome of theſe places (as the ſeat of the terreſtrial paradiſe, and the reſting of the ark) do only and truly teach the world's plantation, and the beginning of nations, before and after the flood; and all ſtory, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better underſtood.

† II.

A propoſal of the common opinion, that the ark reſted upon ſome of the hills of Armenia.

AND firſt, for the true place where the ark reſted after the flood, and from what part of the world the children of Noah travelled to their firſt ſettlement and plantation, I am reſolved (without any preſumption) that therein the moſt writers were utterly miſtaken. And I am not led ſo to think out of my humour or newneſs of opinion, or ſingularity; but do herein ground my ſelf on the original and firſt truth, which is the word of God; and after that, upon reaſon, and the moſt probable circumſtances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, [a] that the ark ſtayed upon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean paraphraſt hath converted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordæi or Gordiæi in Armenia the greater (as the words Gordæi and Kardu ſeem to be one and the ſame) of which opinion alſo the moſt of our interpreters are; I find neither ſcripture nor reaſon which teacheth any ſuch thing: to wit, that it reſted on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. [b] Nicolaus Damaſcenus calls this mountain of Ararat, Baris, being the ſame which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountain the frier Annius (citing this place out of Joſephus) makes him find another adjoining, called Ocila, and to ſay that the ark (of which Moſes the law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did firſt take ground on this Ocila. But I do not find any ſuch mountain in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Joſephus. Strabo remembreth a promontory in Arabia Fœlix, of that name, and Pliny finds a mart-town ſo called in the ſame, which Ptolemy calls Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damaſcenus, or rather of Annius, ſeemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountains. Beroſus calleth thoſe mountains of Armenia Gordiæi, and Curtius Cordæi: Ptolemy Gordæi and Gordiæi; of which the country next adjoining is by this Nicolaus Damaſcenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as [c] Becanus conjectures) for Myliada or rather Minni; which word is uſed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia ſeems to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we ſhould ſay Minni of Syria; for that Armenia alſo was a part of Syria, [d] Pliny witneſſeth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about theſe mountains, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The mountains are ſeated apart from all other to the north of that ledge of the mountains called Taurus, or Niphates, in the plains of Armenia the great, near the lake of Thoſpitis: whence the river of Tigris floweth in 75 degrees of longitude, and 41 and 42 degrees of latitude. One of the mountains Gordiæi (that which ſurmounteth the reſt) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian ſignifieth a place of deſcent: but this out of [e] Joſephus; which name (ſaith Junius) was of the event, becauſe of Noah's coming down with his children. But this alſo I take to be a ſuppoſed event; ſeeing any hill, from whence on every ſide we muſt deſcend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Joſephus Ἀδάρις (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, becauſe Joſeph. l. 1. c. 4. ſays, the place is called Ἀποβατήριον (as it were the deſcent or coming down) and Epiphan. l. 1. cont. Hæreſ. calls it Λόχαρ: which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue ſignifieth deſcent, of Lubar, which is to deſcend; whence alſo Lubra is a ſynagogue, becauſe it was commonly built on ſome high place: whereof alſo the Latin Delubrum may ſeem to be derived; and Acts vi. 9. they that belonged to the ſynagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath been embraced from age to age: receiving a habit of ſtrength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; altho' the name of Lubar might otherwiſe rightly be given, eſpecially to that mountain, by reaſon that the paſſage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the reſt adjoining.

† III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

BUT there are many arguments to perſuade me, that the ark of Noah did not reſt it ſelf in any part of Armenia, and that the mountain Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiæan mountains.

For firſt, it is agreed by all who follow [a] Beroſus, that it was in the 130th year, or in the year 131 after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinaar, which valley was afterwards called Babylonia, Cuſh and Chaldea. If then the ark had firſt found land in Armenia, it is very improbable, that the children of Noah, which came into that valley, could have ſpent ſo many years in ſo ſhort a paſſage: ſeeing the region of Meſopotamia was only interjacent, which might by eaſy journeys have been paſſed over in twenty days; and to haſten and help which paſſage the navigable river of Tigris offered it ſelf, which is every where tranſpaſſable by boats of great burden: ſo as where the deſart on the one ſide reſiſted their expedition, the river on the contrary ſide ſerved to advance it; the river riſing out of the ſame ledge of mountains, or at the foot of them, where the ark of Noah was firſt ſuppoſed to ſettle it ſelf; then, if the nations which followed Nimrod ſtill doubted the ſurpriſe of a ſecond flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it ſoundeth ill to the ear of reaſon, that they would have ſpent many years in that low and overflown valley of Meſopotamia, ſo called of the many rivers which imbroider or compaſs it: for the effects witneſſed their affections, and the works, which they undertook, their unbelief; being no ſooner arrived in Shinaar, but they began to provide themſelves of a defence (by erecting Babel) againſt any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his kingdom, the firſt known city of the world founded after the flood, about 131 years, or (as others ſuppoſe) ten years later: though (for my ſelf) I rather think, that they undertook that work in two reſpects, firſt, to make themſelves famous, [b] To get us a name (ſaith the text:) Secondly, thereby to uſurp dominion over the reſt.

† IV.

The ſecond argument, that the eaſtern people were moſt ancient in populoſity, and in all human glory.

FOR a ſecond argument: the civility, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the eaſt parts of the world firſt abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be ſaid for Armenia, and for Noah's taking land there. And that this is true, the uſe of printing and artillery (among many other things which the eaſt had) may eaſily perſuade us, that thoſe ſun-riſing nations were the moſt ancient. The certainty of this report, that the Eaſt Indians (time out of mind) have had guns and ordnance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes us now to underſtand, that the place of Philoſtratus in vita Apollonii Tianæi, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, tho' expreſs'd in fabulous words: when he ſaith, that the wiſe men, which dwell between Hyphaſis and Ganges, uſe not themſelves to go forth into battel: but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning ſent from Jupiter. By which means there it is ſaid, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, joining their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there caſt away his golden ſhield. For the invention of letters was ignorantly aſcribed to Cadmus, becauſe he brought them firſt into Greece: of which the people (then rude and ſavage) had reaſon to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no leſs ancient than Seth or Enoch were: for they are ſaid to have written on pillars of ſtone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the eaſtern world it was that John Cuthenberg, a German, brought the device of printing: by whom Conradus being inſtructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that, Nicolaus Gerſon, a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and invention. And, notwithſtanding that this myſtery was then ſuppoſed to be but newly born, the Chinaos had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phenicians; and alſo the art of printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civil knowledge, or any letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witneſſed, who about an hundred years ſince diſcovered thoſe kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other nations but ſavages in reſpect of themſelves.

And to add ſtrength to this argument, the conqueſt and ſtory of Alex. Macedon may juſtly be called to witneſs, who found more cities and ſumptuoſity in that little kingdom of Porus, which lay ſide by ſide to the Eaſt India, than in all his other travels and undertakings. For in Alexander's time, learning and greatneſs had not travelled ſo far to the weſt as Rome: Alexander eſteeming of Italy but as a barbarous country, and of Rome as of a village. But it was Babylon that ſtood in his eye, and the fame of the eaſt pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the ſun-riſing, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermoſt angle and iſland thereof, we ſhall find that thoſe nations have ſent out, and not received, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the weſt. For the farther eaſt (to this day) the more civil, the farther weſt the more ſavage. And of the iſle of Japan (now Zipingari) Venetus maketh this report. Incolæ religioni, literis, & ſapientiæ ſunt addictiſſimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more noſtro) ſacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoſcunt principem, unum Deum adorant. The iſlanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters and philoſophy, and moſt diligent ſearchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they uſe in their churches after the manner of Chriſtians. They acknowledge one king, and worſhip one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, ſumptuous buildings, and policy in government, is reported to be ſuch by thoſe who have been employ'd into thoſe parts, as it ſeemeth to exceed (in thoſe formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other kingdoms of the world.

† V.

The third argument, from the wonderful reſiſtance which Semiramis found in the Eaſt Indies.

BUT for a third argument, and alſo of a treble ſtrength to the reſt, I lay the invaſion of Semiramis before the indifferent and adviſed reader: who may conſider in what age ſhe lived, and how ſoon after the world's new birth ſhe gathered her army (as Diodorus Sioulus out of Cteſias reporteth) of more than three millions to invade India, to which he joineth alſo 500000 horſe, and 100000 waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it ſhall ſuffice to prove that India was the firſt planted and peopled country after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein ſhe lived: all hiſtorians conſent, that ſhe was the wife of Ninus; and the moſt approved writers agree, that Ninus was the ſon of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the ſon of Cuſh, Cuſh of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at ſuch time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great nation, as by the building of the city and tower of Babel may appear; and being then ſo multiplied and increaſed, the two deſcents caſt between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time thoſe multitudes, whereof her army was compoſed. Let us then ſee with whom ſhe encountered in that war with this her powerful army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equaling her own, conducted by Staurobates king of India beyond Indus; of whoſe multitudes this is the witneſs of Diodor. Siculus. Staurobates, avitis majoribus, quam quæ erant Semiramidis, copiis; Staurobates gathering together greater troops than thoſe of Semiramis. If then theſe numbers of Indians had been encreaſed but by a colony ſent out from Shinaar (and that alſo after Babel was built, which no doubt took ſome time in the performance) this encreaſe in the eaſt, and this army of Staurobates muſt have been made of ſtone, or ſomewhat elſe by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might eaſily grow up in that time from ſo great a troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as ſhall be demonſtrated hereafter in the ſtory of Iſrael) ſo could not any ſuch time, by any multiplication natural, produce ſo many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the colonies ſent thither had been ſo late as Babel overturned, and the confuſion of languages. For if we allow 65 years time after the flood, before Nimrod was born: of which 30 years to Cuſh, ere he begat Seba, after whom he had [a] Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then 30 years to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five years to his five elder brothers, which make 65, and then twice 30 years for two generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their ſons, and that a third generation might grow up, which makes in all 125 years, there will then remain ſix years to have been ſpent in travelling from the eaſt, ere they arrived in Shinaar in the year after the flood 131. And ſo the followers of Nimrod might be of ſufficient multitude. But as for thoſe which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101: and the confuſion to have been at Peleg's birth, theſe men do all by miracle: they beget whole nations without the help of time, and build Nimrod's tower in the air; and not on thoſe low and marſhy grounds (which require ſound foundations) in the plains of Shinaar. For except that huge tower were built in a day, there could be no confuſion in that year 101, or at Peleg's birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod uſurped regal authority in the 131ſt year after the flood (according to Beroſus) and that the work of Babel laſted forty years (according to Glycas) [b] hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40 annis incaſſum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40 years to finiſh it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170 years after the flood, ere a colony were ſent into Eaſt India; which granted (the one being the main body, and the other but a troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed, that Staurobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then empreſs of all that part of the world, gathered the moſt of nations into one body.

The fourth argument from divers conſiderations in the perſon of Noah.

FOurthly, It is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600 years, was all that ſpace, 130 years after the flood, without any certain habitation: no, it will fall out, and better agree with reaſon, that Nimrod was but the conductor of thoſe people, by Noah deſtined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the weſtern world (which travels Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himſelf, then covered with many years, planted himſelf in the ſame place which God had aſſigned him: which was where he firſt came down out of the ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came down out of the ark he planted a vineyard, and became a husbandman: whoſe buſineſs was to dreſs and manure the earth, and not to range over ſo many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia Fœlix, where he ſhould (if the tradition be found) have left certain colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spain, where they ſay he ſettled other companies; and built cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his ſons wives: from thence into Italy, where they ſay he found his ſon Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and ſubjects of Gomer in his abſence: with whom Noah (as they make the ſtory) had patience for three years; but then finding no amendment, they ſay, he baniſhed him out of Italy. Theſe be but the fancies of Beroſus Annianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reaſonable man conceive, what it was to travel far in ſuch a foreſt as the world was, when after ſo great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the ſame lay waſte and overgrown for 130 or 140 years, and wherein there could hardly be found either path or paſſage through which men were able to creep, for woods, buſhes and briars that in thoſe years were grown up.

And there are ſo many reaſons, proving that Noah never came into the valley of Shinaar, as we need not ſuſpect his paſſage into Italy or Spain: for Noah, who was father of all thoſe nations, a man reverenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and piety, would never have permitted his children and iſſues to have undertaken that unbelieving preſumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his preſence and prevalent perſuaſions he would have bound their hands from ſo vain labours, and, by the authority which he received even from God himſelf, he would have held them in that awful ſubjection, as whatſoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durſt not have diſobey'd the perſonal commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of regal authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former deſtruction of mankind was by themſelves purchaſed through cruelty and diſobedience; and that to diſtruſt God, and to raiſe up building againſt his Almighty power, was, as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the ſame, if not a more ſharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came ſo far weſt as Babylonia; but rather, that he ſent thoſe numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greateſt troop, becauſe they had the greateſt part of the world to plant) under Nimrod, or thoſe upon whom he uſurped. Nauclerus and Cæleſtinus take the teſtimony of Methodius biſhop of Tyre for current, that there were three leaders of the people after their encreaſe (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene and Joktan: of which Nimrod commanded the iſſues of Cham, Joktan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, altho' I will not doubt, but that ſo great a work as the world's plantation could not be affected without order and conduction.

Of the ſons of Sem: Joktan, Havila and Ophir, are eſpecially noted to have dwelt in the Eaſt-Indies. The reſt of Sem's iſſues had alſo the regions of Perſia and the other adjoining to Indus, and held alſo a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were the ſons of Joktan, or of all the reſt a certain number (Cham and his iſſue only excepted) that Noah kept with himſelf, it cannot be known. Of which plantation I ſhall ſpeak at large in the chapter following.

Now another reaſon which moves me to believe that Noah ſtayed in the eaſt, far away from all thoſe that came into Shinaar, is that Moſes doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the ſtory of the Hebrews, or among any of thoſe nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the father of all mankind, and the choſen ſervant of God, was too principal a perſon, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in reſpect of his age and wearieſome experience of the world) withdrawn himſelf, and reſted apart with his beſt beloved, giving himſelf to the ſervice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their deſtin'd portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile ſoil, where he planted his vineyard, and dreſs'd the earth; after which, and his thankſgiving to God by ſacrifice, he is not remembred in the ſcriptures, becauſe he was ſo far away from thoſe nations of which Moſes wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

Of the ſenſeleſs opinion of Annius the commentator upon Beroſus; who finds divers places where the ark reſted; as the Caſpian and Gordiæan hills, which are three hundred miles aſunder; and alſo ſome place of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the arguments and authorities of frier Annius, who in his commentaries upon Beroſus and others, laboureth marvellouſly to prove, that the ark of Noah reſted upon the Armenian mountains called Caſpii; which mountains ſeparate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And becauſe all his authors ſpeak of the mountains Gordiæi, he hath no other ſhift to unite theſe opinions, but by uniting thoſe far diſtant mountains together. To effect which he hath found no other invention, than to charge thoſe men with error which have carefully overſeen, printed, and publiſhed [a] Ptolemy's geography, in which they were altogether diſſevered: for that laſt edition of Mercator's ſets theſe hills five degrees (which makes three hundred Engliſh miles) aſunder. And certainly, if we look into thoſe more ancient copies of Villanovanus and others, we ſhall find nothing in them to help Annius withal: for in thoſe the mountains Caſpii ſtand ſeven degrees to the eaſt of the Gordiæi, which make 420 miles. And for thoſe authors, by whoſe authority Annius ſtrengthneth himſelf, Diodorus, whom he ſo much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like diſpute. [b] Aberrârunt vero omnes, non negligentiâ, ſed regnorum ſitus ignorantiâ; They have all erred (ſaith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the ſituation of kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the ark of Noah ſtood on the mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the ſame, he citeth [c] Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth, that 250 years before Ninus the earth was overflown with waters; Et in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; And that in Scythia Saga the ſtock of mortal men was renewed. The ſame author alſo teacheth that the Umbri before remembred (who were ſo called, becauſe ſaved from Deucalion's flood) were the ſons of the Galli, a nation of the Scythians. Ex his veniſſe Janum cum Dyrim & Gallis progenitoribus Umbrorum; From theſe Scythians, he ſaith, that Janus came with Dyrim and with the Galli the progenitors of the Umbri; and again, Equidem principatus originis ſemper Scythis tribuitur; Certainly the prime antiquity of off-ſpring is always given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that thoſe regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by ſome writers Sarmatia Aſiatica, were among the firſt peopled: and they held the greateſt part of Aſia under tribute till Ninus's time. Alſo [d] Pliny calleth the Umbri, which long ſince inhabited Italy, Gens antiquiſſima; A moſt ancient nation, who deſcended of theſe Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that theſe ancient Scythians (meaning the nephews of Noah) did firſt inhabit that region of the mountains, on which the ark reſted; and confeſſing that this great ſhip was grounded in Armenia, he feigned a nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the mountain Ararat, near the river of Araxes. And becauſe his author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, that in Scythia mankind was reſtored after the great flood, 250 years before Ninus) and in part utterly deſtroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankind was reſtor'd: he therefore in the Proem of his commentary upon [e] Beroſus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repitition of Cato's words, and writes, [f] Homines in Scythia ſalvatos. For Scythia Saga or Sacæ is undoubtedly under the mountains of Paropaniſus, on which, or near which, it is moſt probable that the ark firſt took ground; and from thoſe eaſt parts (according to [g] Moſes) came all thoſe companies which erected the tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the beſt authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name a Scytha rege eorum, from Scytha their king. But (in a word) we may ſee his vanity, or rather indeed his falſhood, in citing this place. For Diodorus, a moſt approved and diligent author, begineth in that place with theſe words, Fabulantur Scythæ; The Scythians fable: and his interpreter in the table of that work, giveth this title to that very chapter. Scytharum origo & ſucceſſus, fabula; The original and ſucceſs of the Scythians, a fable. And indeed there needs no great diſproof hereof, ſince Ptolemy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sacæ, and ſets them in 130 degrees of longitude: and the Perſians (ſaith Herodotus) call all the Scythians Sacæ, which Pliny confirmeth: for in reſpect that theſe Sacæ (ſaith [h] Pliny) are the next

Scythians to the Perſians, therefore they give all the reſt that name. Now that any nation in Armenia can neighbour the Perſians, there is no man believeth. But this ſuppoſed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lieth in 78 degrees of longitude (that is) 42 degrees diſtant from the Sacæ; and the country about Araxes, Ptolemy calleth Colthene and Soducene and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all thoſe which are or were reputed Scythians, either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100 ſeveral nations, are by [a] Ptolemy preciſely ſet down.

But to come to thoſe later authors, whereof ſome have written, others have ſeen a great part of thoſe north-eaſt regions, and ſearched their antiquities with great diligence: firſt, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without theſe mountains is alſo beyond our purpoſe.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea eſt, quæ proprio vocabulo Gaſſaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab occaſu Sarmatia Aſiatica: ab oriente Imao monte: a ſeptentrione Terra incognita: à meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, uſque ad oſtia Oxæ amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; et parte ipſius maris hinc uſque ad Rha fluminis oſtia terminatur: Scythia within the mountain Imaus is that part of the world, which in their own ſpeech is at this time called Gaſſaria; and the ſame is bounded on the weſt-ſide by Sarmatia Aſiatica (or of Aſia) on the eaſt by the Imaan mountains: on the north by unknown lands: on the ſouth by Saccæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan ſea, and by a part of the ſame ſea, as far as the mouth of Rha.[b]

Now if Niger ſets all Sarmatia Aſiatica, to the weſt of Scythia, then Sarmatia ([c] quæ magna ſanè regio eſt, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur; Which is a great region, comprehending innumerable nations (ſaith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth ſufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plain, he diſſevereth Sarmatia it ſelf from any part of Armenia, by the regions of [d] Colchis, Iberia, Albania which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the weſt bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian, or Scythian nations; neither doth his fellow frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his deſcription of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian born, of the blood of thoſe kings (tho' afterwards a monk) ever acknowledge himſelf for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races deſcended: tho' he writes that ſtory at large, gathered by Nicolaus Salcuni, and (by the commandment of pope Clement V.) in the year 1307 publiſhed.

Neither doth Matthias à Michon (a canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Aſiatica, find Armenia any way within the compaſs of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whoſe travels are extant) hath obſerved ſo much of thoſe regions as he hath done: proving and diſproving many things, heretofore ſubject to diſpute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received opinion, that out of the mountains Riphæi and Hyperborei in Scythia, ſpring the rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by unanſwerable experience, that there are no ſuch mountains in rerum natura; and indeed the heads and fountains of thoſe famous rivers, are now by the trade of Muſcovia known to every merchant, and that they ariſe out of lakes, low, woody, and marſhy grounds. The river of Tanais or Don, ariſeth to the ſouth of the city Tulla, ſome twenty Engliſh miles, out of a lake called Iwanoweſero in the great wood Okenitzkilies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolemy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riſeth out of a lake called Fronow, in the great wood Vodkonzki: from which lake the two other famous rivers flow of Boryſthenes (now Nyeper) and Dſuina or Dividna. And this learned [e] Polonian doth in this ſort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the regions of Ruſſians, Lithuanians, Muſcovians, and thoſe adjoining, bounded on the weſt by the river of [f] Viſſa, the name perchance miſprinted Viſſa for Viſtula, a river which parts Germany and Sarmatia: and for the eaſt border he nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Aſiatica he cutteth from Europe by the ſame river Tanais, and the Caſpian ſea, to with-hold it from ſtretching farther eaſt: this Aſian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolemy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem; Scythia within the mountain Imaus. And the ſame Matthias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Aſiatica it ſelf, above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: theſe be his words. Conſtat eam eſſe gentem novam, & adventitiam a partibus orientis (mutatis ſedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Aſiæ Sarmatiam ingreſſam: It is manifeſt (ſaith he, ſpeaking of the Scythian nation) that this is a late planted nation, come from the coaſts of the eaſt; from whence they entered into Aſia, and gat new ſeats a little more than three hundred years ſince: For indeed before that time the Goths or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia Aſiatica. And this Matthias lived in the year 1511, and this his diſcourſe of Sarmatia was printed at Auguſta in the year 1506, as Bucholzerus in his chronology witneſſeth. Now theſe Scythians (ſaith he) came from the eaſt; for in the eaſt it was that the ark of Noah reſted; and the Scythæ Sacæ were thoſe people which lived at the north foot of thoſe mountains of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mix themſelves with the great Imaus. And were there no other teſtimony than the general deſcription of the earth now extant, and the witneſs of Ptolemy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only thoſe three regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caſpian ſea: on the eaſt ſhore of which ſea, but not on the weſt, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia; there are indeed a nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) between Jaxartus and Jactus; but what are theſe Scythians to any Ariacæ, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe.

† VIII.

The fifth argument: The vine muſt grow naturally near the place where the ark reſted.

TO this if we add the conſideration of this part of the text, [g] That Noah planted a vineyard, we ſhall find that the fruit of the vine or raiſin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this reſting of the ark was ſuppoſed: for if the vine was a ſtranger in Italy and France, and brought from other countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a far colder country. For Tyrrhenus firſt brought vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at ſuch time as [a] Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy there were few or no vines in France. For (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alps, near unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunk wine, which was firſt brought them out of Italy; and after they taſted thereof they haſted to inhabit that country, which brought forth ſuch pleaſant fruit: ſo as it appeared, that the plant of the vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Saturn from elſewhere into Italy.

Now it is manifeſt that Noah travelled not far to ſeek out the vine. For the plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counſel how to diſpoſe of the world among his children: and the firſt thing he did was to till the ground, and to plant a vineyard, after his ſacrifice and thankſgiving to God; and whereſoever the ark reſted, there did the vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear that he travelled far: for the ſcriptures teach us, that he was a huſbandman, and not a wanderer.

Anſwer to an objection out of the words of the text: The Lord ſcattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appear, ſaving that it may be inferred out of theſe words [from thence] becauſe it is written: So that the Lord ſcattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other ſenſe, but that the Lord ſcattered them (to wit) thoſe that built this tower: for thoſe were from thence diſperſed into all the regions of the north and ſouth, and to the weſtward. And by theſe words of Sibylla (as they are converted) it ſeemeth that all came not together into Shinaar, for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem ædificârunt altiſſimam, quaſi per eam cœlum eſſent aſcenſuri; Certain of them built a moſt high tower, as if they meant thereby to have ſcaled the heavens.

An anſwer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the hills there.

BUT before I conclude this part, it is neceſſary to ſee and conſider, what part of ſcripture, and what reaſon may be found out to make it true or probable, that the ark of Noah was forſaken by the waters on the mountains of Armenia. For the text hath only theſe words: [b] The ark reſted on (or upon) the mountains of Ararat or Armenia, ſaith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldean Paraphriſt calls it Kardu; of which the higheſt hath the name of Lubar, ſaith [c] Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the ſame word) is taken to be a mountain of Armenia, becauſe Armenia it ſelf had anciently that name: ſo as firſt out of the name, and ſecondly out of the height (which they ſuppoſe exceeded all others) is the opinion taken, that the ark firſt ſat thereon.

But theſe ſuppoſitions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of thoſe mountains, of equal ſtature to many other mountains of the world; and yet it doth not follow, that the ark found the higheſt mountain of all others to reſt on: for the plains were alſo uncovered, before Noah came out of the ark. Now if there were any agreement among writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the books of the Sibyls it is written, that the mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was ſuppoſed that the ark ſtay'd after the flood. And the better to particularize the place and ſeat of theſe mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the city of Cœlenes was afterwards built. Likewiſe in the ſame deſcription ſhe maketh mention of Marſyas, a river which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterwards joineth it ſelf with the river Mæander: which is far from the Gordiean mountains in Armenia. We may alſo find a great miſtaking in Joſephus (tho' out of Beroſus, who is in effect the father of this opinion) that Joſephus ſets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, towards Adiabene, and affirmeth withal, that in the province of Curon, by others Kairos and Arnos, ſo called by reaſon that the waters have from thence no deſcent, nor iſſue out, the people vaunt that they had in thoſe days reſerved ſome pieces of Noah's ark. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a province of Aſſyria: ſo that all Media and a part of Aſſyria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the diſcovery of the mountains Cordiæi was firſt borrowed out of Beroſus by Joſephus; yet the text which Joſephus citeth out of Beroſus, differs far from the words of that Beroſus, which wandereth up and down in theſe days, ſet out by Annius. For Beroſus cited by Joſephus hath theſe words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia, apud montem Cordiæorum ſupereſſe, & quoſdam bitumen inde abraſum ſecum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci hujus homines uti ſolent (which is) It is reported alſo that a part of this ſhip is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiean mountains; and that divers do ſcrape from it the bitumen or pitch, and carrying it with them, they uſe it inſtead of an amulet. But Annius's edition of the fragment of Beroſus uſeth theſe words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordiæi montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars eſſe, & homines ex illa bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem; For the whole ark being lifted up by the waters, reſted on the top of the Gordiean mountains, of which it is reported that ſome parts remain, and that men do carry thence of the bitumen to purge by ſacrifice therewith. So as in theſe two texts (beſides the difference of words) the name is diverſly written: the ancient Beroſus writes Cordiæi with a [C] and the fragment Gordiæi with a [G:] the one that the bitumen is uſed for a preſervative againſt poiſon or inchantment; the other in ſacrifice; and if it be ſaid that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved author: for one of them uſeth the word [fertur;] the other [dicitur:] the one, that ſo it is reported; the other, that ſo it is ſaid: and both but by hearſay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is ſo infamous an hiſtorian, as wiſe men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, theſe mountains which Ptolemy calls Gordiæi, are not thoſe mountains which himſelf giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the mountains of Armenia Moſchici. Theſe be his own words: [d] Montes Armeniæ nominantur ii, qui Moſchici appellantur, Concerning the other ſuppoſitions, that the mountains of Gordiæi, otherwiſe Baris, Kardu or Lubar (which Ptolemy calleth Torgodiaion) are the higheſt of the world, the ſame is abſolutely falſe.

† XI.

Of Caucaſus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

FOR the beſt Coſmographers with others, that have ſeen the mountains of Armenia, find them far inferiour, and under-ſet to divers other mountains even in that part of the world, and elſewhere: as the mountain Athos between Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Lacas (ſaith Caſtaldus) is far ſurmounting any mountain that ever hath been ſeen in Armenia: for it caſteth ſhade three hundred furlongs, which is thirty-ſeven miles and upwards: of which Plutarch, [b] Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bovis; Athos ſhadoweth the cow of Lemnos. Alſo the mount of Olympus in Theſſaly is ſaid to be of that height, as neither the winds, clouds, or rain overtop it. Again, the mountain of Antandrus in Myſia, not far from Ida, whence the river Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be ſeen from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania near the ſea, the famous mountains of Atlas, of which Herodotus. Extat in hoc mari mons, cui nomen Atlas, ita ſublimis eſſe dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non poſſint; Upon this coaſt there is a mountain called Atlas, whoſe height is ſaid to be ſuch as the eye of no mortal man can diſcern the top thereof. And if we may believe Ariſtotle, then are all theſe inferiour to Caucaſus, which he maketh the moſt notorious both for breadth and height. [c] Caucaſus mons omnium maximus, qui æſtivum ad ortum ſunt, acumine atque latitudine, cujus juga a ſole radiantur uſque ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occaſu. Caucaſus (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the greateſt mountain both for breadth and height of all thoſe in the north-eaſt, whoſe tops are lightned by the ſun beams, uſque ad conticinium (which is, ſaith Macrobius) between the firſt crowing after midnight and the break of day: others affirm, that the top of this mountain holds the ſun beams when it is dark in the valley; but I cannot believe either: for the higheſt mountain of the world known, is that of Tenerif in the Canaries: which although it hath nothing to the weſtward of it for 1000 leagues together but the ocean ſea, yet doth it not enjoy the ſun's company at any ſuch late hours. Beſides, theſe mountains which Ariſtotle calleth Caucaſi, are thoſe which ſeparate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucaſus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia and Albania, from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the river of Phaſis riſeth in the ſame mountain, which himſelf calleth Caucaſus, and that Phaſis ſpringeth from thoſe hills which ſunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterwards into Euxinus: which river (it is manifeſt) yieldeth it ſelf to the ſea two degrees to the north of Trapezus (now Trabeſunda) howſoever Mercator brings it from Paryardes.

† XII.

Of divers incongruities, if in this ſtory we ſhould take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth firſt appear, that there is no certainty what mountain Ararat was: for the books of the Sibyls ſet it in Phrygia; and Beroſus in Armenia: and as for Beroſus's authority, thoſe men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, That Baris was the higheſt hill, and therefore moſt likely that the ark grounded thereon, the aſſertion and ſuppoſition have equal credit: for there are many hills which exceed all thoſe of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the ark ſhould ſit on the higheſt.

Thirdly, It cannot be proved that there is any ſuch hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris; for Baris (ſaith Jerome) ſignifieth high towers: and ſo may all high hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the hills of Caucaſus (out of which Indus riſeth) than to any hills of Armenia. For thoſe of Caucaſus in the eaſt, are undoubtedly the higheſt of Aſia.

Fourthly, The authors themſelves do not agree in what region the mountains Gordiæi ſtand: for Ptolemy diſtinguiſheth the mountains of Armenia from the Gordiean, and calleth thoſe of Armenia Moſchici and Paryardes, as aforeſaid. Now Paryardes is ſeated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the weſt ſide riſeth Euphrates, and out of the eaſt ſide Araxis: and the mountains Moſchici are thoſe hills which disjoin Colchis, Iberia and Albania (now the country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

† XIII.

Of the contrary ſituation of Armenia to the place noted in the text: and that it is no marvel that the ſame ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, ſhould keep the ſame name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

LAſtly, we muſt blow up this mountain Ararat it ſelf, or elſe we muſt dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it elſewhere, and in a warmer country, and (withal) ſet it eaſt from Shinaar: or elſe we ſhall wound the truth it ſelf with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the miſtaking open to every eye, we muſt underſtand, that Ararat (named by Moſes) is not any one hill, ſo called, no more than any one hill among thoſe mountains, which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among thoſe, which part France from Spain, is the Pyrenean; but as theſe being, continuations of many hills, keep one name in divers countries: ſo all that long ledge of mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name [d] Taurus, and Ptolemy both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and croſs the mountains of the great Imaus, are of one general name, and are called the mountains of Ararat or Armenia, becauſe from thence or thereabouts they ſeem to ariſe. So all theſe mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caſpii, Moſchici, Amazonici, Eniochi, Scythici (thus diverſly called by Pliny, and others) Ptolemy calls by one name Caucaſus, lying between the ſeas Caſpium and Euxinus:

Euxinus: as all thoſe mountains which cut aſunder America, even from the new kingdom of Granado, to the ſtreight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as theſe mountains of Ararat run eaſt and weſt: ſo do thoſe marvellous mountains of Imaus ſtretch themſelves north and ſouth; and being of like extent, well near, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Pliny calleth theſe former hills Taurus, and Moſes the hills of Ararat. The reaſon of ſeveral names given by Ptolemy was, thereby the better to diſtinguiſh the great regions and kingdoms, which theſe great mountains bound and diſſever; as Armenia, Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Media, Suſiana, Perſia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana and Paropaniſus: having all theſe kingdoms either on the north or ſouth-ſide of them. For all the mountains of Aſia (both the leſs and the greater) have three general names (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucaſus: and they receive other titles, as they ſever and divide particular places and regions. For theſe mountains which ſunder Cilicia from the reſt of Aſia the leſs on the north-ſide, are called Taurus; and thoſe mountains which part it from Comagena (a province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountains called Taurus running eaſt and weſt, as Imaus doth north and ſouth. Though Taurus the river of Euphrates forceth her paſſage, leaving the name of Amanus to the mountains on her weſt-bank; and on her eaſt-ſide the mountains are ſometimes known by the name of Taurus (as in Ptolemy's three tables of Aſia) and ſometimes Niphates (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation ſo long as they bound Armenia from Meſopotamia: and after the the river of Tigris cutteth them aſunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they ſeparate Aſſyria and Media; but then they call themſelves Coatras, tho' between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether diſcontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the eaſtern Media by pieces: in the middle of which region they call themſelves Orontes, and towards the eaſt-part Coronus; out of the ſouthern part whereof the river of Bagradus riſeth, which divideth the ancient Perſia from Caramania: and then continuing their courſe eaſtward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper countries. This done, they change themſelves into the mountains of Sariphi, out of which riſeth the river Margus, afterwards yielding herſelf to Oxus (now Abia) and drawing now near their ways end, they firſt make themſelves the ſouth border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the title of Paropaniſus; and laſtly of Caucaſia, even where the famous river of Indus with his principal companions Hydaſpis and Zarædrus ſpring forth, and take beginning. And here do theſe mountains build themſelves exceeding high, to equal the ſtrong hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37 degrees of latitude, and in 140 of longitude: of the which the weſt parts are now called Lelanguer, and the reſt Nagracot; and theſe mountains in this place only are properly called Caucaſi (ſaith [a] Ptolemy) that is, between Paropaniſus and Imaus: and improperly, between the two ſeas of Caſpium and Pontus.

† XIV.

Of the beſt vine naturally growing on the ſouth ſide of the mountains Caucaſi, and towards the Eaſt-Indies: and of other excellencies of the ſoil.

NOW in this part of the world it is, where the mountain and river Janus, and the mountain Niſeus (ſo called of Bacchus Niſeus or Noa) are found: and on theſe higheſt mountains of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceive that the ark of Noah grounded after the flood: of all his conjectures the moſt probable, and by beſt reaſon approved. In his Indoſcythia he hath many good arguments, tho' mix'd with other fantaſtical opinions of this ſubject. And as the ſame Becanus alſo noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the beſt vines: ſo it is as true, that in the ſame line, and in 34, 35, and 36 degrees of ſeptentrional latitude are the moſt delicate wines of the world, namely, in Judea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewiſe in this region of Margiana, and under theſe mountains, Strabo affirmeth that the moſt excellent vines of the world are found; the cluſters of grapes containing two cubits of length: and it is the more probable, becauſe this place agreeth in climate with that part of Paleſtina, where the ſearchers of the land by Moſes's direction found bunches of equal bigneſs at [b] Eſhcol.

The fruitfulneſs of this place, to wit, on the ſouth bottom of theſe hills, Curtius witneſſeth. For in Margiana, near the mountains of Meros, did Alexander feaſt himſelf and his army ten days together, finding therein the moſt delicate wine of all other.

† XV.

The concluſion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that thoſe mountains do alſo traverſe Armenia: yea, and Armenia it ſelf ſometimes is known by the name of Ararat. But as [c] Pliny giveth to this ledge of high hills, even from Cilicia to Paropaniſus and Caucaſus, the name of Taurus: and as the hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenees: and in America the continuation of hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: ſo was Ararat the general name which Moſes gave them; the diverſity of appellations no otherwiſe growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers regions and divers countries. For in the like caſe do we call the ſea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterranean and inland ſea; and yet where it waſheth the coaſts of Carthage, and over-againſt it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Aſia, Ægeum: between Seſtus and Abydus, Helleſpont: and afterwards Pontus, Propontis and Boſphorus. And as in theſe, ſo is the ocean to the north-eaſt part of Scotland called Deucaledonicum: and on this ſide, the Britiſh ſea: to the eaſt, the German and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this queſtion we muſt appeal to that judge which cannot err, even to the word of truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain ſenſe: ſeeing it can admit neither diſtinction, nor other conſtruction than the words bear literally, becauſe they are uſed to the very ſame plain purpoſe of a deſcription, and the making of a true and preciſe difference of places. Surely where the ſenſe is plain (and being ſo underſtood, it bringeth with it no ſubſequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancy to our ſelves any new or ſtrange expoſition; and (withal) to reſolve our ſelves, that every word (as aforeſaid) hath his weight in God's book. And therefore we muſt reſpect and reverence the teſtimonies of the ſcriptures throughout, in ſuch ſort as St. Auguſtine hath taught us touching the goſpel of

[a] Ptol. Tab. Aſiæ. [b] Numb. 13. 24. [c] Lib. 5. c. 27.

Christ Jesus, which is, Nequis aliter accipiat, quod (narrantibus discipulis Christi) in evangelio legerit, quàm si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit. That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the gospel (the disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

The words then of Moses which end this dispute are these: [a] And as they went from the east they found a plain in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode; which proveth without controversy, that Nimrod, and all with him came from the east into Shinaar; and therefore the ark of Noah rested and took land to the eastward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places whersoever Moses maketh a difference of countries, he always precisely nameth towards what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Joctan, he nameth Sephar, a mount in the east: where he remembreth Cain's departure from the presence of God, he addeth: [b] And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the east-side of Eden: and when he describeth the tents and habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words: [c] Afterwards removing thence unto a mountain eastward from Bethel, he pitched his tents: having Bethel on the west side, and Hai on the east: and afterwards in the 9th verse of the same chapter it is written; And Abraham went forth journeying towards the south: also when [d] Ezekiel prophesy'd of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these nations of Togorma were of the north quarters: and of the queen of Saba it is written, That [e] she came from the south to visit Solomon: And the [f] magi (or wise men) came out of the east to offer presents unto Christ. And that all regions, and these travels were precisely set down upon the points of the compass and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due east from Judea, Saba south from Jerusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly south; and the Cœlesyrians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the regions directly north from Palestina: and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the east, nor so near unto the east as the north: for Armenia is to the west of the north it self; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the Holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto cœlo, and that he knew not east from west. For the body of Armenia standeth in 43 degrees septentrional, and the north part thereof in 45; and those Gordiean mountains, whereon it was supposed that the ark rested, stand in 41. But Babylonia, and the valley of Shinaar are situated in 35, and for the longitude (which maketh the difference between east and west) the Gordiean mountains stand in 75 degrees, and the valley of Shinaar in 79 and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar north-west, 95 degrees from the east; and if Armenia had been but north, yet it had differed from the east one whole quarter of the compass. But Gregory and Jerome warn us, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices & puncta in divina scriptura plena sunt sensibus. In the scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note or accent, and point, in divine scriptures are repleniſhed with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the east, we may not believe writers (of little authority) who also speak by hearsay, and by report, Ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein, without any examination of the text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lieth west from the place where the ark of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the east, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The east parts were first civil, which had Noah himself for an instructor: and directly east from Shinaar, in the same degree of 35, are the greatest grapes and the best wine. The great armies also, which overtopped in number those millions of Semiramis, prove that those parts were first planted: and whereas the other opinion hath neither scripture nor reason sufficient: for my self, I build on his words who in plain terms hath told us, that the sons of Noah came out of the east into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the ark rest on those eastern mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the mountains of Ararat, and not on those mountains of the north-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warm east where Noah rested, where he planted the vine, where he tilled the ground, and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamque rem sua ipsius lingua Ish Adamah (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusque est; The study of husbandry pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no wanderer: and that he troubled not himself with the contentions beginning again in the world, and among men, but stay'd in his destin'd places, and in that part of the world, where he was first delivered out of the prison of the ark, whereinto God had committed him to preserve him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of nations after the flood; and of the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the earth was re-peopled.

SECT. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

OF these sons of Noah, which was the eldest there is a question made. [g] St. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of writers are divers. But this we find every where in the scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in virtue, as by the examples of Enoch, Abraham, Jacob and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversy: the Latin translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this scripture of Genesis x. 21. in these words; Unto Shem also the father of all the sons of Heber, and elder brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To Shem also the father of all the sons of Heber, and brother of Japhet, the eldest son were children born: so the transposition of the word [eldest] made this difference. For if the word [elder] had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing God's blessings are not tied to first and last in blood, but to the eldest in piety, yet the arguments are stronger for Japhet than for Shem. And where the scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of judgment should make valuation of conjectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah, in the five hundredth year of his life, begat the first of his three sons Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundredth year, to wit, the hundredth year following, came the general flood; two years after which [a] Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602 of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: so as Shem was but one hundred years old, two years after the flood: and Noah begat his first-born, being 500 years old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then been 100 years old at the flood, and in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which seeing the scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: [b] Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him, to wit, Ham; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son so converted by the vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it Filius minimus, his youngest son; but St. Chrysostom takes it otherwise, and finds Ham to be the middle or second brother, and Japhet the youngest son of all: which Ham, for his disobedience and the contempt of his father, (whose nakedness he derided) was disinherited, and lost the pre-eminency of his birth, as [c] Esau and Reuben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withal, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place, yet whereas in the first verse of the tenth chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet; in the second verse Moses leaveth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew nation, Abraham, the prophets, David and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the vulgar, Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, Shem frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri Japhet majoris; or with Pererius, Shem frater Japhet ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the reader judge.

But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former argument, that Shem's age at the time of the flood did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not find in the scriptures any such neglect at all: For it is written, that [d] Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood: and again in the 12th verse, So Shela lived after he begat Eber four hundred and three years, &c. So as the number of two years, of three years, of five years, and afterwards of two years were always precisely accounted.

SECT. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world, as that all histories must yield to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the known great lords of the first ages were of the issue of Ham.

BUT let us go unto the world's plantation after the flood, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many nations have supposed or feigned themselves those ancestors and fathers, which never saw or approached the bounds of their countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the scriptures how the sons and issues of Noah were distributed, and what regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any profane author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the scriptures end. For so far as the story of nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquity of the books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, and testimony of antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful observers of time have noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the proem of his chronology. Moses is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as Homer, Hesiod, and the Trojan war; and far before Hercules, Musæus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Castor, Pollux, Æsculapius, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, and the rest of the Gods of the nations, their ceremonies, or holy rites, or prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have seated in the top and highest turret of their divinity.

For of the three Jupiters remembred by [e] Cicero, the ancientest was the son of Æther, whose three sons begotten on Proserpina, were born at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first king: and in the end of Cecrops's time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Ægypto novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensis regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last days of Cecrops king of the Athenians, saith [f] St. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the founder of the city it self, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diversly proved, and by many learned authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand by alledging many authorities, in a needless question, but leave it to the proper place.

The sons of Japhet were: Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshach, and Tiras.

The sons of Gomer were: Askenaz, Riphath, Togorma.

The sons of Javan were: Elisha, Tarshis, Kittim, & Dodanim.

First, We are to consider that the world after the flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings, to fly from Shinaar to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wise father, who knew those parts of the world before the flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as discoverers, or at all adventure, but aſſigned and allotted to every ſon, and their iſſues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous authors, who have no other end than to flatter princes (as Virgil did Auguſtus in the fiction of Æneas) or elſe to glorify their own nations: let us build upon the ſcriptures themſelves, and after them upon reaſon and nature. Firſt therefore, we muſt call to mind and conſider, what manner of face the earth every where had in the 130th year after the great inundation, and, by comparing thoſe fruitfulleſt valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our ſelves thereby, what wonderful deſarts, what impaſſable faſtneſs of woods, reeds, briers and rotten graſs, what lakes, and ſtanding pools, and what marſhes, fens, and bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the mountains) was peſtered withal. For if in this our climate (where the dead and deſtroying winter depreſſeth all vegetative and growing nature, for one half of the year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty years, theſe our grounds would not all overgrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods or with other offenſive thickets and buſhments: much more did all ſorts of plants, reeds, and trees, proſper in the moſt fruitful valleys, and in the climate of a long and warm ſummer, and having withal the ſtart of 130 years to raiſe themſelves without controulment.

This being conſidered, it will appear, that all theſe people which came into Shinaar, and over whom Nimrod either by order or ſtrength took the dominion, did after the confuſion of languages, and at ſuch time as they grew to be a mighty people, diſperſe themſelves into the regions adjoining to the ſaid valley of Shinaar, which contained the beſt part of Meſopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea, and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: ſome of them towards the ſouth, others towards the weſt and north. And altho' there were allotted to Shem many regions both eaſt and weſt from Shinaar, with the dominion of Paleſtina, which the Canaanites firſt poſſeſs'd; yet could he not enjoy the lot of his inheritance on the ſudden, but by time and degrees. For we find, that Abraham the true ſucceſſor of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he reſted at Charran in Meſopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare, he travelled to Sichem in Paleſtina; and yet there had paſſed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themſelves) ſeven deſcents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldea: where, and in Babylonia, all thoſe people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many years, and whence Nimrod went out into Aſſyria, and founded Nineveh. Indeed the great maſters of nations (as far as we can know) were, in that age of the iſſues of Ham; the bleſſing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking leſs effect, until divers years were conſumed; and until the time arrived, which by the wiſdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan came the people, and princes, which held the great kingdoms of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many deſcents together.

SECT. III.

Of the iſles of the Gentiles in Japhet's portion: of Beroſus's too ſpeedy ſeating Gomer the ſon of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhet's ſons Tubal in Spain: and of the antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore where Moſes beginneth with the ſons of Japhet, among whom the iſles of the Gentiles were divided: which diviſion, as well to Japhet's ſons, as to the reſt which came into Shinaar, was (if the diviſion were made at Phaleg's birth) in the year of the world 1757 or 1758, and (by that account) in the year after the flood one hundred and one, of which queſtion elſewhere.

The habitations proper to the ſons of Japhet were the iſles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe, with all the iſlands adjoining and compaſſing it about: Europe being alſo taken for an iſland, both in reſpect that the ſea Helleſpont and Ægeum, Boſphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great continent of Aſia, as alſo becauſe Europe it ſelf is, in effect, ſurrounded with water, ſaving that it is faſtned to Aſia by the north; for it hath thoſe ſeas before named to the eaſt, the Mediterranean to the ſouth and ſouth-weſt, the ocean to the weſt, and Britiſh, German and Baltick ſea, with that of Glaciale to the north-north-eaſt, and north-weſt. Beſides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or iſles lying between Greece and the leſſer Aſia, and the iſles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete or Candia, Sicilia, Corſica, Sardinia, Malta, the iſles of Brittany and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent.

This partition and portion of Japhet, with the part which he held in Aſia and the north, which was alſo very great, anſwereth to that bleſſing of God by Noah. [a] Dilatet Deus Japhet; Let God ſpread abroad (or encreaſe the poſterity of) Japhet, and let him dwell in the tents of Shem. For tho' Junius here uſeth the word [alliciat] and not [dilatet] and the Geneva perſuadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatet or amplificet; and ſuch was the bleſſing given to our fathers, which God promiſed to Abraham and his ſeed for ever. And the dwelling in the tents or tabernacles of Shem was a bleſſing by God to the poſterity of Japhet: noting not only an enlargment of territories; but that thereby they ſhould be made participant of God's church. But to come to Japhet's ſons, of whom Gomer is the eldeſt. This Gomer (if we may believe Beroſus and Annius, whoſe authority the greateſt number of all our late writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrod's reign depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which alſo [b] Funcius confirmeth in theſe words, Anno decimo Nimrodi, &c. In the tenth year of Nimrod's reign, Gomerus Gallus planted a colony in that land afterwards called Italy: and in the twelfth year of the ſame Nimrod's reign, Tubal ſeated himſelf in Aſturia in Spain (now called Biſcay) which was in the 140th and in the 142d years after the flood, according to Beroſus. But this opinion is very ridiculous: For before the confuſion of tongues the children of Noah did not ſeparate themſelves, at leaſt ſo many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore conſider with reaſon, what time the building ſuch a city and tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform ſuch a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Funcius himſelf out of his author Beroſus witneſſeth) Ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the mountains. Sure that both this city and tower were almoſt built, the ſcriptures witneſs. [c] But the Lord came down to ſee the city and tower, which the ſons of men built. Let us then but allot a time ſufficient for the making of brick to ſuch a work, of the greateſt height (and therefore of circuit and foundation anſwerable) that ever was. For where the univerſal flood covered the higheſt mountains fifteen cubits; Let us build us a city and a tower (ſaith Nimrod) whoſe top may reach unto the heaven: meaning, that they would raiſe their work above fifteeen cubits higher than the higheſt mountain, otherwiſe they could not aſſure themſelves from the fear of a ſecond inundation; a great part whereof was finiſhed before it fell, and before they left the work. They alſo began this building upon a ground, the moſt oppreſſed with waters of all the world; as by the great ruin which theſe waters forcibly overbearing and overflowing, made in the time of the ſucceeding emperors, is made manifeſt, approved alſo by the prophet Jeremy, ſpeaking of Babylon in theſe words; Thou that dwelleſt upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a ſubſtantial foundation for ſo high a rais'd building on a marſhy ground: and to which Glycas upon Geneſis giveth forty years. For it ſeemeth, that the tower was near finiſhed when God overthrew it: it being afterwards written, So the Lord ſcattered them from thence upon all the earth, and they left to build the city. Out of which place it may be gathered (becauſe the tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their ſuppos'd defence, which was the tower: and that afterwards they went on with the city adjoining, wherein they inhabited. It is alſo to be noted, that till ſuch time as this confuſion ſeized them (whereupon the tower was thrown down) theſe nations did not diſperſe themſelves: for [a] from thence the Lord ſcattered them upon all the earth, that was, when they perceived not one another's ſpeech. Now to think that this work in the newneſs of the world (wanting all inſtruments and materials) could be performed in ten years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the ſame year could creep thro' 3000 miles of deſart, with women, children, and cattle; let thoſe light believers, that neither tie themſelves to the ſcripture, nor to reaſon, approve it, for I do not. And if the ark of Noah was 100 years in building, or but near ſuch a time, and then, when the world had ſtood 1656 years, it were more than fooliſhneſs and madneſs it ſelf, to think that ſuch a work as this could be performed in ten; when the world (from the flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131 years, and whereof they had ſpent ſome part in travelling from the eaſt. Again, if all Aſia ſet to their helping hands in the building of the temple of [b] Diana, and yet they conſumed in that work 400 years (or be it but half that time) and in ſuch an age as when the world flouriſhed in all ſorts of artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages, this work of the tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants ſuppoſed) be erected in thoſe few years remembred. And for concluſion, let all men of judgment weigh with themſelves how impoſſible it was for a nation or family of men, with their wives and children, and cattle, to travel 3000 miles through woods, bogs, and deſarts, without any guide or conductor; and we ſhall find it rather a work of 100 years than of 100 days. For in the Weſt-Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in thoſe places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entered the country ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrod's people ſpent many years by the account before remembred in paſſing from the Eaſt-Indies, or the higher part thereof, which ſtandeth in 115 degrees of longitude, until they came into Shinaar which lieth in 79 degrees (the diſtance between thoſe places containing 36 degrees, which make 720 leagues, which is 2160 miles) and did all the way keep the mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biſcay is much more: for the body of Biſcay lieth in ten degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar (as aforeſaid) in 79: ſo the length of way from Shinaar to Aſturia or Biſcay, is 69 degrees, which make 1380 leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to find Shinaar, which was but 2160 miles: or (ſuppoſing that the ark reſted in Armenia) little above 400 miles, there is no cauſe to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travel 3000 miles to countries leſs known unto them by far, than the land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradiſe was known to Noah before the flood, and ſo was the region of Eden by Moſes afterwards remembred; but what he underſtood of moſt part of the world elſe, it is unknown. And therefore did Annius ill adviſe himſelf to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the 10th and 12th of Nimrod's reign: [c] Shall the earth be brought forth in one day, or ſhall a nation be born at once? But it may be objected, that the ſons of Japhet might come by ſea, and ſo ſave this great travel through deſarts by land. But we never read of any navigation in thoſe days, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbark ſo great a people, as we may juſtly ſuppoſe thoſe conductors carried with them, will not eaſily believe, that there were any veſſels in thoſe days to tranſport armies, and withal their cattle, by whoſe milk they lived and fed their children: for milk and fruit were the banqueting diſhes of our forefathers. And in the eldeſt times, even the kings and fathers of nations valued themſelves by the herds and numbers of their cattle: who had flocks of ſheep, and great droves and herds of their own, and their own ſhepherds and herdſmen. Now if Tubal had paſs'd by ſea from any part of Paleſtina, Syria or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granado, Valencia, and other provinces in that tract; paſs'd the Streights of Gibraltar, diſdain'd all Andaluſia and Portugal, with all thoſe goodly ports and countries, and have ſought out the iron, woody, and barren country of the world, called Biſcay, by a long and dangerous navigation. But before the journey of the Argonautæ, there were ſcarce any veſſels that durſt croſs the ſeas in that part of the world: and yet that which Jaſon had, if the tale be true, was but a galley, and a poor one (God knows) and perchance ſuch as they uſe this day in Ireland; which altho' it carried but four and fifty paſſengers, yet was it far greater than any of the former times: [d] Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum uſus; For in former times they uſed very ſmall veſſels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themſelves of old to far-off navigations, whence Tibullus aſcribed the invention of ſhips unto them.

Tyrus knew firſt how ſhips might uſe the wind.

And for thoſe boats [f] Longæ naves, or gallies, Pliny ſaith, that Ægeſias aſcribeth the device to Paralus: and Philoſtephanus to Jaſon: Cteſias to Semyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Ægeon; to which invention the Erythræi are ſaid to have added certain numbers of oars, and then [g] Aminocles the Corinthian to have encreaſed them: the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to four banks: the Quinque Remi firſt to have been uſed by Neſichthon the Salaminian, with which veſſels in thoſe parts of the world, the Romans ſerved themſelves in the Punick war. But theſe be, perhaps, but the partialities of writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as conſtantly caſt the deviſing of theſe gallies on Seſoſtris, tho' Se- miramis uſed them in the paſſage of her army over Indus in Abraham's time. So it is ſaid, that [a] Danaus was the firſt that brought a ſhip into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention; and yet Tertullian, on the contrary, gives it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And ſo ignorant were the people of thoſe ages, as the Egyptians uſed to coaſt the ſhores of the Redſea upon raffs deviſed by king Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Britains had a kind of boat (with which they croſs'd the ſeas) made of ſmall twigs, and covered over with leather: of which kind I have ſeen at the Dingle in Ireland, and elſewhere. Naves ex corio circumſutæ in oceano Britannico (ſaith Textor:) of which Lucan the poet:

And altho' it cannot be denied, when Noah by God's inſpiration was inſtructed in ſo many particulars concerning the ark, that then many things concerning navigation were firſt revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the ark of Noah, and ſuch ſhips as were for any long navigation. Yea, ancient ſtories ſhew, that it was long after theſe times, ere any durſt preſume upon any long voyages to ſea: at leaſt, with multitudes of women, and children, and cattle: as alſo common reaſon can tell us, that even now when this art is come to her perfection, ſuch voyages are very troubleſome and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that age of Nimrod, any ſhip, or uſe of ſhips, fit for any long navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had paſſed themſelves and their people by ſea; the exerciſe of navigation would not have been dead for ſo many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their fables, and all men elſe to their fancies, who have caſt nations into countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the relation of Moſes and the prophets; to which truth there is joined both nature, reaſon, policy, and neceſſity: and to the reſt, neither probability, nor poſſibility.

SECT. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Meſech, ſeated firſt about Aſia the leſs, out of Ezekiel xxxviii. 39.

NOW altho' many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a plantation of the world, which alſo hath been and is received: yet I hope I may be excuſed, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great learned man of this latter age, Arias Montanus, was alſo in ſome things much miſtaken: and for Joſephus, as he hath many good things, and is a guide to many errors withal, ſo was he in this plantation of the world very groſs and fabulous, whereby both Euſebius, Hieroſolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his teſtimonies for current, have been by him far miſled. But the better to conceive what regions of the world Gomer the firſt ſon of Japhet poſſeſs'd, as alſo Tubal, it is needful to begin with Magog; becauſe the ſcriptures take moſt knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names have troubled many commentators, ſaith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find moſt judicious in the examination of this plantation. He takes authority from the prophet Ezekiel chiefly, who in the 38th and 39th chapter directeth us what nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was prince or chief conductor in their attempts againſt Iſrael: for beſides the portions of Europe, and the north-eaſt parts of the greater Aſia, which Japhet's iſſues poſſeſs'd, all Aſia the leſs was peopled by them. And that thoſe of the iſſue of Japhet (whom Ezekiel ſpeaks of) were ſeated hereabout, it may beſt appear, if we conſider the circumſtances of the place, and the dependency upon the former prophecy in the 37th chapter: for in that 37th chapter, [b] Ezekiel propheſieth of the uniting of the two kingdoms of Iſrael and Judah, after their delivery from captivity.

By which prophecy of Ezekiel, it appeareth, that God purpoſed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one prince. For to that purpoſe it is written; And David my ſervant ſhall be king over them, and they ſhall have one ſhepherd, that is, they ſhall be united as they were in David's times. Hereupon in the 38th chapter Ezekiel propheſieth againſt thoſe nations, which ſhould ſeek to impeach this union, and diſturb the people of Iſrael, whom God purpoſed to receive to grace, and promiſed to reſtore. And ſo in the ſame chapter are thoſe nations coupled together, which infeſted the Iſraelites after their return, and ſought to ſubject them: all which were the ſubjects or allies of Gog, prince of the Magogians, or Cœleſyrians, next bordering Paleſtina or the holy land, followed alſo by the reſt of the nations of Aſia the leſs, which lay north from Judea. The words of Ezekiel are theſe; [c] Son of man, ſet thy face againſt Gog, and againſt the land of Magog the chief princes of Meſech (or Moſoch) and Tubal: and afterward, Behold, I come againſt the chief prince of Meſech anâ Tubal: and in the ſixth verſe, Gomer and all his bands, and the houſe of Togorma of the north quarters. Herein Ezekiel having firſt delivered the purpoſe of his prophecy, teacheth what nations they were, that ſhould in vain aſſail Iſrael. He joineth them together under their prince Gog, and ſheweth that their habitations were on the north quarters of Judah, and how ſeated and joined together. Gog ſignifieth in the Hebrew (ſaith St. Jerome) tectum or covering of a houſe: and Pintus upon Ezekiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichriſt: for, ſaith he, Antichriſtus erit diaboli tegumentum ſub ſpecie humana; That Antichriſt ſhall be the covering of the devil under human form. He addeth that Magog is as much to ſay as Gog: the letter [M] being an Hebrew prepoſition, and importeth as much as of or from: ſo he taketh Magog for thoſe people which follow Antichriſt. So far Pintus, at leaſt in this, is not amiſs, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one perſon, but for a nation, with which agreeth this obſervation of Beroaldus. Magog, ſaith he, in Hebrew is written Ham Magog, which ſheweth Magog to be a region or nation: for the letter [He] which is uſed but for an Emphaſis (which the Hebrews call Heliaiedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was prince of that nation (called either Magog, or according to others the people of Gog) alſo prince of Meſech (or Moſoch) and of Tubal: as by the firſt verſe of the 39th chapter is made manifeſt, Behold, I come againſt thee Gog the chief prince of Meſech and Tubal. This muſt needs be meant by the ſucceſſors of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering nations) ſeek to make the Jews their tributaries only, but endeavoured by all means, and by all kind of violence, to extinguiſh the religion it ſelf (which the Hebrews profeſs'd) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worſhip and ſerve the mortal and rotten Gods of the heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead images. [a] St. Ambroſe and Iſidore take Gog for the nation of the Goths: belike, becauſe they invaded Europe, and ſack'd Rome and many other places and cities thereabouts. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela derives the Turks from the Scythians, eſteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a man: others of a region: others for a nation inhabiting a region, as Junius, who ſays that Gog is the name of a nation, denominated from him whom the Greek ſtories call Gyges: who in former time having ſlain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that nation, thence after called Gygades: and therefore alſo the Gygean lake, which lake [b] Strabo alſo findeth in Lydia (of which Gyges was king) 40 furlongs from Sardis. Pliny calleth it Gygeum ſtagnum. Herodotus and Nicander ſet it about the rivers of Hyllus, and Mæander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges king of Lydia: who after he had ſubdued the country about the river Rhodius which runneth into the Helleſpont, called the promontory Trapeſe after his own name Gyges. Theſe opinions do alſo ſeem to ſtrengthen that of [c] Junius. For Magog, ſaith he, is that part of Aſia the leſs, which Halyattes obtained; and after him his ſon Cræſus; who (as [d] Junius further notes) having maſtered all thoſe regions as far ſouth as Libanus, in that border built the city Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian ſignifieth the city of Gog) ſeated in Cœleſyria, whoſe people were the ancient enemies of the Jews.

Now that Magog is found in Cœleſyria, Pliny affirmeth, ſaying; Cœleſyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syris vero Magog; Cœleſyria hath it in Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us that the monſtrous idol Atergatis, called by the Greeks Derceto, was here worſhipped; Lucian makes mention hereof, ſaying that the city had anciently another name, which yet he expreſſeth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as ſounding nothing elegantly in the Greek. But if we may believe [e] Strabo, then was Edeſſa in Meſopotamia the ſame Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the ſame idol was worſhipped. Ortelius is doubtful whether one of theſe authors did not miſtake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough be that the ſame name and religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due north from Paleſtina, and were both ſubject unto the kings of the race of Seleucus. Now I do not condemn the opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Joſephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might alſo be the father of the Scythians; notwithſtanding that in this place, where Gog is made the prince of Magog, the nations of Cœleſyria, and the north parts adjoining, be meant by Magog: for by a latter plantation from theſe parts, they might be propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the north-eaſt, waſted the better part of Aſia the leſs, and poſſeſs'd Cœleſyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezekiel had reference, it is very plain: for this city Hierapolis, or Magog, ſtandeth due north from Judea, according to the words of Ezekiel, that from the north quarters thoſe nations ſhould come. For as the kings of the ſouth which infeſted the Iſraelites were the Ptolemies kings of Egypt: ſo thoſe of the north were the kings of Aſia and Syria, the ſucceſſors of Seleucus, the ſucceſſor of Alexander Macedon. Guliel-mus Tyrius thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the ſtory of Tobias. [f] Pliny takes it not only to have been called Bambyce, as we have ſaid, but alſo Edeſſa: not that by Euphrates, but another of the ſame name; now the known name is Alepo: for ſo Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This city had the title of ſacred, as the ſacred city (for ſo the word Hierapolis ſignifieth) yet was it a place of moſt deteſtable idolatry; and wherein was worſhipped the idol of the mermaid Atergatis, or Atirgitis, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Derceto.

If then we confer the words of Ezekiel in the 3d verſe of the 38th chapter, wherein he joineth together Gog, Meſech, and Tubal: and withal remember that Hierapolis was the city of Magog, which alſo is ſeated directly north from Judea: with whom alſo Ezekiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the north quarters; we may, as I conceive, ſafely conclude, that theſe followers and vaſſals of Gog (which were northern nations in reſpect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of leſſer Aſia, and Cœleſyria: and therefore that the opinions of Beroſus, Joſephus, and whoſoever elſe hath followed them therein are to be rejected. But if Joſephus refer himſelf to later times, and think that ſome colony of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Aſia paſs into Spain (to wit, from that piece of land between Colchis or Mengrelia) and Albania (moſt part poſſeſſed by the Georgians) then is his judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in proceſs of time theſe people might from their firſt habitation paſs into the countries near the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-ages into Spain.

Joſephus makes mention of the Iberi, ſaying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence, ſaith Juſtin, they paſſed into Spain to ſearch out the mines of that region: having belike underſtood that it was a ſoutherly country, and mountainous. For it ſeemeth that the Tubalines, called Chalybes, lived altogether by the exchange of iron, and other metals, as Apollonius witneſſeth in theſe following verſes, telling how the Argonauts did viſit them.

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas ſcindit ſub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta miniſtrant.

The Chalybes plough not their barren ſoil,
But undermine high hills for iron veins:
Changing the purchaſe of their endleſs toil
For merchandiſe, which their poor lives ſuſtains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was firſt peopled by the Africans, who had ever ſince an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were eaſily drawn to paſs over the ſtreights into that country; and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the ſouth parts 800 years, till the time of Ferdinand and Iſabel. And either of theſe opinions are more probable, than that in the 12th year of Nimrod's reign, Tubal paſs'd into Spain, and therein built St. Uval: a poor town, and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is, that we muſt find Moſoch or Meſech, and Tubal neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not far off, or elſe we ſhall wrong Ezekiel: for he called Gog the leader or prince of Meſech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their aſſiſtants. And that Meſech inhabited Aſia, Functius (tho' he followed Beroſus) confeſſeth, for theſe be his words; Meſacus, qui a Moſe Meſech, priſcos Meſios ab Adula monte uſque ad Ponticam regionem poſuit: hæc regio poſtea Cappadocia dicta eſt, in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hæc eſt terra Magog principalis: Meſacus, whom Moſes calleth Meſech, placed the ancient Meſians from the mount Adulas, unto the coaſt of Pontus. This region was afterwards called Cappadocia, in which is the town Mazica, &c. this is the principal country of Magog. And this doth Annius alſo avow, and yet forgets that Gog was prince both of Meſech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly weſt, and not north from Judea. Alſo Ezekiel in the 27th chapter, where he propheſieth of the deſtruction of Tyre, nameth Meſech and Tubal jointly. And for a final proof, that theſe nations were of a northern neighbour land (how far ſoever ſtretched) Ezekiel in the 38th chapter makes them all horſemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all ſhall ride upon horſes, even a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any man believe that theſe troops came out of Spain over the Pyrenees, and firſt paſs'd over a part of France, Italy, Hungary and Sarmatia, and imbark'd again about the Helleſpont, or elſe compaſſed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the leſſer Aſia, which is half the length or compaſs of the then known world, he may be called a ſtrong believer, but he ſhall never be juſtified thereby. But on the contrary it is known, that Seleucis was a province neighbouring Paleſtina or Judea, and that Hierapolis, or Magog, joined unto it: whoſe princes commanded all Syria, and Aſia the leſs, namely, the Seleucidæ; and held it, till Scipio Aſiaticus overthrew Antiochus the great: after which they yet poſſeſs'd Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meſech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the ſame dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be ſaid. Firſt he ſeated himſelf with Togorma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterwards he proceeded further into Aſia the leſs; and in long tract of time his valiant iſſue filled all Germany, reſted long in France and Britain, and poſſeſſed the utmoſt borders of the earth, accompliſhing (as Melanchon well notes) the ſignification of their parents name, which is utmoſt bordering. But when theſe borderers wanted further place, whereinto they might exonerate their ſwelling multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the nations, occupying the countries, through which they had formerly paſſed, oppreſſing firſt their neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy reſtorer of our antiquities, Mr. William Camden, hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old language doth ſignify robbers; neceſſity inforcing them to ſpoil their neighbours, to whom in their original they were as near joined, as afterwards in the ſeats which they poſſeſſed. For that the warlike nations of Germany were in elder ages accuſtomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authority of Ceſar affirming it, is proof ſufficient. But in times following they purſued richer conqueſts, and more eaſy, tho' further diſtant, by which (to omit their other enterpriſes not here to be ſpoken of) they were drawn at length into Aſia the leſs, and occupied thoſe parts, which had formerly been held by their progenitors. I ſay, not that they claimed thoſe lands as theirs by deſcent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old ſeated in Aſia, becauſe in late ages they returned thither; unleſs he will think, that all thoſe nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the land of Shinaar, may by that argument be proved not to have iſſued from thence at the firſt.

Now concerning Samothes (for his excellent wiſdom ſurnamed Dis) whom Annius makes the brother of Gomer and Tubal (which brother Moſes never heard of, who ſpake his knowledge of Japhet's ſons) they muſt find him in ſome old poet: for Functius a great Beroſian confeſſeth: [a] Quis hic Samothes fuerit incertum eſt; Who this Samothes was it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that ſame Dis, whom [b] Ceſar ſaith the Gauls ſuppoſe to be their anceſtor; yea, and Vignier confeſſeth with Functius: [c] Mais on ne ſçayt qui il eſtoit; No man knows who he was.

SECT. V.

Againſt the fabulous Beroſus's fiction. That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUT before I go on with Noah's ſons, I think it neceſſary to diſprove the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himſelf: an invention, indeed, very ridiculous, tho' warranted, as he hath wreſted, by thoſe authors of whom himſelf hath commented: as the fragment of Beroſus, Fabius Pictor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For [d] Annius ſeeks to perſuade us, that Noah (ſurnamed Janus) was the ſame which founded Genoa, with other cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92 years. This to diſprove, by Moſes's ſilence, is a ſufficient argument to me, if there were nothing elſe to diſprove it. For if he vouchſafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineveh by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92 years. But it were a needleſs labour for me to diſprove the authority of that Beroſus, on whom Annius groundeth, ſeeing ſo many learned men have ſo demonſtratively proved that fragment to be counterfeit. Beſides that, Tatianus the Aſſyrian, in his oration againſt the Greeks, avoweth, that the ancient and true Beroſus wrote only three books, dedicated to Antiochus the ſucceſſor of Seleucus Nicanor: But [e] Annius hath deviſed five books, wherewith he honoureth Beroſus. And whereas Beroſus handled only the eſtate of the Chaldeans and Aſſyrians, Annius hath filled this fragment with the buſineſs of all the world. And if we may believe Euſebius better than Annius, then all the kings of the Latins (before Eneas) conſumed but 150 years: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Eneas's arrival into Italy, there paſs'd 1126 (after the leaſt rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the firſt of their kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the world's year (as ſome reckon) 2717, after the flood 1064, and Noah died 350 years after the flood: and ſo there paſs'd between Janus of Italy, and Noah ſurnamed Janus, 704 years. For Saturnus ſucceeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinus followed Faunus: which Latinus lived at once with Tautanes the 27th king of Aſſyria: with Pelaſgus of Peloponneſus: with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampſon judge of Iſrael. Now all theſe five kings of the Latins having conſumed but 150 years; and the laſt of them in the time of Sampſon: then reckoning upwards for 150 years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: ſo had they Ion the ſon of Xuthus, the ſon of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Javan, the fourth ſon of Japhet. For the Vulgar tranſlation (where the Hebrew word is [a] Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint Hellas; which is the ſame. So had they Medus the ſon of Medea, whom they make the parent of the Medes, tho' they were deſcended of a far more ancient father, to wit, Madai the 3d ſon of Japhet.

Laſtly, we ſee by a true experience, that the Britiſh language hath remained among us above 2000 years, and the Engliſh ſpeech ever ſince the invaſion of the Angles: and the ſame continuance have all nations obſerved among themſelves, tho' with ſome corruption and alteration. Therefore it is ſtrange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain reſemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguiſhed) ſhould have been found in the languages of thoſe countries. For which reaſons we doubt not but theſe perſonal plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italy, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themſelves with the Grecian Janus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150 years, ſaith Euſebius, which was in the time of Latinus the 5th king: which alſo St. Auguſtine and Juſtin confirm: and this agreeth with reaſon, time and poſſibility. And if this be not ſufficient to diſprove this vanity, I may out of themſelves add thus much: that whereas ſome of them make Veſta (others Camaſena) the wife of this Janus, who inſtituted the holy fire of the veſtal virgins in Rome (the Latins and Romans taking from Janus all their idolatrous and heatheniſh ceremonies) there is no man ſo impious, as to believe that Noah himſelf (who is ſaid by Moſes to have walked with God, to be a juſt man, and whom God of all mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or ſo wicked and ungrateful, to ſet up or deviſe any heathen, ſavage, or idolatrous adoration, or have inſtituted any ceremony, contrary to that which he knew beſt-pleaſing to God himſelf.

SECT. VI.

That Gomer alſo and his ſon Togorma of the poſterity of Japhet were firſt ſeated about Aſia the leſs: and that from thence they ſpread weſtward into Europe: and northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the ſons of Noah, and the world's plantation after the flood: therein I obſerve, that as both reaſon and neceſſity taught them; ſo, when they multiply'd in great numbers, and diſperſed themſelves into the next countries bordering to their firſt habitations, and from thence ſent forth colonies elſewhere, it was in ſuch a manner as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by river: becauſe the land was yet deſart and overpreſs'd with woods, reeds, bogs, and rotten marſhes. As when Nimrod ſeated in Babylonia, Chus took the ſouth-part of Chaldea, down the river of Gehon, by which he might paſs to and fro from Babylon to his own plantation: thoſe alſo, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur or Orchoa near the lakes of Chaldea, might by the ſame river get up to Babylon, and receive ſuccour from thence. All which tract of land upon Gehon ſouthward, Moſes in the deſcription of Paradiſe calleth the land of Cuſh: becauſe the dominion and empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cuſhite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that valley, and ſtay'd not in the eaſt) were for a while oppreſs'd, till God afterward by the ſeed of Abraham made them his own nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and ſon of Cuſh, took both banks of Tigris, eſpecially on the eaſt-ſide of the river: by which river his people might alſo paſs to and fro to Babel.

The imperial ſeat of which region of Havilah or Suſian, was anciently called Chuſian, or Chuſan, afterwards Suſa. Cuſh himſelf took the banks of Gehon, and planted thoſe countries weſtward, and ſouth-weſt-ward towards Arabia the ſtony, and the deſart, where [b] Ptolemy placeth the city of Chuſidia, firſt Chuſia.

Seba, and Sheba, with the reſt that planted Arabia Fœlix, had Tigris to convey them into the Perſian gulf, which waſheth the banks of Arabia Fœlix on the eaſt-ſide: ſo as thoſe ſons of Cuſh might take land down the river as they pleaſed. Alſo the city of Nineveh was by Nimrod founded on the ſaid river of Tigris: and from thence a colony paſs'd to Charran, ſtanding alſo upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japhet's ſons ſettle themſelves together, and took their ſeats in Aſia the leſs, from whence they might indifferently ſtretch themſelves northward, and weſtward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Iſles of the Gentiles. And it ſeemeth very agreeable to reaſon, that both Gomer, Magog and Tubal, ſat down firſt of all in that part of Syria, to the north of Paleſtina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children paſs'd on into Aſia the leſs, as thoſe of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines ſpread themſelves into Iberia: and the Magogians more northerly into Sarmatia. The firſt Gomerians, and firſt planters in Aſia the leſs, held the country of the Cymmerians (witneſs Herodot. lib. 4.) the ſame region which was afterwards by the Gallogreeks called Galatia, to whom St. Paul wrote his epiſtle, ſo intituled. This nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards diſperſed, and forced from their firſt plantations) gave names to divers places; as to the mountains above Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the city of Cymmeris in Phrygia: alſo Boſphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this nation, in the outlet whereof was alſo a city of that name called Cymmerian: which Pliny ſaith (miſtaking the place) had ſome time the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a town in Campania, ſo called of the unhealthful waters, ſavouring of brimſtone: which Auguſtus cauſed to be cleanſed by letting in the water of the lake Lucrinus.

The children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Moſchici were neighbours, which others write Meſhech. The prophet Ezekiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the prince of Meſchech and Tubal. For theſe Meſchi (which Ptolemy calleth Moſchi) inhabit Syracena a province of Armenia, directly ſouth from the mountains Moſchici, in the valley between the mountains Moſchici and the mountains Paryardes: out of whoſe north part ſpringeth the river Phaſis; from the eaſt part Araxis; and from the weſt Euphrates: and of this Meſchech are deſcended alſo the Moſcovians (ſaith Melanchthon) and it may be, that in proceſs of time ſome of them inhabited thoſe regions alſo: For Meſhech (ſaith Melanchthon) ſignifieth extendens, enlarging or ſtretching forth. Togorma alſo at firſt did inhabit amongſt his parents and kindred. The Togormians were alſo called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchy of Phenicia, the ſame which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence [a] Solomon had his moſt excellent maſons, which hewed ſtones for the temple of Jeruſalem. Thence the Togormians ſtretched into the leſs Armenia, whoſe kings were hence called [b] Tigranes, and their cities Tigranokartæ: of which cities Tigranes, ſubdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hieroſolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary: forgetting the prophecy of Ezekiel againſt the Tyrians; [c] They of the houſe of Togorma, brought to thy fairs horſes, and horſemen, and mules, which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterranean ſea, but from the neighbour countries by land. But Joſephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be in the enſuing ages: and ſo might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the 12th of Nimrod's reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of thoſe Togormians, becauſe their emperor is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the fathers of the Germans. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turks deſcended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muſcovy. But for theſe ſub-derivations it were infinite to examine them. Only of the firſt and ſecond plantation, and of the firſt nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to diſcover; and therein to open the ignorance of ſome, and the corruption of other fabulous writers. And this we muſt note, that thoſe grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet ſpirit, or (perchance) of leſs underſtanding, and had not therefore the leading of colonies ſent out, their proper habitations could be hardly known: only reaſon hath taught us, that they dwelt among the reſt, and were cover'd with the fame of others, who took on them the conduction and dominion over the reſt.

From Madai the 3d ſon of Japhet, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the ſon of Medea.

SECT. VII.

Of Javan the fourth ſon of Japhet: and of Meſch of Aram, and Meſhech of Japhet.

OF Javan the 4th ſon of Japhet came from the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and ſo the Latin and Greek interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Iſaiah. Et mittam ex iis qui ſalvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam: And I will ſend thoſe that eſcape of them to nations in the ſea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here uſeth the word [Tarſhiſh] for Tarſus, a city in Cilicia, tho' Tarſis in many places be taken for the ſea. The Tigurine and the Geneva uſe the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the ſame Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themſelves dream that they were Aborigines, or men without anceſtors, and growing (as it were) out of the ſoil it ſelf: who abounding in people, ſent colonies into Aſia the leſs, of whom came the Iones of thoſe parts. Others [d] derive the Athenians from Ion the ſon of Xuthus, the ſon of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Javan marrs the faſhion of that ſuppoſition, who ſo many years preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pauſanias tells us that Xuthus ſtole out of Theſſaly with all his father's treaſure, and his brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciouſly received by Erictheus, who gave him his daughter in marriage; of whom he received two ſons, Ion and Achæus, the ſuppoſed anceſtors of the Athenians. For Attica was called Ionia (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Theſeus) who, when he had joined Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Iſthmus or Strait, which faſteneth Peloponneſus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the eaſt, theſe words: Hæc non ſunt Peloponneſus, aſt Ionia; Theſe countries are not of Peloponneſus, but of Ionia: and on the other ſide which looketh towards the ſouth, and into Peloponneſus, this: Theſe parts are Peloponneſus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecatæus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Aſia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: that the Iones of Greece tranſporting certain companies into Aſia the leſs, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And tho' Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themſelves, yet I find this conjecture of Hecatæus reaſonable enough. For tho' it were to him unknown, yet ſure I am that Aſia the leſs had people before Greece had any: and that Javan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but took Aſia the leſs in his paſſage; and from thence paſs'd over the neareſt way, leaving his own name to ſome maritimate province on that ſide, as he did to that part of Greece ſo called. But yet Strabo himſelf believed, that Ionia took the name from Ion the ſon of Xuthus: for ſo much he had learned from themſelves; which was alſo the opinion of Pauſanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times caſt themſelves into that part of Aſia the leſs, oppoſite unto them, which they held for divers years. And howſoever the Greeks vaunt themſelves to be the fathers of nations, and the moſt ancient; yet all approved hiſtorians (not their own) deride and diſprove their pride, and vanity therein. For this diſpute of antiquity (among prophane writers) reſted between the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Juſtin out of Trogus, in the war between Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witneſſeth: which preceded far the reign of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is alſo manifeſt, that in Cecrops's time, the Greeks were all ſavages without law or religion, living like brute beaſts in all reſpects: and Cecrops (ſaith [e] St. Auguſtine) lived together with Moſes.

The 6th ſon of Japhet was Meſech, whom the Septuagint call Moſoch, a part of thoſe nations commanded by Gog the chief prince of Meſech and Tubal. But this we muſt remember, that between Meſech the ſon of Aram, and Meſhech (or Moſech) the ſon of Japhet, there is little difference in name, and both by divers interpreters diverſly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meſch, the ſon of Aram Mes; the Geneva Maſh; Junius Meſch. But it may be gathered out of the 120th Pſalm, that either Meſhech the ſon of Japhet, was the parent of thoſe people, or gave name to that province wherein David hid himſelf: or elſe (which may rather ſeem) that it took name from Meſch the ſon of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious people) uſeth theſe words. [a] Woe is me that I remain in Meſech, and dwell in the tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus. Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint gives it this ſenſe, Woe is me becauſe my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latin agreeth: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus eſt, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwiſe, and in theſe words, O me miſerum, quia peregrinatus ſum Aſianis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum: O wretch that I am, for I have travelled among thoſe of Aſia, I have dwelt in the tabernacles of the Arabians. But howſoever or whichſoever converſion be taken for the beſt, yet all make mention of Kedar; which is a province of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldean putteth Aſia inſtead of Meſech; but the Hebrew it ſelf hath Meſech. And if it be to be taken for a nation (as it is moſt likely, becauſe it anſwers to Kedar, the name of a nation) ſeeing Meſh the ſon of Aram, 1 Chron. 17: is called Meſhec, it is indifferent whether this nation took name from Meſhech or Meſh, both bordering Judea, and like enough to be commanded by one prince; for ſo Ezekiel makes Meſech and Tubal. But as for thoſe that take Meſech out of the word Moſoch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muſcovian; ſure they preſume much upon the affinity of names, as aforeſaid. And ſure I am, that David never travelled ſo far north; (for to him Muſcovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar, it may be, he was often in all the time of his perſecution: the ſame being a city on the mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Moſoch the father of the Muſcovians; and herein alſo Melanthon runs with the tide of common opinion, and ſets Meſech in Muſcovia, tho' with ſome better advice of judgment; as, firſt ſeated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling north-ward: expounding the places of the 120th pſalm [Hei mihi quod exulo in Meſech] to ſignify, Gentis ejus feritatem inſignem eſſe; That the ferity of that nation exceeded: which fierceneſs or brutality of the Muſcovians, David never proved, or, perchance, never heard of. But the ſame ferity or cruelty, which thoſe nothern Muſcovians had, may as well be aſcribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this country took name of [b] Kedar the ſecond ſon of Iſhmael, of whom a people of equal fierceneſs to any of the world were begotten, both in thoſe times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Iſhmaelites and Saracens may be accounted one people:) the ſame being foreſhewed by the ſpeech of the angel to Hagar, Gen. xvi. 12. And he ſhall be a wild man: his hand ſhall be againſt every man, and every mans hand againſt him. Now Arabia the deſart, ſaith Pliny, confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the eaſt, and the Cedræi ſouth-ward, both which join together upon the Nabathæi. So it appeareth, as before, that Meſech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Iſrael, and that Kedar alſo did join to Meſech: all which were regions of Syria, or of Aſia the leſs, commanded by the ſucceſſors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-eſtabliſhment of Iſrael and Judah. But as I have already ſaid, it might well be, that long after the firſt plantation the iſſue of Meſech, or Moſoch, might paſs into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the mountains Moſchici in the other, and from thence might ſend people northerly in Muſcovia; and ſo all opinions ſaved. But all ſavage nations, overgrown and uncultivated, do (for the moſt part) ſhew a late plantation; even as civility, letters, and magnificent building witneſs antiquity.

Tiras the ſeventh ſon of Japhet, which [c] Montanus reckons among the ſons of Gomer, was the father of the Thracians, as all authors (worthy of examination) affirm. Joſephus was the firſt that determined hereof: and becauſe the ſcriptures are altogether ſilent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of diſpute. It followeth now to ſpeak of the ſons of Gomer, which were three:

Aſcanez, Riphath and Togorma.

SECT. VIII.

Of Aſcanez and Riphath, the two eldeſt ſons of Gomer.

ASCANEZ was the father of thoſe which the Greeks call Rhegini, ſaith Joſephus, but he gives no reaſon why.

Euſebius makes Aſcanez the father of the Goths; the Jews in their Targum make him the root of the German nation, but their expoſitions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Aſcania in Phrygia, near the rivers of Hylas and Cios: [d] Melanthon being of the ſame opinion, that the Tuiſcones were deſcended of the Aſcanez (for Tuiſcones, ſaith he, is as much to ſay, as of the Aſcanez, Præpoſito articulo die Aſcanez) and that the word ſignifieth a religious keeper of fire: it being an ancient ſuperſtition to pray at the fire of ſacrifices, as afterwards at the tombs of martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the lake Aſcania, known by that name in the Romans time. And among the kings which came to the ſuccour of Troy, was Aſcanius, Deo ſimilis, ſaith [e] Homer, Like unto God; becauſe he was beautiful and ſtrong: for in the ſame manner doth Virgil grace Eneas, Os humeroſque Deo ſimilis; In face and body like one of the gods. Virgil alſo remembreth ſuch a river together with the hills Gargara; as [f] Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, tranſque ſonantem Aſcanium: Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara and the roaring Aſcanius. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the deſcription of Phrygia. For he placeth the city of Brillion upon the river Aſcanius, which is adjoining to Myſia, and is near the border of the Trojan empire: and the lake Aſcanez he directs us to find by the deſcription of Pruſia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the countries of Bithynia: and then from Pruſia to Nicea are accounted five and twenty miles, in which way this lake lieth, even between Pruſia and Nicea; and ſo Junius, as I conceive him, takes them of Aſcanez to be the inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and thoſe north parts of Aſia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a city of Troas, built by Aſcanius the ſon of Eneas, ſaying, that there was another of that name in Myſia. Of Aſcanii, a lake of Bithynia, Ptolemy witneſſeth: and Strabo giveth Aſcania both a lake, a river, and a town in Myſia, near unto Cio; which alſo agreeth with Pliny: for Pliny findeth Pruſia, before ſpoken of, near Cio, and calleth the iſlands before Troy, Aſcanes.

Now whether theſe places took name of Aſcanez the ſon of Gomer, or of Aſcanius the ſon of Eneas, it might be queſtioned: ſure it is, that Aſcanius which brought ſuccour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Eneas's ſon, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it ſeemeth that the countries whence thoſe ſuccours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Myſia, but farther off, and from the north parts of all Aſia the leſs, which by Jeremy is called Aſcanez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of thoſe teſtimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the prophet Jeremy we ſhall learn of what nation the Aſcanez were, whoſe words are theſe: [a] Set up a ſtandard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations againſt her, call up the kings of Ararat, Minni, and Aſcanez againſt her, &c. meaning, againſt the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as moſt interpreters conſent, ſo called of the mountains of Ararat which run thro' it: Minni the leſſer Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni; for Minni was the ancient name, ſaith Junius and others before him, and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that tract from Euphrates to the ſea-coaſts of Phenicia and Paleſtina; and therefore Meſopotamia being in elder times but a province of Syria, the ſcriptures difference it in the the ſtory of Jacob and Eſau, and call it Aram-padan. Then if theſe two nations were of the Armenians, and Aſcanez joined with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the ſpoil of the Babylonian empire) we ſhall err much to call Askenaz Germany or Almain, for we hear of no Swart Ruttiers at that ſiege. But the Askenaz were of thoſe nations which were either ſubject or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterwards into Phrygia, I know not: for the diſperſion of nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Euſebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Joſephus, who calls them Rhegini; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almains, when they confirm it either by ſcriptures or reaſon, I will think as they do.

Of Riphath, the ſecond ſon of Gomer, there is mention in the firſt of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius think that he wandered far off from the reſt of his brothers, and therefore no memory of his plantation. But I ſee nothing to the contrary, but that he might ſeat himſelf with the reſt of his family; for there wanted no room or ſoil in thoſe days for all the ſons and grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well underſtood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greeks afterwards, according to Joſephus, called the Paphlagones: and Riphei, ſaith Melanchthon, ſignifieth giants. Theſe people were very famous in the north parts, and in Sarmatia: the moſt of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti; The greateſt number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti, who ſpoke the ancient Polac: which being firſt called Riphei (for the love of ſome of their leaders or kings) changed their names and became Heneti (a cuſtom exceeding common in thoſe times) and dwelt firſt in Paphlagonia, as Homer witneſſeth, and ſo doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: now, when theſe Riphei, afterwards Heneti, ſought new regions, they came along the ſhores of Euxinus, and filled the north part of Europe, containing Ruſſia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they croſs'd thwart the land, and peopled Illyria, deſirous, ſaith [b] Melanchthon, of a warmer ſoil of fruit and wine. Theſe Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchthon taketh to be one people, filled all that land between the Baltick and Adriatick ſea; and to this day the name of the gulf Venedicus is found in Ruſſia. This nation, after they were poſſeſs'd of Lithuania and Polonia, diſturbed the plantation of the Boii and Hermondurii. Therefore it ſeemeth to me, that of Riphath came the Riphei, afterwards Heneti; and ſo thinketh Arias Montanus, firſt ſeated in Paphlagonia, but in courſe of time lords of Sarmatia, and thoſe other parts before remembred, chiefly between the rivers of Viſtula and Albis. The name, ſaith Melanchthon, ſignifieth wandering or wanderers, or Nomades, a people which lived by white meats and fruits, as indeed all nations did in the firſt ages.

Of the third ſon of Gomer, Togorma, I have ſpoken already; now therefore of Javan's children, which were four:

Eliſa, Tharſis, Cethim, and Dodanim.

SECT. IX.

Of the four ſons of Javan: and of the double ſignification of Tharſis, either for a proper name or for the ſea.

OF Eliſa or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Eliſa all the Greeks were called Hellenes, ſaith Montanus. Melanchthon makes Eliſa the father of the Æoles in Aſia ſide; others of Elis in Peloponneſus, or of both. And ſeeing the Greeks were deſcended in general of Javan, it is probable that the Æoles and the Elei, took name of Eliſa, his eldeſt ſon. [c] Ezekiel ſpeaking of Tyre, nameth the iſles of Eliſa. Hyacinthus & purpura de inſulis Eliſæ facta ſunt operimentum tuum: Blue ſilk and purple brought from the iſles of Eliſa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Eliſa write Italia, but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius keep the word Eliſa; and ſo I think they might do with reaſon: for there was not found any ſuch purple dye in Italy in thoſe days, nor ſince that I can read of. But thoſe iſles of Eliſa were by a better conjecture the iſles of Greece; and the beſt purple was found afterwards at Tyre itſelf, and before that, and among the Cyclades, and on the coaſt of Getulia.

Tharſis, the ſecond ſon of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharſis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharſis in Cilicia, underſtands Carthage in Africa; but (reſerving the reſpect due to ſo learned a man) he was much miſtaken in that conjecture. The Chaldean paraphraſt puts Carthage for Tharſis, but it hath no authority, nor warrant of reaſon therein. So likewiſe, where it is written, that the ſhips of Solomon went every three years to Tharſis, and brought thence gold, ſilver, elephants teeth, &c. The Chaldean paraphraſt tranſlates Tharſis [Africa.] But Solomon's ſhips were prepared in the Red ſea at Ezion-gaber, in the bay of Elana, near unto Madian, where Jethro, Moſes's father-in-law, inhabited; a province of Arabia Petræa, Idumea, or of the Chuſites; and they ſailed to the higher part of the Eaſt-Indies. For it had been a ſtrange navigation to have ſpent three years in the paſſage between Judea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been ſailed in ſix or ten days. And if ſo great riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterranean ſea, all the other neighbouring princes would ſoon have entertained that trade alſo. But this enterprize of Solomon is in this ſort written of in the firſt of Kings: Alſo king Solomon made a navy of ſhips in Ezion-gaber, which is beſide Elath and the brink of the Red ſea in the land of Edom: and Hiram ſent with the navy his ſervants, that were mariners, and had knowledge of the ſea, with the ſervants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and fetch'd from thence 420 talents of gold, &c. But as the nations about Pontus thought no ſea in the world like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other ſea but that only (whereof it came that Pontus was a word uſed for the ſea in general;) ſo becauſe the Iſraelites and the Phenicians knew no other ſea than that of the Mediterranean in the beginning; and that the people of Tharſis had the greateſt ſhips, and were the firſt navigators in thoſe parts with ſuch veſſels, they were therefore called men of the ſea: and the word Tharſis uſed often for the ſea. And whereas it's ſaid that the ſhips of Solomon went every three years to Tharſis, that phraſe is not ſtrange at all: for we uſe it ordinarily whereſoever we navigate, namely, that the king's ſhips are gone to the ſea, or that they are ſet out every year, or every three years to the ſea; and therefore Tharſis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but uſed for the ſea it ſelf. But in this place Tharſis is truly taken for Tharſis, the chief city in Cilicia, founded by Tharſis the 2d ſon of Javan, or by his ſucceſſors, in memory of their firſt parent. To this city arrived Alex. Macedon, before he gave the firſt overthrow to Darius, and caſting himſelf into the river to bathe and waſh his body, he fell into an extreme fever, and great danger of death: and in this city of Tharſis was St. Paul born. Now this agreeth with the reaſon and nature of a plantation. For (Gomer and his other ſons inhabiting Aſia the leſs, and that part of Syria adjoining) Javan, who was to paſs over the ſea into Greece, took the edge of the ſame coaſt, and firſt planted the Iones on that ſhore: gave the iſlands between Aſia the leſs and Greece, to Eliſa, and left Tharſis upon the ſea-ſide in Cilicia; of whom that city took name.

The 3d ſon of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, ſaith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanćthon's opinion, who makes Cethim the father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural, ſaith he, and ſignifieth percuſſores, tho' in that reſpect it may be meant by either. But it ſeemeth more probable, that place of Iſaiah 23. (according to Melanćthon) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians. Hæc calamitas ab Eſai prædicta eſt, qui capite viceſimo tertio inquit, venturos eſſe everſores Tyri ex terra Cittim; This calamity, ſaith Melanćthon, was foreſhewed by Iſaiah the prophet, who in the 23d chapter pronounced, that the deſtroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cittim. And altho' the children of Iſrael eſteemed all men iſlanders, which came to them by ſea, and ſeparate from that continent (and ſo alſo Cittim might be taken for Italy, ſaith Beroaldus) yet we muſt take the firſt performance of the former prophecy, which took effect by the deſtruction of the Tyrians by Alexander: who after ſeven months ſiege entred that proud city, and cut in pieces 7000 principal citizens; ſtrangled 2000, and changed the freedom of 13000 others into bondage and ſlavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it appeareth plainly in the firſt of the Maccabees, in theſe words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the ſon of Philip, went forth of the land of Cethim, and ſlew Darius king of the Perſians and Medes. Joſephus ſets Cethim in the iſle of Cyprus, in which, ſaith he, there remaineth the city Citium, the country of Zeno the philoſopher (witneſs Laertius) which city Pintus upon Ezekiel affirmeth, that it ſtood in St. Jerome's time. So it may be, that all the iſlands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the iſlands of Cethim: and in that ſenſe might Cyprus be ſo called alſo; and yet becauſe Tharſis was the very next port to Cyprus, and directly over-againſt it, it is alſo very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharſis: and finding that iſland too ſtrait for his people after they were increaſed, and that the reſt of the coaſts, both on Aſia ſide and Greece, were inhabited by his father and brothers, he ſent colonies over the Egean ſea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the 4th ſon of Javan, and the youngeſt brother (by the moſt opinions) ſat down at Rhodes as near Cethim, Tharſis and Eliſa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are uſed indifferently by many tranſlators: the Hebrew [D] and the Hebrew [R] are ſo like, as the one may eaſily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is alſo found in Epirus the city of Dodona, in the province of Moloſſia. And as Cethim, when he wanted ſoil in Cyprus: ſo Dodanim (ſeated in a far leſs iſland) did of neceſſity ſend his people farther off; and keeping along the coaſt, and finding Peloponneſus in the poſſeſſion of Eliſa, he paſſed a little farther on the weſt-ward, and planted in Epirus. And tho' the city of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance) not ſo ancient as Dodanim himſelf, yet his poſterity might give it that name in memory of their firſt parent, as it happened all the world over. For names were given to cities, mountains, rivers, and provinces, after the names of Noah's children, and grand-children; not in all places by themſelves, but by their ſucceſſors many years after: every of their families being deſirous to retain among them by thoſe memories, out of what branch themſelves were taken, and grafted elſewhere. And becauſe great kingdoms were often by new conquerors newly named, and the greateſt cities often fired and demoliſhed: therefore thoſe that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their anceſtors, to mountains and rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freeſt from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan ſettle himſelf and his children, in the edge and frontier of Aſia the leſs, towards the ſea-ſhore: and afterwards in Greece, and the iſlands and neighbour provinces thereof, as Japhet their father had done in the body of the leſſer Aſia, together with Javan's brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meſech, and the reſt round about him. And in like ſort did Chuſh (the ſon of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the weſt and ſouth-weſt: and the ſons of Chuſh (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it ſelf) travelled ſouth-ward in Arabia Fœlix, and ſouth-weſt-ward into Arabia Petræa: the reſt of his children holding the regions adjoining to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chuſh in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the region of Paleſtina adjoining. The ſons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all thoſe nations came, which were afterwards the enemies both to the Hebrews, and to thoſe of the ſons of Shem, which ſpread themſelves towards the weſt, and the borders of the Mediterranean ſea: of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. But firſt of the ſons of Cham or Ham, which were four:

Chuſh, Mizraim, Phut and Canaan.

SECT. X.

That the ſeat of Chuſh the eldeſt ſon of Ham was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of ſtrange fables, and ill tranſlations of ſcripture, grounded upon the miſtaking of this point.

† I.

Of Joſephus's tale of an Ethiopeſs wife of Moſes, grounded on the miſtaking of the ſeat of Chuſh.

THAT Ham was the father of the Egyptians, it is made manifeſt in many ſcriptures, as in the the 150th Pſalm, ver. 51. Then Iſrael came to Egypt, and Jacob was a ſtranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78th Pſalm; He ſlew all the firſt-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their ſtrength, in the tabernacles of Ham. There is alſo found a great city in Thebaida, called Cheramis (as it were, the city of Ham) of which name [a] Herodotus alſo diſcovers an iſland in the ſame region. But becauſe Chuſh is the elder ſon of Ham, it agreeth with order to ſpeak firſt of him. Now tho' I have already in the deſcription of Paradiſe handled this queſtion, and, I hope, proved that Chuſh could not be Ethiopia: yet ſeeing it cometh now to his turn to ſpeak for himſelf, I will add ſome farther proof to the former. For the manifeſtation hereof ſets many things ſtrait, which had otherwiſe very crooked conſtructions, and ſenſeleſs interpretations. Surely, howſoever the Septuagint and Joſephus have herein failed, yet it is manifeſt that Chuſh could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the happy and the the deſart: which regions Chuſh and the Chuſites preſently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they firſt ſat down all together. And there is nothing which ſo well cleareth this controverſy, as the true interpretation of the place, Numb. xii. 1. where Moſes's wife is called a Chuſite; together with ſome places which ſpeak of Nabuchodonoſor's conqueſts. For whereas Joſephus and the Septuagint in the place, Numb. xii. 1. as alſo elſewhere, underſtand Chuſh for Ethiopia, we muſt give credit to Moſes himſelf therein; and then it will appear that Joſephus was groſly miſtaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Joſephus preſuming that Chuſh was Ethiopia, and therefore that the wife of Moſes (which in ſcripture, Numb. xii. 1. is called a woman of Cuſh) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, fell in love with the perſon and fame of Moſes, while he beſieged Saba her father's city; and to the end to obtain Moſes for her huſband, ſhe practiſed to betray both her parents, country, and friends, with the city it ſelf, and to deliver it into Moſes's hands. The tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Joſephus. After he had deſcribed the ſtrength of the Ethiopian city Meroe, which he ſaith at length Cambyſes called ſo from the name of his ſiſter (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in theſe words: [b] Hic cum Moſes deſidere exercitum otioſum ægre ferret, hoſte non audente manus conſerere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which tale hath this ſenſe in Engliſh; When Moſes was grieved that his army lay idle, becauſe the enemy beſieged, durſt not ſally and come to handy ſtrokes, there happened this accident in the mean while. The Ethiopian king had a daughter called Tharbis, who at ſome aſſaults given beheld the perſon of Moſes, and withal admired his valour. And knowing that Moſes had not only upheld and reſtored the falling eſtate of the Egyptians, but had alſo brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of ſubverſion: theſe things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily encreaſed, ſhe made means to ſend unto him by one of her truſtieſt ſervants to offer herſelf unto him, and become his wife; which Moſes on this condition entertained, that ſhe ſhould firſt deliver the city into his poſſeſſion: whereunto ſhe condeſcending, and Moſes having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were inſtantly performed.

† II.

A diſpute againſt the tale of Joſephus.

THIS tale (whereof Moſes hath not a word) hath Joſephus faſhioned, and therein alſo utterly miſtaken himſelf, in naming a city of Arabia, for a city of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it ſelf to have been the country of Moſes's wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, ſaying that the Sabeans are Arabians, and not Ethiopians; except Joſephus can perſuade us, that the queen of Saba which came from the ſouth to hear the wiſdom of Solomon, were a Negro, or black-moor. And tho' Damianus a Goes ſpeaks of certain letters to the king of Portugal from Preſter John of the Abiſſines: wherein that Ethiopian king would perſuade the Portugals that he was deſcended of the queen of Saba, and of Solomon; yet it doth no-where appear in the ſcriptures, that Solomon had any ſon by that great princeſs: which had it been true, it is likely that when Siſhac king of Egypt invaded Roboam, and ſack'd Jeruſalem, his brother (the ſon of Saba and Solomon) who joined upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, as alſo given aid and ſuccour to Roboam againſt Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing againſt our opinion of Moſes's wife, to have been an Arabian, that the ſcriptures teach us, that Moſes married the daughter of Jethro prieſt of Midian or Madian: which ſtanding on the north coaſt of the Red ſea, over-againſt the body of Egypt, and near Eſion Gaber, where Solomon provided his fleet for India, in the region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red ſea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa joineth to the tribe of Juda by the north, to Arabia Petræa by the eaſt, to the Mediterranean by the weſt, and to the Red ſea by the ſouth-eaſt. And if we mark the way which Moſes took when he left Egypt, and conducted Iſrael thence, it will appear that he was no ſtranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it ſelf, he had formerly lived 40 years; where it ſeemeth, that beſides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was inſtructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Joſephus confeſſeth, and St. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians. But on the other ſide this text makes much againſt Joſephus, where it is written in Exodus ii. 15. Therefore Moſes fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the 3d chapter it is as plain as words can expreſs, in what region Madian was, where it is written, When Moſes kept the ſheep of Jethro his father-in-law, prieſt of Madian, and drove the flock to the deſart, and came to the mountain of God in Horeb. Now that mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moſes himſelf, then was not the wife of Moſes purchaſed in that manner which Joſephus reporteth (which was for betraying her country and friends) neither had ſhe the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was ſhe a negro, but a Madianitiſh. And as God worketh the greateſt things by the ſimpleſt means: ſo it pleaſed him from a ſhepherd to call Moſes, and after him David, and by them to deliver his people firſt and laſt. For [c] Moſes ſitting by a well (as diſconſolate and a ſtranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other ſhepherds, and drew them water to water their ſheep: upon which occaſion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whoſe daughter he married: and not for any betraying of towns or countries.

From hence alſo came Jethro to Moſes at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the inſupportable government of ſuch a multitude, he adviſed him to diſtribute this weighty charge, and to make governors and judges of every tribe and family. And if Jethro had been an Ethiopian, it had been a far progreſs for him to have paſſed thro' all Egypt with the wife and children of Moſes, and to have found Moſes in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moſes and all that favoured him. But the paſſing of Moſes thro' Arabia Petræa (which joineth to Madian) proveth that Moſes was well acquainted in thoſe parts: in which the ſecond time he wandered forty years, and did by theſe late travels of his ſeek to inſtruct the children of Iſrael in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the land of plenty and reſt. For he found them nouriſhed up with the milk of idolatry, and obſtinate in the religion of the heathen, and finding that thoſe ſtiff plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perſuaſion or by miracle, he wore them out in the deſarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from thoſe he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own deſire, and God's commandments.

Laſtly, This opinion of Joſephus is condemned by Auguſtinus Chriſamenſis, where alſo he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moſes had married both Tharbis and Sephora: his own words have this beginning [a] Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuiſſe Moſen, &c. Apollinaris alſo lieth in affirming that Moſes had two wives: and who doth not perceive theſe things feigned by them? For it is manifeſt, that the wife of Moſes was Zephora, daughter to the prieſt or preſident of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt, being the ſame that joineth to Arabia: ſo far Chriſamenſis.

Chuſh ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezek. xxix. 10.

NOW as Chuſh is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the wife of Moſes therefore called Æthiopiſſa: ſo in the conqueſt of Nabuchodonoſor is Ethiopia written for Arabia: for by the words of Ezekiel it is manifeſt that Nabuchodonoſor was never in Ethiopia. [b] Behold, ſaith Ezekiel, (ſpeaking of the perſon of this great Aſſyrian) I come upon thee, and upon thy rivers, and I will make the land of Egypt utterly waſte and deſolate, from the tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the black-moors: which laſt words ſhould have been thus converted: From the tower of Seveneh to the borders of the Chuſites or Arabians: between which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seveneh to the Ethiopians, hath no ſenſe at all. Seveneh it ſelf being the border of Egypt, confronting and joining to Ethiopia, or the land of the black-mores. So as if Nabuchodonoſor's conqueſt had been but between Seveneh and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſs no other victory than the conqueſt of all that land and country, lying between Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the countries join together; or all the north parts of England between Berwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſenſe with the former, if any man ſought to expreſs by theſe two bounds, the conqueſt of England, Berwick being the north border of England, as Seveneh or Syene is the ſouth bound of Egypt, ſeated in Thebaida which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezekiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonoſor never entered into any part of Ethiopia, altho' the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other, in effect, have written Ethiopia for Chuſh.

Another place of Ezekiel, chap. xxx. ver. 9. in like manner miſtaken.

AND as the former, ſo is this place of Ezekiel miſtaken, by being in this ſort converted. In die illa egredientur nuncii a facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Æthiopiæ confidentiam: which place is thus turned into Engliſh by the Genevians: In that day ſhall there meſſengers go forth from me in ſhips to make the careleſs Mores afraid. Now the Latin for [ſhips] hath the Greek word Trieres for Triremes which are galleys of three banks, and not ſhips. But that in this place the tranſlation ſhould have been, as in the former, amended by uſing the word Chuſh, or Arabia for Ethiopia, or the Black-mores, every man may ſee which meanly underſtandeth the geography of the world, knowing, that to paſs out of Egypt into Ethiopia, there need no gallies nor ſhips, no more than to paſs out of Northampton into Leiceſterſhire: Ethiopia being the conterminate region with Egypt, and not divided ſo much as by a river. Therefore in this place of Ezekiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nabuchodonoſor ſhould ſend gallies along the coaſt of the Red ſea, by which an army might be tranſported into Arabia the happy and the ſtony (ſparing the long weariſome march over all Egypt and the deſarts of Pharan) which army might thereby ſurprize them unawares in their ſecurity and confidence: for when Nabuchodonoſor was at Seveneh, within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither galley nor ſhip to paſs into it: being all one large and firm land with Egypt, and no otherwiſe parted from it, than one inland ſhire is parted from another; and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the river but for pleaſure, he could not have done it; for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and ſteep mountains) called Catadupæ Nili were at hand.

Laſtly, As I have already obſerved, the ſons of every father ſeated themſelves as near together as poſſibly they could, Gomer and his ſons in Aſia the leſs; Javan and his ſons in Greece and the iſlands adjoining; Shem in Perſia and eaſtward. So the ſons and grand-children of Chuſh from the river of Gehon, their father's firſt ſeat, inhabited upon the ſame, or upon ſome other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one ſide, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha, with the reſt, did on the other ſide. And, to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had never any acquaintance or fellowſhip, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian Black-mores, as is already remembred in the chapter of Paradiſe.

† V.

A place of Iſaiah xviii. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chuſh for Ethiopia.

AND as in theſe places before-remembred, ſo in divers others is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chuſh, which puts the ſtory (where it is ſo underſtood) quite out of ſquare; one kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what ſenſe

[a] Sixt. Senenſ. Bibl. [b] Ezek. 29. 10.

hath this part of ſcripture, Iſaiah 18. Væ terræ cymbalorum alarum quæ eſt trans flumina Ethiopiæ; or according to the Septuagint in theſe words, Væ terræ navium alarum quæ eſt trans fluvios Ethiopiæ? Woe to the land ſhadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, ſending ambaſſadors by ſea, even the veſſels of reeds upon the waters. Væ terræ umbroſæ oræ; Wo to the land of the ſhady coaſt, ſaith Junius. The former tranſlators underſtand it in this ſenſe; that the waters are ſhadowed with the ſails, which are ſignificatively called the wings of the ſhips; the other, that the coaſt of the ſea was ſhadowed by the height of the land.

But to the purpoſe: That this land here ſpoken of by the prophet Iſaiah is Egypt, no interpreter hath doubted: for they were the Egyptians that ſent this meſſage to the Iſraelites which Iſaiah repeateth, and by the former tranſlation every man may ſee the tranſpoſition of kingdoms: for hereby Egypt is tranſported unto the other ſide of Ethiopia, and Ethiopia ſet next unto Judea, when it is the land of Chuſh and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judea and Egypt, and not Ethiopia, which is ſeated under the equinoctial line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a material queſtion, to wit, What region that ſhould be, of which the prophet ſpeaketh, and placeth it beyond the rivers of Ethiopia: Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be ſaid that he treateth of an unknown region. Now if Ethiopia it ſelf be under the equinoctial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why ſhould any man dream that they had knowledge of nations far beyond that again, and beyond the rivers of Ethiopia? except we ſhall impiouſly think that the prophet ſpake he knew not what, or uſed an impertinent diſcourſe of thoſe nations, which were not diſcovered in 2000 years after, inhabiting as far ſouth as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona Eſperanza.

† VI.

That upon the like miſtaking, both Terrhaca in the ſtory of Senacherib, and Zera in the ſtory of Aſa are unadviſedly made Ethiopians.

AND by this tranſlation is the ſtory of Senacherib utterly miſtaken in the cauſe of his retreat. For Senacherib was firſt repulſed at Peluſium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judea: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhaca (which all the interpreters call king of [a]Ethiopia) was on the way to ſet on him, he began to withdraw himſelf: and fearing to leave his army in two parts, he ſent threatning meſſengers to Hezekiah king of Judah, perſuading him to ſubmit himſelf: the tenor whereof is ſet down in the ſecond of Kings in theſe words: Have any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hands of the king of Aſhur? Where is the god of Hamah? &c. by which proud ambaſſage, if he had obtained entrance into Jeruſalem, he then meant to have united that great army before Jeruſalem commanded by Rabſakeh with the other which lay before Peluſium, a great city upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For [b]Senacherib had already maſtered the moſt part of all thoſe cities in Judea and Benjamin with a third army (which himſelf commanded) being then at the ſiege of Lebna. But upon the rumour of that Arabian army led by their king Thirrhakeh (whom [c]Joſephus calls Tharſices) Rabſakeh haſted from the ſiege of Jeruſalem, and found Senacherib departed from [d]Lachiſh, and ſet down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as ſome have ſuppos'd. But while he had ill ſucceſs at Peluſium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himſelf, whom he leaſt feared, ſtruck his army before Jeruſalem by the angel of his power, ſo as 158000 were found dead in the place, as in the life of Hezekiah is hereafter more largely written. And that this army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Joſephus himſelf makes it plain. For he confeſſeth in the tenth book the firſt chapter of the Jewiſh antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the army which was a foot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) march'd towards him by the way of the deſart: now the deſart which lay indifferent between [e] Jeruſalem and Peluſium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which alſo toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the ſtony, of which it is a part, the deſart, and the happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to ſuccour either Peluſium or Jeruſalem. But, that there is any deſart between Peluſium and the ſouth part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or deſcribed, by any coſmographer or hiſtorian. So then this ſcripture of the ſecond of Kings, verſe the ninth, hath the ſame miſtaking as the reſt. For here the word [Chuſh] is alſo tranſlated Ethiopia; and in this ſenſe have all the interpreters, but Junius, expreſſed the beginning of the ninth verſe. He heard alſo men ſay of Thirrhakeh king of Ethiopia, &c. whereas it ſhould have been thus converted with Junius. Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh rege Chuſhi: He heard alſo of Thirrhakeh king of the Chuſites. For they were the Chuſites and Arabians, whoſe houſes and cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very ſmoke of Judah flaming was blown, being their neareſt neighbours: and ſo were not the Ethiopian Black-mores under the equinoctial, whom neither war nor peace (which diſcovereth all regions) ever found out, ſaith [f] Pliny. For this king was no more king of Ethiopia than Zerah was, who invaded [g] Aſa king of Judah, with an army of a million and three thouſand chariots. Indeed, how ſuch an army and thoſe chariots ſhould paſs thro' all Egypt (the kings of Egypt being mighty kings) let all men that know how theſe regions are ſeated, and how far diſtant, judge. For princes do not eaſily permit armies of a million to run thro' them; neither was there ever any ſuch ſtrength of black-mores heard of in that part of the world, or elſewhere. Neither are theſe Ethiopians ſuch travellers or conquerors; and yet is this king Zerah alſo called king of Ethiopia. But the word Chuſh being firſt ſo converted for Ethiopia, the reſt of the interpreters (not looking into the ſeats of kingdoms, or the poſſibilities of attempts, or invaſions) followed one another in the former miſtakings.

A farther expoſition of the place, Iſaiah xviii. 1.

CONcerning theſe words in that 18th chapter of Iſaiah, Navium alarum, Wing'd ſhips (ſo the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latin) Sails whiſtling in the winds, or terræ umbroſæ oræ (after Junius) the land of a ſhadowed coaſt, or, the land ſhadowing with wings, as our Engliſh Geneva hath it. The two firſt interpretations of the Septuagint and St. Jerome have one ſenſe in effect. For the ſails are commonly called the wings of a ſhip; and we uſe to ſay ordinarily when our ſhips ſail ſlowly, that ſhe wanteth wings: (that is) when her ſails are either worn or too narrow; and we alſo uſe the ſame phraſe of the wind whiſtling in the ſails. And it may be that the Egyptians employ'd ſo many of thoſe ſmall ſhips, as their ſails were ſaid to give a ſhadow over the Red ſea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Iſaiah) affirmeth, that the word [Sabal] doth ſignify both to ſhadow and to gingle, which is, to make a kind of cymbaline ſound: ſo as the meaning of this place, ſaith Pintus, is this: Wo to thee, O Egypt, which doſt promiſe to others ſafeguard, under the ſhadow of thy wings, which indeed ſeemeth to agree with the argument of the 18th chapter of Iſaiah: and this phraſe is often elſewhere uſed, as in the 16th Pſalm, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the ſhadow of thy wings. The boats of reed ſpoken of are of two kinds; either of baſket-willow covered with hides (as anciently in Britain) or a tree made hollow in the bottom, and built upon both ſides with canes. Of the one ſort I have ſeen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

SECT. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

That Mizraim the chief planter of Egypt, and the reſt of the ſons of Ham, were ſeated in order, one by another.

THE ſecond ſon of Ham was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a ſecond brother) was ſent ſomewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chuſh firſt poſſeſs'd Chaldea on the weſt-ſide of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increaſed in people, ſo he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red ſea, and to the ſouth-eaſt ſide of Judea. Mizraim's brother (with Phut) paſs'd over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thruſt farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the ſea-coaſt, and held the ſide of Paleſtina: and theſe four brothers poſſeſs'd all that tract of land, from Gehon in Chaldea, as far to the weſt as the Mediterranean ſea: comprehending all Arabia Deſerta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samaria, and Judea; with the two Egypts; whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the ſouth, and by the Mediterranean ſea on the north: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) ſtretcheth it ſelf towards the ſouth as far as Syene, the border of the Ethiopians or Blackmores. All the reſt of the coaſt of Africa weſtward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other nation or family that dwelt between them. And in the ſame manner did all their ſons again, and all the ſons of the reſt of Noah's children, ſort themſelves.

† II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians lunary years, which made their antiquities ſeem more fabulous.

THIS flouriſhing kingdom poſſeſs'd by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at ſuch time as Ægyptus (otherwiſe Rameſſes, as ſome think) the ſon of Belus chaced thence his elder brother Danaus, ſhifting him into that part of Greece, now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai abandoning their proper names: which happened 877 years after the flood, in the time of Joſhua, as St. Auguſtine conjectureth out of Euſebius. But in Homer's Odyſſes it appeareth, that the Egyptians were ſo called at the time of the Trojan war. And before this, Egypt was known by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Oſiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Joſephus citeth in his firſt book againſt Appion) numbreth all the kings of Egypt after Moſes's departure, who conſumed 393 years. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name 330 years after Joſhua, and about 1000 years after the flood. But where Joſephus in the ſame book taketh Iſrael to be thoſe Hycſos, which he alſo calleth paſtores or ſhepherds, which are ſaid to have reigned in Egypt 511 years, whom alſo he calleth his anceſtors (meaning the anceſtors of the Jews;) in this I am ſure he was groſly deceived, or that he vainly boaſted; for the Iſraelites had no ſuch dominion as Manethon feigneth: nor abode in Egypt ſo long a time by many years.

Of the Egyptian antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirm (ſaith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330 kings before Amaſis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had memory and ſtory of 13000 years; and that the ſtars had four times changed their courſe, and the ſun twice ſet in the eaſt. Theſe riddles are alſo rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the moon, whereof Ovid:

> Arcades: & luna gens prior illa fuit.
> The Arcadians the earth inhabited
> Ere yet the moon did ſhine, or Jove was bred.

But for thoſe 13000 years it may well be true: ſeeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their years by months, which makes after that account not above 1000 or 1100 years, whether we take their months or lunary years to have been of the firſt kind of 27 days and 8 hours; or otherwiſe 29 days and 12 hours; or after any other of thoſe 5 diverſities of their lunary years.

† III.

Of certain vain aſſertions of the antiquity of the Egyptians.

GErardus Mercator, in his chronology, reaſoneth for the Egyptians antiquity in this manner; that the 16th Dynaſty (where Euſebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general flood: and that therefore the firſt of the other fifteen reached the creation, or ſoon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this anſwer: that therein Mercator was firſt deceived, becauſe he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the 16th Dynaſty was at once with the general flood: which Euſebius maketh 292 years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the ſhepherds Dynaſtia (being in number the 17th) in the time of their firſt king, Saltis, to have been in the year of the world 1846, which Euſebius findeth in the world's age 2140. For the 16th Dynaſtia was begun but in the 292d year after the flood, as they account, and continued 190 years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynaſtia to endure 115 years, Euſebius reckoneth many of them at leſs than 100 years: for the 28th had but 6 years; the 29th but 20, and the 30th but 18 years.

Now Annius, in his ſupplement of Manethon, affirmeth, that all theſe 15 Dynaſties laſted but 162 years: and that the firſt of the 15 began but in the 131ſt year after the flood: ſo as where Mercator makes all the 15 to precede the flood, and the 16th to have been then in being at the time of the flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falſhood cannot be hidden, tho' diſguiſed. For Annius had forgotten his former opinion and aſſertion, that it was in the 131ſt year that Nimrod with the ſons of Noah came into the valley of Shinaar: ſo he forgets the time which was conſumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confuſion of ſpeech there was no diſperſion, nor far-off plantation at all. And tho' he haſtily convey'd Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the 10th year of Nimrod's reign (which was 10 years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadviſed. For he makes Egypt poſſeſs'd, and a government eſtabliſhed in the very firſt year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition far off or near in queſtion: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord ſcatter them upon all the earth.

† IV.

Againſt Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200 years after the creation; at leaſt, that both it, and the moſt part of the world, were peopled before the flood.

BUT whereas Pererius ſeeketh to overthrow this antiquity of the Egyptians, touching their Dynaſties (which Euſebius doth not altogether deſtroy, but leſſen) I do not find any great ſtrength in this opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impoſſible that Egypt ſhould be peopled within 100 or 200 years after Adam, in the firſt age. And whereas he ſuppoſeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general flood, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the world was then peopled: Pererius's words are theſe: Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Ægyptum uſque habitandum & complendum propagata ſit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be ſo multiplied in the firſt two hundred, or in the firſt hundred years of the world, and ſo propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this, ſaith Pererius, we muſt alſo confeſs, that there were then both the Aſſyrians, and other nations.

Now ſeeing the ſcriptures are ſilent herein, and that it is no point of our ſaving belief, it is lawful for every man to be guided in this and the like queſtions by the beſt reaſon, circumſtance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the reſt, I proteſt that I do not gainſay any man's opinion out of any croſſing or cavilling humour: for I think it the part of every Chriſtian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is poſſibility of union, than out of froward ſubtilty, and prejudicate reſolvedneſs, to maintain factions needleſs, and dangerous contentions.

Firſt therefore to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted ſo ſoon after Adam, no, not at all before the flood, I ſay there is no reaſon why we ſhould give a leſs increaſe to the ſons of Adam, than to the ſons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded thoſe which came after the flood double, and (after a few years) treble, is an infallible proof of their ſtrength and ability, to beget many children: and at that time they obſerved no degrees of kindred, nor conſanguinity. And that there was a ſpeedy increaſe of people, and in great numbers, it may in ſome ſort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearful that the death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himſelf from the reſt, which were afterwards begotten, and dwelt in the land of Nod, and there by the help of his own iſſues, built a city (called Enoch) after the name of his firſt-born. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the valley of Shinaar with ſo many multitudes, as ſufficed to build the city and tower of Babel: and that to this increaſe there was given but 130 years by Beroſus, and after the account of the ſcriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly underſtood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but 101 years: I ſee no cauſe to doubt, but that in the infancy of the firſt age, when the bodies of men were moſt perfect, even within 130 years (the ſame, if not a greater) number might be increaſed: and ſo within 70 years after (that is, by ſuch time as the world had ſtood 200 years) as well Aſſyria, Syria, and Egypt, might be poſſeſs'd before the flood, as they were within the ſame or leſs time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumſtance, or true ſtory of the Babylonian and Aſſyrian empire, that all thoſe people, which were increaſed in the firſt 100 or 130 years after the flood, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himſelf came out of the eaſt, as there is no ſcripture or authority to prove it, ſo all probable conjecture and reaſon it ſelf denies it. Again, thoſe multitudes and powerful numbers, which Semiramis (but the 3d from Nimrod) found in India, conſidered with her own army of three millions (and ſhe left not all her kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the world had ſuch plenty of people in ſo few years after the flood, it might alſo be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own account Ninus governed Babylonia and Aſſyria but 292 years after the flood of Noah. And theſe troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all thoſe eaſtern kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterranean ſea; when there had now paſs'd from the flood to the time of this her invaſion, ſomewhat leſs or more than 360 years: for much more time the true chronology cannot allow; tho' I confeſs, that in reſpect of the ſtrange greatneſs of Semiramis's army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as ſhort a time as can well be given. And if but one half be true of that which is ſaid, that her army conſiſted of 1300000 footmen, and 500000 horſemen, it muſt needs be, that long before Semiramis's reign, the greateſt part of Aſia (whence her huge army was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it ſelf (much part whereof is barren) muſt long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himſelf maſter of all nations, entered notwithſtanding in league with the king thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or ſought his aſſiſtance. And if Arabia were then ſo well repleniſhed, I ſee no cauſe but Egypt might alſo be peopled. Now if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (epitomiz'd by Juſtin, lib. 1.) Egypt was a moſt flouriſhing and magnificent nation before Ninus was born. For theſe be his own words, ſpeaking of Ninus: Fuêre quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris rex Ægypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris king of Egypt, and Tanais king of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the world was, the conqueſts of Ninus witneſs, who ſubdued with no ſmall force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Aſia on this ſide India. For Diodorus out of Cteſias numbreth the armies, wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaſter, at 1700000 footmen, and 200000 horſemen: and the ſtories generally ſhew, that though Zoroaſter's army was far ſhort of this, yet it was greater greater than any that thoſe parts of the world ever ſince beheld. But to what end ſhould I ſeek for foreign authority? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was poſſeſs'd by Mizraim, the ſon of Ham; and that it was an eſtabliſhed kingdom, filled with many cities in Abraham's time, the ſcriptures tell us. And ſure to prepare and cultivate a deſolate and overgrown ground, to beautify it with many cities, laws, and policies, cannot be eſteemed a labour of a few days: and therefore it muſt be inhabited in a leſs time than 200 years after the flood; and in the ſame time, if not in a ſhorter, before the flood. For if ſo many millions of men were found within 300 years after the general flood; ſo as not only Babylon, and Aſſyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Paleſtina, yea, the far-off Libya on the one ſide, and India on the other, and Scythia, inferior to neither, were all filled: into what ſmall corners could then all thoſe nations be compreſs'd, which 1656 years brought forth before the flood? Even neceſſity, which cannot be reſiſted, caſt the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known world; eſpecially, where death forbare the father, and made no place for the ſon, till he had beheld living nations of his own body.

Of ſome other reaſons againſt the opinion of Pererius.

FOR what a ſtrange increaſe did the long lives of the firſt age make, when they continued 800 or 900 years. Surely, we have reaſon to doubt that the world could not contain them, rather than that they were not ſpread over the world. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in this age of the world: wherein if one exceed 50 years, ten for one are cut off in that paſſage, and yet we find no want of people; nay, we know the multitude ſuch, as if by wars or peſtilence they were not ſometimes taken off by many thouſands, the earth with all the induſtry of man could not give them food. What ſtrange heaps then of ſouls had the firſt ages, who enjoyed 800 or 900 years as aforeſaid! Theſe numbers, I ſay, cannot be counted or conceived. For it would come to the ſame reckoning in effect, as if all thoſe which have been born in Britain ſince three or four hundred years before the Norman conqueſt (ſaving ſuch as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to theſe there were added as many as by polygamy might have been increaſed. For (to omit that the giants and mighty ones of the firſt age obſerved no law of matrimony) it is to be thought, that thoſe lovers of the world and of pleaſure, when they knew the long and liberal time which nature had given them, would not willingly or haſtily preſent themſelves to any danger which they could fly from or eſchew. For what human argument hath better perſuaſion to make men careleſs of life, and fearleſs of death, than the little time which keeps them aſunder, and that ſhort time alſo accompanied with ſo many pains and diſeaſes, which this envious old age of the world mingleth together, and ſoweth with the ſeeds of mankind.

Now if that Beroſus or Annius may be alledged for ſufficient authors, whom Pererius himſelf in this queſtion citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Joſephus confirmed, that the city of Enoch was ſeated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I ſee no cauſe why Paleſtina (which is alſo a province of Syria) and Egypt, which neighboureth it, could be left deſolate both all the life-time of Cain, and all thoſe times between his death and the flood, which were by eſtimation 700 or 800 years. And ſure, tho' this fragment of Beroſus, with Annius's comment, be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient copies being corrupted or loſt) yet all things in Beroſus are not to be rejected. Therefore St. Jerome for ſuch authors gives a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us chuſe what is good in them, and reject the reſt. And certainly in the very beginning of the firſt book, Beroſus agreeth, in effect, with Moſes, touching the general flood: and in that firſt part Beroſus affirmeth, that thoſe mighty men and giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all nations, and ſubjected the univerſal world: and tho' that phraſe [of all the world] be often uſed in the ſcriptures for a part thereof; as in the ſecond of the Acts: That there were dwelling at Jeruſalem Jews, men that feared God of every nation under heaven: yet by words which follow in Beroſus, it is plain that his words and ſenſe were the ſame: for he addeth from the ſun's riſing to the ſun's ſetting, which cannot be taken for any ſmall part thereof. Again, we may ſafely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the world among his ſons at adventure, or left them as diſcoverers, but directed them to thoſe regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more paſſable and eaſy to travel over before the flood, than after it. For Pererius himſelf confeſſeth, that Attica (by reaſon of mud and ſlime which the water left upon the earth) was uninhabited 200 years after Ogyges's flood, whereby we may gather that there was no great pleaſure in paſſing into far countries after the general deluge, when the earth lay, as it were, incopſed for 100 or 130 years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautiful, and leſs cumberſome to walk over in the firſt age, than after the general overflowing.

† VI.

Of the words of Moſes, Gen. x. verſe the laſt, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

LASTLY, whereas Pererius draws this argument out of the laſt verſe of the tenth of Geneſis, And out of theſe were the nations divided after the flood: Quo ſignificatur talem diviſionem non fuiſſe ante diluvium; By which it appeareth, ſaith Pererius, that there was no ſuch diviſion before the flood: which he alſo ſeeketh to confirm out of the 11th of Geneſis, becauſe the diviſion of tongues was cauſe of the diſperſion of the people. This conſequence, Quo ſignificatur, &c. ſeemeth to me very weak; the text itſelf rather teacheth the contrary: For out of theſe, ſaith Moſes, were the nations divided in the earth after the flood; inferring, that before the flood the nations were divided out of others, tho' after the flood out of theſe only. But whatſoever ſenſe may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the flood, or to any plantation or diviſion in that age: for if there were none elſe among whom the earth could be divided after the flood, but Noah's ſons, wherein doth that neceſſary diviſion controul the planting of the world before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confuſion of ſpeech was the cauſe of this diſperſion, it is true, that it was ſo for that preſent; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confuſion of languages at all, yet increaſe of people and time would have enforc'd a farther-off and general plantation: as Beroſus (lib. 3.) ſays well, that when mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novas ſedes neceſſitas compellebat; They were driven by neceſſity to ſeek new habitations. For we find, as it is before ſaid, that within 300 years after the flood, there were gathered together gether into two armies, ſuch multitudes as the valley about Babylon could not have ſuſtained thoſe numbers with their increaſe for any long time: all Aſia the greater and the leſſer; all Scythia, Arabia, Paleſtina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the iſlands thereof; Mauritania and Libya being alſo at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Beroſus, then not only thoſe parts of the world, but (within 140 years after the flood) Spain, Italy and France were alſo planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656 years before the flood, in the time of the chief ſtrength of mankind, they were repleniſh'd with people. And certainly ſeeing all the world was overflown, there were people in all the world which offended.

A concluſion reſolving of that which is moſt likely, touching the Egyptian antiquities: with ſomewhat of Phut (another ſon of Ham) which peopled Libya.

THerefore for the antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptian antiquities: ſo I do not think the report of their antiquities ſo fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the flood, and two or three hundred years more or leſs after Adam, there might remain unto the ſons of Mizraim ſome monuments (in pillars or altars of ſtone or metal) of their former kings or governors: which the Egyptians having added to the liſt and roll of their kings after the flood, in ſucceeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by ſome corruption in their prieſts) ſomething beyond the truth might be inſerted. And that the memory of antiquity was in ſuch ſort preſerved, Beroſus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and ſo doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the uſe of letters and the art of aſtronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634 years before Alexander's conqueſt: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034 years before the flood, and wrote of the world's deſtruction, both by water and fire; as alſo of Chriſt's coming in judgment; as St. Jude hath witneſſed. But leaving theſe antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reaſon, I will conclude this plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Ægyptus the ſon of Belus, as aforeſaid. Being divided into two regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean ſea, was called the inferiour Egypt; ſurnamed alſo Delta; becauſe the ſeveral branches of Nilus breaking aſunder from one body of the river, gave it the form of the Greek letter Delta, which is the form of a triangle. That branch, which ran toward the north-eaſt and embraced the ſea, next unto the deſarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the city of Peluſium, where Senacherib was repulſed: the other branch, which yielded it ſelf to the ſalt-water towards the north-eaſt, is beautified by that famous city of Alexandria: the upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient city of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100 gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum, and by the Greeks Dioſpolis; in the ſcriptures No-hamon, which ſignifieth multitudes of inhabitants, exceeding belief. [a] Joſephus calls Egypt Merſin of Mizraim: and [b] Herodotus affirms, that it had once the name of Thebais.

Phut the third ſon of Ham took the next portion of land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Libya, whoſe people were anciently called Phutei, ſaith [c] Joſephus, and Pliny mentioneth the river Fut in Mauritania: which river from the mountain Atlas, known to the inhabitants by the name of Dyris, he maketh to be diſtant the ſpace of 200 miles. It alſo appeareth in the 30th chapter of Ezekiel, that Phut, Chuſh and Lud were comermini and aſſociates with the Egyptians.

SECT. XII.

Of the eleven ſons of Canaan, the fourth ſon of Ham.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan; with the names of his eleven ſons.

CANAAN, the fourth ſon of Ham, poſſeſs'd all that region called by the Romans Paleſtina; in the ſcriptures Galilea, Samaria and Judea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jury; the limits whereof are preciſely ſet down by Moſes, Geneſis 10. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goeſt to Gerar until Azzah, and as thou goeſt unto Sodom and Gomorrha, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Laſha. Now howſoever theſe words of the Hebrew text [as thou goeſt] be converted, Moſes's meaning was, that Gerar was the ſouth bound of Canaan, and Zidon the north; Sodom and Gomorrha the eaſt, and the other cities named, ſtood on the frontiers thereof. For Gerar ſtandeth in a right line from Gaza, in the way of Egypt, the uttermoſt territory of Canaan ſouthward: and this was properly the land of Canaan.

Now the ſons of Canaan which poſſeſs'd this country, and inhabited ſome part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebuſi or Jebuſeus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeſhi or Girgeſeus.
6. Hevi or Chiveus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Sini or Sinæus.
9. Arvadi or Arvadæus.
10. Zamari or Samareus, or Tzemarius.
11. Hamathi or Hamathæus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the moſt renowned were the Hethites, Gergeſites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebuſites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were deſcended of Zamari or Samareus, or from ſome of his.

† II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

ZIDON the firſt-born of Canaan, built the famous city of Zidon in Phenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the tribe of Aſſer: for Aſſer, Zabulon and Naphtali had a great part of the ancient Phenicia diſtributed among them; but the Aſſerites could never obtain Zidon itſelf.

The ſecond ſon of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of thoſe ſeven principal nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out: namely,

the Gergeſites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites and Hevites, and the Jebuſites. The Hittites inhabited about Berſabe, and towards Hebron, near the torrent Beſor, and about [a]Gerar, which Moſes maketh the uttermoſt limit of Canaan, having the deſart of Pharan to the ſouth: for about Berſabe (otherwiſe Puteus juramenti) four miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his poſterity, as far to the north-eaſt as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did [b]Abraham buy the field of Sarah's burial. Of which nation Rebecca bewailed herſelf to Iſaac, ſaying, [c]That ſhe was weary of her life for the daughters of Heth. The giants Anakim were of theſe Hittites, a ſtrong and fierce nation, whoſe entertainments by the kings of Iſrael againſt them, the Syrians greatly fear'd: as in the ſecond of the Kings; [d]Iſrael hath hired againſt us the kings of the Hittites.

† III.

Of the Jebuſites and Amorites.

JEBUSEUS the third ſon of Canaan, of whom came the Jebuſites, and whoſe principal ſeat was Jebus, afterwards Jeruſalem, were alſo a valiant and ſtubborn nation, and held their city and the country near it, till ſuch time as David by God's aſſiſtance recovered both: yet were not the Jebuſites extinguiſhed, but were tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreus was the fourth ſon of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that land to the eaſt of Jordan below the ſea of Galilee, having Arnon and the mountains of Galaad on the eaſt, and Jordan on the weſt; of whom Og, king of Baſan, and Sihon, overthrown by Moſes, were princes.

The Amorites had alſo many other habitations diſperſed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Cœleſyria, or Syria Libanica. They had alſo their being in the mountains of [e]Juda, and in Idumæa near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came, that all the Canaanites were ſometimes called Amorites: as in Geneſis xv. For the wickedneſs of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was alſo a powerful nation, we find in the prophet Amos; [f] Yet deſtroyed I the Amorite before them, whoſe height was like the height of a cedar, and he was ſtrong as the oaks.

† IV.

Of the Gergeſites, Hevites and Harkites.

THE fifth ſon of Canaan was Gergeſeus or Gergeſion, otherwiſe Girgaſi, who inhabited on the eaſt-ſide of the lake of Tiberias, or the ſea of Galilee, where Ptolemy ſets the city Geraſa, which Joſephus calls Geſera in the territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Chriſt diſpoſſeſs'd the poſſeſs'd with devils; and the Gergeſites deſired him to depart their coaſts; becauſe their ſwine filled with the evil ſpirits drowned themſelves in the ſea of Galilee. Gergeſeus alſo built Berytus, ſometime Geris, afterwards Fœlix Julia, three miles from the river Adonis in Phenicia, in which the Romans held a garriſon, and to which Auguſtus gave many large privileges.

Heveus the ſixth ſon, and father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. Theſe Hevites, howſoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the ſecond is remembred) yet many of them remained all the war of Joſhua, and afterwards to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleaſed utterly to root out theſe nations, but they were ſometimes made tributaries to the Iſraelites, and at other times ſerved, in their falling away from the true worſhip of God) to afflict them: for as it is written Judges iii. They remained to prove Iſrael by them, whether they would obey the commandments of God.

The ſeventh ſon was Araceus or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterranean ſea, over-againſt Tripolis, built the city of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

SINEUS the eighth ſon, Hieroſolymitanus ſets at Caparorſa, which Ptolemy finds in Judea, not far from Jebus; to the ſouth thereof, ſaith Junius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which St. Jerome calls Sim; Ptolemy, Simyra; Mela and Pliny, Simirus; Brochard, Sycon (called Synochis) near Arca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the deſarts of Sinai, or thereabouts; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all theſe places, affirming that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is alſo another nation of Sini, written with the letter C, otherwiſe Kenæi, who deſcended of Hobab the ſon of Raguel the Madianite, who aſſiſted the Iſraelites, in their conduction thro' the wilderneſs of Pharan. But theſe Cinæi were admitted among the Iſraelites, and had a portion of land with the [g]Naphtalims, beſides their habitations with the Amalekites: againſt theſe Cinæi Balaam propheſied, that they ſhould be deſtroyed by the Aſſyrians.

The ninth ſon was Aradeus or Arvadeus, who in the iſle of [h]Aradus built the city Arados: oppoſite againſt which iſland, on the main of Phenicia, they founded another city of that name, which for oppoſition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this city came St. Peter, ſaith Clement, and in this iſle preached the goſpel; and founded a church in honour of our lady: but we find no ſuch work of his in the Acts of the Apoſtles. Both theſe two were very famous, and places of ſkilful ſeamen, whom Ezekiel remembreth in his prophecies againſt the Tyrians. [i] The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy mariners.

† VI.

Of Zemari.

OF Samareus or Zemari, the tenth ſon, there are divers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Cœleſyria at Edeſſa, and founded Samaraim, which in Joſhua is placed in the tribe of Benjamin. There is alſo Samaraiim (of the ſame orthography) upon the mountains of Ephraim, ſaith [k]Beroaldus, mentioned in the ſecond of Chronicles xiii. 4. which the Latin converteth amiſs, ſaith he, by Semeron. The Hieroſolymitan paraphraſt makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emiſſani, which Pliny calls the Hemiſeni, in Cœleſyria; and it may be that it was their firſt habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited thoſe other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew orthography, and this place in the firſt of Kings (ſpeaking of Omri) diſproveth. [l] And he bought the mountain Samaria, or Shemeron, of one Shemer, for two talents of ſilver, and built in the mountain: and called the name of the city which he built, after the name of Shemir, lord of the mountain Samaria. But of all theſe places I ſhall ſpeak more at large in the conqueſt of the Holy Land by the children of Iſrael. Of whomſoever the Samaritans were deſcended, ſure I am, that they were ever a perfidious nation, and baſe: for as long as the ſtate of the Jews ſtood up, they always called themſelves Jews; when it ſuffered or ſunk, they then utterly denied to be of that nation or family; for at ſuch time as they were returned from their firſt captivity, they became a mix'd nation; partly of the colonies of the Aſſyrians, and partly of the naturals.

Of Hamathi.

THE laſt of Canaan's ſons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi of Hamath, ſaith Beroaldus, of which (the aſpiration taken away) the ſame is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was preſent. Joſephus and St. Jerome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which ſtandeth on the river Orontes on the frontier of Comagena, between the mountain Caſſius and the province of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which St. Peter was biſhop, and in which St. Luke and Ignatius were born: but Antioch ſurnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus ſuppoſeth, which ſtandeth between Apamea and Emeſa in Caſſiotis. Yet indeed Emath cannot be taken for either; for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emeſa, are farther off ſeated from Canaan, than ever any of thoſe nations ſtragled. And whereas St. Jerome ſetteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the tribe of Naphtali; it is manifeſt that Epiphania, which ſtandeth to the north of Emeſa, hath all the province of Laodicea between it and any part of the land divided. And if Libanon it ſelf were not ſhared among the tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the provinces Laodicea and Libanica are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land, and therefore Emath ſo taken could not be a part of Naphtali, as in the 13th of Joſhua is directly proved. For Joſhua counting the lands that remained unpoſſeſs'd, reckoneth all mount Libanon towards the ſun-riſing, from Baal-gad under mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reaſon, among others, is uſed, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Iſrael: becauſe David accepted the preſents of Tohu [a] king of Emath, and therewithal conditions of peace; which he would not have done, if that territory had ever belonged to the children of Iſrael, but would have recovered it without compoſition, and by ſtrong hand, as he did the reſt. But this argument, as I take it, hath no great weight: for if the promiſe which God made be conſidered, as it is written in [b] Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, tho' ſeated altogether without the bounds of the land promiſed, according to the deſcription of Moſes and Joſhua; for Emath is indeed ſituate on the other ſide of the mountain of Hermon, which joineth to Libanus, and is otherwiſe called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Joſhua xix. 35. and written in the Latin converſion Emath; therein, ſaith Beroaldus, was St. Jerome miſtaken. Emath or Iturea is that over the mountains, and the city in Nephtalim ſhould be written Hamath; and ſo the Septuagint, underſtanding the difference, write it Ammath and not Emath, the ſame which indeed belonged to the Nephtalims, ſeated on the ſouth-ſide of Libanus to the eaſt of Aſſedim: which St. Jerome writes Emath, Joſephus Hamath, others Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Amathein; of which, as I take it, Rabſakeh vaunteth in the ſecond of Kings; [c] Where is the God of Hamath?

SECT. XIII.

Of the ſons of Chuſh, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

The ſons of Chuſh were { Seba, Havila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod. } And the ſons of Raama were { Sheba and Dedan. }

† I.

That moſt of the ſons of Chuſh were ſeated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabeans that robbed Job: and of the queen that came to Solomon.

SEBA or Saba was the eldeſt ſon of Chuſh, the eldeſt ſon of Ham, to make a difference between him and his nephew Sheba, the ſon of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma, after Montanus) his name is written with a ſingle [S] Samech, and Sheba the ſon of Regma with an [S] aſpirate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldeſt ſon of Chuſh, Regma his brother, and Sheba the ſon of Regma, poſſeſs'd both the ſhores of Arabia Fœlix. Saba took that part toward the Red ſea, as neareſt his father Chuſh, and the land of the Chuſites: Regma and Sheba, the eaſt coaſt of the ſame Arabia, which looketh into the gulf of Perſia; of which Pliny: Sabæi Arabum populi propter thura clariſſimi ad utraque maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabeans, people of Arabia, famous for their frankincenſe, extending their nations, dwell along both the ſeas, to wit, the Perſian and the Arabian or Red ſea. This country was afterwards called Arabia a populi mixtione, ſaith Poſtellus. To this agreeth Ptolemy, who ſetteth the city of Saba towards the Arabian or Red ſea, and the city Rhegama towards the Perſian, with whom alſo we may leave Sabta: for ſo much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, becauſe he remembreth a nation (called Stabæi) near the Perſian ſea; and Maſſabathe which deſcended of them. But Montanus hath ſent Regma, or (as he calls him Rhama) into Carmania, for which I ſee no reaſon. Joſephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath baniſhed Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it ſtrange, that the Sabæi, which ſtole away Job's cattle, ſhould run thro' all Egypt, and all Arabia Petræa, and find out Job in Traconitis between Paleſtina and Cœleſyria 1200 miles off. Now as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, ſo do I think, that neither the Sabæi on the Red ſea, nor thoſe toward the Perſian ſea, could by any means execute the ſtealth upon Job, whichſoever Beroaldus ſhall take for neareſt. But theſe were the Sabæi of Arabia the deſart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his own experience, that the city Saba is ſeated: the ſame which Ptolemy calls Save, now Semiſcaſac: and from this Saba in Arabia the deſart, came thoſe magi or wiſemen which worſhipped Chriſt, ſaith Melchior, whoſe words are theſe: The magi came neither out of Meſopotamia (as Chryſoſtome, Jerome, and Ambroſe ſuppoſed) nor out of Arabia the happy, as many wiſe men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the deſart: which city when my ſelf was there, was (as I judged it) called Semiſcaſac. And to approve this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that the Sabæi were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other nations (as well thoſe on the Perſian ſea, as thoſe on the Red ſea) are ſo disjoined with large deſarts, as there is no poſſibility for ſtrangers to paſs them, eſpecially with any numbers of cattle, both in reſpect of the mountains, of the ſands, and of the extream want of water in thoſe parts: Ubi nec homines nec beſtiæ videntur, nec aves, imo nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, ſed non niſi montes ſaxoſi, altiſſimi, aſperrimi; Where there are found neither men nor beaſt, no not ſo much as birds, or trees, nor any paſture, or graſs, but only ſharp, and high, ſtony, and craggy mountains. Beroaldus and Pererius conceive that the queen of Saba which came to viſit Solomon, was of the Sabæi on the eaſt ſide of Arabia Fœlix; but the contrary ſeemeth more probable, that ſhe was queen of Saba towards the Red ſea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petræa, betwixt Idumæa and the Red ſea, as far down as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this queen of Saba, which inhabited the weſt part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might without any far travel enter his territories, free from all danger of ſurprize by any other prince or nation.

But to avoid tediouſneſs, it is manifeſt that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Rhegma, with his ſons Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the poſſeſſors of Arabia the happy and the deſart: only Havila and Nimrod dwelt together on the eaſt ſide of Chuſh, who held Arabia Petræa. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the city of Sabbatha or Sabota in the ſame Arabia: of which both [a] Pliny and Ptolemy; who withal nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there were ſometimes found ſixty temples. Ezekiel joineth the father and the ſon together, [b] The merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy merchants. And that they were the eaſtern Arabians their merchandize witneſſeth, formerly repeated in the chapter of Paradiſe. For Joſephus's fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Aſtablari, they be not worthy any farther anſwer than hath already been given: eſpecially ſeeing theſe cities, preſerving the memory of the names of Saba and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemy's time, tho' in ſome letters changed. As alſo in the coaſts adjoining, the names of other of the brethren of the family of Chuſh, with little alterations are preſerved. In Arabia the deſart is found the city Sabæ or Save (now Semiſcaſac) with the city of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the nation by Ptolemy himſelf called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the happy is found the city of Rhegama, and Rabana, which alſo keepeth the ſound of Rhegma, the city of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the eaſt coaſt of Arabia: as alſo the Metropolis and chief city, in the body of the ſouth part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the weſt of Sabatha towards the Red ſea the great city of Saba; and the nation adjoining, Sabæi: and to the ſouth thereof again towards the ſtraight entrance of the Red ſea, the region of Sabe. To all theſe his brothers and nephews which were ſeated on the eaſt ſide of Arabia, Havilah by the paſſage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom he might paſs by boat even unto Rhegma the city of Raama or Rhegma, ſet near the river of Lar towards the mouth of the Perſian ſea, which ſtood in Ptolemy's time.

† II.

Joſephus's opinion of Dedan, one of the iſſue of Chuſh, to have been ſeated in weſt Ethiopia, diſproved out of Ezekiel and Jeremy.

AND whereas Joſephus (whom in this St. Jerome followeth, as not curious herein) ſent Dedan the ſon of Raamah into weſt Ethiopia, it is ſtrange that Ezekiel ſhould couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15th verſe, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22d verſe, to be the merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in weſt Ethiopia, which is diſtant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) above 4000 miles. Beſides which the merchandiſe that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-mores. For they of Dedan (ſaith Ezekiel) were thy merchants in precious cloths for thy chariots; and theſe weſtern Ethiopians never ſaw cloth, till the Portugals ſeeking thoſe coaſts traded with them: the merchandiſe of the country being hides, elephants teeth, ſome gold and amber, civit cats, and rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all theſe they exchanged for linen, or iron chiefly.

But in thoſe days the weſt part of Africa within the body of the land was known only by imagination: and, being under the burnt zone was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the negroes of weſt Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra, Liona, or Niger, could either paſs by ſea or land to Tyre in the bottom of the Mediterranean ſea, were a ſtrange, or rather a fooliſh fancy. Now to put it out of diſpute that Dedan alſo dwelt by the reſt of the children of Chuſh, which ſeats they held by that name in the time of Jeremy the prophet, let us hear Jeremy's own words: Fly ye inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the deſtruction of Eſau upon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumæa is a province of Arabia Petræa: and Dedan which dwelt on the north part of Arabia Fœlix, joined in that part to Petræa, the ſeat of his grand-father Chuſh; which neighbourhood and fellowſhip of Dedan and the Idumeans is alſo confirmed by Ezekiel; [c] I will ſtretch out mine hand upon Edom, and deſtroy man and beaſt out of it, and I will make it deſolate from Teman: and they of Dedan ſhall fall by the ſword.

SECT. XIV.

Of the iſſue of Mizraim: of the place of Jeremy, chap. ix. ver. 7.

AFTER Chuſh it followeth to ſpeak of Mizraim's ſons, whoſe names (ſaith [d] St. Auguſtine) were plural, to ſignify the nations which came from them. Ludim the eldeſt ſon of Mizraim was the father of the Libyans in Africa: and the reſt of his brothers diſperſed themſelves into all regions adjoining. Among the ſons of Shem there is alſo Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the ſon of Mizraim by the ſingular number: the ſon of Shem being written Lud, the ſon of Mizraim Ludim: and yet theſe names and nations are often confounded, notwithſtanding the apparent difference both of names and nations. For that Ludim the ſon of Mizraim was the parent of the Libyans in Africa, and that he was ſeated not far from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the prophet Jeremy, who joineth them in this ſort together. [e] Come up ye horſes, and rage ye chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-mores and the Libyans which bear the ſhield: for thoſe nations aſſiſted the Egyptians being of one parent deſcended.

[a] Plin. l. 12. c. 14. Ptol. Tab. 6. Aſiæ. [b] Ezek. 27. 22. [c] Ezek. 15. 15. [d] The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a ſign of the plural number, as aim of the dual. [e] Jer. 46. 9.

And

And in Ezekiel, Phut and Lud are joined together. Ethiopia (or Chuſh) ſaith Ezekiel c. xxx. ver. 5. And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the land that are in league ſhall fall with them by the ſword: which is as much to ſay, as the ſons of Chuſh (which were the Chuſites) the ſons of Mizraim (which were the Egyptians) and the Libyans (deſcended of his ſon Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa ſhall fall together. Hieroſolymitanus finds alſo in Africa a nation of the Lydians. And I believe it: becauſe Jeremy joineth the Libyans and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrews called Ludim (ſaith Arias Montanus) tho' 2 Chron. xii. 3. they ſeem to be called Lubim or Lubæi, a name ſomewhat nearer the word Lybies, and by which it may ſeem that the truer writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the 30th of Ezekiel) underſtandeth that which is ſpoken of in the 5th verſe of Lud, not to be meant of the Libyans at all: for he will have this threatning to be meant againſt the people of Lyda, a city, ſaith he, between Egypt and Paleſtina, which opinion I could not miſlike, if the city of Lyda were ſo ſeated. But Lyda (which ſhould be written Lydda with a double D, and is the ſame city which was afterwards Dioſpolis, in which St. Peter cured Eneas of the palſy) ſtandeth near the torrent Gaas, not far from Joppe, the port of Jeruſalem. Yet it is not impoſſible but that this city might have Lud for the founder. For there are many cities of one name founded in all the regions of the world, and far aſunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, ſo of divers others. St. Jerome maketh Lehabim to be the father of Libya who was the 3d ſon of Mizraim: and ſo doth Poſtellus; and either opinion may be true.

The reſt of Mizraim's ſons have no proper countries given them in the ſcriptures, ſaving Caſluhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philiſtines, whom the ſcriptures call Peleſet.

Theſe Caſluhim inhabited Caſſiotis, a region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Paleſtina, in which the lake Sirbonis and the mountain Caſſius are found: not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim ſeated near Caſluhim in that tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, not far from Peluſium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the city Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the ſame which Ptolemy calls Hercules parva. Of the Caſluhim and Caphtorim came the Philiſtines, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli, which is, Alienigenæ, ſtrangers, or of a ſtrange kindred. Theſe Philiſtines inhabited the ſouth part of the holy land towards Egypt, of whom Paleſtina took name. For the Hebrews (ſaith Iſidore) do not uſe the letter [P] but inſtead of it [Ph.] Their principal cities were Gaza, Aſcalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gazæi, Aſcalonitæ, Azotii, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ. Iſidore affirms, that Aſcalon was firſt called Philiſtim: and of that city the country adjoining. But where Iſidore had it I know not.

The firſt known king of the Philiſtines was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was alſo king of the Philiſtines, in theſe words: [a] Wherefore Iſaac went to Abimelech king of the Philiſtines unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or ſome ancienter Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his glory, the reſt of his ſucceſſors called themſelves by the ſame name. The Philiſtines commanded that tract of land upon the Mediterranean ſea to the northward, from the caſtle of Pilgrims (otherwiſe Cæſarea Paleſtinæ or Straton's tower) which was the ſouth border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the river of Egypt. The Anakims, or ſtrong giants, were of theſe Philiſtines, and Goliah was of Geth, one of the five cities above-named. They had ſometimes five kings, ſaith Liranus. They maſtered the Iſraelites at ſeveral times above 150 years, and kept them tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampſon and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themſelves.

It is objected, that becauſe theſe cities and the countries adjoining were held by the ſons of Mizraim, therefore did the Iſraelites diſpoſſeſs the ſons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing thoſe places.

To this ſaith Pererius, that altho' the Paleſtines or Philiſtines held it in the time of Joſhua, yet at the time of the promiſe it was poſſeſs'd by the Canaanites; as in the 2d of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the villages unto Gaza. And what marvel if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? for that the Philiſtines were of Caphtor, and ſo of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, beſides Moſes, the prophet Jeremy witneſſeth: [b] The Lord will deſtroy the Philiſtines, the remnant of the iſſue of Caphtor: and in like manner in Amos, the Philiſtines are ſaid to be the reliques of Caphtorim: [c] Have not I brought up Iſrael out of the land of Egypt, and the Philiſtines from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? ſo I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palæſtinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this converſion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a city directly weſt from Egypt, between Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia; but Kir in Aſia under the Aſſyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene; and ſo hath the Geneva. But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar tranſlation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Paleſtina, and not that [d] Cappadocia by the ſea Pontus in the north of Aſia the leſs. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Paleſtina, it is not certainly known. And ſure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the 2d of [e] Kings, that Teglatphalaſſer king of the Aſſyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damaſcus into Kir: and ſo Joſephus ſeems to underſtand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene Media ſuperior: for it was the manner and policy of the Aſſyrians to tranſplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Iſraelites, and other nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: becauſe the Syrians by the Aſſyrians were therein captived.

SECT. XV.

Of the iſſue of Sem.

† I.

Of Elim, Aſſur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

IT remaineth laſtly to ſpeak of the ſons of Sem, who were theſe:

[a] Baſil upon the 33*d* Pſalm. Jerome upon the 29*th of* Ezekiel. Book, Chap. vii. Sect. iii. † 5. [e] 2 Kings 16. 9.

[b] Jer. 47. 4. [c] Amos 9. 7. [d] Of which ſee in the ſecond

I. Alam,

1. Alam, or Elam.
2. Aſhur.
3. Arphaxad.
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

The poſterity of Sem, Moſes recounteth after the reſt: becauſe from them he proceedeth in order with the genealogy and ſtory of the Hebrews. For of Sem was Abraham deſcended.

Of theſe five ſons the ſcriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him and Aram, the reſt are barely ſpoken of by rehearſal of their names, ſaving that it may be gathered, that Aſſur (who was ſuppoſed to found Nineveh) was alſo ſaid to be the father of the Aſſyrians, whoſe iſſues of Cham inſtantly contended for the empire of the eaſt: which ſometimes the Aſſyrians, ſometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their princes. This is the common opinion, which alſo teacheth us, that all the eaſt parts of the world were peopled by Aſſur, Elam and Lud (ſaving India) which I believe Noah himſelf firſt inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Havilah the ſons of Joctan afterwards repaired. Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Aſiæ uſque ad oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; Theſe ſons of Sem (ſaith St. Jerome) held all thoſe regions from Euphrates to the Indian ocean.

Of [a] Elam came the Elamites, remembred, Acts ii. 9. and the princes of Perſia; which name then began to be out of uſe and loſt, when the Perſians became maſters of Babylonia: the eaſt Monarchy being eſtabliſhed in them. Some prophane writers diſtinguiſh Elam from Perſia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Suſa (which the ſcriptures call Suſan) in Elam was the king's ſeat of Perſia (witneſs Daniel viii. 2.) And I ſaw (ſaith he) in a viſion, and when I ſaw it, I was in the palace of Suſan, which is in the province of Elam. This city is embraced by the river Eulæus (according to [b] Ptolemy) in Daniel, Ulai: and ſeated in the border of Suſiana.

Aſhur (as moſt hiſtorians believe) the 2d ſon of Sem, was father of the Aſſyrians, who diſdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Nineveh, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we ſhall in due place diſprove that opinion. Every man's hand hath been in this ſtory, and therefore I ſhall not need herein to ſpeak much: for the Aſſyrians ſo often invaded and ſpoiled the Iſraelites, deſtroy'd their cities, and led them captives, as both in divine and human letters there is large and often mention of this nation.

But howſoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this empire, and honour this nation with ample dominion; yet was not the ſtate of the Aſſyrians any ſuch power, after ſuch time as Sardanapalus loſt the empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the powerfulleſt princes among them, had yet the mountain Taurus for the utmoſt of his dominion towards the north eaſt, and Syria bounded him towards the weſt, notwithſtanding thoſe vaunts of Senacherib in Iſaiah xxxvii. 11. Have the gods of the nations delivered them whom my fathers have deſtroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telaſſar. Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city Sepharvaim, Hena and Ivah? all theſe indeed were but petty kings of cities, and ſmall countries; as Haran, in Meſopotamia: Reſeph, in Palmyrena: Hamath, or Emath, in Iturea under Libanus: the iſle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this ſort. Yea Nabuchodonoſor, who was moſt powerful, before the conqueſt of Egypt had but Chaldea, Meſopotamia, and Syria, with Paleſtina and Phenicia parts thereof. But in this queſtion of Aſſur, I will ſpeak my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whoſe plantation I have omitted among the reſt of the Chuſites, becauſe he eſtabliſhed the firſt empire: from whom the moſt memorable ſtory of the world taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, ſaith S. Jerome, and Joſephus, but it muſt be thoſe Chaldeans about Ur: for the ſons of Cham poſſeſs'd the reſt. It is true that he was the father of the Hebrews: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the 4th ſon of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Aſia the leſs, is the common opinion, taken from Joſephus and St. Jerome; but I ſee not by what reaſon he was moved to ſtraggle thither from his friends.

† II.

Of Aram and his ſons.

Aram, the 5th and laſt ſon of Shem, was the parent of the Syrians: of which [c] Damaſcus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (ſaith [d] Euſebius out of Joſephus) which Syrus lived before Moſes was born; the ſame which others call the ſon of Apollo. Meſopotamia alſo being but a province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabaraiim, which is as much to ſay, as Syria duorum fluviorum, Syria compaſſed with two rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The ſcriptures call it Meſopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram, and the Greeks Meſopotamia ſimply.

[e] Ariſe and get thee to Padan Aram (ſaith Iſaac to Jacob) to the houſe of Bethuel thy mother's father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo alſo remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as theſe his own words converted witneſs. [f] Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipſi Syri Aramenios & Arameos vocant; thoſe which we call Syrians (ſaith he) themſelves call Aramenians and Arameans.

Againſt this opinion that Aram the ſon of Sem, was the father and denominator of the Syrians in general (and not only of thoſe in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Meſopotamia) ſome read Gen. xxii. 21. Kemuel, the father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemuel, the ſon of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to underſtand the word [Aram] here, not for the nation, but for the name of ſome one of note; the rather, becauſe in the hiſtory of Abraham and Iſaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's poſterity could be famous) we find Meſopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: ſometimes with Nabaraiim, and ſometimes of Padan, to diſtinguiſh it from another Aram, which (as it ſeems) then alſo was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. xxv. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be reſtrained to ſome part of Meſopotamia (to wit) to that part which Ptolemy calls Ancobaritis (ſo called from the river Chaboras, which dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiſcuous uſe of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabaraiim (which latter appellation queſtionleſs comprehends the whole Meſopotamia) may ſeem to refute this opinion: eſpecially ſeeing the ſignification of this appellation agreeth with the whole region. For it ſignifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this region: becauſe the two rivers (as it were) yoked together go along it. The reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two cities in Ptolemy, called Aphadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaborus, the other upon Euphrates.

The ſons of Aram were { Uz or Hus, Hul, Gether, and Meſch or Mes.

Uz or Hus inhabited about Damaſcus, and built that city, ſay Joſephus and [a] St. Jerome. But Toſtatus miſtaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who alſo followeth Joſephus, affirmeth that Abraham's ſteward Eliezer was the founder thereof; tho' it were likely that Hus, the eldeſt ſon of Aram dwelt near unto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a region of the ſame, adjoining to Arabia the deſart, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the prophet Jeremy: [b] Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edom that dwelleſt in the land of Hus. Hus therefore is ſeated beyond Jordan, in the eaſt region of Traconitis, adjoining to Baſan, having Batanea Gaulonitis, and the mountain Seir to the eaſt, Edrai to the ſouth, Damaſcus north, and Jordan weſt: having in it many cities and people, as may alſo be gathered out of Jeremy. [c] And all ſorts of people: and all the kings of the land of Hus. In this region dwelt Job, deſcended of Hus, the ſon of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (ſaith St. Jerome) and married Dinah the daughter of Jacob, ſaith Philo.

Hul the 2d ſon of Aram, St. Jerome makes the father of the Armenians: and Gether the 3d ſon, parent to the Artananians or Carians: which opinion (becauſe I find not where to ſet him) I do not diſprove, tho' I ſee no reaſon why Gether ſhould leave the fellowſhip of his own brethren, and dwell among ſtrangers in Aſia the leſs. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the deſart of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy ſetteth the city of Challe.

Gether (ſaith Joſephus) founded the Bactrians: but Joſephus gave all Noah's children feathers, to carry them far away in all haſte. For mine own opinion, I always keep the rule of neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) that Gether ſeated himſelf near his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the province of Caſſiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius alſo giveth to Mes or Meſch the north part of Syria, between Cilicia and Meſopotamia, near the mountain Maſius. The certainty of thoſe plantations can no otherwiſe be known than by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great region took name) planted his ſons in the ſame land about him: for he wanted no ſcope of territory for himſelf and them; neither then when the world was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reaſon to caſt them into the deſart parts of the world, ſo far aſunder. And as neceſſity and policy held them together for a while: ſo ambition (which began together with angels and men) inhabiting the hearts of their children ſet them aſunder. For altho' theſe ſons of Aram, and the ſons of the reſt of Noah's children, kept themſelves within the bounds of ſome one large kingdom; yet therein every one alſo ſought a province apart, and to themſelves; giving to the cities therein built, their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their poſterity: the uſe of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this ſort did the pride of the Spaniards in America caſt them into ſo many provinces: every one emulating and diſdaining the greatneſs of others, as they are thereby to this day ſubject to invaſion, expulſion, and deſtruction: ſo as (Nova Hiſpania, and Peru excepted, becauſe thoſe countries are unacceſſible to ſtrangers) an eaſy force will caſt them out of all the reſt.

Mes, the 4th ſon, is made the parent of the Mevnians: [d] of whom ſomething hath been ſpoken already. Arphaxad, the 3d ſon of Shem, begat Shelah and Heber. Heber had two ſons, Phaleg and Joctan: and in Phaleg's time was the earth divided.

§ III.

Of the diviſion of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the ſons of Heber, of the iſſue of Sem.

THE many people which at the diviſion (at Phaleg's birth) were then living, and the thorough plantation of all the eaſt part of the world (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the earth were divided at either. The Hebrews (ſaith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their chronicles) affirm that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was born in the year after the flood 101, and lived in all 239 years, which numbers added, make 340. And therefore was it ſo many years after the flood, ere the children of Noah ſevered themſelves. But to this opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make how in ſo few years as 101 (the time of Phaleg's birth) ſo many people could be increaſed; Pererius gives this anſwer, That if 70 perſons of the family of Jacob increaſed to 600000 fighting men in 215 years (beſides women, children, and impotent perſons) how much more is it likely, that ſo ſoon after the flood the children of Noah might in a ſhorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the bleſſing of God, Increaſe and multiply, and fill the earth? What ſtrength this anſwer hath, let others judge: for the children of Iſrael were 70, and had 215 years time: and the ſons of Noah were but three, and had but 101 years time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the diviſion, in memory thereof: as [e] Joſephus and St. Auguſtine, who reaſon in this manner. If the diviſion were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48th of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12 years before his birth) then was the diviſion 38 years after Ninus, who governed 52 years: in the 43d year of whoſe reign Abraham was born. But when Ninus began to rule the [f] Aſſyrians 80 years before this diviſion (as this diviſion is placed by the Hebrews, Jerome and Chryſoſtom) then was the earth ſo peopled in all the eaſt and northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time ſince. For Ninus aſſociated to himſelf Ariæus king of Arabia, a people who at that time (ſaith Diodorus Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis præſtabant, exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, ſubdued many cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the king thereof, with his wife and ſeven children; vanquiſhed all thoſe regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phenicians, the kingdoms of Syria, and all the nations of Perſia, to the Hyrcanian ſea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Cteſias) againſt Zoroaſter, and others: and Zoroaſter on the other ſide, who made reſiſtance with 400000, prove it ſufficiently, that if the diviſion had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diviſion at that time at all. For ſome of them were ſo ill ſatisfied with their partitions, as they ſought to be maſters of all; and greater armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit, that if the diviſion had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then ſufficient numbers born to fill the earth: it was never meant that the earth could be filled every where at the very inſtant, but by time and degrees: and ſurely whatſoever men's opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the diviſion of tongues and of men muſt go near together with the ceaſing of the work at Babel: and that the enterpriſe of Babel was left off inſtantly upon the confuſion of languages, where followed the execution of the diviſion; and ſo neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101 after the flood, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or 10 years after he arrived, ſaith Beroſus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the etymology of whoſe name ſignifieth diviſion) muſt have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this confuſion and partition. To this objection it may be anſwered, that the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the ſcriptures: for Jacob was called Iſrael after he had wreſtled with the angel; Abraham was firſt Abram, and Edom Eſau; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this diviſion had his firſt name upon this accident changed, it is moſt probable.

And laſtly, whereas the Hebrews, St. Jerome and Chryſoſtom account Heber for a great prophet, if that by giving his ſon the name of Phaleg, he foretold the diviſion which followed. To this I ſay, I do not find that Heber deſerved any ſuch honour, if he had thereupon ſo called his ſon: for diviſion and diſperſion followeth increaſe of people of neceſſity; and this prophecy (if any ſuch had been) might alſo have reference to the diviſion, which afterwards fell among the Hebrews themſelves.

But if we give a reaſonable time to the building of the tower and city of Babel, in which time many people (by reaſon and by demonſtrative proof) might be increas'd: and that upon the fall thereof the confuſion and diviſion followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monſtrous.

† IV.

Of the ſons of Joctan, the other ſon of Heber.

The ſons of Joctan were:

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Aſamath, or Chatzar.
4. Jare, or Jaraah, or Jerath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uxal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havila, or Chavila, and
13. Jobab.

ALL thoſe ſons of Joctan, according to St. Jerome, dwelled in the eaſt parts of the world, or India, even from the river Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of thoſe thirteen ſons cannot be gathered out of the ſcriptures, the words of Moſes being general. [a] And their dwelling was from Meſha as thou goeſt unto Sephar a mount in the eaſt. Of all theſe thirteen ſons, there were only three memorable, to wit, Sheba, Ophir and Havilah. Concerning whoſe names, to avoid confuſion, it is to be obſerved, that among the ſons of Chuſh, two of them had alſo the names of Seba and Havilah. Abraham had alſo a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the ſon of Chuſh, and Sheba the ſon of Rhegma his nephew, we have left in Arabia Fœlix: and Havilah the ſon of Chuſh upon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as ſome have thought, the father of the Sabeans in Perſia: of which nations Dionyſius de orbis ſitu maketh mention. Primum Sabæi; poſt hos ſunt Paſſagardæ, prope vero hos ſunt Taſci: The firſt are Sabeans; after theſe be Paſſagardæ; and near theſe the Taſci. And whereas it is written: [b] But unto the ſons of the concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and ſent them away from Iſaac his ſon (while he yet lived) eaſtward to the eaſt country: hereupon it is ſuppoſed, that this Saba the ſon of Abraham wandered into Perſia: for Perſia was accounted the furthermoſt eaſt country in reſpect of Judea; which alſo [c] Ovid ſetteth under the ſun-riſing. Yet ſeeing the reſt of Abraham's ſons ſeated themſelves on the borders of Judea, I rather chuſe to leave Saba the ſon of Abraham in Arabia the deſart, where Ptolemy ſetteth a city of that name.

But Saba the ſon of Joctan, the ſon of Heber, as I conceive, inhabited India it ſelf. For [d] Dionyſius Afer in his Periegeſis, or deſcription of the world, which he wrote in Greek verſe, among the regions of India findeth a nation called the Sabæi. Taxilus hos inter medios habitatque Sabæus; In the midſt of theſe dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, ſaith this Dionyſius.

† V.

Of Ophir one of Joctan's ſons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

OPHIR alſo was an inhabitant of the Eaſt-Indies, and, as St. Jerome underſtands it, in one of the iſlands plentiful with gold, which are now known by the name of Molucca. Joſephus underſtands Ophir to be one of thoſe great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Cherſoneſi, or Peninſulæ; of which there are two very notorious, Callecut and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an iſland, as St. Jerome doth, but he ſets it at the head-land of Malacca: but Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther eaſt.

Arias Montanus out of 2 Chronicles iii. 6. gathers, that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the weſt ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the ſouth ſea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words in 2 Chronicles are theſe: And he overlaid the houſe with precious ſtones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembred by Moſes in the deſcription of Paradiſe: [e] And the gold of that land is good: finding a town in Characene a province of Suſiana called Barbatia, ſo called, as he thinks, by corruption for Parvaim: from whence thoſe kings ſubjected by David, brought this gold, with which they preſented him; and which David preſerved for the enriching of the temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men before Montanus and Pleſſis, who alſo took Ophir for Peru. And that this queſtion may be a ſubject of no farther diſpute, it is very true, that there is no region in the world of that name: ſure I am, at leaſt, that America hath none, no not any city, village or mountain ſo called. But when Francis Piſarro firſt diſcovered thoſe lands to the ſouth of Panama, arriving in that region which Atabaliba commanded, a prince of magnificence, riches and dominion inferior to none, ſome of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by ſigns, as they could, the name of the country, and pointing with their hand athwart a river, or torrent, or brook that ran by, the Indians anſwered Peru, which was either the name of that brook, or of water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly underſtood them, ſet it down in the diurnal of their enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent over to Charles the emperour, all that weſt part of America to the ſouth of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever ſince, as divers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Jeſuite, in his natural and moral hiſtory of the Indies, confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies, called Jucatan, took that name of Joctan, who, as he ſuppoſeth, navigated from the utmoſt eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Jucatan, is nothing elſe in the language of that country, but [What is that?] or [What ſay you?] For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning, one of the ſavages anſwered Jucatan, which is, What ask you? or, What ſay you. The like happened touching Paria, a mountainous country on the ſouth ſide of Trinidado and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring, as all men do, the names of thoſe new regions which they diſcovered, pointed to the hills afar off, one of the people anſwered, Paria, which is as much to ſay, as high hills or mountains. For as Paria begins that marvellous ledge of mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan; from eight degrees of north latitude to fifty two of ſouth; and ſo hath that country ever ſince retained the name of Paria.

The ſame happened among the Engliſh, which I ſent under Sir Richard Greeneville to inhabit Virginia. For when ſome of my people asked the name of that country, one of the ſavages anſwered, Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay, as, You wear good cloaths, or gay cloaths. The ſame happened to the Spaniard in asking the name of the iſland Trinidado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that ſelf place which the ſea incompaſſed, they anſwered Caeri, which ſignifieth an iſland. And in this manner have many places newly diſcovered been intitled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we muſt leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabouts ſuch an iſland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now altho' there may be found gold in Arabia it ſelf (towards Perſia) in Havilah, now Suſiana, and all along that Eaſt-Indian ſhore; yet the greateſt plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain iſlands planted by the Spaniards from the Eaſt-Indies. And by the length of the paſſage which Solomon's ſhips made from the Red ſea (which were three years in going and coming) it ſeems they went to the uttermoſt eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeed theſe that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that navigation in two years, and ſometimes leſs: and Solomon's ſhips went not above a tenth part of this our courſe from hence. But we muſt conſider, that they evermore kept the coaſt, and crept by the ſhores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the uſe of the compaſs was known, it was impoſſible to navigate athwart the ocean; and therefore Solomon's ſhips could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needful for the Spaniards themſelves, had it not been for the plenty of gold in the Eaſt-India iſlands, far above the mines of any one place of America, to ſail every year from the weſt part of America thither, and there to have ſtrongly planted, and inhabited the richeſt of thoſe iſlands: wherein they have built a city called Manilia. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the eaſt, to have ſped worſe: neither could he navigate from the eaſt to the weſt in thoſe days, whereas he had no coaſt to have guided him.

Toſtatus alſo gathereth a phantaſtical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a country, whoſe mountains of gold are kept by griffins: which mountains Solinus affirmeth to be in Scythia Aſiatica, in theſe words. Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, griphes tenent univerſa, alites ferociſſimæ, Arimaſpi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas theſe countries abound in gold, and rich ſtone, the griffins defend the one and the other, a kind of fowl the fierceſt of all other; with which griffins a nation of people, called Arimaſpi, make war. Theſe Arimaſpi are ſaid to have been men with one eye only, like unto the Cyclopes of Sicilia; of which Cyclopes Herodotus and Ariſteus make mention: and ſo doth Lucan in his third book, and [a] Valerius Flaccus, and [b] Diodorus Siculus in the ſtory of Alexander Macedon. But for mine own opinion, I believe none of them. And for theſe Arimaſpi, I take it, that this name ſignifying one-eyed was firſt given them by reaſon that they uſed to wear a vizard of defence, with one ſight in the middle to ſerve both eyes; and not that they had by nature any ſuch defect. But Solinus borroweth theſe things out of Pliny, who ſpeaks of ſuch a nation in the extreme north, at a place called Giſolitron, or the cave of the north-eaſt wind. For the reſt, as all fables were commonly grounded upon ſome true ſtories, or other things done, ſo might theſe tales of the griffins receive this moral. That if thoſe men, which fight againſt ſo many dangerous paſſages for gold, or other riches of this world, had their perfect ſenſes, and were not deprived of half their eye-ſight (at leaſt of the eye of right reaſon and underſtanding) they would content themſelves with a quiet and moderate eſtate; and not ſubject themſelves to famine, corrupt air, violent heat, and cold, and to all ſorts of miſerable diſeaſes. And tho' this fable be feigned in this place, yet if ſuch a tale were told of ſome other places of the world, where wild beaſts or ſerpents defend mountains of gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the world, eſpecially in America, many high and impaſſable mountains which are very rich and full of Gold, inhabited only by tygers, lions, and other ravenous and cruel beaſts: unto which if any man aſcend (except his ſtrength be very great) he ſhall be ſure to find the ſame war, which the Arimaſpi make againſt the griffins: not that the one or other had any ſenſe of the gold, or ſeek to defend that metal, but being diſquieted, or made afraid of themſelves or their young ones, they grow inraged and adventurous. In like ſort it may be ſaid that the Alegartos, which the Egyptians call the Crocodiles, defend thoſe pearls which lie in the lakes of the inland: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the pearl, yet they find ſavour in the

Of Havilah the ſon of Joctan, who alſo paſſed into the Eaſt-Indies : and of Meſha and Sepher named in the bordering of the families of Joctan : with a concluſion of this diſcourſe touching the plantation of the world.

OF Havilah the ſon of Joctan there is nothing elſe to be ſaid, but that the general opinion is, that he alſo inhabited in the Eaſt-Indies in the continent, from which Ophir paſs'd into the iſlands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is ſaid to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the Eaſt-Indies, which took name of Havilah the ſon of Joctan : but Havilah, which Piſon compaſſeth, was ſo called of Havilah, the ſon of Chuſh, as is formerly proved by this place of ſcripture : [a] Saul ſmote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comeſt to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul ever made war in the Eaſt-Indies, no man hath ſuſpected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen ſons of Joctan, theſe three Saba, Havilah, and Ophir ; tho' at the firſt ſeated by their brethren about the hill Maſius, or Meſh, Gen. x. 30. to wit, between Cilicia and Meſopotamia ; yet at length either themſelves or their iſſues removed into the Eaſt-Indies, leaving the other families of Joctan, to fill the countries of their firſt plantation, which the ſcripture defines to have been from Meſh unto Sephar. And altho' St. Jerome takes Meſh to be a region of the Eaſt-Indies, and Sephar a mountain of the ſame (which mountain Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) thoſe fancies are far beyond my underſtanding. For the word [eaſt] in the ſcriptures, where it hath reference to Judea, is never farther extended than into Perſia. But Meſch is that part of the mountain of Maſius in the north of Meſopotamia, out of which the river Chaboras ſpringeth, which runneth by Charran : and in the ſame region we alſo find for Sephar (remembred by Moſes) Sipphara by Ptolemy, ſtanding to the eaſt of the mountain Maſius ; from whence Joctan having many ſons, ſome of them might paſs into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in proceſs of time.

The other faſhion of planting I underſtand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reaſon and poſſibility. And that this mountain in the eaſt was no farther off than in thoſe regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the ſcripture where the ſame phraſe is uſed : as in Numbers xxiii. 7. Balac the king of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountain of the eaſt ; which was from the eaſt part of Meſopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Meſopotamia (witneſs this place of Deuteronomy xxiii. 4.) Becauſe they hired Balaam the ſon of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharaiim, to curſe thee : for Aram Naharaiim was Syria Fluviorum, which is Meſopotamia, as aforeſaid.

This plantation of the world after the flood doth beſt agree, as to me it ſeems, with all the places of ſcripture compared together. And theſe be the reports of reaſon and probable conjecture ; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have choſen to go after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or modern. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the diſcovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himſelf hath diſguis'd all things, ſo the factious and hireling hiſtorians of all ages (eſpecially of theſe latter times) have, by their many volumes of untrue reports, left honour without a monument, and virtue without memory : and inſtead thereof, have erected ſtatues and trophies to thoſe, whom the darkeſt forgetfulneſs ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And altho' the length and diſſolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the world's firſt planters after the flood (I mean the greateſt number and moſt part of them) yet all the footſteps of antiquity (as appears by that which hath been ſpoken) are not quite worn out nor overgrown : for Babylon hath to this day the ſound of Babel ; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which city the eldeſt ſon of Canaan gave name ; ſo hath Cilicia Tharſis ; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other nations, have preſerved from the death of forgetfulneſs ſome ſigns of their firſt founders and true parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and eſtabliſhing of Government.

SECT. I.

Of the proceeding from the firſt government under the eldeſt of families to regal, and from regal abſolute to regal tempered with laws.

IT followeth now to intreat how the world began to receive rule and government, which (while it had ſcarcity of people) underwent no other dominion than paternity and elderſhip. For the fathers of nations were then as kings, and the eldeſt of families as princes. Hereof it came, that the word [elder] was always uſed both for the magiſtrate, and for thoſe of age and gravity : the ſame bearing one ſignification almoſt in all languages. For in Numbers xi. God commanded Moſes to gather together 70 of the elders of the people, and governours over them : the Hebrew bearing the ſame ſenſe, which the Latin word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Suſannah, Then the aſſembly believed them as thoſe that were the elders and judges of the people. And ſo in the words of thoſe falſe judges and witneſſes to Daniel, Shew it unto us, ſeeing God hath given thee the office of an elder. Demoſthenes uſeth the ſame word for the magiſtrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato, giveth two other reaſons for this appellation : Apud Lacedæmonios qui ampliſſimum magiſtratum gerunt, ut ſunt, ſic etiam appellantur Senes : Among the Lacedemonians the chief magiſtrates, as they are, ſo are they called Eldermen : and again, Ratio & prudentia niſi eſſent in ſenibus non ſummum concilium majores noſtri appellâſſent Senatum ; If reaſon and adviſement were not in old men, our anceſtors had never called the higheſt council by the name of a ſenate.

But tho' theſe reaſons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this name of [elders] for governors or counſellors of ſtate, there is a ſign that the firſt governors were the fathers of families ; and under them the eldeſt ſons. And from thence did the French, Italian and Spaniard, take the word [Signor] and out of it [Seignoury] for lordſhip and dominion : ſignifying, according to Loyſeau, puiſſance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignoury, Seneca makes two : the one, Poteſtas aut imperium, Power or command : the other, Proprietas aut dominium, Propriety or maſterſhip :

the correlative of the one is the ſubject, of the other the ſlave. Ad Cæſarem, ſaith he, poteſtas omnium pertinet, ad ſingulos proprietas; Ceſar hath power over all, and every man proprietor in his own. And again, Cæſar omnia imperio poſſidet, ſinguli dominio; Ceſar holdeth all in his power, and every man poſſeſſeth his own. But as men and vice began abundantly to increaſe, ſo obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent ſeed ſeldom ripeneth) being exceedingly overſhadowed with pride and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the ſoft weapons of paternal perſuaſions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the original and firſt giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to reſiſt the firſt inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to conſtrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were only guided and ſteered by their own fancies, and toſs'd to and fro' on the tempeſtuous ſeas of the world, while wiſdom was ſevered from power, and ſtrength from charity; [a] Neceſſity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wiſe and fooliſh underſtand at once, that the eſtate of reaſonable men would become far more miſerable than that of beaſts, and that a general flood of confuſion would a ſecond time overflow them, did they not by a general obedience to order and dominion prevent it. For the mighty, who truſted in their own ſtrengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themſelves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. Inſomuch, that licentious diſorder (which ſeemed to promiſe a liberty upon the firſt acquaintance) proved upon a better trial, no leſs perilous than an unendurable bondage.

Theſe arguments by neceſſity propounded, and by reaſon maintained and confirmed, perſuaded all nations which the heavens cover, to ſubject themſelves to a maſter, and to magiſtracy in ſome degree. Under which government, as the change (which brought with it leſs evil, than the former miſchiefs) was generally pleaſing: ſo time (making all men wiſe that obſerve it) found ſome imperfection and corroſive in this cure. And therefore the ſame neceſſity which invented, and the ſame reaſon which approved ſoveraign power, bethought it ſelf of certain equal rules, in which dominion (in the beginning boundleſs) might alſo diſcern her own limits. For before the invention of laws, private affections in ſupreme rulers, made their own fancies both their treaſurers and hangmen: meaſuring by this yard, and weighing in this balance both good and evil.

For as wiſdom in elderſhip preceded the rule of kings, ſo the will of kings forewent the inventions of laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not governed by any other laws than the wills of princes. Hereof it followed, that when kings left to be good, neither did thoſe mens virtues value them, which were not fancied by their kings, nor thoſe mens vices deform them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love ſees one while too much, another while ſtark nothing. Hence it came to paſs, that after a few years (for direction and reſtraint of royal power) laws were eſtabliſhed: and that goverment which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even balance ſupreme power and common right) acquired the title of regal; the other (which had it not) was known for tyrannical: the one God eſtabliſhed in favour of his people; the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this regal authority, princes, as they were choſen for their virtues only, ſo did they meaſure their powers by a great deal of moderation. And therefore (ſaith Fabius Pictor) [b] Principes, quia juſti erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dii & dicti; Princes, becauſe they were juſt and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods.

And tho' (ſpeaking humanly) the beginning of empire may be aſcribed to reaſon and neceſſity; yet it was God himſelf that firſt kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they ſaw that they could not live and be preſerved without a ruler and conductor: God himſelf by his eternal providence having ordained kings; and the law of nature leaders and rulers over others. For the very bees have their prince, the deer their leaders; and cranes (by order impoſed) watch for their own ſafety. [c] The moſt High beareth rule over the kingdoms of men; and appointeth over it whomſoever he pleaſeth. [d] By me, ſaith Wiſdom, ſpoken by the Son of God) kings reign; by me princes rule; and it is God (ſaith [e] Daniel) that ſetteth up kings, and taketh away kings: and that this power is given from God, Chriſt himſelf witneſſeth, ſpeaking to Pilate, [f] Thou couldeſt have no power at all againſt me except it were given thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold juſtice that the world hath been governed from the beginning, to wit, by a juſtice natural: by which the parents and elders of families governed their children, and nephews, and families, in which government the obedience was called natural piety: again, by a juſtice divine, drawn from the laws and ordinances of God; and the obedience hereunto was called conſcience: and laſtly, by a juſtice civil, begotten by both the former; and the obedience to this we call duty. That by theſe three thoſe of the eldeſt times were commanded; and that the rule in general was paternal, it is moſt evident: for Adam being lord over his own children, inſtructed them in the ſervice of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought oblations before God, as they had been taught by their parent, the father of mankind.

SECT. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of government with their oppoſites: and of the degrees of human ſociety.

WHAT other policy was exerciſed, or ſtate founded after ſuch time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the flood, it cannot be certainly known, tho' it ſeems by probable conjecture, that the ſame was not without kings in that firſt age: it being poſſible that many princes of the Egyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the general flood; and very likely, that the cruel oppreſſions in that age proceeded from ſome tyranny in government, or from ſome rougher form of rule, than the paternal.

[g] Beroſus aſcribeth the rule of the world in thoſe days to the giants of Libanus, who maſtered (ſaith he) all nations from the ſun-riſing to the ſun-ſet. But in the ſecond age of the world, and after ſuch time as the rule of elderſhip failed, three ſeveral ſorts of government were in ſeveral times eſtabliſhed among men, according to the divers natures of places and people.

The firſt, the moſt ancient, moſt general, and moſt approved, was the government of one, ruling by juſt laws, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is oppoſed, being alſo a ſole and abſolute rule, exerciſed according to the will of the commander, mander, without reſpect or obſervation of the laws of God or men. For a lawful prince or magiſtrate (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the keeper of right and equity: and of this condition ought every magiſtrate to be, according to the rule of God's word. [a] Judges and officers ſhalt thou make thee in thy cities: and theſe ſhall judge the people with righteous judgment.

The ſecond government is of divers principal perſons eſtabliſhed by order, and ruling by laws, called Ariſtocracy, or Optimatum poteſtas; to which Oligarchy (or the particular faction and uſurpation of a few great ones) is oppoſed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a ſtate popular (or government of the people) called Democratia, to which is oppoſed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjuſt ruling of the confuſed multitude, ſeditiouſly ſwaying the ſtate, contrary to their own laws and ordinances. Theſe three kinds of government are briefly expreſs'd by Tholoſanus: Unius, paucorum, & multorum; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy ſince the ſecond increaſe of mankind, the ſame grew in this ſort: firſt of all, every father, or eldeſt of the family, gave laws to his own iſſues; and to the people from him and them increaſed. Theſe, as they were multiply'd into many houſholds (man by nature loving ſociety) joined their cottages together in one common field or village, which the Latins call Vicus, of the Greek οἶκος, which ſignifieth a houſe, or of the word [Via] becauſe it hath divers ways and paths leading to it. And as the firſt houſe grew into a village, ſo the village into that which is called Pagus (being a ſociety of divers villages) ſo called of the Greek πήγη, which ſignifieth a fountain: becauſe many people (having their habitations not far aſunder) drank of one ſpring or ſtream of water. To this word the Engliſh hundreds, or (as ſome think) ſhires anſwereth not unfitly.

But as men and impiety began to gather ſtrength, and as emulation and pride between the races of the one and the other daily increaſed: ſo both to defend themſelves from outrage, and to preſerve ſuch goods as they had gathered, they began to join and ſet together divers of their villages, invironing them firſt with banks and ditches, and afterwards with walls: which being ſo compaſſed were then called Oppida; either ab opponenda ſe haſtibus, becauſe walls were oppoſed againſt enemies, or ab opibus, becauſe thither they gathered their riches for ſafety and defence: as alſo they were called Urbes, ab orbe; becauſe when they were to build a city, they made a circle with a plough (ſaith Varro) therewith meaſuring and compaſſing the ground which they went to incloſe or fortify. And altho' Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs ſignified no other than the very walls and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the citizens, inhabiting therein: ſo called of Civis; and that, ab eo quod multitudo coivit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within theſe walls are not properly citizens, but only ſuch as are called free-men; who bearing proportionably the charge of the city, may by turns become officers and magiſtrates thereof: the reſt go under the name of ſubjects, tho' citizens by the ſame general name of ſubjects are alſo known. For every citizen is alſo a ſubject, but not every ſubject a citizen: perhaps alſo ſome citizen (as the chief magiſtrate, if he be to be termed one of the citizens) is no ſubject; but of this we need not ſtand to inquire. The word [magiſtrate] is taken, a magiſtro, from a maſter, and the word [maſter] from the adverb magis (as alſo magiſteria, precepts of art) or elſe from the Greek word [megiſtos:] and ſo the Greeks call them megiſtanes, whom the Latins call magnates or magiſtratus.

The office and duty of every magiſtrate Ariſtotle hath written in few words: [b] A magiſtrate or prince, ſaith he, is the keeper of right and equity; but the ſame is beſt taught by St. Paul, who expreſſeth both the cauſe efficient and final, that is, by whom magiſtrates and princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. [c] A magiſtrate is the miniſter of God for thy wealth; but if thou do evil, fear: for he beareth not the ſword for nought. For he is the miniſter of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He alſo teacheth in verſe 1, 2. That every ſoul ought to be ſubject to the higher powers, becauſe they are by God ordained; and that whoſoever reſiſteth that power, reſiſteth God, the giver and fountain thereof: and ſhall not only be therefore ſubject to the judgment and condemnation of man, but of God: For ye muſt be ſubject, ſaith he, not becauſe of wrath only, but alſo for conſcience ſake. ver. 5.

The examples are not to be numbred of God's puniſhments upon thoſe that have reſiſted authority, by God ordained and eſtabliſhed. Neither ought any ſubject therefore to reſiſt the power of kings, becauſe they may be taxed with injuſtice or cruelty: for it pleaſeth God ſometimes to puniſh his people by a tyrannous hand: and the commandment of obedience is without diſtinction. The prophets and Chriſt himſelf ſubjected themſelves to the power of magiſtracy. Chriſt commanded that all due to Ceſar ſhould be given unto him: and he pay'd tribute for himſelf and Peter. [d] Jeremy commanded the Iſraelites (even thoſe that were captives under heathen kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So [e] Abraham pray'd for Abimelech; and Jacob bleſſed the king of Egypt. And it is acceptable in the ſight of our Saviour, ſaith Paul, that ye make ſupplications and prayers for kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for ſuch kings as were idolatrous, much more for Chriſtian kings and magiſtrates. And ſo much did St. Chryſoſtom in his homily to the people, prefer monarchical government, as he rather commended the rule of kings (tho' tyrants) than that they ſhould be wanting: Præſtat regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; better a tyrannous king, than no king: To which alſo Tacitus ſubſcribeth: Præſtat (ſaith Tacitus in the firſt of his hiſtory) ſub malo principe eſſe, quam nullo; It is better to have a bad prince than none at all. And be they good kings (which is generally preſuppoſed) then is there no liberty more ſafe, than to ſerve them: Neque enim libertas tutior ulla eſt, ſaith Claudian, quam domino ſervire bono; No liberty, ſaith he, more ſafe for us than to be ſervants to the virtuous. And certainly howſoever it may be diſputed, yet is it ſafer to live under one tyrant, than under 100000 tyrants: under a wiſe man that is cruel, than under the fooliſh and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Ageſilaus anſwered a citizen of Sparta that deſired an alteration of the government, that kind of rule which a man would diſdain in his own houſe, were very unfit to govern great regions by.

Laſtly, as many fathers erected many cottages for their many children: and as (for the reaſon before remembered) many houſholds joined themſelves together, and made villages; many villages made cities: ſo when theſe cities and citizens joined together,

together, and eſtabliſhed laws by conſent, aſſociating themſelves under one governor and government, they ſo joined were called a commonwealth: the ſame being ſometimes governed by kings; ſometimes by magiſtrates; ſometimes by the people themſelves.

SECT. III.

Of the good government of the firſt kings.

NOW this firſt age after the flood, and after ſuch time as the people were increaſed, and the families became ſtrong, and diſperſed into ſeveral parts of the world, was by ancient hiſtorians called golden: ambition and covetouſneſs being as then but green, and newly grown up, the ſeeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the law of nature was the rule of man's life, they then ſought for no larger territory than themſelves could compaſs and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than ſufficient to defend them from cold and tempeſt: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curioſity of diet, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel than to cover them from the cold, the rain and the ſun.

And ſure if we underſtand by that age (which was called golden) the ancient ſimplicity of our forefathers, this name may then truly be caſt upon thoſe elder times: but if it be taken otherwiſe, then, whether the ſame may be attributed more to any one time than to another (I mean to one limited time, and none elſe) it may be doubted. For good and golden kings make good and golden ages; and all times have brought forth of both ſorts. And as the infancy of empire (when princes play'd their prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the golden age: ſo may the beginning of all princes times be truly called golden: for be it that men affect honour, it is then beſt purchaſed; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deſervings have commonly the leaſt impediments: and if ever liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the ſame is then beſt warranted both by policy and example. But age and time do not only harden and ſhrink the openeſt and moſt jovial hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth princes torn eſtates before their eyes, and withal perſuadeth them to compaſſionate themſelves. And altho' there be no kings under the ſun whoſe means are anſwerable unto other men's deſires; yet ſuch as value all things by their own reſpects, do no ſooner find their appetites unanſwered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times injurious and iron. And as this falleth out in the reign of every king; ſo doth it in the life of every man, if his days be many: for our younger years are our golden age; which being eaten up by time, we praiſe thoſe ſeaſons which our youth accompanied: and indeed the grievous alterations in our ſelves, and the pains and diſeaſes which never part from us but at the grave, make the times ſeem ſo differing and diſpleaſing: eſpecially the quality of man's nature being alſo ſuch, as it adoreth and extolleth the paſſages of the former, and condemneth the preſent ſtate how juſt ſoever. [a] Fit humanæ malignitatis vitio, ut ſemper vetera in laude, præſentia in faſtidio ſint; It comes to paſs, ſaith Tacitus, by the vice of our malignity, that we always extol the time paſt, and hold the preſent faſtidious. For it is one of the errors of way-ward age: Quod ſint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praiſers of forepaſſed times, forgetting this advice of Solomon: [b] Say not then, why is it that the former days were better than theſe? for thou doſt not inquire wiſely of this thing: to which purpoſe Seneca, Majores noſtri queſti ſunt, & nos querimur, poſteri querentur, everſos eſſe mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum, & in omne nefas labi; Our anceſtors have complained, we do complain, our children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedneſs doth reign, and all things grow worſe and worſe, and fall into all evil. Theſe are the uſual diſcourſes of age and misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arnobius: [c] Nova res quandoque vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus quibus cœpit nova fuit & repentina; Whatſoever is new, in time ſhall be made old: and the ancienteſt things when they took beginning were alſo new and ſudden. Wherefore not to ſtand in much admiration of theſe firſt times, which the diſcontentments of preſent times have made golden, this we may ſet down for certain, that as it was the virtue of the firſt kings, which, after God, gave them crowns: ſo the love of their people thereby purchaſed, held the ſame crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of ſubjects to princes: ſo (relatively) he gave the care and juſtice of kings to the ſubjects; having reſpect, not only to the kings themſelves, but even to the meaneſt of his creatures. [d] Nunquam particulari bono ſervit omne bonum; The infinite goodneſs of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the ſmall and the great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general love it is, that princes hold a general obedience: for Poteſtas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum; All human power is rooted in the will or diſpoſitions of men.

SECT. IV.

Of the beginning of nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without virtue.

AND with this ſupreme rule and kingly authority began alſo other degrees and differences among ſubjects. For princes made election of others by the ſame rule, by which themſelves were choſen; unto whom they gave place, truſt and power. From which employments and offices ſprung thoſe titles, and thoſe degrees of honour, which have continued from age to age to theſe days. [e] But this nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the ſucceſſion of blood, but to ſucceſſion of virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Tho' at length it was ſufficient for thoſe, whoſe parents were advanced, to be known for the ſons of ſuch fathers: and ſo there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excel, upon whom glory or worldly nobility neceſſarily deſcended: Yet hereof had nobility denomination in the beginning, that ſuch as excelled others in virtue were ſo called: Hinc dictus nobilis, quaſi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after ſuch time as the deſerved honour of the father was given in reward to his poſterity, St. Jerome judged of the ſucceſſion in this manner: Nihil aliud video in nobilitate appetendum, niſi quod nobiles quadam neceſſitate conſtringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I ſee no other thing to be affected in nobility, than that noblemen are by a kind of neceſſity bound not to degenerate from the virtue of their anceſtors. For if nobility be virtus & antiquæ divitiæ, virtue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all thoſe things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like,

[a] Tacit. in Dial. de Orat. [b] Eccleſ. 7. 10. [c] Arnob. l. 2. [d] Wiſd. 6. 7. [e] Verus nobilis non naſcitur, ſed fit.

do no otherwiſe define nobility, than the word animal alone doth define a reaſonable man. Or if honour, according to L. Vives, be a witneſs of virtue and well-doing: and nobility, after Plutarch, the continuance of virtue in a race or lineage: then are thoſe, of whom virtue is extinguiſhed, but like unto painted and printed papers, which ignorant men worſhip inſtead of Chriſt, our Lady, and other Saints: men, in whom there remain but the dregs and vices of ancient virtue: flowers and herbs, which by change of ſoil and want of manuring are turned to weeds. For what is found praiſe-worthy in thoſe waters, which had their beginning out of pure fountains, if in all the reſt of their courſe they run foul, filthy, and defiled? [a] Ex terra fertili producitur aliquando cicuta venenoſa, & ex terra ſterili pretioſum aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariſeth ſometimes poiſoning henbane: and out of barren ſoil precious gold. For as all things conſiſt of matter and form, ſo doth Charron (in his chapter of nobility) call the race and lineage but the matter of nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be virtue and quality, profitable to the commonweal. For he is truly and entirely noble, who maketh a ſingular profeſſion of publick virtue, ſerving his prince and country, and being deſcended of parents and anceſtors that have done the like. And altho' that nobility, which the ſame author calleth perſonal (the ſame which our ſelves acquire by our virtue and well deſervings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by deſcent, and alſo perſonal; yet if virtue be wanting to the natural, then is the perſonal and acquired nobility by many degrees to be preferred: for, ſaith Charron, this honour, to wit, by deſcent, may light upon ſuch an one, as in his own nature is a true villain. There is alſo a third nobility which he calleth nobility in parchment, bought with ſilver or favour: and theſe be indeed but honours of affection, which kings with the change of their fancies wiſh they knew well how to wipe off again. But ſurely if we had as much ſenſe of our degenerating in worthineſs, as we have of vanity in deriving our ſelves of ſuch and ſuch parents, we ſhould rather know ſuch nobility (without virtue) to be ſhame and diſhonour, than nobleneſs, and glory to vaunt thereof. [b] What calamity is wanting (ſaith Bernard) to him that is born in ſin, of a potſhare body and barren mind? for (according to the ſame father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris hujus, & male coronatæ nitorem gloriæ, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill crowned glory, that then thou may'ſt conſider thy ſelf nakedly: for thou cameſt naked out of thy mother's womb. Cameſt thou thence with thy mitre, or gliſtering with jewels, or garniſhed with ſilks, or adorned with feathers, or ſtuffed with gold? if thou ſcatter and blow away all theſe by thy conſideration as certain morning clouds, which do or will ſoon paſs over, thou ſhalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miſerable man, and bluſhing becauſe he is naked, and weeping becauſe he is born, and repining becauſe he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and duſt: which if [c] thou doſt not believe (ſaith St. Chryſoſtom) look into the ſepulchres and monuments of thy anceſtors, and they ſhall eaſily perſuade thee by their own example, that thou art duſt and dirt: ſo that if man ſeem more noble and beautiful than duſt, this proceedeth not from the diverſity of his nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

[d] For true nobility ſtandeth in the trade
Of virtuous life; not in the fleſhly line:
For blood is brute, but gentry is divine.

And howſoever the cuſtom of the world have made it good, that honours be caſt by birth upon unworthy iſſues: yet Solomon (as wiſe as any king) reprehendeth the ſame in his fellow princes. [e] There is an evil (ſaith he) that I have ſeen under the ſun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth. Folly is ſet in great excellency.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus and Ninus: and of memorable things about thoſe times.

SECT. I.

That Nimrod was the firſt after the flood that reigned like ſoveraign lord: and that his beginning ſeemeth to have been of juſt authority.

THE firſt of all that reigned, as ſoveraign lord after the flood, was Nimrod, the ſon of Chuſh, diſtinguiſhed by Moſes from the reſt (according to St. Auguſtine) in one of theſe two reſpects: either for his eminency, and becauſe he was the firſt of fame, and that took on him to command others: or elſe in that he was begotten by Chuſh, after his other children were alſo become fathers; and of a later time than ſome of his grandchildren and nephews. Howſoever, ſeeing Moſes in expreſs words calleth Nimrod the ſon of Chuſh, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have no reſpect. This empiry of Nimrod, both the fathers, and many later writers, call tyrannical: the ſame beginning in Babel (which is) confuſion. But it ſeemeth to me, that Melanthon conceived not amiſs hereof: the ſame expoſition being alſo made by the author of that work called Onomaſticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, a bitter or ſevere governor, becauſe his form of rule ſeemed at firſt far more terrible than paternal authority. And therefore is he in this reſpect alſo called a mighty hunter: becauſe he took and deſtroy'd both beaſts and thieves. But St. Auguſtine underſtands it otherwiſe, and converts the word [ante] by [contra] affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty hunter againſt God, Sic ergo intelligendus eſt gigas ille, venator contra Dominum; So is that giant to be underſtood, a hunter againſt the Lord. But howſoever this word [a mighty hunter] be underſtood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all thoſe, which went with him from the eaſt into Shinaar: ſo this charge was rather given him, than by him uſurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himſelf, or any of the ſons of his own body, came with this troop into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the ſucceeding ſtory of the Hebrews: nor that Sem was in this diſobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The ſame is alſo confirmed by divers ancient hiſtorians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Joctan were the captains and leaders of all thoſe which came from the eaſt. And tho' Sem came not himſelf ſo far west as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the east parts) yet from his son's nephew Heber, the name and nation of the Hebrews (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the southermost parts of Chaldea about the city of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the race of Sem which came into Chaldea were no partners in the unbelieving work of the tower: therefore (as many of the fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the fathers of the first age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his issues. [a] In familia Heber remansit hæc lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (saith St. Augustine out of Epiphanus;) and this language Abraham used: yea, it was anciently and before the flood the general speech: and therefore first called (saith Cœlestinus) lingua humana, the human tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Ægyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chief leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than by violence of usurpation.

SECT. II.

That Nimrod, Belus and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Nauclerus, with others, make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus; and so doth St. Jerome upon Osea; and these words of St. Augustine seem to make him of the same opinion. [b] Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65 annos; There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who first governed in Babylon 65 years. But it could not be unknown to St. Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the land of Shinaar: wherefore Nimrod was the first king of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus's time, the world was marvellously repleniſhed. And if St. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane authors. And for those words of St. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat, who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the founder of the Babylonian empire. For altho' Julius Cesar overthrew the liberty of the Roman commonwealth, making himself perpetual dictator; yet Augustus was the first established emperor, and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraign authority over the Romans, as an emperor. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of eldership and paternity, laying the foundation of soveraign rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a general allowance, exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200 years after the flood, as they account, that Belus reign'd: but such agreement of times prove it not. For so Edward III. and his grandchild Richard II. were kings both in one year; the one died, and the other in the same year was crowned king.

And yet the opinion, that Nimrod and Belus were one, is far more probable than that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom was Babel, and the towns adjoining: but the first and most famous work of Ninus was the city of Nineveh.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth that Ninus overcame and suppress'd the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his empire at Nineveh in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easy: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis's time.

——Dicitur altam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis urbem.

Semiramis with walls of brick the city did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the scriptures call Nimrod mighty: so Justin hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments: it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other kings as well. For if we may believe Justin; then were Vexoris king of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, mighty kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them. For whereas Mercator conceiveth that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confusion of languages, to have invaded and mastered those cities so far removed from Babel, namely Erec, Accad and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true, that ever Nimrod invaded any of these cities; but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The city of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archard, and Epiphanius Arphal; Junius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Nineveh to be one city: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran; but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Tho' I cannot deny Accadene to be a region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of St. Jerome calls Achad: and so do the Hebrews

alſo call Niſibis, which ſeemeth to be the cauſe of this miſtaking. As for the city of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech, St. Auguſtine Oreg, and Pagninus Erec, this place Junius underſtands for Arrata in Suſiana: but there is alſo a city in Comegena called Arace; and indeed likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the aſſiſtance of other circumſtances.

Concerning the third city (called Chalneh) ſome take it for Calaniſis: of which [a] Am. Marcellinus. St. Jerome takes it for Seleucia; Hieroſolymitanus for Cteſiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, deſtroy'd and razed by the Perſians. But let Moſes be the moderator and judge of this diſpute, who teacheth us directly, that theſe cities are not ſeated in ſo divers and diſtant regions; for theſe be his words: And the beginning of his kingdom (ſpeaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: ſo as in this valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we muſt find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think with Viterbienſis, that theſe four made but one Babylon, than that they were cities far removed, and in ſeveral provinces, did not the prophet Amos preciſely diſtinguiſh Chalne from Babylon. Go you (ſaith Amos, vi. 2.) to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philiſtines. The Geneva tranſlation favouring the former opinion, to ſet theſe cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expreſſing that Shinaar was here named: not that all theſe cities were therein ſeated, but to diſtinguiſh Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt; but I find little ſubſtance in that conceit. For ſure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's empire, there was no ſuch Babylon, nor any city at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great city of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where ſtood Memphis the ancient city, but not ſo ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is ſituate in the valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the chapter of Paradiſe. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote ſituation of theſe three cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, that Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were diſtinct and ſucceſſive kings.

SECT. III.

That Nimrod, not Aſſur, built Nineveh: and that it is probable out of Iſaiah xxiii. 13. that Aſſur built Ur for the Chaldees.

NOW as of Nimrod: ſo are the opinions of writers different touching Aſſur, and touching the beginning of that great ſtate of Babylon and Aſſyria: a controverſy wearifomly diſputed without any direct proof, concluſion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the ſcriptures are ſilent, the voice of reaſon hath the beſt hearing) the interpretation of Junius is moſt agreeable; who beſides all neceſſary conſequence doth not disjoyn the ſenſe of the ſcriptures therein, nor confuſe the underſtanding thereof. For in this ſort he converteth the Hebrew text. Erat enim principium regni ejus Babel, & Erec, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris; e terra hac proceſſit in Aſſyriam ubi ædificavit Niniven: (which is) For the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this land into Aſſyria, and built Nineveh. So as Junius takes Aſſur in this place, not for any perſon, but for the region of Aſſyria: the land being ſo called in Moſes's time, and before it. For certainly the other conſtruction, (where the word [Aſſur] is taken for Aſſur the ſon of Sem) doth not anſwer the order which Moſes obſerveth thro' all the books of Geneſis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the 10th chapter he ſetteth down the ſons of Noah in theſe words. Now theſe are the generations of the ſons of Noah: Shem, Ham, and Japhet, unto whom ſons were born after the flood: then it followeth immediately. The ſons of Japhet were Gomer, &c. ſo as Japhet is laſt named among Noah's ſons, be he eldeſt or youngeſt: becauſe he was firſt to be ſpoken of: with whom (having laſt named him) he proceeds and ſets down his iſſue, and then the iſſue of his ſons: firſt, the iſſue of Gomer, Japhet's eldeſt ſon; and then ſpeaks of Javan and his ſons: for of the reſt of that family he is ſilent. Anon, after he numbreth the ſons of of Ham, of which Cuſh was the eldeſt: and the ſons of Cuſh and Mizraim; and afterwards of Canaan; leaving Shem for the laſt, becauſe he would not disjoin the ſtory of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto Abraham; and ſo to Jacob, and the fathers of that nation. But to have brought in one of the ſons of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had been againſt order; neither would Moſes have paſs'd over ſo ſlightly the erection of the Aſſyrian empire, in one of the ſons of Shem, if he had had any ſuch meaning; it being the ſtory of Shem's ſons which he moſt attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the reſt of the ſons of Cuſh, becauſe he founded the Babylonian and Aſſyrian empire: and in the 11th chapter he returns to ſpeak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the 10th chapter, with thoſe other cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the 10th chapter, ſo alſo in the 11th he maketh no report of Shem, till ſuch time as he had finiſh'd ſo much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the iſſue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Iſrael. And of Junius's opinion touching Aſſur, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Comeſtor in Hiſtoria Scholaſtica gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in ſome other ſenſe, he uſeth theſe words. Vel intelligendum non eſt de Aſſur filio Sem, &c. ſed Aſſur, id eſt, regnum Aſſyriorum inde egreſſum eſt, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum eſt (which is) Or elſe it is not to be underſtood of Aſſur the ſon of Shem, &c. but Aſſur (that is the kingdom of the Aſſyrians) came from thence (viz. from Babylon) or was made out of it; which happened in the time of Sarug the great grandfather of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the differences in this ſort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the firſt erector of the Aſſyrian empire, or the firſt founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium, reſpecting the beginning; but others conceive, that it had beginning from Ninus, which is alſo true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem, regarding the enlargement of the empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Aſſur to be the ſon of Nimrod: and ſo doth Methodius, and Viterbienſis, St. Jerome and Cyrillus, and now laſtly, [b] Torniellus; who ſaith, he took upon him that name of Aſſur after he had beaten the Aſſyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus after his conqueſt in Africa: and that Aſſur was a common name to the kings of Aſſyria, as it appeareth by many ſcriptures, as Pſalm lxxxi. Iſaiah x. Hoſea v, &c. but to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the ſon of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was archbiſhop of Mentz in the year of Chriſt 854, an ancient and learned writer, underſtands this place with Comeſtor, or Comeſtor with him, agreeing in ſubſtance with that tranſlation of Junius: to which words of Moſes he giveth this ſenſe, De hac terra Aſſyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli filii, Nilum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the empire of the Aſſyrians, who built Ninus the great city, ſo named of Ninus the ſon of Belus. On the contrary, Calvin objecteth this place of Iſaiah xxiii. 13. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Aſſur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderneſs; than which there is no one place in the ſcriptures that hath a greater diverſity in the tranſlation and underſtanding; inſomuch as Michael de Palatio upon Iſaiah (tho' in all elſe very diligent) paſſeth it over. But Calvin ſeemeth hereby to infer, that becauſe Aſſur founded the ſtate of the Chaldeans, therefore alſo Aſſur rather than Nimrod eſtabliſhed the Aſſyrian empire, and built Nineveh: contrary to the former tranſlation of Junius, and to his own opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Jerome's tranſlation) it may be gathered, that Aſſur both founded and ruin'd this ſtate or city of the Chaldeans, by Iſaiah remembred: unto which city, people, or ſtate, he plainly telleth the Tyrians, that they cannot truſt or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the prophet maketh this city of Chaldea, and that ſtate, an example unto thoſe Phenicians, whom in this place he foretelleth of their ruin: which city of Chaldea being of ſtrength, and carefully defended, was notwithſtanding by the Aſſyrians utterly waſted and deſtroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and foretelleth them that their own city of Tyre (invincible, as themſelves thought) ſhould alſo ſoon after be overturned by the ſame Aſſyrians: as indeed it was by Nabuchodonoſor. And theſe be the words of Jerome; Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, Aſſur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traduxerunt robuſtos ejus, ſuffoderunt domos ejus, poſuit eam in ruinam; which is, Behold the land of the Chaldeans, ſuch a people there were not (or this was no people, after the Geneva) Aſſur, or the Aſſyrians founded it, they carried away their ſtrong men captive, they undermined their houſes, and ruined their city. The Septuagint expreſs it but in a part of another verſe, in theſe words; Et in terra Chaldæorum, & hæc deſolata eſt ab Aſſyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the ſenſe perfect by the preceding verſe, which altogether may be thus underſtood. If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou ſhalt have no reſt, (ſpeaking to the Tyrians) neither in the land of the Chaldeans, for this is made deſolate by the Aſſyrians, becauſe their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus, Ecce terra Chaſdiim, iſte populus non erat illic olim; nam Aſſur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius, contriverunt ædes ejus, poſuerunt eam in ruinam: which may be thus engliſhed. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Aſſur built it a harbour for ſhips, they erected the towers thereof, and again brake down the houſes thereof, and ruinated it. Junius in the place of ſhips ſets the word [pro Barbaris] that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted, that the prophet Iſaiah (as may be gathered by all the ſenſe of the chapter) did therein aſſure the Tyrians of their future deſtruction; which accordingly fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of thoſe places, cities and regions, whoſe trade the ſtate and greatneſs of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharſis, from the Macedonians, and other Grecians under the name of Cittim; alſo by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans and the reſt. For Tyre was then the mart-town of the world moſt renowned. And (as it appears in our diſcourſe of Paradiſe) not the leaſt part of her chief merchandiſe came in by the city Ur, or Urchoa in Chaldea, where the body or chief ſtream of Euphrates (even that ſtream which runneth thro' Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his paſſage into the Perſian gulf; though now it be ſtopped up. For (as we have heretofore noted) the Arabians, that deſcended from Sheba and Raamah, dwelling on the eaſt banks of the Perſian gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as thoſe of Eden, Charran and Chalne did) tranſported their merchandiſe by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Ur or Urchoa; and then by Babylon, and thence by river and over land they conveyed it into Syria, and ſo to Tyre, as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Ur of the Chaldees was a port-town, and one of thoſe cities which had intelligence, trade and exchange with the Tyrians: for it ſtood by the great lakes of Chaldea, thro' which that part of Euphrates ran, which paſſage is now ſtopt up. Ejus curſum vetuſtas abolevit (ſaith Niger.) And Pliny, Locus ubi Euphratis oſtium fuit, flumen ſalſum; Time hath worn away the channel of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a bay of ſalt water. Theſe things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the city of the Chaldees, whoſe calamities Iſaiah here noteth for terror of the Tyrians to be the city anciently called Ur; and by Hecatæus, Camerina; by Ptolemy, Urchoa; and by the Greeks, Chaldæopolis, The city of Chaldea; which the ſons of Shem, until Abraham's time, inhabited. And whereas in all the tranſlations it is ſaid, that Aſſur both founded it and ruin'd it: it may be underſtood, that Aſſur the founder was the ſon of Shem; and Aſſur the deſtroyers were the Aſſyrians, by whom thoſe that inhabited Ur of Chaldea, were at length oppreſſed and brought to ruin: which thing God foreſeeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and ſo into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted [by ſhips] do bear that ſenſe, the ſame may be the better approved; becauſe it was a port-town: and the river ſo far up as this city of Ur, was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word [for the Barbarians] or [by the Barbarians] be alſo in the Hebrew text, it is no leſs manifeſt, that the moſt barbarous Arabians of the deſart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other unto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachaldar, which ſignifieth deſart lands, becauſe it joineth to that part of Arabia ſo called: and Cicero (calling thoſe Arabians by the name of Itureans) addeth that they are of all other people the moſt ſavage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Iſaiah, which breedeth ſome doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former tranſlation of Junius, nor the interpretation of Comeſtor and Rabanus. For tho' other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Aſſur is in this place diverſly taken; (as for the ſon of Shem, when he is ſpoken of as a builder of Ur; and when, as a deſtroyer thereof, then for the Aſſyrian ſyrian nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumſtances ſeem to inforce it. And ſo this founding of the city of the Chaldees by Aſſur (into which the moſt of the poſterity of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were ſeparate for the idolatry of the Chuſites and Nimrodians, retired themſelves) hath nothing in it to prove that the ſame Aſſur built Nineveh, or that the ſame Aſſur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Aſſur, who was the ſon of Shem, both an idolater and the ſon of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the firſt notorious ſacrificer to idols, and the firſt that ſet up a ſtatue or image to be honoured as God. Now if Aſſur muſt be of that race, and not of the family of Sem, as he muſt be if he founded Nineveh, then all thoſe which ſeek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thouſand parts more injury, by taking from him his true parent and religion.

Beſides, if this ſuppoſed Aſſur whom they make the founder of Nineveh (and ſo the ſon of Belus) were any other, and not the ſame with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very unworthy and obſcure, and not like to be the founder of ſuch an empire and ſuch a city, if no man have vouchſafed to leave to poſterity his expulſion thence, and how he loſt that empire again, or quitted it to Ninus; whoſe acts and conqueſts are ſo largely written, and (according to my apprehenſion) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found beſt agreeing to ſcripture and to reaſon, and beſt agreeing with the ſtory of that age written by prophane authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the firſt works and beginnings of his empire, according to Moſes, and that theſe works being finiſh'd within the valley of Shinaar, he look'd farther abroad, and ſet in hand the work of Ninus, lying near unto the ſame ſtream that Babel and Chalne did: which work his grandchild Ninus afterwards amplified and finiſhed, as Semiramis (this Ninus's wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to paſs, that as Semiramis was counted the foundreſs of the city which ſhe only finiſh'd: ſo alſo Ninus of Nineveh. Quam quidem Babylonem potuit inſtaurare; She might repair or renew Babylon, ſaith St. Auguſtine. For ſo did Nabuchodonoſor vaunt himſelf to be the founder of Babylon alſo, becauſe he built up again ſome part of the wall overborn by the fury of the river: which work of his ſtood till Alexander's time; whereupon he vaunted thus: [a] Is not this great Babel which I have built?

SECT. IV.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to return to the ſtory, it is plain in Moſes, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium, and Julius Africanus ſurnamed Saturn) was the eſtabliſher of the Babylonian monarchy, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his empire in the beginning conſiſted of thoſe four cities before remembred, Babel, Erech, Accad and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his empire into Aſſyria; and in Aſſyria built four more cities, to wit, Nineveh, Rehoboth, Celah, and Reſen. And ſeeing that he ſpent much time in building Babel it ſelf and thoſe adjoining, and that his travels were many ere he came into Shinaar, that work of Babel (ſuch as it was) with the other three cities, and the large foundation of Nineveh, and the other cities of Aſſyria which he builded (conſidered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his ſucceſſors in many years after: to whoſe undertakings time had given ſo great an increaſe of people; and the examples and patterns of his beginning ſo great an advancement and encouragement: in whoſe time (ſaith Glycas) all theſe nations were called Meropes, A ſermonis linguarum terræque diviſione; By reaſon that the earth and the ſpeech were then divided.

Belus or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, ſucceeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114 years; of whoſe acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he ſpent much of his time in diſburdening the low lands of Babylon, and drying and making firm ground of all thoſe great fens and overflown marſhes which adjoin'd unto it. For any of his wars or conqueſts there is no report, other than of his begun enterpriſe againſt Sabatius king of Armenia, and thoſe parts of Scythia which Beroſus calls Scythia Saga, whoſe ſon and ſucceſſor Barzanes became ſubject and tributary to Ninus, that followed the war to effect, which was by his father Belus begun.

SECT. V.

That we are not to marvel how ſo many kingdoms could be erected about theſe times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THAT ſo many kingdoms were erected in all thoſe eaſtern parts of the world ſo ſoon after Nimrod (as by the ſtory of Ninus is made manifeſt) the cauſes were threefold; namely, opportunity, example and neceſſity. For opportunity, being a princeſs liberal and powerful, beſtoweth on her firſt entertainers many times more benefits, than either fortune can, or wiſdom ought; by whoſe preſence alone the underſtanding minds of men receive all thoſe helps and ſupplies, which they either want or wiſh for: ſo as every leader of a troop (after the diviſion of tongues and diſperſion of people) finding theſe fair offers made unto them, held the power which they poſſeſs'd, and governed by diſcretion all thoſe people, whom they conducted to their deſtin'd places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the earth was firſt divided, mankind ſtraggled abroad like beaſts in a deſart; but that by agreement they diſpoſed themſelves, and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the world. and by diſtinct families and nations: otherwiſe thoſe remote regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had kings, and were peopled in Ninus's time, would not have been poſſeſs'd in many hundreds of years after, as then they were; neither did thoſe that were ſent, and travelled far off (order being the true parent of proſperous ſucceſs) undertake ſo difficult enterprizes without a conductor or commander. Secondly, The example of Nimrod with whom it ſucceeded well, ſtrengthened every humour that aſpired. Thirdly, Neceſſity reſolved all men by the arguments of common miſeries, that without a commander and magiſtrate, neither could thoſe that were laborious, and of honeſt diſpoſitions, enjoy the harveſt of their own travels: nor thoſe which were of little ſtrength, ſecure themſelves againſt forcible violence: nor thoſe which ſought after any proportion of greatneſs, either poſſeſs the ſame in quiet, or rule and order their own miniſters and attendants.

That theſe cauſes had wrought theſe effects, the undertakings and conqueſts of Ninus (the ſon of Belus) made it apparent: for he found every where kings and monarchs, what way ſoever his ambition led him in the wars.

But Nimrod (his grandfather) had no companion king, to us known, when he firſt took on him ſoveraignty and ſole commandment of all thoſe the children of Noah, which came from the eaſt into Babylonia: tho' in his life-time others alſo raiſed themſelves to the ſame eſtate; of which hereafter. Belus, his ſon and ſucceſſor, found Sabatius king of Armenia and Scythia, ſufficiently powerful to reſiſt his attempts: which Sabatius I take to be the ſame which Juſtin calls Tanais; and ſhould conjecture, that Mizraim had been his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently ſuſpect ſome error (as [a]Juſtin placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumſtances ſeems to me rightly accounted by the judicious and learned Reineccius all one with the great Seſoſtris, that lived certain ages after Ninus. This Belus, the ſecond king of Babylon, reigned 65 years, according to the common account.

SECT. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affine unto it.

WHENCE this ſecond king and ſucceſſor of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, queſtion hath been made; for it ſeemeth rather a name impoſed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than aſſumed by Belus himſelf.

Cyrillus againſt Julian calls the father of Ninus, Arbelus, affirming that he was the firſt of all men that cauſed himſelf to be called a god: which were it ſo, then might the name of Belus be thence deriv'd. But Bel, as many learned writers have obſerved, ſignifieth the ſun in the Chaldean tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their father, that he might be honoured as the ſun, which the Babylonians worſhipped as a god. And as this title was aſſumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldean princes, and Babylonians Satrapæ: ſo was it uſed (in imitation) by the chief of the Carthaginians and other nations, as ſome hiſtorians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) thoſe voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphagor, Belſebub, and Beelſephon. Thoſe that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean, convert the word Baal by the Latin, Princeps militiæ, Chief in the war, tho' Daniel was ſo called (ſaith Suidas) ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honour of his expounding ſecrets. [b]St. Jerome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the ſame ſignification: and ſaith, that the idol of Babylon was ſo called, which Ninus in memory of his father ſet up to be worſhipped: to which that he might add the more honour and reverence, he made it a ſanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (ſaith [c]Lyranus) came idolatry, and the firſt uſe of images into the world. [d]Iſidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Aſſyrians it is taken for Saturn and the Sun: ſo in the Punick or Carthaginian language it ſignifieth God. Glycas makes it an Aſſyrian name properly; and Joſephus, a Tyrian. He alſo affirmeth, that the idol which the Moabites worſhipped (by them erected on the mountain Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the ſame which the Latins call Priapus, the God of gardens; which alſo was the opinion of [e]St. Jerome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to ſay as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel, ſoundeth [God] and Sebub [flies or hornets;] by which name notwithſtanding the Jews expreſs the prince of devils. But the prophet Hoſea teacheth us the proper ſignification of this word from the voice of God himſelf; And at that day (ſaith the Lord) thou ſhalt call me Iſhi, and ſhalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For altho' the name of Baal, or Babal, be juſtly to be uſed towards God; yet in reſpect that the ſame was given to idols, God both hated it and forbad it. And the uſing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the ſun, was not becauſe it properly ſignifieth the ſun, but becauſe the ſun there was worſhipped as a god: as alſo the fire was, Tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belſephon; Belſephon is expounded out of Facius, Dominus ſpeculæ vel cuſtodiæ; The lord of the watch tower, or of the guard: the other word noteth the idol, and the place wherein it was worſhipped. It is alſo written Belpeor or Baalpeor: and Peor, they ſay, is as much as denudavit; and therefore the word joined expreſſeth a naked image. Some there are that call this Belus, the ſon of Saturn; for it was uſed among the ancients to name the father Saturn, the ſon Jupiter, and the grandchild Hercules. [f]Saturni dicuntur familiarum nobilium, regum qui urbes condiderunt ſeniſſimi; primogenti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortiſſimi; The ancienteſt of noble families, and kings which founded cities, are called Saturns; their firſt-born Jupiters and Juno's; their valiant nephews Hercules. But this Belus (ſaith L. Vives) was famous by reaſon of his warlike ſon Ninus, who cauſed his father to be worſhipped as a God by the name of [g]Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (tranſported by the dreams of their antiquity) make one of theirs. For Neptune, ſay they, upon Libya the daughter of Epaphas, begat this Jupiter Belus, who was father to Ægyptus. They add, that this Belus carrying a colony to the river of Euphrates there built a city, in which he ordained prieſts after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the ſon of Epaphus and Iſis, or of Neptune and Libya, or with Euſebius of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Iſis, Cecrops then reigning in Athens, the ſame was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we ſpeak, but rather ſome other Belus, of whom the Egyptians ſo much vaunted.

SECT. VII.

Of the worſhipping of images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the moſt ancient Belus, and the inventor of Aſtronomy, if Pliny ſay true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the doctrine. Some part of the temple, in which his ſtatue or image was honoured as a god, the ſame author affirmeth that it remained in his time.

Of the ſepulchre of Belus, [h] Strabo writeth thus. Over the river, ſaith he, there are gardens, where they ſay the ruins of Belus's tomb, which Xerxes broke up, are yet remaining. It was a ſquare Pyramis made of brick, a furlong high, and on every ſide it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by [i] Cyril againſt Julian, that he obtained divine worſhip yet living: for ſo he writes of him (calling him Arbelus: Arbelus, vir ſuperbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à ſubditis deitatis nomen accepiſſe:

accepiſſe: perſeverárunt igitur Aſſyrii, & finitimæ illis gentes ſacrificantes ei. Arbelus, A man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the firſt of all men that was ever honoured by their ſubjects with the title of deity (or with the name of God) the Aſſyrians therefore and the bordering nations have perſevered, ſacrificing to him. Even Arius alſo, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who ſucceeded next after Ninyas, was made an idol-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thuras reigned (ſaith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the planet Mars; a man of ſhape and fierce diſpoſition, who bidding battle to Caucaſus of the ſtock of Japhet, ſlew him. The Aſſyrians worſhipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among idolatrous nations were deified in their life-times, or ſoon after: tho' I deny not but that the moſt of their images and Statuæ were firſt erected without divine worſhip, only in memory of the glorious acts of benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and ſo afterwards the devil crept into thoſe wooden and brazen carcaſes, when poſterity had loſt the memory of their firſt invention. Hereof Iſidore ſpeaketh in this manner. Quos autem Pagani Deos aſſerunt homines fuerunt, & pro uniuſcujuſque vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud ſuos poſt mortem cœperunt: ſed (dæmonibus perſuadentibus) quos illi pro ſua memoria honoraverunt, minores Deos exiſtimárunt: ad iſta vero magis excolenda acceſſerunt poetarum figmenta; They were men, ſaith he, whom the Pagans affirmed to be Gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to be honoured of his own. But at length (the devils perſuading) they accounted them leſſer gods, whoſe memories they honoured: and the fictions of the poets made the opinions (concerning the honours of the dead) much more ſuperſtitious.

And that the worſhipping of images was brought in by the Pagans, and heathen nations, it is not Iſidore alone that witneſſeth; but Gregory: [a] Gentilitas (ſaith he) inventrix & caput eſt imaginum; Gentiliſm is the inventreſs and ground of images: and Ambroſe; [b] Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood as it were the image of God. [c] Euſebius alſo affirmeth as much, and calleth the worſhipping of images a cuſtom borrowed of the heathen. The like hath [d] St. Auguſtine againſt Adimantus. Et verentur (ſaith [e] Lactantius) ne religio vana ſit, ſi nihil videant quod adorent; They fear their religion would be vain, ſhould they not ſee that which they worſhip.

And (out of doubt) the ſchoolmen ſhift this fearful cuſtom very ſtrangely. For ſeeing the very workmanſhip is forbidden, how can the heart of a wiſe Chriſtian ſatisfy it ſelf with the diſtinction of Doulia and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but ſome difference of worſhipping of thoſe images after they are made? and it is of all things the moſt ſtrange, why religious and learned men ſhould ſtrain their wits to defend the uſe of thoſe things, which the ſcriptures have not only no where warranted, but expreſly in many places forbidden, and curſed the practiſers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the devil was ſo ſtrongly and ſubtilly rooted, as neither the expreſs commandment of God himſelf, Thou ſhalt not make any graven image, nor all the threatnings of Moſes and the prophets after him could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any perſuaſions, lead the hearts of men from it. For where ſhall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer inſtruction than theſe? Take therefore good heed to your ſelves (for ye ſaw no image in the day that the Lord ſpake unto you in Horeb out of the midſt of the fire) that ye corrupt not your ſelves, and make you a graven image, or repreſentation of any figure, whether it be the likeneſs of male or female.

And beſides the expreſs commandment, Thou ſhalt make thee no graven image, and the prohibition in many ſcriptures, ſo it is written in the book of Wiſdom, That the invention of idols was the beginning of whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither ſhall they continue for ever.

And whereas the ſchoolmen affirm, that the prophets ſpake againſt the worſhipping of the heathen idols, it is manifeſt that Moſes ſpake of images of the living God, and not of Baal and the reſt of that nature, For you ſaw no image (ſaith Moſes) that day that the Lord ſpake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently ſaid of Baſil, Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumſcribas eum mente tua; Do not imagine any form to be in God, leſt thou limit or circumſcribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Baſil thought it a preſumption unlawful to repreſent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do thoſe men preſume that put him under the greaſy pencil of a painter, or the ruſty ax, or other inſtrument of a carpenter or carver.

For as this diſhonour to the infinite and incomprehenſible God began in Babel: ſo did the devil tranſport and ſpred this invention into all the regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while reſiſted the erection of theſe idols and images, refuſing to ſet them in their temples for 170 years, obſerving therein the law of Numa: who thought it impiety to reſemble things moſt beautiful, by things moſt baſe. But Tarquinius Priſcus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Grecians (a nation of all others under the ſun moſt deluded by Satan) ſet up the images of their Gods; which (as [f] St. Auguſtine witneſſeth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth. Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis ſupplicant, genu poſito illa adorant, & cum hæc ſuſpiciant, fabros qui illa fecêre contemnunt; The images of the Gods are worſhipped, thoſe they pray unto with bended knees, thoſe they adore; and while they ſo greatly admire them, they contemn the handicraftſmen that made them: which alſo Sedulius the Poet in this ſort ſcoffed at.

Heu miſeri qui vana colunt, qui corde ſiniſtro
Religioſa ſibi ſculpunt ſimulachra, ſuumque
Factorem fugiunt, & quæ fecêre verentur.
Quis furor eſt? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit?
Ut volucrem, turpemque bovem, torvumque draconem,
Semi-hominemque canem ſupplex homo pronus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worſhip vanities,
And conſecrate dumb idols in their heart,
Whom their own Maker (God on high) deſpiſe,
And fear the work of their own hands and art.
What fury? what great madneſs doth beguile
Mens minds? that man ſhould ugly ſhapes adore,
Of birds, or bulls, or dragons, or the vile
Half-dog half-man on knees for aid implore.

And tho' this device was barbarous, and firſt, and many years practiſed by heathen nations only, till

till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to ſcorn the ignorant ſtupidity of his nation: but Juſtin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inveighed againſt images: and Hoſpinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the ſouls of men to erect and adore thoſe Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witneſs, that the Perſians did not erect or ſet up any ſtatue of their gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impiety to repreſent immortal natures by mortal figures. Euſebius alſo witneſſeth in his ſixth book de præparatione evangelica, that it was forbidden by a law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that images ſhould be worſhipped. The ſame do Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other authors might be remembred that witneſs the diſdain which the heathens themſelves had of this childiſh idolatry: of which Hoſpinian hath written at large in his tract de origine imaginum. And it was truly ſaid, Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta ſunt; All ill examples have ſprung from good beginnings. The heathen at firſt made theſe ſtatuæ and images, but in memory of ſuch remarkable men, as had deſerved beſt of their countries and commonwealths: Effigies hominum (ſaith Pliny) non ſolebant exprimi niſi aliqua illuſtri cauſa perpetuitatem merentium; Men were not wont to make pictures, but of men which merited for ſome notable cauſe to be perpetually remembred. And tho' of the more ancient Papiſts, ſome have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Lactantius) that defence for images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, ut per ea diſcerent homines Deum inviſibilem cognoſcere; Images (ſay they, and ſo before them the heathen ſaid) are inſtead of letters, whereby men might learn to know the inviſible God: in which underſtanding (perhaps) they no otherwiſe eſteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel, ſet up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterwards the moſt reverenced idol of the world, by which ſo many nations (and they which were appropriate to God himſelf) were miſled and caſt away: ſo thoſe very ſtocks and ſtones, and painted canvaſes (called the pictures of Chriſt, or Lady, and others) were by thouſands of ignorant people, not only adored, but eſteemed to have life, motion, and underſtanding. On theſe ſtocks we call (ſaith the book of Wiſdom) when we paſs through the raging waves, on theſe ſtocks more rotten than the ſhip that carrieth us.

This heathen invention of images became ſo fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to diſtinguiſh them into degrees and orders; as Dii conſentes, ſeu majorum gentium; ſelecti, patritii, inſigniores, dii medii: counſelling gods, or gods of the mightieſt nobility; ſelect gods, patritian, gods of mark, and common gods (which the Romans called Medioxumi) dii infimi, and terreſtrial hero's, and multitudes of other gods: of which St. Auguſtine hath made large mention in his book de Civitate Dei, lib. 14. But (ſaith Lactantius) among all thoſe miſerable ſouls and rotten bodies, worſhipped by men more like to their idols, did Epimenides Cretenſis (by what good angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian fields, altars to the unknown God, which ſtood with the ſame title and dedication even to the times of St. Paul: who made them firſt known to whom thoſe altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might diſcern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obſcure and ſtinking miſt wherein the devil had ſo many years led and miſled them. And it ſufficed not that the multitude of theſe gods was ſo great in general, or that every nation had ſome one which took particular and ſingular care of them; as Jupiter in Crete, Iſis in Egypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos Juno, in Paphos Venus, and ſo of all other parts; but every city, and almoſt every family, had a god apart. For it is written in the 2d of Kings xvii. 18, 31. the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Aſhima, and the Avins made Nibhaz and Tarrack, and the Sephernaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the prophet Iſa. c. xliv. derided? Men cut down trees, rinde them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themſelves by the fire thereof, and of the reſidue he maketh a god, an idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath ſhut their eyes from ſight, and their hearts from underſtanding. It is therefore ſafeſt for a Chriſtian to believe the commandments of God ſo direct againſt idolatry, to believe the prophets, and to believe St. Paul, who ſpeaketh thus plainly and feelingly. My beloved fly from idolatry, I ſpeak as unto them which have underſtanding, judge ye what I ſay.

SECT. VIII.

Of the wars of Ninus: and laſtly of his war againſt Zoroaſter.

UNTO this Belus ſucceeded Ninus, the firſt that commanded the exerciſe of idolatry, the firſt that injuriouſly invaded his neighbour-princes; and the firſt that without ſhame or fear committed adultery in publick. But as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars:) ſo of this Ninus (whoſe ſtory is gathered out of prophane authors) I find nothing ſo warrantable, but that the ſame may be diſputed, and in the greateſt part doubted. For altho' that piece of Beroſus ſet out and commented upon by Annius hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Chrytæus noteth) to the underſtanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnaſſæus, and others: yet Lodovicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the fragment; proving directly that it cannot be the ſame Beroſus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by [a] Athenæus and Joſephus: and whoſe ſtatue the Athenians erected, ſaith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the ſucceſſion of the Babylonian and Aſſyrian princes, even from Nimrod to the 18th king Aſcatades, and to the times of Joſhua. For of Metaſthenes an hiſtorian, of the race of the Perſian prieſts, there are found but certain papers, or ſome few lines of the Chaldean and Aſſyrian monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Perſian kings is not without his errors.

Cteſias of Cnidus (a city adjoining to Halicarnaſſus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his hiſtory out of the Perſian records, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and tho' in the ſtory of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in ſome things, and Athenæus, Pauſanias and Tertullian cite him; yet ſo baſe and apparent are his flatteries of the times and princes with whom he lived, and ſo incredible are the numbers which he finds in the armies of Ninus, and eſpecially of

Semiramis; as whatſoever his reports were, times have conſumed his works, ſaving ſome very few excerptions lately publiſhed.

And therefore in things uncertain, ſeeing a long diſcourſe cannot be pleaſing to men of judgment, I will paſs over the acts of this 3d Aſſyrian, in as few words as I can expreſs them. St. Auguſtine affirms that Ninus maſtered all Aſia, India excepted. Others ſay that he won it all, ſave India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his conqueſts, with whom he entered into a ſtraight league of amity, becauſe he commanded many people, and was his kinſman, and a Chuſite, and the neareſt prince confronting Babylonia. His firſt enterpriſe was upon Syria, which he might eaſily ſubdue, both becauſe he invaded it on the ſudden, and becauſe it lay next him: and alſo becauſe the Arabians and their king Aricus (which bordered Syria) aſſiſted him in the conqueſt thereof.

The king of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his war againſt Zoroaſter: for from Armenia he bent himſelf that way towards the eaſt; but that ever he commanded the leſſer Aſia, I do not believe, for none of his ſucceſſors had any poſſeſſion therein.

His third war was againſt Pharnus, king of the Medes, whom it is ſaid that he overthrew, and cruelly murdered with his ſeven children, tho' others affirm that they all died in one battel againſt him. Whether he invaded Zoroaſter before the building or amplifying of Nineveh, or after, it is uncertain. It is ſaid that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill ſucceſs in the firſt, he returned, and ſet the work of Nineveh forward: and then a ſecond time entred Bactria with 1700000 foot, and 200000 horſe, and 10600 chariots: being encountred by Zoroaſter with 400000. But [a] Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaſter being ſlain, he entred farther into the country, and beſieged the chief city thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (ſaith [b] Stephanus:) which by a paſſage found, and an aſſault given by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and poſſeſs'd. Upon this occaſion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her perſon and external beauty, fancy'd her ſo ſtrongly, as (neglecting all princely reſpects) he took her from her huſband, whoſe eyes he threatned to thruſt out if he refuſed to conſent. He therefore yielding to the paſſion of love in Ninus, and to the paſſion of ſorrow in himſelf, by the ſtrong perſuaſions of ſhame and diſhonour, caſt himſelf headlong into the water and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaſter, ſuppoſed to have been the chief author of magick arts: and of the divers kinds of magick.

SECT. I.

That Zoroaſter was not Cham, nor the firſt inventor of aſtrology, or of magick: and that there were divers great magicians of this name.

ZOroaſter king of the Bactrians, Vincentius ſuppoſeth to be Cham, the ſon of Noah: a fancy of little probability. For Cham was the paternal anceſtor of Ninus, the father of Chus, the grand-father of Nimrod, whoſe ſon was Belus, the father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that book which was called Scripturæ Cham, deviſed by ſome wicked knave, and ſo intitled: of which Sixtus Senenſis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by [c] Caſſianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of magick to Cham, the ſon of Noah: ſo did Comeſtor in his ſcholaſtical hiſtory: wich art (ſaith he) with the ſeven liberal ſciences he writ in fourteen pillars: ſeven of which were made of braſs, to reſiſt the defacing by the waters of the flood; and ſeven of brick againſt the injury of fire. There was alſo another deviſed diſcourſe, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Caſſianus out of Serenus hath ſomewhat like unto this of Comeſtor. Theſe be Caſſianus's words: Cham (filius Noah) qui ſuperſtitionibus iſtis & ſacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, ſciens nullum ſe poſſe ſuper hiis memorialem librum in arcam prorſus inferre, in qua erat cum patre juſto, &c. Cham (the ſon of Noah) who was infected with theſe ſuperſtitions, and ſacrilegious arts, knowing that he could not bring any book or memorial of that nature into the ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly father, cauſed the precepts and rules thereof to be graven in metal and hard ſtone.

St. Auguſtine noteth, that Zoroaſter was ſaid to have laugh'd at his birth, when all other children weep; which preſaged the great knowledge which afterwards he attained unto: being taken for the inventor of natural magick and other arts; for the corrupter, ſaith Pliny and Juſtin. But I do not think that Zoroaſter invented the doctrine of the horoſcopes or nativities: or firſt found out the nature of herbs, ſtones, and minerals, or their ſympathetical or antipathetical workings; of which I know not what king of Chaldea is alſo made the inventor. I rather think that theſe knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his ſons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaſter (as Joſephus reporteth) was no leſs learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wiſdom of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cauſe, and giver of life and virtue to nature and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting God's infinite, diſperſed, and univerſal power) admired the inſtruments and attributed proper ſtrength to the things themſelves (from which the effects were ſenſible) which belonged to that wiſdom, [d] Which being one, and remaining in it ſelf, can do all things and reneweth all.

Now whether this Zoroaſter (overthrown by Ninus) were the ſame which was ſo excellent a naturaliſt, it is doubted. For Zoroaſter the magician, Cteſias calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaſter were taken away by a ſpirit (being in the midſt of his diſciples) as ſome authors report, then Zoroaſter, ſlain by Ninus, was not the magician: which is alſo the opinion of [e] Scaliger.

Again, [f] Joſephus and Cedrenus affirm that Seth firſt found out the planets, or wandring ſtars, and other motions of the heavens: for if this art had been invented by Zoroaſter, he could not have attained to any ſuch excellency therein, in his own life-time; but being a man (as it ſeemeth) of ſingular judgment, he might add ſomewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to poſterity.

But of this Zoroaſter there is much diſpute: and no leſs jangling about the word and art of magick. Arnobius remembreth four to whom the name of Zoroaſter, or Zoroaſtres, was given: which by Hermodorus and Dinon ſeemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to ſay, as aſtrorum cultor. The firſt, Arnobius calleth the Bactri- an, which may be the ſame that Ninus overthrew: the ſecond, a Chaldean, and the aſtronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaſter Pamphylius, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth Zoroaſter Armenius, the nephew of Hoſtianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there paſs'd 78 years. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Perſomedus ſapiens: and Plato ſpeaketh of Zoroaſter the ſon of Oromaſdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what nation the firſt and chief Zoroaſter was, it is doubted. Pliny and Laertius make him a Perſian. Gemiſthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius make him a Chaldean. But by thoſe books of one Zoroaſter, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the author of them was a Chaldean by nation, tho' the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned prieſts peculiarly, as for any diſtinguiſhment of nations. Porphyrus makes the Chaldæi and Magi divers; Picus the ſame. But that this Zoroaſter was a Chaldean both by nation and profeſſion, it appeareth by his books, which (ſaith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the comment in the ſame language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of thoſe books of Zoroaſter, which in an epiſtle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he ſaith, to be intitled, Patris Ezre Zoroaſtris & Melchior magorum oracula.

SECT. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far diverſe from conjuring and witchcraft.

NOW for magick it ſelf; which art (ſaith [a] Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few underſtand, and many reprehend: Et ſicut canes ignotos ſemper allatrant; As dogs bark at thoſe they know not: ſo they condemn and hate the things they underſtand not: I think it not amiſs (leaving Ninus for a while) to ſpeak ſomewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhor the very name and word [Magus] becauſe of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, that is, familiar with evil ſpirits, uſurped that title. For magick, conjuring and witchery are far differing arts, whereof Pliny being ignorant, ſcoffeth thereat. For Nero, ſaith [b] Pliny, who had the moſt excellent magicians of the eaſt, ſent him by Tyridates king of Armenia, who held that kingdom by his grace, found the art after long ſtudy and labour altogether ridiculous.

[c] Magus is a Perſian word primitively, whereby is expreſs'd ſuch a one as is altogether converſant in things divine. And, as [d] Plato affirmeth, the art of magick is the art of worſhipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his epiſtles expounding the word [μάγῳ] ſaith, that the Perſians called their gods μάγους: whence he addeth that Magus is either ὁ κατὰ φύσιν θεὸς or θεραπευτὴς θεῶν, that is, that Magus is a name ſometime of him that is a God by nature; ſometimes of him that is in the ſervice of God: in which latter ſenſe it is taken, Matt. ch. ii. ver. 1. And this is the firſt and higheſt kind: which [e] Piccolomini calleth divine magick: and theſe did the Latins newly intitle ſapientes or wiſe men: For the fear and worſhip of God is the beginning of knowledge. Theſe wiſemen the Greeks call Philoſophers: the Indians Brachmans: which name they ſomewhat nearly retain to this day, calling their prieſts Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed prieſts; with the Hebrews they were called Cabaliſts, Prophets, Scribes, and Phariſees: amongſt the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Perſians Magicians: of whom Arnobius (ſpeaking of Hoſtanes, one of the ancient magicians) uſeth theſe words, [f] Et verum Deum merita majeſtate proſequitur, & angelos miniſtros Dei, ſed veri, ejus venerationi novit aſſiſtere. Idem dæmonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos. Soſthenes (for ſo M. Fœlix calleth him, not Hoſtanes) aſcribeth the due majeſty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his angels are miniſters and meſſengers which attend the worſhip of the true God. He alſo hath delivered that there are devils earthly and wandring, and enemies to mankind.

His majeſty alſo in his firſt book of Demonology, c. iii. acknowledgeth, that in the Perſian tongue the word [Magus] imports as much as a contemplator of divine and heavenly ſciences, but unjuſtly ſo called, becauſe the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true divinity. And it is alſo right which his majeſty avoweth, that under the name of magick, all other unlawful arts are comprehended, and yet doth his majeſty diſtinguiſh it from necromancy, witchcraft, and the reſt: of all which he hath written largely and moſt learnedly. For the magick which his [g] majeſty condemneth, is of that kind whereof the devil is a party. Daniel, in his 2d chapter, nameth four kinds of thoſe wiſemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, & Chaldæi. Arioli the old Latin tranſlation calleth Sophiſtas: Vatablus and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Phyſicos, or Philoſophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturaliſts: Nempe ſunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod philoſophi apud Græcos (ſcilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum ſcientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the ſame with the Barbarians, as the Philoſophers are with the Grecians, that is, men that profeſs the knowledge of things both divine and human. The Greek and the Engliſh call them inchanters; Junius magicians; Caſtalion conjecturers: in the Syrian they are all four by one name called Sapientes Babylonis, The wiſemen of Babel.

The ſecond ſort Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our Engliſh call Aſtrologers, Jerome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici; in Jerome, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poiſoners; in Junius, Præſtigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in Engliſh.

That witches are rightly ſo called Venefici, or Poiſoners; and that indeed there is a kind of Malefici, which without any art of magick or necromancy, uſe the help of the devil to do miſchief, his majeſty confirmeth in the firſt chapter of his ſecond book: ſpeaking alſo in the fifth chapter of their practice, to mix the powder of dead bodies with other things by the devil prepared; and at other times to make pictures of wax, or clay, or otherwiſe (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect thoſe things, which the devil by other means bringeth to paſs.

The fourth, all tranſlators call Chaldeans: who took upon them to foretel all things to come, as well natural as human, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the ſtars by them obſerved, and underſtood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of magick, having chiefly ſought (as is the manner of all impoſtures) to counterfeit the higheſt and moſt noble part of it, yet ſo as they have alſo crept into the inferiour degrees.

A ſecond kind of magick was that part of Aſtro-

logy, which had reſpect to ſowing and planting, and all kinds of agriculture and husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the ſtars into thoſe lower elements.

Philo Judæus goeth farther, affirming that by this part of magick or aſtrology, together with the motions of the ſtars and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldea: [a] Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem (ſaith Jo. Damaſcen.) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Joſephus reporteth of Abraham, that he inſtructed the Egyptians in arithmetick and aſtronomy, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of theſe ſciences.

And ſo doth [b] Archangelus de Burgo in defence of Mirandula againſt Garſias. Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham ſanctitate & ſapientia omnium præſtantiſſimus Chaldæos primum, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios ſacerdotes aſtrologiam & divina docuerit: Alexander (ſaith he) meaning Alexander Polyhiſtor, and Eupolemon affirm, that Abraham the holieſt and wiſeſt of men did firſt teach the Chaldeans, then the Phenicians, laſtly the Egyptian prieſts aſtrology and divine knowledge.

The third kind of magick containeth the whole philoſophy of nature; not the brablings of the [b] Ariſtotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmoſt virtues, and draweth them out of nature's hidden boſom to human uſe, Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Virtues hidden in the center of the center, according to the chymiſts. Of this ſort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa Nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before theſe, in elder times, and who better underſtood the power of nature, and how to apply things that work to things that ſuffer, were Zoroaſter before ſpoken of: Apollonius Tyanæus remembred by St. Jerome to Paulinus; in ſome mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians, Theſpion: among the Egyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperborians (as is ſuppoſed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Pet. Aponenſis. The magick which theſe men profeſs'd is thus defin'd. Magia eſt connexio à viro ſapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, ſibi congruenter reſpondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant non ſine eorum admiratione qui cauſam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, anſwerable each to other, wrought by a wiſe man to the bringing forth of ſuch effects, as are wonderful to thoſe that know not their cauſes. In all theſe three kinds which other men divide into four, it ſeemeth that Zoroaſter was exceedingly learned; eſpecially in the firſt and higheſt. For in his oracles he confeſſeth God to be the Creator of the univerſal: he believeth of the [c] Trinity, which he could not inveſtigate by any natural knowledge: he ſpeaketh of angels, and of Paradiſe: approveth the immortality of the ſoul: teacheth truth, faith, hope, and love, diſcourſing of the abſtinence and charity of the magi: which oracles of his, [d] Pſellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others have gathered and tranſlated.

Of this Zoroaſter, [e] Euſebius in the theology of the Phenicians uſing Zoroaſter's own words: Hæc ad verbum ſcribit (ſaith Euſebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, ſempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, ſibi ipſi ſimillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus: prudentiſſimus, pater juris, ſine doctrina juſtitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, ſapiens, ſacræ naturæ unicus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaſter, word for word. God the firſt incorruptible, everlaſting, unbegotten, without parts, moſt like himſelf, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the beſt, the wiſeſt, the father of right, having learn'd juſtice without teaching, perfect wiſe by nature, the only inventor thereof.

Sixtus Senenſis, [f] ſpeaking of the wiſdom of the Chaldeans, doth diſtinguiſh thoſe wiſe men into five orders, to wit, Chaſcedim, or Chaldeans: Aſaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he tranſlates Arioli or Sophiſts) Mechaſphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poiſoners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruſpices, or Diviners.

Chaſcedim were thoſe which had the name of Chaldeans, which were aſtronomers; Hi cœlorum motus diligentiſſime ſpectárunt; Theſe did moſt diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham deſcribeth.

Aſaphim were in the old Latin tranſlation called philoſophers: of the Septuagint and of Jerome, magicians: Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum cauſis philoſophati ſunt; Who diſcourſed of the cauſes of all things, as well divine as human: of whom Origen, makes Balaam the ſon of Beor, to be the firſt: but [g] Laertius aſcribeth the invention of this art to Zoroaſtres the Perſian.

Chartumim, or inchanters, the diſciples (ſaith St. Anguſtine, Pliny and Juſtin) of another Zoroaſtres: who corrupted the admirable wiſdom of the magi, which he received from his anceſtors.

Mecaſphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are thoſe of which we have ſpoken already out of his majeſty's book of Demonology.

Gazarim, or Aruſpices, after St. Jerome, which divine from the entrails of beaſts ſlain for ſacrifices: or by Gazarim others underſtand Augures, who divine by the flying, ſinging, or feeding of birds.

By this diſtinction we may perceive the difference between thoſe wiſe men which the kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profeſſion of the magi among the ancient Perſians was moſt honeſt. For as Peucer truly obſerveth, [h] Præerant religioni Perſicæ, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, ſtudiiſq; veræ philoſophiæ dediti erant: nec quiſquam Rex Perſarum poterat eſſe, qui non antea magorum diſciplinam ſcientiamque percepiſſet. The magi (ſaith he) were the chief miniſters of the Perſian religion, as the Levites among God's people, and they were given to the ſtudies of true philoſophy: neither could any be king of the Perſians, who had not firſt been exerciſed in the myſteries and knowledge of the magi. Sixtus Senenſis in the defence of Origen againſt Polychronius and Theophilus hath two kinds of magick; his own words are theſe: [i] Et ne quem moveant præmiſſa Polychronii & Theophili teſtimonia, ſciendum eſt duplicem eſſe magiam; alteram ubique ab Origene damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita aut vere aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origene laudatam, quæ ad practicen naturalis philoſophiæ pertinet docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium: That the teſtimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius, ſaith he, may not move any man, it is to be underſtood that magick is of two ſorts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or ſeemingly) by covenants made with devils: the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practic part of natural philoſophy, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of natural virtues, agent and ſuffering reciprocally. This partition Jerome doth embrace in the firſt of his commentaries upon Daniel; where conſidering of the difference which Daniel makes between theſe four kinds of wiſe men formerly remembred, he uſeth this diſtinction; Quos nos Hariolos, cæteri ἐπαοιδοὺς (id eſt) Incantatores interpretati ſunt, videntur mihi eſſe qui verbis rem peragunt; magi, qui de ſingulis philoſophantur; malefici, qui ſanguine utuntur & victimis, & ſæpe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldæis Genethliacos ſignificari puto, quos vulgo mathematicos vocant. Conſuetudo autem communis magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem ſuam, eo quod ſint philoſophi Chaldæorum: & ad artis hujus ſcientiam reges quoque & principes ejuſdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini Salvatoris ipſi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes in ſanctam Bethlehem adoraverunt puerum, ſtella deſuper oſtendente. They whom we call ſorcerers, and others interpret inchanters, ſeem to me ſuch as perform things by words; magicians, ſuch as handle every thing philoſophically; witches, that uſe blood and ſacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldeans I take them to be ſignified by the name of conjecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call mathematicians. But common cuſtom takes magicians for witches, who are otherwiſe reputed in their own nation: for they are the philoſophers of the Chaldeans: yea kings and princes of that nation do all that they do according to the knowledge of this art: whence at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour they firſt of all underſtood his birth, and coming unto holy Bethlehem did worſhip the child, the ſtar from above ſhewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference between the doctrine of a magician, and the abuſe of the word. For tho' ſome writers affirm, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunque; That he is called a magician now-a-days, who having entered league with the devil, uſeth his help to any matter; yet (as our Saviour ſaid of divorce) it was not ſo from the beginning. For the art of magick is of the wiſdom of nature; other arts which undergo that title were invented by the falſhood, ſubtlety and envy of the devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the uſe of certain ceremonies per malam fidem, by an evil faith: in the former no other ill, than the inveſtigation of thoſe virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work to things that ſuffer. And tho' by the Jews thoſe excellent magicians, philoſophers and divines, which came to worſhip our Saviour Chriſt, were termed Mechaſchephim, or Mecaſphim; yet had they no other reaſon than common cuſtom therein. Conſuetudo autem communis magos pro maleficis accipit; Common cuſtom, ſaith [a] St. Jerome, underſtandeth witches under the name of magicians: and antiquity, ſaith [b] Peter Martyr, by the word [magi] underſtood good and wiſe men. [c] Quid igitur expaveſcis magi nomen formidoloſe, nomen evangelio gratioſum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, ſed ſapientem ſonat & ſacerdotem? O thou fearful one, ſaith Ficinius, why doubteſt thou to uſe the name of Magus, a name gracious in the goſpel, which doth not ſignify a witch or conjurer, but a wiſe man and a prieſt? For what brought this ſlander to that ſtudy and profeſſion but only idle ignorance, the parent of cauſeleſs admiration? [d] Cauſa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ revera opera naturalia ſunt: veruntamen quia procuratione dæmonum naturas ipſas vel conjungentium, vel commiſcentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta ſunt, opera dæmonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus hujuſmodi eſt magia naturalis, quam necromantiam multi improprie vocant. The marvelloufneſs of ſome works, which indeed are natural, hath been the cauſe of this ſlander: but becauſe theſe works have been done by procurement of devils joining the natures together, or mingling them, or howſoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the works of the devils by the ignorant. Among theſe works is natural magick, which men call very improperly necromancy.

Mirandula in his Apology goeth further: [e] For by underſtanding, ſaith he, the uttermoſt activity of natural agents we are aſſiſted to know the divinity of Chriſt: for otherwiſe (to uſe his own words) Ignoratis terminis potentiæ & virtutis rerum naturalium, ſtat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Chriſtus, poſſe fieri per media naturalia; The terms or limits of natural power and virtue not underſtood, we muſt needs doubt whether thoſe very works which Chriſt did, may not be done by natural means: after which he goeth on in this ſort: Ideo non hæretice, non ſuperſtitioſe dixi, ſed veriſſime & Catholice, per talem magiam adjuvari nos in cognoſcenda divinitate Chriſti; Therefore I ſaid not heretically, not ſuperſtitiouſly, but moſt truly and catholickly, that by ſuch magick we are furthered in knowing the divinity of Chriſt. And ſeeing the Jews and others the enemies of Chriſtian religion, do impudently and impiouſly object, that thoſe miracles which Chriſt wrought were not above nature, but by the exquiſite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years fuller of knowledge than any that this latter age hath brought forth, might with good reaſon avow, that the uttermoſt of nature's works being known, the works which Chriſt did, and which (as himſelf witneſſeth) no man could do, do manifeſtly teſtify of themſelves, that they were performed by that hand which held nature therein but as a pencil, and by a power infinitely ſupreme and divine: and thereby thoſe that were faithleſs, were either converted or put to ſilence.

SECT. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient magick is not to be condemned; tho' the devil here as in other kinds, hath ſought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.

SEEING therefore it is confeſſed by all of underſtanding, that a magician (according to the Perſian word) is no other than Divinorum cultor & interpres; A ſtudious obſerver and expounder of divine things: and the art itſelf (I mean the art of natural magick) no other, Quam naturalis philoſophiæ abſoluta conſummatio, Than the abſolute perfection of natural philoſophy. Certainly then it proceedeth from ignorance, and no way ſorteth with wiſe and learned men promiſcue, and without difference and diſtinction, to confound lawful and praiſe-worthy knowledge with that impious, and, to uſe St. Paul's words, With thoſe beggarly rudiments, which the devil hath ſhuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceleſs men. For if we condemn natural magick, or the wiſdom of nature, becauſe the devil, who knoweth more than any man, doth alſo teach witches and poiſoners the harmful parts of herbs, drugs, minerals, and excrements: then may we by the ſame rule condemn the phyſician, and the art of healing. For the devil alſo in the oracles of Amphia-

rans, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in dreams, what herbs and drugs were proper for ſuch and ſuch diſeaſes. Now no man of judgment is ignorant, that the devil from the beginning hath ſought to thruſt himſelf into the ſame employment among the miniſters and ſervants of God, changing himſelf for that purpoſe into an angel of light. He hath led men to idolatry as a doctrine of religion; he hath thruſt in his prophets among thoſe of the true God; he hath corrupted the art of aſtrology, by giving a divine power to the ſtars, teaching men to eſteem them as gods, and not as inſtruments. And (as [a] Bunting obſerveth) it is true that judicial aſtrology is corrupted with many ſuperſtitions: but the abuſe of the thing takes not away the art; conſidering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience ſheweth) have and exerciſe their operation upon the inferiour. For the ſun, and the ſtar of Mars do dry; the moon doth moiſten, and govern the tides of the ſea. Again, the planets, as they have ſeveral and proper names, ſo have they ſeveral and proper virtues: the ſtars do alſo differ in beauty and in magnitude; and to all the ſtars hath God given alſo their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) needed not. [b] He counteth the number of the ſtars, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celeſtial influences, the devil ceaſeth not to ſhuffle in his ſuperſtitions: and ſo to the knowledge of the ſecret virtues of nature hath he faſtned his doctrine of characters, numbers and incantations; and taught men to believe in the ſtrength of words and letters: (which without faith in God are but ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the all-powerful word of God, or to diminiſh the glory of God's creating word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, He was never ignorant, that both the wiſe and the ſimple obſerve when the ſea-birds forſake the ſhores and fly into the land, that commonly ſome great ſtorm followeth; that the high flying of the kite and the ſwallow betokeneth fair weather; that the crying of crows and bathing of ducks foreſhew rain: for they feel the air moiſtened in their quills. And it is written in Jeremy the prophet, [c] Even the ſtork in the air knoweth her appointed times, and the turtle, and the crane, and the ſwallow. Hereupon this enemy of mankind working upon theſe, as upon the reſt of God's creatures, long time abuſed the heathen, by teaching them to obſerve the flying of fowls, and thereby to judge of good or ill ſucceſs in the war: and withal to look into their entrails for the ſame, as if God had written the ſecrets of unſearchable providence in the livers and bowels of birds and beaſts. Again, becauſe it pleaſed God ſometimes by dreams, not only to warn and teach his prophets and apoſtles, but heathen princes alſo; as [d] Abimelech to reſtore Sarah to Abraham; becauſe he admoniſhed Joſeph, and by dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharaoh, Solomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the eaſt, and others. For as it is remembred in Job: [e] In dreams and viſions of the night when ſleep falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the ears, that he might cauſe man to return from his enterpriſe: therefore, I ſay, doth the devil alſo practiſe his divinations by dreams, or after [f] Pariſienſis, Divinitatis imitationes, His mock divinity. This in the end grew ſo common, as Ariſtides compiled an Ephemerides of his own dreams: Mithridates of thoſe of his concubines. Yea, the Romans finding the inconvenience hereof, becauſe all dreams, without diſtinction of cauſes, were drawn to divination, forbad the ſame by a law, as by the words of prohibition, [g] Aut narrandis ſomniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi, it may appear. Likewiſe by the law of God in Deuteronomy xiii. ſeducing dreamers were ordered to be ſlain. Yet it is not to be contemned that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his dream for two grievous diſeaſes that oppreſs'd him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemy's poiſon'd wound; nor that which [h] St. Auguſtine reporteth of a Millanoiſe, whoſe ſon (the father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his father in a dream where the acquittance lay to diſcharge it; nor that of Aſtyages of his daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reaſon of all which, foraſmuch as the cauſe is not in ourſelves, this place denieth diſpute.

SECT. IV.

That Daniel's miſliking Nabuchodonoſor's condemning of the magicians doth not juſtify all their practices.

BUT it may be objected, that if ſuch divinations as the heathens commonly uſed were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and ſtrange revelations: how came it to paſs that Daniel both condemned the haſty ſentence of Nabuchodonoſor againſt the magicians of Chaldea, and in a ſort forbad it? eſpecially conſidering that ſuch kind of people [i] God himſelf commanded to be ſlain. To this divers anſwers may be given. Firſt, It ſeemeth that Daniel had reſpect to thoſe Chaldeans, becauſe they acknowledged that the dream of the king, which himſelf had forgotten, could not be known to any man by any art, either natural or diabolical: For there is no other (ſaid the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whoſe dwelling is not with fleſh: and herein they confeſſed the power of the ever-living God.

Secondly, It may be conjectured, and that with good reaſon, that among ſo many learned men, ſome of them did not exerciſe themſelves in any evil or unlawful arts, but were merely magicians and naturaliſts: and therefore when the king commanded to kill all, Daniel perſuaded the contrary, and called it a haſty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that ſome of thoſe mens ſtudies and profeſſions were lawful, it may be gathered by Daniel's inſtructions: For himſelf had been taught by them, and was called chief of the inchanters; of which ſome were termed Soothſayers, others Aſtrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wiſemen: and therefore of diſtinct profeſſions.

Thirdly, Daniel miſliked and forbad the execution of that judgment, becauſe it was unjuſt. For howſoever thoſe men might deſerve puniſhment for the practice of unlawful arts (tho' not unlawful according to the law of that ſtate) yet herein they were altogether guiltleſs. For it exceeded human power to pierce the king's thought, which the devil himſelf could not know. So then in Daniel's diſlike, and hindering of the execution of ſentence of death pronounced againſt the magicians, there is no abſolute juſtifying of their practice and profeſſion.

SECT. V.

The abuſe of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right uſe of them.

NOtwiſtanding this mixture every where of good with evil, of falſhood with truth, of corruption with cleanneſs and purity: the good, the truth, the purity in every kind may well be embraced: as in the ancient worſhipping of God by ſacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the elders, that therefore forbare to offer ſacrifice to the God of all power, becauſe the devil in the image of Baal, Aſtaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like, was ſo adored.

Neither did the abuſe of aſtrology terrify Abraham (if we may believe the moſt ancient and religious [a] hiſtorians) from obſerving the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wiſe and learned men in theſe days from attributing thoſe virtues, influences, and inclinations to the ſtars and other lights of heaven, which God hath given to thoſe his glorious creatures.

The ſympathetical and antipathetical working of herbs, plants, ſtones, minerals, with their other utmoſt virtues ſometimes taught by the devil, and applied by his miniſters to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrify the honeſt and learned phyſician or magician from the uſing of them to the help and comfort of mankind: neither can the illuſions whereby the devil betrayeth ſuch men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the obſervation of dreams; ſo far as with a good faith and a religious caution they may make uſe of them.

Laſtly, The [b] prohibition to mark flying of fowls (as ſigns of good or evil ſucceſs) hath no reference at all to the crying of crows againſt rain, or to any obſervation not ſuperſtitious, and whereof a reaſon or cauſe may be given. For if we confound arts with the abuſe of them, we ſhall not only condemn all honeſt trades and interchange among men (for there are that deceive in all profeſſions) but we ſhall in a ſhort time bury in forgetfulneſs all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obſcure and cover it over with a moſt ſcornful and beggarly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we ſhould ſhew our ſelves Ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce; Unthankful we ſhould ſhew ourſelves toward thoſe, who with pains and care have diſcovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed not only theſe natural knowledges are condemned by thoſe that are ignorant; but the mathematicks alſo and profeſſors thereof; tho' thoſe that are excellently learned judge of it in this ſort. [c] In ſpeculo mathematico verum illud, quod in omni ſcibili quæritur, relucet; non modo remota ſimilitudine, ſed fulgida quadam propinquitate; In the glaſs of the mathematicks, that truth doth ſhine, which is ſought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obſcure image, but in a near and manifeſt repreſentation.

SECT. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful magick.

IT is true that there are many arts, if we may ſo call them, which are covered with the name of magick, and eſteemed abuſively to be as branches of that tree, on whoſe root they never grew. The firſt of theſe hath the name of Necromancy or Goetia: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an invocation at the graves of the dead, to whom the devil himſelf gives anſwer inſtead of thoſe that ſeem to appear. For certain it is, that the immortal ſouls of men do not inhabit the duſt and dead bodies, but they give motion and underſtanding to the living: death being nothing elſe but a ſeparation of the body and ſoul: and therefore the ſoul is not to be found in the graves.

A ſecond practice of thoſe men, who pay tribute, or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring or of raiſing up devils, of whom they hope to learn what they liſt. Theſe men are ſo diſtracted, as to believe that by terrible words they make the devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a circle (a circle which cannot keep out a mouſe) they therein, as they ſuppoſe, inſconce themſelves againſt that great monſter. Doubtleſs they forgot that the devil is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodneſs; no, not by the fearful word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to ſit in God's ſeat; that he made no ſcruple to tempt our Saviour Chriſt, whom himſelf called the Son of God. So, forgetting theſe proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet reſolve himſelf, that he can draw the devil out of hell, and terrify him with a phraſe: whereas in very truth, the obedience which devils ſeem to uſe, is but thereby to poſſeſs themſelves of the bodies and ſouls of thoſe which raiſe them up; as his majeſty in his book aforenamed hath excellently taught, That the devil's obedience is only ſecundum quid, ſcilicet, ex pacto; reſpective, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can do upon thoſe ſimple and ignorant devils, which inhabit [d] Jamblicus's imagination; but ſure I am, the reſt are apt enough to come uncalled: and always attending the cogitations of their ſervants and vaſſals, do no way need any ſuch inforcement.

Or it may be that theſe conjurers deal altogether with Cardan's mortal devils, following the opinion of [e] Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that theſe kind of devils lived not above a thouſand years: which Plutarch, in his treatiſe De oraculorum defectu, confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true, that the devils were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they always fear thoſe words or threats, by which at other times they are willingly maſtered. But the [f] familiar of Simon Magus, when he had lifted him up in the air, caſt him headlong out of his claws, when he was ſure he ſhould periſh with the fall. If this perhaps were done by St. Peter's prayers (of which St. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the ſame prank at other times upon his own accord the devil play'd with [g] Theodotus: who tranſported (as Simon Magus was ſuppoſed to have been) had the ſame mortal fall that he had. The like ſucceſs had Budas, a principal pillar of the Manichean hereſy, as [h] Socrates in his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory witneſſeth: and for a manifeſt proof hereof, we ſee it every day, that the devil leaves all witches and ſorcerers at the gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himſelf a Pegaſus, to convey them in haſte to places far diſtant, or at leaſt makes them ſo think: [i] For to thoſe that received not the truth, ſaith St. Paul, God ſhall ſend them ſtrong illuſions. Of theſe their ſuppoſed tranſportations (yet agreeing with their confeſſions) his majeſty, in the 2d book and the 4th chapter of the Demonology, hath confirmed by unanſwerable reaſons, that they are merely illuſive. Another ſort there are who take on them to include ſpirits in glaſſes and cryſtals: of whom Cuſanus: [k] Fatui ſunt incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt ſpiritum includere: quia ſpiritus non clauditur corpore; They are fooliſh inchanters which will ſhut up their ſpirits within their nails or in a glaſs; for a ſpirit cannot be incloſed by a body.

There is alſo another art beſides the aforementioned, which they call Theurgia, or white magick; a pretended conference with good ſpirits or angels, whom by ſacrifice and invocation they draw out of heaven, and communicate withal. But the adminiſtring ſpirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator: ſo ſeeing they are moſt free ſpirits, there is no man ſo abſurd to think (except the devil have corrupted his underſtanding) that they can be conſtrained or commanded out of heaven by threats. Wherefore let the profeſſors thereof cover themſelves how they pleaſe by a profeſſed purity of life, by the miniſtry of infants, by faſting and abſtinence in general; yet all thoſe that tamper with immaterial ſubſtances and abſtract natures, either by ſacrifice, vow, or inforcement, are men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good ſpirits or angels cannot be conſtrained; and the reſt are devils which willingly obey.

Other ſorts there are of wicked divinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the air, called Matæotechnia, and the like.

The laſt, and, indeed, the worſt of all other is faſcination or witchcraft: the practiſers whereof are no leſs envious and cruel, revengeful and bloody, than the devil himſelf. And theſe accurſed creatures having ſold their ſouls to the devil, work two ways; either by the devil immediately, or by the art of poiſoning. The difference between necromancers and witches, his majeſty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a ſort) command, the other obey the devil.

There is another kind of petty witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of beaſts and birds, of which [a] Pythagoras was accuſed, becauſe an eagle lighted on his ſhoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the ſame exceeded the art of falconry, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's dove, which he had uſed to feed with wheat out of his ear: which dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's ſhoulder, and thruſt his bill therein to find his breakfaſt: Mahomet perſuading the rude and ſimple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghoſt that gave him advice. And certainly if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have ſhamed all the inchanters in the world: for whoſoever was moſt famous among them, could never maſter or inſtruct any beaſt as he did his horſe.

For the drawing of ſerpents out of their dens, or killing them in their holes by inchantments (which the Marſians, a people of Italy, practiſed. [b] Colubros diſrumpit Marſia cantu, Inchanting Marſia makes the ſnakes to burſt.) That it hath been uſed, it appears Pſalm lviii. 6. tho' I doubt not, but that many impoſtures may be in this kind; and even by natural cauſes it may be done. For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or deſtroy them; as womans hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other magick or inchantment, than to draw out a mouſe with a piece of toaſted cheeſe.

Of divers ways by which the devil ſeemeth to work his wonders.

BUT to the end that we may not doat with the Manichees, who make two powers of Gods: that we do not give to the devil any other dominion than he hath (not to ſpeak of his ability, when he is the miniſter of God's vengeance, as when Egypt, according to David, was deſtroyed by evil angels) he otherwiſe worketh but three ways: the firſt is, by moving the cogitations and affections of men: the ſecond, by the exquiſite knowledge of nature: and the third, by deceit, illuſion, and falſe ſemblance. And that they cannot work what they would, G. Pariſienſis giveth three cauſes: the firſt a natural impotency: the ſecond, their own reaſon diſſwading them from daring over much, or indeed (and that which is the only certain cauſe) the great mercy of the Creator, [c] Tenens eos ligatos (ſaith the ſame author) velut immaniſſimas belluas. St. Auguſtine was of opinion, that the frogs which Pharaoh's ſorcerers produced were not natural, but that the devil (by betraying of their ſenſes that looked on) made them appear to be ſuch. For as Vairus obſerveth, thoſe frogs of the inchanters were not found corrupted as thoſe of Moſes were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof ſaith St. Auguſtine, Nec ſane dæmones naturas creant, ſed quæ a Deo creatæ ſunt commutant, ut videantur eſſe quod non ſunt; The devils create not any natures, but ſo change thoſe that are created by God, as they ſeem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83d queſtion he giveth the reaſon, Dæmon quibuſdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis ſolet; that is, The devil fills with certain clouds all paſſages of the underſtanding, by which the beam of the mind is wont to open the light of reaſon.

And as Tertullian in his book de anima rightly conceiveth, if the devil can poſſeſs himſelf of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazle thoſe of the body. For (out of doubt) by the ſame way that God paſſeth out, the devil entreth in, beginning with the fancy, by which he doth more eaſily betray the other faculties of the ſoul: for the [d] fancy is moſt apt to be abuſed by vain apprehenſions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that thoſe frogs were not imaginary, but ſuch indeed as they ſeemed: not made magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the art, but (according to Thomas) per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem, By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moſes could not be deceived by that ſleight of falſe ſemblance; and St. Auguſtine in another caſe like unto this, to wit, of the turning of Diomedes's companions into birds, per activa cum paſſivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: tho' I am not perſuaded that St. Auguſtine believed that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Pariſienſis, a man very learned, alſo confirmeth. For ſpeaking of natural magick, he uſeth theſe words. [e] De hujuſmodi autem operibus eſt ſubita generatio ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus ſola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adjutoriis, quæ ipſa ſemina naturæ confortant & acuunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc neſciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere conſuevit) ſed potentia dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in hiis docti ſunt talia non mirantur, ſed ſolum Creatorem in hiis glorificant; In ſuch works, ſaith he, the ſudden generation of frogs, and lice, and worms, and ſome other creatures is: in all which nature alone worketh; but by means ſtrengthening the ſeeds of nature, and quickning them; in ſuch wiſe that they ſo haſten the work of generation, that it ſeemeth to the ignorant not to be the work of nature, which uſually worketh more leiſurely, but they think it is done by the powers of devils. But they who are learned in theſe arts marvel not at ſuch working, but glorify the Creator. Now by theſe two ways, the devils do moſt frequently work, to wit, by knowing the uttermoſt of nature; and by illuſion: for there is no incomprehenſible or unſearchable power, but of God only.

For ſhall we ſay, he cauſed ſometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempeſts; and can infect the air, as well as move it or compreſs it; who knows not that theſe things are alſo natural? or may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illuſion? it is true, that he ſometimes doth it; but how? in elder ages he ſtole his knowledge out of the predictions of the prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at ſuch time as he was in his own poſſeſſion and power to diſpoſe of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the world to this day, and obſerved the ſucceſs of every council: he that by reaſon of his ſwift motions can inform himſelf of all places, and preparations: he that is of counſel with all thoſe that ſtudy and practiſe ſubverſion and deſtruction: [a] he that is prince of the air, and can thence better judge, than thoſe that inhabit the earth: if he ſhould not ſometimes, yea if he ſhould not very oftentimes, gueſs rightly of things to come (where God pleaſeth not to give impediment) it were very ſtrange. For we ſee that wiſe and learned men do oftentimes by comparing like cauſes conceive rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore anſwereth by riddles, as,

Cræſus Halym penetrans magnam ſubvertit opum vim.

If Cræſus over Halys go,
Great kingdoms he ſhall overthrow.

Which anſwer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own kingdom, or of his enemies. And thus far we grant the devil may proceed in predictions, which otherwiſe belong to God only; as it is in Iſaiah, Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods: ſhew us at all times and certainly what is to come. [b] Solius enim divinæ intelligentiæ ac ſapientiæ eſt occulta nôſſe & revelare; It is only proper to God's underſtanding and wiſdom to know and reveal hidden things.

SECT. VIII.

That none was ever raiſed from the dead by the power of the devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the devil hath raiſed from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel raiſed by the witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed that ſome of the devil's acts exceeded all the powers of nature, falſe ſemblance, and other illuſions. [c] Juſtin Martyr was ſometimes of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed: and ſo was Ambroſe, Lyra, and Burgenſis; from which authorities thoſe men borrow ſtrength which ſo believe. But Martyr changed his opinion: and ſo did St. Auguſtine, who at firſt ſeemed to be indifferent: for in his queſtions upon the Old and New Teſtament, he accounteth it deteſtable to think that it was Samuel which appeared: and theſe be his words elſewhere to the ſame effect: In requie ſunt animæ piorum a corpore ſeparatæ, impiorum autem pœnas luunt, donec iſtarum ad vitam æternam, illarum vero ad æternam mortem quæ ſecunda dicitur corpora reviviſcant; The ſouls of the godly ſeparated from their bodies are at reſt, but thoſe of the wicked ſuffer puniſhment, till the bodies of the juſt riſe to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and ſecond death.

And (beſides [d] St. Auguſtine) Juſtin Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanaſius, Chryſoſtom, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the ſouls of men being once ſeparate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all. Credere debemus (ſaith Cyril) quum a corporibus ſanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus chariſſimi patris Bonitati divinæ commendari; We muſt believe when the ſouls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodneſs as into the hands of a moſt dear father. If then they be in heaven, the power of the devil cannot ſtretch ſo high: if in hell, ab inferno nulla eſt redemptio, from hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death; Unum (ſaith Auguſtine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternal fire; the other in God's eternal kingdom. And tho' it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Gloſs upon the ſame text finds it ridiculous. [e] Credunt & male, quia ſunt phantaſmata (ſaith the Gloſs;) They believe, and they believe amiſs, becauſe they be but phantaſms, or apparitions. For whereas any ſuch voice hath been heard, ſaying, I am the ſoul of ſuch a one; hæc oratio a fraude atque deceptione diabolica eſt; That ſpeech is framed by the fraud and deception of the devil, ſaith Chryſoſtom. Likewiſe of the ſame faith Tertullian. Abſit ut animam cujuſlibet ſancti, nedum prophetæ, a dæmonio credamus extractam; God forbid that we ſhould think that the ſoul of any holy man, much leſs of a prophet, ſhould be drawn up again by a devil.

It is true that the ſcriptures call that apparition Samuel; ſo do they the wooden images Cherubins: and falſe brazen gods are called gods, and the like. And whereas theſe of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26th of Eccleſiaſticus (a book not numbered among the canonical ſcriptures) as St. Auguſtine himſelf in his treatiſe, if it be his, de cura pro mortuis agenda, confeſſeth; yet Siracides following the literal ſenſe and phraſe of the ſcriptures, proveth nothing at all: for tho' the devil would willingly perſuade, that the ſouls (yea even of juſt men) were in his power, yet ſo far is it from the promiſes of the ſcriptures, and from God's juſt and merciful nature, and ſo contrary to all divine reaſon, as St. Auguſtine (or whoſoever wrote that book before cited) might rightly term it a deteſtable opinion ſo to think. For if God had ſo abſolutely forſaken Saul, that he refuſed to anſwer him either by dreams, by Urim, or by his prophets: it were ſottiſh to conceive, that he would permit the devil, or a wicked witch to raiſe a prophet from the dead in Saul's reſpect: it being alſo [f] contrary to his own divine law to ask counſel of the dead; as in Deuteronomy 18, and elſewhere. Therefore it was the devil, and not

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his wife Semiramis: and of other of her acts.

SECT. I.

Of the magnificent building of Nineveh by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BUT to come back to Ninus the amplifier and finiſher of Nineveh: whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaſter, it is uncertain. As for the city it ſelf, it is agreed by all prophane writers, and confirmed by the ſcriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and anſwerable magnificence. For it had in compaſs [a] 440 ſtadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had ſuch a breadth as three chariots might paſs on the rampire in front: theſe walls were garniſhed with 1500 towers which gave exceeding beauty to the reſt, and a ſtrength no leſs admirable for the nature of thoſe times.

But this city (built in the plains of Aſſyria, and on the banks of Tigris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus's time; and (as ancient hiſtorians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campſor, at ſuch time as Ninus amplified the ſame, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

For theſe works of Babylon and Nineveh begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Aſſyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. [b] Ninus finiſhed Nineveh, Semiramis Babylon: wherein ſhe ſought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed in the firſt age when princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded; labouring to build towns and villages for the uſe of themſelves and their people without either walls or towers; and how they might diſcharge the earth of woods, briars, buſhments, and waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that age, when ambition was in ſtrong youth: and purpoſing to follow the conqueſt which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and ſtrength to Babylon which it had.

SECT. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis's reign.

THIS ſhe did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had maſtered Bactria, and ſubjected unto his empire all thoſe regions between it and the Mediterranean ſea and Helleſpont (Aſia the leſs excepted) and finiſhed the work of Nineveh, he left the world in the year thereof 2019 after he had reigned 52 years. Plutarch reporteth, that Semiramis deſired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the abſolute ſoveraign power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Atheneus, and others, ſpeak of five days. In which time (moved either with deſire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who periſhed for her) ſhe cauſed Ninus her husband to be ſlain. But this ſeemeth rather a ſcandal caſt on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howſoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the ſole rule of the Aſſyrian empire: of which Ninus was ſaid to be the firſt monarch, becauſe he changed his ſeat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Nineveh in Aſſyria. [c] Juſtin reports that Semiramis (the better to inveſt herſelf, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her ſo great a charge) preſented herſelf to the people in the perſon of her ſon Ninias or Zameis, who bare her external form and proportion without any ſenſible difference.

This report I take alſo to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as ſhe ruled long, ſo ſhe performed all thoſe memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and ſubſcribed that letter which ſhe ſent to the king of India (her laſt challenge and undertaken conqueſt) by her own name. And were it true that her ſon Ninias had ſuch a ſtature at his father's death, as that Semiramis (who was very perſonable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that ſhe could have held the empire from him 42 years after by any ſuch ſubtilty (for ſo long ſhe reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleaſures, as it is written of him) was well pleaſed with his mother's proſperous government and undertakings.

SECT. III.

Of Semiramis's parentage, and education, and metamorphoſis of her mother.

SOME writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of baſe parentage, calling her after the name of her country, a Syrian. Beroſus calls her after the name of her city wherein ſhe was born, Semiramis Aſcalonitis, of Aſcalon, the ancient city and metropolis of the Philiſtines. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Courtizan of Aſcalon, exceeding beautiful. Others ſay that this Derceta or Dercetis, the mother of Semiramis, was ſometime a recluſe, and had profeſs'd a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a temple dedicated ſeated on the bank of a lake adjoining to Aſcalon; and afterwards falling in love with a goodly young man, ſhe was by him made with child, which (for fear of extreme puniſhment) ſhe conveyed away, and cauſed the ſame to be hidden among the high reeds which grew on the banks of the lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild beasts) the same was fed by certain birds, which used to feed upon or near those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoyning to this lake had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of vow; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her temple into the lake adjoining, and (as the poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and human shape. It is thought, that from this Derceta the invention of that idol of the Philistines (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a man's face, and a fish's body: into whose temple when the ark of God was brought, the idol fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained only the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so St. Jerome hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius writ it by Dagon only, which signifieth a fish, and so it only appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my self I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistines was an idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary sea-gods under Neptune. For this city being maritimate (as all those of the Philistines were, and so were the best of Phenicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

SECT. IV.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUT for her pedigree I leave it to the Assyrian heralds: and for her vicious life I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and ease do more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this lady, then there never lived any prince or princess more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon, and elsewhere, and for the wars she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprise of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus, report that she never returned: and that of all her most powerful army there survived but only 20 persons: the rest being either drowned in the river of Indus, dead of the famine, or slain by the sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbred: so were those that returned less than could have escaped of such an army, as consisted of four millions and upwards. For these numbers which she levied by her lieutenant Dercetæus (saith [a] Suidas) did consist of footmen three millions; of horsemen one millon; of chariots armed with hooks on each side one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon camels as many; of camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw hides for all uses three hundred thousand; of gallies with brazen heads three thousands, by which she might transport over Indus at once three hundred thousand soldiers: which gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every man and beast but fed upon grass) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivilous reports: so Diodorus himself hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes's expedition into Greece, and afterwards: whose army (tho' the same was far inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to overload the belief of any reasonable man. For all authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an army of 1700000 and gathered together (therein to pass the Hellespont) three thousand gallies, as Herodotus out of the several provinces whence those gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soever the army of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken, and overthrown by Staurobates upon the banks of Indus, canticum cantavit extremum, she sang her last song; and (as antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a dove (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a dove in their ensigns.

SECT. V.

Of the temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the pyramids of Egypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the wall of the city of Babylon) was the temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this city, invironed with a wall carried four square of great height and beauty, having on each square certain brazen gates curiously engraven. In the Core of the square she raised a tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a basis of a less circuit) she set a second tower; and so eight in all, one above another: upon the top whereof the Chaldeans priests made the observation of the stars, because this tower overtopped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruins of this tower, have many travellers been deceived; who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's tower, when it was but the foundation of this temple of Bel (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This temple did Nabuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Jerusalem, and of the temple of Solomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This temple Xerxes evened with the soil; which Alexander is said to have repaired by the persuasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have been in his desire so to do; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. the Egyptians (saith [b] Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the same superstition of the stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramids by Memphis, which were conspicuæ undique navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these pyramids [c] Bellonius, a careful observer of rarities (who being in Egypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommite, & tirant une fleche en l'air, a peine pouroit l'envoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez. The best archer standing on the top of one of these pyramids, and shooting an arrow from thence into the air as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

The SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham : And of the uſe of this Queſtion, for the ordering of the Story of the Aſſyrian Empire.

SECT. I.

Of ſome of the ſucceſſors of Semiramis : with a brief tranſition to the queſtion, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

AFTER the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis ſucceeded her in the empire, on whom Beroſus Anniaus beſtows the conqueſt of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaſter; contrary to Diodorus, Juſtin, Oroſius, and all other approved writers. For Ninias being eſteemed no man of war at all, but altogether feminine, and ſubjected to eaſe and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now becauſe there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealouſy he every year changed his provincial governours, and built colleges for the Chaldean prieſts, his aſtronomers: nor by Arius his ſucceſſor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Caſpians, revolted (as it ſeemeth) in Ninias's time; nor of Aralius, the ſucceſſor of Arius, but that he added ſumptuoſity, invented jewels of gold and ſtone, and ſome engines for the war: I will for this preſent paſs them over, and a while follow Abraham, whoſe ways are warrantable (till we meet theſe Aſſyrians again in this ſtory) by whom, and by whoſe iſſues we ſhall beſt give date to the kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balanius. For otherwiſe, if we ſeek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of thoſe times, which the ſcriptures ſet us down without error, by the reigns of the Aſſyrian princes, we ſhall but patch up the ſtory at adventure, and leave it in the ſame confuſion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the ſcriptures do not help us (as Plut. in Theſeo) Mirum non eſt in rebus antiquis hiſtoriam non conſtare: No marvel if then in things very ancient, hiſtory want aſſurance.

The

The better therefore to find out, in what age of the world, and how long theſe Aſſyrian kings reigned, as alſo for other good cauſes, we muſt firſt aſſure the time of Abraham's birth, and in what year the ſame happened after the flood. Now ſince all agree, that the forty-third year of Ninus was the birth year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the ſcriptures, in what year after the flood the birth of Abraham happened, we ſhall thereby ſet all the reſt in ſquare and order. But of this time there is much jangling between thoſe chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the moſt part make 292 or 293 years; others 352 years between Abraham's birth and the flood; a matter often diſputed, but never concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250 years from the flood to Ninus: then ſeeing that Abraham was born in the forty-third year of Ninus, according to Euſebius and St. Auguſtine, it followeth by the addition of thoſe two numbers, that the year of Abraham's birth was in the year after the flood 293, or, as the moſt part of all chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, ſince I do here enter into that never-reſolved queſtion, and labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give reaſon for my own opinion: and with ſo much the greater care and circumſpection, becauſe I walk aſide, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, tho' the fewer in number: with whom I rather chuſe to endure the wounds of thoſe darts, which envy caſteth at novelty, than to go on ſafely and ſleepily in the eaſy ways of ancient miſtakings: ſeeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diverſity.

SECT. II.

A propoſal of reaſons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292 after the flood, and not in the year 352.

THOSE which ſeeek to prove this account of 292 years, between the general flood and Abraham's birth, ground themſelves, firſt on theſe words of the ſcripture. So Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: 2dly, Upon the opinion of Joſephus, St. Auguſtine, Beda, Iſidore, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are ſlightly look'd over) ſeeming of great weight.

From the place of ſcripture laſt remembred, the latter chronologers gather theſe arguments. Firſt, Out of the words as they lie; that Terah at 70 years begat Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the firſt named, Abraham being the worthieſt, Abraham being the ſon of the promiſe, ought in this reſpect to be accounted the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and ſo neceſſarily born in the ſeventieth year of his life. Secondly, It was of Abraham that Moſes had reſpect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the bleſſing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the ſcope of this chapter was to ſet down the genealogy of Chriſt, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, That if Abraham were not the eldeſt ſon, then there can be no certainty of his age, and ſo are all future times made doubtful. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more aſſuredly in the 130th year of Terah's age, than in the year 131, 132, &c. Moſes having no-where ſet down preciſely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year in which his father died.

Fourthly, It is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130 years, ſeeing Abraham himſelf thought it a wonder to be made a father at 100 years.

SECT. III.

The anſwer to one of the objections propoſed, ſhewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Meſopotamia into Canaan: and that, after his father's death.

TO anſwer all which objections it is very eaſy, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned divines long ſince, and to which I will add ſomewhat of my own, according to the ſmall talent which God hath given me. Now foraſmuch as the ſtate of the queſtion cannot well be ſcanned, unleſs the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be firſt conſidered of; before I deſcend unto the particular examination of theſe arguments, I will make bold with order and method ſo far, as to ſearch into a ſtrange tradition concerning his travels, that ſerveth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwark againſt all that can be ſaid to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journies into Canaan: the latter after his father's death, the former preſently upon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not ſtaying for his father's death at Haran: a conjecture drawn from a place in the epiſtle to the Hebrews; where it is written, [a] By faith Abraham, when he was called, obeyed God, to go into a place, which he ſhould afterwards receive for an inheritance: and he went out not knowing whither he went. This ſuppoſition (if it be granted) ſerves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill ſtand without it. Let us therefore ſee whether we may give credit to the ſuppoſition it ſelf.

Surely that Abraham firſt departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his father, the ſame is proved, without the admiſſion of any diſtinction, by theſe words of St. Stephen: [b] And after his father was dead, God brought him into this land, where ye now dwell, that was out of Haran into Canaan. Againſt which place, ſo direct and plain, what force hath any man's fancy or ſuppoſition, perſuading that Abraham made two journies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after, no ſuch thing being found in the ſcriptures, nor any circumſtance, probability, or reaſon to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledg'd can pick any argument, proving, or affording any ſtrong preſumption, that Abraham paſſed into [c] Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a ſecond time: then I think it reaſon, that he be believed in the reſt. But that he performed the commandment of God after his father's death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the ſcriptures themſelves are true. For after his father was dead, ſaith the martyr Stephen, God brought him into this land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then muſt it be inferred, that Moſes omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, ſaith Beza, the knowledge of Abraham's coming into Canaan, but out of Moſes? For if Stephen had ſpoken any thing of thoſe times, differing from Moſes, he had offered the Jews his adverſaries too great an occaſion both of ſcandalizing himſelf and the goſpel of Chriſt. Indeed we ſhall find ſmall reaſon to make us think that Abraham paſſed and repaſſed thoſe ways, more often than he was enforced ſo to do, if we conſider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his faith in God's promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a region of strong and stubborn nations: a nation of valiant and resolved idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to fly into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no son to inherit the promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, Let us consider the ways themselves, which Abraham had to pass over, the length whereof was 300 English miles: and thro' countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great river of Euphrates, to travel thro' the dangerous and barren deserts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were easy walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300 miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For if he travelled it twice, then was his journey in all 1800 miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy, the manner of Abraham's departing from Haran hath more proof, that he had not Animum revertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any man's bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him: [a] Then Abraham took Sarah his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they possess'd, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his wife and kinsmen, and their goods; it is not probable, that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a country as that was: or if he could have been thereto moved, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and press'd with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a mere stranger both in religion and nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his father's death: so they perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say, that Abraham was in Haran at his father's death, or some time after, being then by their account 135 years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four or five years after that time his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he [b] bind with a very solemn oath his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a wife for Isaac his son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgment, in chusing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other desirable qualities, to be link'd in marriage with his only son, who was then 35 years old, before which age most of the patriarchs after the flood had begotten children, rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any in that country. But let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that somewhat happened which no man can devise. What might be the reason, that [c] Abraham's man, in doing his master's errand, was fain to lay open the whole story of his master's prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a son in her old age? If Abraham himself, a more certain author, had so lately been among them, would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how averse he was from permitting his son to be carried thither, even tho' a wife of his own kindred could not have been obtained without his personal presence. [d] Jacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a wife of his own lineage; not without God's special approbation, by whose [e] blessing he prospered in that journey: yet he lived there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himself away from thence by flight. For altho' it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's wife, contains much matter. Let us but consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was delivered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrews. When [f] Hezekiah was visited with an honourable embassy from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophecy which thereupon he heard by Isaiah, made him to know, that the counsel of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they sat down and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that [g] Sesac and Neco kings of Egypt brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt, I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomy xvii. 16. that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their king might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: that he never did return, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can persuade those of judgment or understanding: I take it sufficient, that St. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead.

[a] Gen. 12. 5. [b] Gen. 24. [c] Gen. 24. 35, 36, &c. [d] Gen. 24. 6, 8. [e] Gen. 28. [f] 2 Kings 20. [g] Psal. 137. 1 Kings 14. 25. and 2 Kings 23. 29.

And for the reſt, when they ſhew any one ſcripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travels of Abraham are preciſely ſet down in the ſcriptures: as firſt from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea, to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his father's death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt: from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, becauſe their flocks and herds of cattle were more than could be fed in that part: from thence the ſecond time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron: and thence having purſued Amraphel, and reſcued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, under Abimilech: and after near unto it at Berſabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his ſon Iſaac on the mountain Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one ſtory, either divine or human. Now if it may be ſuppoſed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita in his Cabala hath feigned, it ſhould in reaſon be therewithal believed, that he would in thoſe his firſt travels have provided himſelf of ſome certain ſeat, or place of abiding: and not have come a ſecond time, with his wife, kinſmen, family, goods and cattle, not knowing whereon to reſt himſelf. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, paſs'd thro' the north part of Canaan, thence to [a] Sichem, and the plain of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and ſo from nation to nation, to diſcover and find out ſome fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Geneſis xi. He went forth, going and journeying towards the ſouth, and always unſettled. By occaſion of which wandring to and fro, ſome ſay, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebræi. [b] Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the country, we may note, that ere he came to Bethel and Hai, and at his firſt entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, ſaying, Unto thy ſeed will I give this land, ſhewing it him as unto a ſtranger therein, and as a land to him unknown. For Abraham, without any other provident care for himſelf, believed in the word of the living God: neither ſending before, nor coming firſt to diſcover it; but being arrived he received a ſecond promiſe from God, that he would give thoſe countries unto him and his ſeed to inhabit and inherit.

Laſtly, What ſhould move any man to think, that Moſes would have omitted any ſuch double journey of Abraham's, ſeeing he ſetteth down all his paſſages elſewhere, long and ſhort? As when he moved from Sichem, and ſeated between Hai and Bethel, the diſtance being but twenty miles: and when he moved thence to the valley of Mamre, being but twenty-four miles; and when he left Mamre, and ſat down at Gerar, being leſs than ſix miles; no, Moſes paſs'd over all the times of the firſt age with the greater brevity, to haſten him to the ſtory of Abraham: ſhutting up all between the creation and the flood in ſix chapters; which age laſted 1656 years: but he beſtoweth on the ſtory of Abraham fourteen chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleventh, and ending with his death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175 years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moſes forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions: or that he would ſet down thoſe ſmall removes of five miles, and omit thoſe of three hundred. For ſuch a journey in going and coming would have miniſtred ſome variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inſerting and adding to Abraham's ſtory.

SECT. IV.

The anſwer to another of the objections propoſed, ſhewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his 130th year.

NOW touching the objection, where it is ſaid, that it was very unlikely that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his 130th year, ſeeing Abraham himſelf thought it a wonder to have a ſon at an hundred: this is hardly worth the anſwering. This wonder is indeed miſcaſt, and miſtaken; Abraham having reſpect only to Sarah his wife, when he ſpake of their many years. For when the angel ſaid unto Abraham in his tent door at Mamre; Lo, Sarah thy wife ſhall have a ſon, it followeth in the next verſe, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and ſtricken in age, and it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is ſaid it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his ſecond wife Keturah had many ſons after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Jockſhan, Medan, Midian, Iſhback and Shuah: and the eldeſt of theſe was born 37 years after Iſaac: and the youngeſt 40 years after. What ſtrangeneſs then, that Terah being 130 years old ſhould beget Abraham, will they ſay, may be gathered from this ſuppoſed deſpair of Abraham at 100 years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145, and Iſaac was born in the year 2109, and Abraham did not marry [c] Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109 out of 2145, there remaineth 36; and therefore if Abraham begat five ſons 36 years after this ſuppoſed wonder, and when Abraham was 137 years old; it is not ſtrange, that his father Terah ſhould beget Abraham at 130. And if Boaz, Obed and Jeſſe, who lived ſo many years and ages after Abraham, begat ſons at 100 years, or near it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130, and Abraham others at the ſame age, and ſeven years after.

SECT. V.

The anſwer to two more of the objections: ſhewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's age from the ſcripture, tho' we make not Abraham the eldeſt ſon: and that there was great cauſe, why in the ſtory of Abraham his two brethren ſhould be reſpected.

IT followeth now to ſpeak ſomething to the objection, which brings Abraham's age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and born when Terah was 70 years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all ſucceeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this propoſition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham's age, unleſs we make him the eldeſt ſon, is falſe. For it is plain in the ſcriptures, that when Terah was 205, which was the year of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or ſucceeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I anſwer, that St. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his father Terah: and Terah died at 205; ſo as the 75th year of Abraham was the 205th year of Terah:

which known, there can be no error in the account of times ſucceeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is ſaid, That Moſes had no reſpect unto Nachor and Haran, becauſe they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God eſtabliſhed the covenant, and of whom Chriſt deſcended according to the fleſh, &c. I anſwer, that Moſes, for many great and neceſſary cauſes, had reſpect of Nachor and Haran. For the ſucceſſion of God's Church is not witneſſed by Abraham alone, but by the iſſues of Nahor and Haran, were they idolators or otherwiſe. For Nahor was the father of Bethuel and Bethuel of Rebecca the mother of Iſrael: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Iſaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah alſo the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacob's great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is eſpecially noted, in that it pleaſed God to give her a ſon at 90 years, and when by nature ſhe could not have conceived. And therefore, tho' it were not in regard of themſelves, yet becauſe both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and becauſe Iſaac married Rebecca the grandchild of Nahor; and Jacob Leah and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grandchild alſo of Nahor; it was not ſuperfluous in Moſes to give light of theſe men's times and ages. And tho' ſometimes they worſhipped ſtrange Gods, as it is Joſhua xxiv. 2. yet I ſee no cauſe to think, that they ſtill continued idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural country, and city of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his father Terah, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his ſon, followed Abraham in Canaan; and Sarah, the ſiſter of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor alſo, who remained at Charran, gave his ſons daughters to Iſaac and Jacob, his own kinſmen; he himſelf having alſo married in his own family; not thinking it pleaſing unto God to mix themſelves with ſtrangers and idolaters. And that theſe men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had ſeen the ſervant of Abraham ſtanding at the well beſide Charran, he invited him to his father's houſe in this manner; [a] Come in thou bleſſed of Jehovah, &c. And when this ſervant of Abraham's demanded an anſwer as touching Rebecca, then anſwered Laban and Bethuel, and ſaid; [b] This thing is proceeded of Jehovah; meaning that it was the will of the true God it ſhould be ſo; wherein he acknowledged God's providence. Likewiſe in the following verſe it is written; Take, go, that ſhe may be thy maſter's ſon's wife, even as Jehovah hath ſaid. This their often uſing of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a ſign that they had the knowledge of him.

Now altho' it be the opinion of St. Chryſoſtom, and ſome later writers, as Cajetan Oleaſter, Muſculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an idolater, becauſe he retained certain idols or houſhold gods, which Rachel ſtole from him; yet that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham, and of Nahor, and he called Abraham's ſervant, bleſſed of Jehovah, as aforeſaid. So as for my ſelf, I dare not avow, that theſe men were out of the church, who ſure I am were not out of the faith.

SECT. VI.

That the naming of Abraham firſt of the three brethren, Gen. xi. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldeſt: together with divers reaſons proving that Abraham was not the eldeſt ſon of Terah.

TO the main objection, which I anſwer laſt, becauſe it ſeemeth of moſt ſtrength, by which, thoſe that ſtrive to ſhorten the times, endeavour to prove, that Abraham was the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and born in the 70th year of Terah's life: grounding themſelves firſt and chiefly on this place of the ſcripture, [c] And Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nahor and Haran: To this I ſay, that altho' Abraham in this verſe be firſt named, yet the ſame is no proof at all that he was the eldeſt and firſt-born ſon of Terah. For it is no neceſſary conſequence, that the firſt named in ſcriptures was therefore eldeſt in blood and birth, neither doth it appear that it pleaſed God to make eſpecial choice of the firſt ſons in nature and time: for Seth was not the firſt-born of Adam, nor Iſaac of Abraham, nor Jacob of Iſaac, nor Judah and Joſeph of Jacob, nor David the eldeſt ſon of Jeſſe, nor Solomon of David, as is formerly remembred.

But it is written of Noah; Noah was five hundred years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Japhet: ſhewing that at the 500th year of his age he began to get the firſt of thoſe three ſons. For according to St. Auguſtine, ſpeaking generally, [d] Nec attendendus eſt in his ordo nativitatis, ſed ſignificatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excellit Abraham; The order of nativity is not here to be reſpected, but the ſignification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the ſons of Noah, ſo is it here; where it is ſaid, That Terah lived 70 years and begat Abraham, Nahor and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget ſons, himſelf being begotten by his father Nachor at 29, as others his anceſtors were at 30. The like alſo happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130, Enoſh Kenan at 90, Kenan Mahalaleel at 70, Mahalaleel Jared at 60, Noah was yet 500 years old when he began to beget the firſt of his three ſons as aforeſaid. And St. Auguſtine in the place before-cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngeſt of Terah's ſons, than otherwiſe: tho' for his excellency he was worthily named firſt. His own words are theſe: Fieri enim potuit ut poſterior ſit generatus Abraham: ſed merito excellentiæ, qua in ſcripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, ſaith he, that Abraham was begotten later; but was firſt named in regard of his excellency, for which in ſcripture he is much commended. So as the naming firſt or laſt, proveth nothing who was firſt or laſt born: either in thoſe iſſues of Noah or in theſe of Terah: neither hath God any reſpect of the eldeſt in nature, as touching his election or ſpiritual bleſſing: for Moſes nameth firſt the children of the promiſe, and the eldeſt and firſt in God's favour. Pietas ergo vel ipſa potius electio divina, quæ comitem ſecum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare. Piety, ſaith he, or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it, or after it piety and the fear of God, gave place and precedency to Shem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among thoſe of Thare.

For the reſt it is manifeſt, that [e] Abraham entred Canaan in the 75th year of his age. And it was in

Canaan

Canaan that [a] Hagar bare him Iſmael, when Abraham had lived 86 years. It was at Gerar (the ſouth border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Iſaac, when Abraham had conſumed 100 years. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham roſe out, when he [b] reſcued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83 years: and it is as manifeſt that he parted from Haran after his father Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70 years old, then muſt Abraham have been 135 years when he firſt ſet his foot in Canaan: ſeeing Terah muſt be dead ere he parted, and ſo 70 added to 135, made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all thoſe places of ſcripture before remembred. For he entred at 75, he reſcued Lot at 83, he had Iſmael at 86, he had Iſaac at 100, proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and born in the 70th year of his age: then had Terah lived till Iſaac had been 35 years old, and Iſmael 49, both which muſt then have been born in Meſopotamia, and therein foſtered to that age: unleſs we ſhould either deny credit to St. Stephen, who ſaith that Abraham departed from Meſopotamia after his father's death; or elſe give credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, ſaith it was about his father's death: becauſe the Greek word μετὰ may be tranſlated by the Latin ſub, as well as by poſt: which tho' elſewhere it may be, yet cannot it be ſo in this place. For it were moſt improperly ſpoken, to ſay that thoſe things were done about Terah's death, which were 60 years before. Wherefore, ſuppoſing Abraham to have been born in the 70th year of Terah, we muſt give thoſe times and places of birth to Abraham's children, which no authority will warrant; for Abraham had no children in Ur of Chaldea, nor in Haran: nor in 10 years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the world 2083: and the year of Iſmael's birth was the world's year 2094, which maketh 10 years difference. And that Iſaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the mountain Moriah therein, 39 miles from Berſabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three angels firſt of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abraham's ſons were born in Meſopotamia: nor while Terah lived: nor in leſs than 10 years after Terah's death: and then conſequently was not Abraham the eldeſt ſon of Terah, nor born in the 70th year of Terah's age.

Thirdly, Whereas [c] Abraham came into Canaan at 75, if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah lived but 145, for 70 and 75 make 145, which muſt alſo have been the full age of Terah: but Terah lived 205 years; and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70th year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifeſt, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldeſt brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iſcah wanted but 10 years of Abraham's age: Iſaac being born when Abraham was 100, and Sarah 90 years old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran muſt have begotten Sarah at 9 years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within 10 years as old as Abraham, then of neceſſity muſt Haran beget her, when he had lived but 9 years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iſcah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, ſaith he, bearing the ſame ſignification; and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Iſcah or Iiſhcah inſerted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to ſpeak of any thing ſuperfluous it is not uſed in God's books: and if Iſcah had not belonged to the ſtory, it had been but an idle name to no purpoſe remembred.

Now if it had been true (as thoſe of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moſes had no reſpect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithſtanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Iſrael, and of Chriſt: what regard then had Moſes of Iſcah in this place, were ſhe not Sarah, but otherwiſe an idle name of whom there is nothing elſe firſt or laſt?

The age alſo of Lot diſproveth the elderſhip of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83 years: and if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were father to Lot, Sarah and Milcah, Abraham marrying one of Haran's daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah alſo being within 10 years as old as Abraham: it may appear to every reaſonable man (not obſtinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and not Abraham: who alſo died firſt and before his father left Ur in Chaldea. Alſo Lyra reaſoneth againſt the opinion of Abraham's elderſhip, upon the ſame place of Geneſis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10 years younger than Abraham himſelf. Lyra's words are theſe; Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipſo Abraham, ſequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imo nec octo, &c. and afterwards, & ideo melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimò natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput ſtirpis & generationis ſequentis: & quia primo facta eſt ei repromiſſio expreſſa de Chriſto, ſicut ſupra dictum eſt de Sem, &c. If therefore (ſaith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himſelf, it followeth, that he was not 10 years old when he begat Sarah; and therefore it ſeemeth better to be ſaid, that Abraham was the laſt born of the three ſons of Thare, nevertheleſs he is named firſt for his dignity, both becauſe he was to be ordained head of the ſtock and generation following, and becauſe the promiſe of Chriſt was firſt made unto him, as before it is ſaid of Sem.

SECT. VII.

A concluſion of this diſpute, noting the authors on both ſides: with an admonition that they which ſhorten the times make all ancient ſtories the more unprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the ſcriptures, with nature, time, and reaſon, that Haran was the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130th year of Terah's life, and not in the 70th year. For Abraham departing Charran after [d] Terah died, according to St. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was [e] 75 years old, theſe two numbers added make 205 years, the full age of Terah: ſeeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my ſelf, I have no other end herein, than to manifeſt the truth of the world's ſtory: I reverence the judgments of the fathers; but I know they were miſtaken in particulars. St. Auguſtine was doubtful, and could not determine this controverſy. For whatſoever is borrowed from him out of his 16th book de Civitate Dei, c. 15. the ſame may be anſwered out of himſelf in his 25th

[a] Gen. 16. 16. [b] Acts 7. 4. & Gen. 14. [c] Gen. 12. [d] Acts 7. 4. [e] Gen. 12. 4.

queſtion upon Gen. But St. Auguſtine herein followed Joſephus, and Iſidore: and Beda followed St. Auguſtine. And it was out of a fooliſh pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Joſephus ſought to make Abraham the firſt-born: as if God had had reſpect to the eldeſt in nature. So did Joſephus, together with Nicholas Damaſcenus (thinking thereby to glorify the Jewiſh nation) make Abraham a king, intitling Sarah by the name of queen Sarah: and ſaid that Abraham was followed with 318 captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim præfectos habuit: quorum ſingulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharaoh invading him with a great army, took from him his wife Sarah. Such fables argue that Joſephus is not to be believed, but with diſcreet reſervations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292 years from the flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how ſhould we value the opinion of ſuch chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgment in ſuch matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in ſetting down the ſucceſſion of the Perſian kings, under whom they lived, whoſe hiſtory was not ſo far remote in time, as theſe antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet groſly have they erred therein, and ſo familiar are their miſtakings in all things of like nature, that we ſeldom find their opinion rehearſed without the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman religion are alſo generally on the ſame ſide: it being a thing uſual among them, to maintain whatſoever they have been formerly known to hold and believe. Contrariwiſe, of the more ancient Theodoret, and ſome following him: of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moor, with divers of the Proteſtants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130th year of his father Terah. From theſe (as in a caſe not concerning any point in religion) divers of the ſame religion, and thoſe nevertheleſs good authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitræus, Funcius and others, are very averſe herein, eſpecially Joſephus Scaliger with his Sethus Calviſius, proclaiming Beroaldus an arch-heretick in chronology, and condemning this opinion of his as poiſonous. Contrariwiſe Auguſtinus Torniellus a prieſt of the congregation of St. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free writer, whoſe annals are newly ſet forth, very earneſtly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered: not alledging Beroaldus, nor any proteſtant writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thanks to hereticks. For my ſelf, I do neither miſlike the contrary opinion, becauſe commonly thoſe of the Romiſh religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this large account of times, becauſe many notable men of the Proteſtant writers have approved it; but for the truth it ſelf. To ſtrengthen which, after all theſe former reaſons, and teſtimonies of ſcripture, I will add thus much more to the reſt. Firſt, it is apparent to all men of judgment, that the beſt approved hiſtorians, divine and prophane, labour to inveſtigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the ſtories and forepaſs'd actions of the world: and not the truth of hiſtories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our ſelves; which of thoſe two accounts give the beſt reputation to the ſtory of the ſcriptures; teaching the world's new plantation, and the continuance of God's church; either that of Joſephus, and thoſe which follow him, who make but 292 years, or thereabouts, between the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352 years between the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the firſt-born of Thare, in the 70th year of his life: the other a younger ſon of Thare, and born when he had lived 130 years. And if we look over all, and do not haſtily ſatisfy our underſtanding with the firſt things offered, and thereby being ſatiated do ſlothfully and drowſily ſit down; we ſhall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to ſome editions, make it above 1072 years between the flood and Abraham's birth: than to take away any part of thoſe 352 years given. For if we adviſedly conſider the ſtate and countenance of the world, ſuch as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we ſhall find that it were very ill done of us, by following opinion without the guide of reaſon, to pare the times over-deeply between Abraham and the flood: becauſe in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole ſtory might perchance bleed thereby, were not the teſtimony of the ſcripture ſupream, ſo as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withal this precept of St. Auguſtine, that whereſoever any one place in the ſcriptures may be conceived diſagreeing to the whole, the ſame is by ignorance of interpretation miſunderſtood. For in Abraham's time, all the then-known parts of the world were peopled: all regions and countries had their kings. Egypt had many magnificent cities: and ſo had Paleſtina, and all the bordering countries: yea, all that part of the world beſides, as far as India: and thoſe not built with ſticks, but of hewen ſtones, and defended with walls, and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquity, than thoſe other men have ſuppoſed. And therefore, where the ſcriptures are plaineſt, and beſt agreeing with reaſon and nature, to what end ſhould we labour to beget doubts and ſcruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving alſo ſtrength thereby to common cavillers, and to thoſe mens apiſh brains, who only bend their wits to find impoſſibilities and monſters in the ſtory of the world and mankind.

SECT. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Aſſyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the ſtory of Abraham.

IN this ſort therefore for the reaſons before alledged, I conclude, that from the general flood, to the birth of [a] Abraham, 352 years were conſumed: and taking the Aſſyrian hiſtory with us, the ſame number of years were ſpent from the flood to the 43d year of Ninus: in which 43d year of Ninus Abraham was born: which happened in the year of the world 2009.

Now of this time of 352 years, we muſt give one part as well to the increaſe of thoſe people which came into Shinar, as to thoſe that ſtaid in the eaſt, to wit, 30 years to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which tho' the ſcriptures are ſilent, yet becauſe thoſe of the ſame time had that age when they begat their firſt ſons, we may the more ſafely give the like allowance to theſe. For Eber begat Peleg at 34, Peleg Regu at 30, Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Havila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth Gen. x. which [b] St. Auguſtine approveth. Giving then 30 years more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and 5 years to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, may be gathered that 65 years were consumed ere Nimrod himself was born: and that Raama had that age ere any of his sons were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison: for [a]Peleg, the 4th from Noah, as Raama was, begat Regu in the same year of his life.

Let us then allow 60 years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel: for sure we are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65 and 60 make 125: the rest of the time of 131 (in which year they arrived in Shinar, whereof there were 6 years remaining) we may give them for their travels from the east: because they were pestered with women, children and cattle: and, as some ancient writers have conceived, and Becanus of later times, they kept always the mountains sides, for fear of a second flood. Now if we take this number of 131 out of 352, there remains 221, of which number [b]Berosus bestoweth 65 on Belus, and 42 on Ninus, before Abraham born: both which St. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221, there remaineth 114 years of the 352, from the flood to Abraham's birth: which number of 114, necessity bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time given to Nimrod, is over-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appear over-short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but 179 years: whereof he reigned 112: whereas Sale, who was the son of Arphaxad the son of Sem, lived 403 years: and of the same age of the world was Nimrod, the son of Chus, the son of Cham.

Now after Abraham was born,

Ninus reigned 9 years: which added to 43, make 52.

Ninus dieth and leaveth Semiramis his successour.

Semiramis governed the empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42 years, and died in the 52d year [c] compleat of Abraham's life.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38 years, in the 2d year of whose reign Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85 years old, he rescued his nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel king of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38 years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23 years after Semiramis died: which was the 75th year of his age: so that Amraphel may seem to have been this Ninias the son of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23d year, as aforesaid, being the 75th year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85th year of Abraham, and the 33d year of his own reign: after which he reigned 5 years: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set them down, according to the times noted by Moses, in the story of Abraham, it is most certain: unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moses's computation, which were impiety: or account the whole history of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction: which were to condemn all ancient historians for fablers.

SECT. IX.

That Amraphel, one of the four kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. xiv. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes king of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85th year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33d year of the reign of Ninias Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time king of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Basan, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was king of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85th year of Abraham's life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest monarch: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, tho' Amraphel be first named by Moses in the 1st verse of the xivth chapter of Genesis. For the kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis or of the five cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written: [d] Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13th year they rebelled, and in the 14th year came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then king of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated over Tigris, and to the east of Amraphel's country: and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the west of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel been so great a prince as prophane historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But tho' Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four kings (as it is manifest that he was: for these little kings of Sodom, Gomorrha, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a downright fall at the time of this war: tho' not long before it commanded all the kingdoms between India and the Phenician sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

SECT. X.

Of Arioch another of the four kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been king, lies between Cœlesyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOW the two other kings joined with Amraphel, and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellassar, the other of the nations. For Ellassar, Aquila and Jerome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellespont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is only to defend the Latin translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellespont far distant, and out of the way to send any armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa: which countries these four kings chiefly invaded, beſides that, it is certain, that the Aſſyrians (when they were greateſt) had never any dominion in Aſia the leſs. For at ſuch time as the Aſſyrians feared the invaſion of the Medes and Perſians, they ſent not into Aſia the leſs as commanders: but uſed all the art they had to invite [a] Cræſus to their aſſiſtance: perſuading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himſelf, and the other kings of thoſe parts, than the ſucceſs of the Medes againſt the Aſſyrians. But examine the enterpriſe what it was. [b] Theſe kings (ſaith the text) made war with Bera, king of Sodom, Birſha king of Gomorrha, Shinab king of Admah, and Shemebar king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela which is Zoar. All which five kings had not ſo much ground as Middleſex: being ſuch a kind of Reguli, as Joſhua found in the land long after: namely, lords of cities and ſmall territories adjoining; of which Canaan had 33 all ſlain or hanged by Joſhua. Neither can the other countries, which in the text they are ſaid alſo to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in kings from Pontus or Helleſpont, had manifeſted a great impotence and weakneſs in the kings of Babylon and Perſia.

And tho' it be alledged for an example, that divers kings far off, came to aſſiſt Pompey againſt Ceſar: yet theſe ſame examples, without like occaſions and circumſtances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cauſe to fear the greatneſs of theſe petty kings, or of the other countries: but the eyes of the world were fixed on Ceſar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other princes no leſs doubtful than fearful: but the whole country by theſe four kings maſtered in their paſſage, was afterwards given to the half tribe of Manaſſeh, Gad, and Ruben: a narrow valley of ground lying between Jordan and the mountains of Seir: incloſed by the river of Arnon on the ſouth-ſide, and by Libanus on the north, conſiſting of the two ſmall provinces of Traconitis or Baſan, and the region of the Moabites: a conqueſt far unvaluable, and little anſwering to the power of the Aſſyrian empire, if the ſame had remained in any comparable eſtate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who ſubjected all the great kings of that part of the world, without the aſſiſtance of any of the kings of Helleſpont, or any other part of Aſia the leſs. But as the Vulgar and Aquila convert Ellaſſar by Pontus: ſo Symmachus makes Arioch a king of the Scythians, a king indeed, as far fetched to join with the Aſſyrians in this war, as the world had any at that time. The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellaſſar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountains whereof the ark did reſt, ſo do they in this place retain the Hebrew word Ellaſſar, being doubtful to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himſelf remembreth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Helleſpont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, becauſe the Latin tranſlation hath it otherwiſe. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Grecian coſmographer, findeth the city of Ellas in the border of Cœleſyria. And St. Jerome calleth Ellas the city of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now altho' the ſame be ſeated by Stephanus in Cœleſyria, yet it ſtandeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly joined with Ninus in all his conqueſts, being of the ſame family, and deſcended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrews written Arioch: and afterwards again Aretas: as in the [c] Maccabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of [d] St. Paul, who was ſought to be betray'd by the lieutenants of Aretas commanding in Damaſcus. They were princes for the moſt confederate and depending upon the Aſſyrian empire. It is true, that we find in Daniel ii. that in the time of Nabuchodonoſor, one Arioch was general of his army, and the principal commander under him, who was a king of kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here ſpoken of, the ſon of that Arioch, confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions far removed from the Aſſyrians and Babylonians. The name alſo of Arioch who commanded under Nabuchodonoſor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans, who are a nation of Perſians bordering Aſſyria, according to Stephanus; tho' Pliny ſets it between the ſea-coaſt, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian kings, or other of that houſe (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta or Aretas) had the government of that Perſian province called Elymais (as it ſeemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the ſame was in Nabuchodonoſor's time. But this Arioch here ſpoken of, may with more reaſon be taken for the king of Arabia, the ſon of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whoſe ſons held league as their fathers did, being the next bordering prince of all on that ſide towards the weſt to Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own houſe, and blood: which [e] D. Siculus alſo confirmeth.

SECT. XI.

Of Tidal another of the four kings.

THE fourth king by Abraham overthrown was Tidal, king of the nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mix'd people: Calvin of runnagates without habitation: Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilea was inhabited by divers nations, which were a mix'd people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. [f] Nam tales ſunt qui Galilæam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, ſaith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called king of theſe nations, as they ſuppoſe. And it may be ſo: but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this queſtion. For Galilea was not peopled at this time as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the [g] Canaanite was then in the land, howſoever they might be afterwards mix'd; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adjoining to Phenicia, and Paleſtina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcedice, Caſſiotis, Chalibonitis, and all theſe do alſo join themſelves to Meſopotamia on the north, and to Arabia on the eaſt. And that theſe nations gathered themſelves together under Tidal, I take to be the probableſt conjecture.

SECT. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chief of the four kings was not of Aſſyria, but of Perſia: and that the Aſſyrian empire at this time was much impaired.

LAſtly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Aſſyrian emperor, and that Amraphel was but a ſatrape, viceroy, or provincial governor of Babylonia, and that the other kings named were ſuch alſo, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moſes was too well acquainted with the names of Aſſur, and Shinar, to call the Aſſyrian a king of Elam: thoſe kings being in the ſcriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldea, Shi-

nar, Babylonia or Aſſyria: but never by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was ſo called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew ſignifieth regale: for ſo Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Perſian kings ware on their heads.

Neither do I believe that the Aſſyrian or Babylonian empire ſtood in any greatneſs at the time of this invaſion, and my reaſons are theſe: Firſt, Example and experience teach us, that thoſe things which are ſet up haſtily, or forced violently, do not long laſt: Alexander became lord of all Aſia on this ſide of Indus, in a time of ſo ſhort a life, as it laſted not to over-look what itſelf had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual: for his empire died at once with himſelf: all whoſe chief commanders became kings after him. Tamerlane conquered Aſia and India with a ſtorm-like and terrible ſucceſs: but to prevalent fury God hath adjoined a ſhort life: and whatſoever things nature herſelf worketh in haſte, ſhe taketh the leaſt care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories periſhed with him, if not before.

Ninus being the firſt whom the madneſs of boundleſs dominion tranſported, invaded his neighbour princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, inſolent and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her paramour, enlarged the Babylonian empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her ſon having changed nature and condition with his mother, proved no leſs feminine than ſhe was maſculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual ſmart, put the patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other; ſo thoſe kings adjoining (whoſe ſubjection and calamities incident were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not ſleep, when the advantage was offered by ſuch a ſucceſſour. For in Regno Babylonico hic parum reſplenduit; This king ſhined little (ſaith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian kingdom. And likely it is, that the necks of mortal men having been never before galled with the yoke of foreign dominion, nor having ever had experience of that moſt miſerable and deteſted condition of living in ſlavery; no long deſcent having as yet inveſted the Aſſyrian with a right, nor any other title being for him pretended than a ſtrong hand; the fooliſh and effeminate ſon of a tyrannous and hated father, could very ill hold ſo many great princes and nations his vaſſals, with a power leſs maſtering, and a mind leſs induſtrious than his father and mother had uſed before him. And he that was ſo much given over to licentious idleneſs, as to ſuffer his mother to reign 42 years, and thereof the greateſt part after he came to man's eſtate, witneſſed thereby to the world, that he ſo much preferred eaſe before honour, and bodily pleaſures before greatneſs, as he neither endeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentious peril enjoy.

Theſe conſiderations being joined to the ſtory of Amraphel, delivered by Moſes, by which we find that Amraphel king of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the king of Perſia, than either his ſuperiour or equal, make it ſeem probable, that the empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken aſunder, and reſtrained again to Babylonia.

For concluſion I will add theſe two arguments confirming the former: Firſt, That at ſuch time as it pleaſed God to impoſe that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Candan a paſſage of 700 miles, or little leſs, with women, children, and carriages: the countries thro' which he wandred were then ſettled, and in peace. For it was in the 23d year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of 23 years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour princes had recovered their liberty and former eſtates. For [a] Semiramis's army of four millions, with herſelf, utterly conſumed in India, and all her arms and engines of war at the ſame time loſt, gave an occaſion and opportunity even to the pooreſt ſouls, and weakeſt hearted creatures of the world, to repurchaſe their former liberty.

Secondly, It is affirmed by the beſt and ancienteſt hiſtorians, that Arius the ſon of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Caſpians, and again ſubjected them: which needed not if they had not been revolted from Ninias, after Ninus's death. And as Arioch recovered one part, ſo did Baleus or Balaneus, otherwiſe Xerxes, reduce the reſt revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is ſaid, that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id eſt, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madneſs, had not thoſe countries freed themſelves from the Babylonian ſubjection. Now if we ſhall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the conqueſt of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well think the reſt of Ninus and Semiramis to be but feigned: but if we grant this re-conqueſt, then is it true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Aſſyrian empire was torn aſunder, according to that which hath been gathered out of Moſes, as before remembred.

SECT. XIII.

That it is not improbable that the four kings had no dominion in the countries named, but that they had elſewhere with their colonies planted themſelves: and ſo retained the names of the countries whence they came: which if it be ſo, we need not ſay that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our ſelves with many other difficulties.

THE conſent of all writers, whoſe works have come to my peruſal, agreeing as they do, that theſe four kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and thoſe fellows were lords of thoſe regions, whereunto they are or ſeem intitled: doth almoſt inforce us to think, that the hiſtory muſt be ſo underſtood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often elſewhere in the ſcriptures, the names of countries may be ſet for people of thoſe lands, or if (as Jerome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was ſaid to be of the nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of ſundry regions: then may we otherwiſe conceive of this hiſtory, removing thereby ſome difficulties which men perhaps have been unwilling to find, becauſe they could not find how to reſolve them. For as it had been a ſtrange conjecture to think that Arioch was drawn to aſſiſt the Perſian, againſt the Sodomite; as far as from Pontus, where it very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almoſt impoſſible that the vale of Siddim ſhould have been once named: ſo in true eſtimation it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedorlaomer, if he were king of Perſia alone, ſhould paſs thro' ſo great a part of the world, as the countries of Aſſyria, Chaldea, Meſopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia and Canaan, to ſubdue thoſe five towns, whoſe very names how they ſhould come to his ear, being disjoined by so many great nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly conjecture. And if all the countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, yea the kingdom of Elassar, and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependants, what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrha? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new-gotten empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) than to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other kings, against five petty towns, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great city of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far nearer unto him, unsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alledged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his re-conquest of these five cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the text it self. For first, what madness had it been in that small province, to rebel against so powerful a monarch? Or if it were so, that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more than madness in them, when his terrible army approached, still to entertain hope of evasion: yea, to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute, and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the nations between Euphrates, yea between themselves and the river of Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should find no great wisdom, if he knowing the weakness of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any lieutenant, with small forces, he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little country was not sufficient to countervail one month's charges of so huge an army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the wasting of that valley, wherein he left the cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the country, altho' he had broken their army in the field? Now the scriptures do not make any fearful matter of this invasion, tho' supposed to be so great: but compose the two armies as equally match'd, saying they were four kings against five; yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find in Genesis xiv. 17. that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no history makes mention: neither will the reign of Ninas, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he should have died so soon; neither would histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these four kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title, lords and commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troop of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the country which lay about them to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first book of Thucydides, with the manner of discoveries, conquests and plantations, in the infancy of Greece, or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many kings as several armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual for the leaders of colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the slothful quality of Ninias then reigning in Assyria; whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accustomed, in the reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded; whilst others more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole stream of writers upon this place make this conjecture disagreeable to the text, to the authority whereof all human reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: and that the power of his ancestors being by his sloth decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not satisfy, we may say that Amraphel was an under-king or satrape of Shinar, under Ninias; who may be supposed to have had his imperial seat in his father's city Nineveh: and to have preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the city of his mother, whom he hated as an usurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any man's salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might err: then can I think that the opinion, that these four kings were leaders of colonies, sent out of the countries named in the text, and not kings of the countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the scripture. And hereto add that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Persian king, than king of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a man of action, or being a worthy man's son, was very well pleased to give passage and assistance to these captains or petty kings. These and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or, if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the reader's pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he shall find any that shall seem better than these. But of what countries or people soever these four were kings, this expedition is the only publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his story, and of his sons, and of his nephews Esau and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, neither to stand upon things generally known to all christians, nor to repeat what hath been elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we pass them here in silence. And because in this story of Abraham and his posterity, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that even in the time of Abraham it was a settled and flourishing kingdom, it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

SECT. I.

A brief of the names and times of the first kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

SOON after the confusion at Babel, as it seems, Cham, with many of his issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Egypt before the flood) came thither and took possession of the country: in which they built many cities, and began the kingdom one hundred and ninety one years after the deluge. The ancient governors of this kingdom till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewn in the table following.

2269	613	Typhon, Hercules.
2276	620	Orus.
2391	735	Sesostris the Great.
2424	768	Sesostris the Blind.
2438	782	Busiris or Orus the second.
2476	820	Acenchere or Thermutis or Meris.
2488	832	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497	841	Chencres drowned in the Red sea.

The table, and especially the chronology, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity manifest and resistless truth cannot be found. For St. Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgment, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian kings; which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, than whom doubtless they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian story, was the ambition of the priests: who, to magnify their antiquities, filled the records, which were in their hands, with many leasings: and recounted unto strangers the names of many kings that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, that the magnificent works and royal buildings in Egypt, such as are never found but in states that have greatly flourished, witness that their princes were of marvellous greatness: and that the reports of the priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian history, was the too much credulity of some good authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were enforced them upon us, by their authority. A third and general cause of more than Egyptian darkness in all ancient histories, is the edition of many authors by John Annius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned I may add mine) I think thus: that Annius having seen some fragments of those writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true histories, where approved writers confirm him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass that the account of authors, either in the chronology or genealogy of the Egyptian kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: many late writers follow the edition of Annius's authors: the profane histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

SECT. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the flood 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient kings, about whom is most controversy, the best mean is by help of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties, besides the authority of approved authors, hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16th Dynasty is joined by general consent with the 43d year of Ninus, in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve, which were called the greater gods: so that all the years of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty endured fourteen years; the fourteenth, twenty-six; the fifteenth, thirty-seven. These three last are said to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161 years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dynasties was such as hath been mentioned, because Annius in such wise limits out their time; so I cannot reject the account upon this only reason, that Annius hath it so; considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161 years, which according to our account were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 352 years, which were between the flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first dynasty, which was the beginning of Cham's reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno a diluvio 131. In building the tower were consumed forty years, as Glycas recordeth; whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their wives, children, cattle, and substance, thro' all Syria then desolate, and full of bogs, forests and briars (which the deluge and want of culture in one hundred and seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow 20 years: and these sums being added together, to wit one hundred thirty-one years after the flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40 years for their stay there, and 20 for Cham's passage into Egypt and settling there, make up the sum of one hundred and ninety one years: at which time we said that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this sum of 191 years, if we add the 161 years of the 15 first Dynasties, naſties, as they are numbred in common account, we ſhall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto, omitting many other reaſons, which might be brought to prove that theſe firſt Dynaſties muſt needs have been very ſhort, and not containing in the whole ſum of their ſeveral times above 161 years: let it ſuffice that had they laſted longer, then either muſt Egypt have been peopled as ſoon as Babel after the flood: or the Dynaſties (as Mercator thinks) muſt have been before the flood. That the arrival at Babel was many years before the plantation of Egypt, after the flood, enough hath been ſaid to prove: and that the Dynaſties were not before the flood, the number of the long-liv'd generations between Adam and the flood, which was leſs than the number of the Dynaſties, may ſufficienly witneſs. Or if we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynaſties, then may this have been as well after the flood, as before: conſidering that the ſons of Noah did not in every country erect ſuch form of policy, as had been uſed in the ſame ere the deluge: but ſuch, as the diſpoſition of the people, the authority and power of the conductor, together with many other circumſtances, did induce or inforce them to.

SECT. III.

That theſe Dynaſties were not divers families of kings, but rather ſucceſſions of regents, oft-times many under one king.

THE ſhort continuance of the Dynaſties, doth ſhew that they were not ſeveral races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to ſtile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in reſtitutions of decay'd antiquities, it is more eaſy to deny than to affirm. But this may be ſaid, partly upon good circumſtance, partly upon the ſureſt proof, that it was the manner of the Egyptian kings, to put the government of the country into the hands of ſome truſty counſellor, only reſerving the ſoveraignty to themſelves, as the old kings of France were wont to the maſters of the palace, and as the Turk doth to the chief viſier. This is confirmed firſt, by the number of the Dynaſties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Oſiris or Mizraim; and muſt therefore have been ſucceſſions, not of kings, but rather of counſellors and regents. Secondly, by cuſtom of ſuch princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the ſcriptures: of whom Abimilech the Philiſtine, in his dealing with Abraham and Iſaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol, captain of his hoſt; tho' in taking Abraham's wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleaſure. Likewiſe of Abimilech the ſon of Gideon, it was ſaid: Is not he the ſon of Jerubbal? and Zebulis his officer? alſo Iſhboſheth the ſon of Saul, feared Abner the captain of the hoſt. Yea, David himſelf hating Joab for his cruelty, did not puniſh him, in regard of his greatneſs, which was ſuch, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and diſpoſition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the ſcriptures: therefore likely both for his own idleneſs and pleaſure, to have laid the burthen of government upon others; and upon jealouſy, the companion of unworthineſs, to have changed his lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joſeph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh ſaid to Joſeph; Only in the king's throne will I be above thee: behold I have ſet thee over all the land of Egypt. [a] William, archbiſhop of Tyre, who flouriſhed about the year of our Lord one thouſand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like or very ſame form of government by viceroys, was in his time practiſed in Egypt, having there been in uſe (as he believed) ever ſince the time of Joſeph. He plainly ſhews, that the ſoldans of Egypt were not lords of the country, however they have been ſo deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the duty of ſubjects unto the Caliph: who reſiding in a moſt magnificent palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of civil government, but the power of making war and peace, with the whole office and authority royal into the ſoldan's hands. He that ſhall read in [b] William of Tyre, the ſtate of the caliph, or Mulene Elhadech, with the form of his court, ſhall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a lieutenant, as great in authority as Joſeph was, tho' far inferiour in wiſdom.

To think that many names of ſuch regents or lieutenants as Joſeph was, have crept into the liſt of the Egyptian kings, were no ſtrange imagination, For Joſeph's brethren called him, [c] The man that is lord of the land, and the lord of the country: beſides, it is not unlikely that the vain-glorious Egyptian prieſts would as eaſily report him a king to poſterity, as ignorant men and ſtrangers deem him ſuch, under whoſe hand all diſpatches of importance, and royal managing of the ſtate had paſs'd, whilſt that the king himſelf intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How ſtrangers have miſtaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joſeph's brethren, doth ſufficiently witneſs. The reports of prieſts do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, ſay; Diodorus, that Seſoſtris was the 19th king after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332d after Menas: which could not have been if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, that the Dynaſties were not ſo many races of kings, but ſucceſſions of regents, appointed by the kings of ſo many ſundry lineages or ſorts of men. Now by whatſoever means a Dynaſty or regency continued: whether in one family, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: ſure it is that it was the king's gift, and free choice, that gave the office. But the crown royal always paſſed by deſcent, and not by election: which (beſide conſent of authors) the ſcriptures alſo prove. For whereas Joſeph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the crown had paſſed by election, then ſhould Pharaoh's children hereby either have been inthralled amongſt the reſt of the people, to the next ſucceſſour: or enjoying their father's land, tho' not his eſtate, have been more mighty than the king: as landlords of all Egypt, and the king himſelf their tenant. Likewiſe we find in Exod. xii. that God ſmote the firſt-born of Pharaoh, that was to ſit on his throne: and in Iſaiah it is ſaid of Pharaoh, [d] I am the ſon of the ancient king.

SECT. IV.

Of Cham, and his ſon Mizraim, or Oſiris.

THAT the ſucceſſion of kings began, and continued in ſuch wiſe as the table hath ſhewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to ſhew. Egypt is called in the ſcripture, [e] the land of Ham. That this name is not given to it becauſe the poſterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himſelf did firſt plant it, we may gather by many circumſtances. For I think it is no-where found, that the countries of Cuſh, Put, or Canaan, as well as

Egypt,

Egypt, were called the land of Ham. Further it is found in [a] Diodorus Siculus, that Oſiris calleth himſelf the eldeſt ſon of Cham, ſaying; Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: alſo, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoſo ortum: which muſt needs be underſtood of Cham: for this Saturnus Egyptius was Cham: as it was ſaid, that on the monument of Ninus was an inſcription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewiſe the temple of Hammon not far from Egypt doth teſtify, that Ham reſided in thoſe parts: and St. Jerome in Quæſtionibus Hebraicis, ſaith, that the Egyptians themſelves did in his days call their country Ham: as in four ſeveral places in the Pſalms this country is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Oſiride, that in the ſacrifices of the Egyptians this country of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puto (ſaith he) a Chamo Noes filio, to which alſo he addeth out of Iſidore, Ægyptum uſque hodie Ægyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: That Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the ſame reaſons may ſuffice to be alledged, which I have already given in proof of the time ſpent in the 15 firſt Dynaſties: neither is it ſtrange that the reign of Cham, ſhould laſt ſo long as 161 years: conſidering that Sem lived 600. Arphachſhad and Shelah each above 400. But ſtrange it had been, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in thoſe long-lived generations reigned there 19 years, and with Bæon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the ſame brood, obſcured the fame and glory of Oſiris, Orus and Seſoſtris. Reineccius, in hiſtor. Julia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwiſe called Oſiris according to Diodorus: who ſaith he was the ſon of Hammon: Krentzhemius ſaith that Mizraim and Oſiris are words of near affinity and ſound in the Hebrew tongue. Howſoever it be, we know that Mizraim the ſon of Cham, was lord of Egypt, and Reineccius citing good authority in this caſe, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their own language Mezre. Neither do I ſee cauſe of doubt whether Oſiris were the ſame with Mizraim. It is more neceſſary, and hard to ſhew manifeſtly, how long Mizraim or Oſiris reigned. For whereas the year of his death is no-where preciſely ſet down, we muſt be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly ſaid by Annius's Beroſus to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynaſty of the Thebæi began, it appeareth, firſt, by the authority of Euſebius, who avoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who ſaith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Oſiris there, that it might be cauſe of that Dynaſty, I can well believe: aſſenting ſo far to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynaſties were named only, according to the ſeveral feats of the kings.

SECT. V.

Of the time when Oſiris's reign ended: and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the ſon of Oſiris.

THE death of Oſiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The only conjecture that I know, is made thus. Lebabim the ſon of Mizraim, called Hercules Libyus, made war in Italy, to revenge his father's death, on the aſſociates of Typhon, in the 41ſt year of Baleus king of Aſſyria: before which year he had made many great wars in Egypt, Phenicia, Phrygia, Crete, Libya, and Spain: and having ended his Egyptian wars, left the kingdom to Orus. Thus far Beroſus, or authors following Beroſus. That Orus laſt of all the gods (as they were ſtiled) held the kingdom of Iſis, [b] Diodorus Siculus plainly ſaith: and Plutarch as much; to which all hiſtories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon infers, that ſix years may be allowed to the wars, which Hercules made in ſo many countries, after the Egyptian wars were ended: ſo ſhould the death of Oſiris have been the 34th of Baleus: when himſelf had reigned 297 years. I think that Krentzhemius was a greater ſcholar than ſoldier. For ſurely in thoſe days when commerce was not ſuch as now, but all navigation made by coaſting, a far longer time would have been required to the ſubduing of ſo many countries. An allowance of more time, tho' it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtleſs) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Oſiris had been the 34th of Baleus, then muſt Iſrael have come into Egypt but ſeven years before the death of Oſiris: and have lived there in the reign of Typhon. A thing not eaſily believed. For it was the ſame king who advanced Joſeph, bad him ſend for his father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his father's funeral: as may eaſily be gathered out of the book of Geneſis. Whereas therefore the reign of Oſiris, cannot be extended by any poſſible allowance in account of times, beyond the 7th year of Iſrael's coming into Egypt: we muſt needs cut off 23 years from that number, which Krentzhemius conjectured his reign to have continued: namely, ſeven which he ſhould have lived after Jacob's coming into Egypt: nine in which Joſeph had there flouriſhed, ere his father's coming: and other ſeven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Oſiris, yet before Joſeph's advancement.

Neither will this diſagree with the time of Hercules Libyus's wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is ſaid to have indured 10 years: after which proportion we may well give not only ſix years, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23 more to ſo many wars in ſo many and ſo far diſtant countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute unto Orus the 13 years, which paſſed between the time of Joſeph's being ſold into Egypt, unto his advancement: conſidering that Putiphar who bought him, and whoſe daughter he may ſeem to have married, continued all that while chief ſteward unto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to have been, if ſo violent alterations had happened the whilſt in Egypt, as the tyrannous uſurpation of Typhon muſt needs have brought in. If citing ſome fragment of a loſt old author, I ſhould confidently ſay, that Putiphar, for his faithfulneſs to Orus, the ſon of Oſiris, was by him in the beginning of his reign made his chief ſteward: at which time buying Joſeph, and finding him a juſt man, and one under whoſe hand all things did proſper, he rather committed his eſtate into Joſeph's hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either falſe-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troubleſome days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected againſt this. Perhaps I might proceed further, and ſay, that when the ſaying of Joſeph pleaſed Pharaoh, and all his ſervants: then Putiphar prieſt of On, being chief officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Joſeph, the ancient graces of God, and his injurious impriſonment: whereupon he gave him his daughter to wife: and being old reſigned his office of chief ſteward unto him: who afterwards in regard of Putiphar, did favour the prieſts, when he bought the lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to ſome a tale not unlike to the frierly book of Aſenath, Putiphar's daughter: but unto ſuch as conſider that God works uſually by means: and that Putiphar was the ſteward of that king, under whom Jacob died: it would ſeem a matter not improbable, had it an author of ſufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the wars of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he ſhould have ſpent 42 years after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumſtance which (the length of his Italian wars conſidered, and his former enterpriſes and atchievements proportioned to them) doth not make againſt us, but for us: or if it were againſt us, yet could it not ſo weaken our ſuppoſition, as theſe probabilities collected out of the undiſputable truth of ſcripture do confirm it. Nevertheleſs I freely grant that all theſe proofs are no other, than ſuch as may be gathered out of authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in ſuch obſcurity, otherwiſe than by likelihoods, anſwerable to the holy text.

SECT. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Seſoſtres, ſucceſſively reigning after Miſraim: and of divers errors about the former Seſoſtris.

CONcerning the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that preciſely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is ſo peremptory without proof, as if his own word were ſufficient authority, in many points very queſtionable; alledging no witneſs, but as it were ſaying Teſte meipſo: yet herein we may think him to ſpeak probably, foraſmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very ſoon undertake his father's revenge, and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other wars, in the ſame quarrel, as hath been ſhewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Beroſus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet ſeeing Aventinus, a follower of Beroſus, hath it ſo, I will alſo believe it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, ſeven years were ſpent, howſoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzhemius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus 7 years after the death of Oſiris: forgetting to ſet down his reaſons, which, in a matter ſo probable, I think he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90 years of the 18th Dynaſty to Oſiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it ſeems that the reign of Orus laſted 115 years. From the death of Orus to the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, there paſſed 122 years by our account: who (according to Beroaldus, and others) think that Abraham was born in the 130th year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the flood to the birth of Abraham —— —— 352 which ſum divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remain (as is aforeſaid) only 122 years from the death of Orus: we are now to conſider how many of them are to be allowed unto Seſoſtris or Seſonchoſis, who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiaſtes Apollonii; not without good probability. For this great king or conqueror, is by many hiſtories recorded to have over-run a great part of Aſia: to have built a fleet of ſhips on the Red ſea; and ſo to have entred into India: likewiſe with another fleet on the middle-earth ſeas, to have paſſed into Europe, and ſubdued many nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Juſtin erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris: for Juſtin placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Seſoſtris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Oſiris (otherwiſe Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Aſia) till the father-in-law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gerar, and gave it to his daughter (as we may read more at large in the holy hiſtory of the bible) after which time Seſac oppreſſed Rehoboam, and Necho ſought paſſage thro' the land of Iſrael, when he made his expedition againſt the Chaldeans. Of king Vaphres and Necho it is out of queſtion, that neither of them was the great king Seſoſtris. Of Seſac it is doubted by ſome, foraſmuch as he came into Judea, with a great army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unleſs it be ſufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himſelf placeth Seſoſtris next to Orus; following the Scholiaſtes Apollonii. But further anſwer may be made to ſhew that they were not one. For as Juſtin witneſſeth, Seſoſtris, otherwiſe Vexoris, made war on people far removed, abſtaining from his neighbours. Seſac came up purpoſely againſt Jeruſalem. Seſoſtris, as Diodorus witneſſeth, had but 24000 horſe: Seſac had 60000: Seſoſtris had 8020 chariots, Seſac but 1200. Seſoſtris made his expedition for no private purpoſe, but to get a great name: Seſac, as moſt agree, had no other purpoſe than to ſuccour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign, whom he had favoured even againſt Solomon: therefore Seſoſtris muſt needs have reigned whilſt Iſrael abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: becauſe thoſe hiſtorians affirm that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth me nothing. For Oſiris did ſucceed thoſe 15 gods, namely, the 12 greater and 3 leſſer: himſelf alſo (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as alſo Minæus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: tho' miſtaken by ſome as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus: the Hebrew word Meni ſignifying an arithmetician: which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Oſiris: who was a great conqueror, philoſopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giving good laws, and teaching profitable arts. In proweſs and great undertakings Seſoſtris was no whit inferiour to Oſiris. For he ſought victory not for gain, but for honour only: and being well contented, that many nations had acknowledged his power, and ſubmitted themſelves to his will and royal diſpoſition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great treaſon, the houſe, in which he was, being by his own brother purpoſely fired: which nevertheleſs he is ſaid to have eſcaped, and to have reigned in all thirty-three years: after which time he choſe rather to die than to live: becauſe he fell blind. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Seſoſtris left a ſon, whoſe name was Pheron or Pherones; who afterwards took the name of Seſoſtris: but was nothing like to his father in glory: for he ſhortly fell blind. The cauſe of his blindneſs Herodotus attributes to his aſſaulting the river Nilus with a javelin: which tale Diodorus having likewiſe heard, yet reports as a fable, ſaying, that perhaps he took the diſeaſe naturally from his father. How long this man reigned it is no where expreſ-ſed: yet foraſmuch as Orus the ſecond (otherwiſe Buſiris) who ſucceeded him, began 14 years after that this Seſoſtris had been king, it muſt needs be that this reigned 14 years at leaſt. That Buſiris began not until theſe 14 years at leaſt were expired, the very account of time from the firſt of Buſiris, to the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, plainly ſhews, being almoſt generally agreed upon, to have been 75 years. That none came between Seſoſtris the ſecond, and Buſiris or Orus the ſecond, it ſtands only upon probabilities: which are theſe. After Seſoſtris had reigned ſomewhile, he fell blind: after certain years he recovered his ſight, as is ſaid: which may have been true, but is more like to have been a fable: ſurely the manner of his recovery, as it is ſet down, is very fabulous: namely, that by looking upon a woman, or waſhing his eyes with her water, who had only known her own husband, he got his ſight again. As the time of his reign, before his blindneſs, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14 years: ſo his works, which were great, do much more ſtrongly argue, that his reign was not very ſhort. His works, are largely ſet down by Herodotus and Diodorus: a part of which may ſeem to have been the finiſhing of that which his father had begun, about the channels and ſluices of Nilus: whom I think he rather frighted (as his father had done) with ſpades and ſhovels, than with darts and javelins: and by his diligent overſight of that work, was like enough to loſe both his eye-ſight and his people's love: whom his father had very buſily employ'd in exceſſive labour about it.

SECT. VII.

Of Buſiris the firſt oppreſſor of the Iſraelites: and of his ſucceſſour queen Thermutis that took up Moſes out of the water.

AND herein (if I may preſume to conjecture) Buſiris, who was afterwards king, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the ſon of Solomon. For that Buſiris himſelf was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared, by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the children of Iſrael in his buildings: if therefore he were employ'd by the great Seſoſtris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the overſight of thoſe buſineſſes, he had good opportunity to work his greatneſs with the king by induſtry: and afterwards with the people by incenſing them againſt their new king: as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one prince's hands, they will not at another's: unleſs he have either an equal ſpirit, or a ſurer foundation. If moreover he ſought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians, to the Iſraelites: he ſurely did that which to his own people was very plauſible, who (as appears in Exodus i.) were nothing ſlack in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the 2d, or Buſiris, was the king that firſt oppreſſed Iſrael, and made the edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (ſaith Cedrenus) laſted 10 months: it is a common opinion of many great and moſt learned writers, who alſo think that hereupon grew the fable of Buſiris ſacrificing ſtrangers. It is alſo a common interpretation of that place, Exod. i. that the king, who knew not Joſeph, was a king of a new family. That Buſiris was of a new family, Reinecius doth ſhew: who alſo thinks him author of the bloody edict. Nevertheleſs true it is, that Buſiris, according to all mens computation, began his reign 5 years after the birth of Moſes; before whoſe birth it is moſt manifeſt, that the law was made, and much more that the perſecution began: which Bunting thinks to have laſted 87 years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore conſider, beſides the blindneſs of Seſoſtris the ſecond, how great the power of the regents or viceroys in Egypt was: and how great confidence the kings did put in them: ſeeing Joſeph ruled with ſuch full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the ſame time the beſt of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing: ſeeing alſo that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for bread, Pharaoh ſaid to all the Egyptians, Go to Joſeph: what he ſaith to you, do ye. If to a ſtranger born, lately fetch'd out of priſon, a king well able to have governed himſelf, would give ſuch truſt, and ſoveraign authority: it is not unlikely that a blind prince ſhould do it to a man of eſpecial reputation. For God often proſpers, not only the good (ſuch as Joſeph was) but wicked men alſo, as his inſtruments againſt the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many have done) reſign his kingdom to him, tho' his reign was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Seſoſtris. But whether Buſiris did uſurp the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king reſigned it, keeping the title: or whether Buſiris were only regent, whilſt the king liv'd, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himſelf: it might well be ſaid that Pharaoh's daughter took up Moſes, and that Pharaoh vexed Iſrael: ſeeing he both at that time was king in effect, and ſhortly after king in deed and title both. It were not abſurd for us to ſay, that the blind king Seſoſtris the 2d oppreſs'd Iſrael: but foraſmuch as it may ſeem that the wicked tyrant ſhewed his evil nature even when he firſt aroſe, I think it more likely, that Buſiris did it, uſing at firſt the power of a king, and ſhortly after the ſtile. Thus of the 122 years which paſſed between the beginning of Seſoſtris's reign, and the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, 47 being ſpent: the 75 which remain, are to be accounted to Buſiris or Orus the 2d, and his children. Buſiris himſelf reigned 30 years, according to Euſebius: whom very many judicious authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who took Moſes out of the water, is ſaid, by all that I have read, to have reigned 12 years: her name was Thermutis Phareis, or Muthis, according to Cedrenus: Euſebius calls her Acencris: and out of Artabanus's hiſtory, Meris: Joſephus calls her both Acenchere and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario ſaith, that ſhe was honoured afterwards of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis, the daughter of Amenoph, the ſon of Pharaoh. Of this laſt title queſtion might be made, and much ſpoken: for the ſcriptures call her not Pharaoh's ſon's daughter, but Pharaoh's daughter. Amenophis indeed is placed next before Buſiris, or Orus the ſecond, by Euſebius, and others: but whether he were a king, or only a regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient hiſtorians name the ſon of Seſoſtris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the niece or grandchild, than the daughter of Pharaoh, becauſe of the glory of Seſoſtris, and the diſreputation of his ſon. If ſo, and if that Buſiris or Orus the 2d marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture ſtrengthened, and then was ſhe both daughter, grandchild, and wife unto Pharaoh: and ſurviving him, queen of the land, twelve years. But if ſhe were daughter of Orus the ſecond, and ſiſter of Athoris, or Ratboris, as many think, to whoſe conjecture I will

will not oppoſe mine, then may it ſeem, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her father died.

SECT. VIII.

Of the two brethren of queen Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moſes was born: and who it was that periſhed in the Red ſea.

SHE had two brethren: the one was Ratboris, or Atheris, who ſucceeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Euſebius: but his lineage and off-ſpring deſcribed by Reineccius. Ratboris, after his ſiſter's death, reigned nine years: after whom Chencres, thought to be his ſon, reigned ten, and then periſhed in the Red ſea. During the reign of Chencres, Euſebius ſaith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io: of which hiſtory elſewhere he reporteth otherwiſe. After the death of Chencres (whom ſome call Acencheres: but all or moſt do ſtile αὐθάμαχον a fighter againſt God) Acherres reigned eight years: and then Cherres fifteen. This deſcent ſeems from father to ſon. In the eleventh year of Cherres it is ſaid by Euſebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwiſe was not unlikely, viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the deſtruction of her king and army in the Red ſea: elſe could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his poſterity, ſeems to have taken all from Cherres the grandchild of Chencres. For whereas Armais is ſaid to have reigned four years after Cherres, and Armeſis one after Armais, theſe two kings are by Euſebius and others accounted as one, and his reign ſaid to have been five years. His name is called Armeus, otherwiſe Danaus; and his pedegree thus deſcribed by Reineccius in Hiſtoria Julia.

Telegonus.
Epaphus,
Libya, who had Agenor, Belus and Buſiris.

Ægyptus or Rameſſes, who gave name to the country, having expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermneſtra.

Danaus or Armeus, expelled by his brother Ægyptus, after he had reigned five years, became king of Argos in Greece: was father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to paſs that the nephews ſons of Epaphus ſhould have occupied the kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to ſay: conſidering that Epaphus himſelf is reported by Euſebius to have been born in the time of Chencres. But foraſmuch as the hiſtory of Epaphus's birth, is diverſly related by Euſebius, it may ſuffice, that Belus the father of Danaus and Egyptus, otherwiſe called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally diſtant from Buſiris or Orus the ſecond, with Cherres the grandchild of Chencres. And that the poſterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the hiſtory of theſe two brethren, Danaus and Ægyptus: of whom the former had 50 daughters, the latter 50 ſons: perhaps, or rather queſtionleſs, by divers women: yet ſurely they began to beget children in their firſt youth: howſoever it were, the general conſent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did ſucceed Cherres: and, according to Euſebius and good authors approving him, reigned five years. Rameſſes followed, who reigned ſixty-eight years. This Rameſſes or Ægyptus is that Armoſeſmiamum or Armeſeſmiamus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moſes was born; and the cruel edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reign ſeems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord ſaid to Moſes, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Exod. iv. 19. Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the ſame king under whom Moſes was born, and under whom he ſlew the Egyptian at the 40th year of his age; and fled into the wilderneſs, and there abode for fear: all which circumſtances could agree with none but this Rameſſes who reigned ſo long: wherefore deſirous rather to hold a true paradox, than a common error, he placeth one Aliſfragmuthoſis (whoſe name is found in the liſt of Egyptian kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an age 112 or 113 years more ancient than others left him in: and ſo continuing the catalogue of his ſucceſſors from Themoſis (whom Euſebius calls Amaſis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each man's reign, than is the difference between Manetho and Euſebius, he finds Moſes born under Armeſeſmiamum, and Iſrael delivered in the days of his ſon Amenophis. The very name of Aliſfragmuthoſis ſeems to him with little alteration to ſound like Pharatates, of which name one was thought to have flouriſhed either as a king, or a wiſe man, about the time of Iſaac. For, ſaith he, from Aliſfragmuthoſis to Phragmuthoſis, Pharmuthoſis or Pharatates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and induſtry: and one to whom the world is bound for his many notable works; yet my aſſent herein is with-held from him, by theſe reaſons. Firſt, I ſee all other writers agree, that Chencres was the king who was drowned in the Red ſea. Secondly, The place, Exod. iv. all are dead, &c. may better be underſtood of Buſiris and all his children, than of one king alone. Thirdly, St. Cyril, in his firſt book againſt Julian the apoſtate, ſaith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moſes was 120 years old, Rameſſes, which was this Armeſeſmiamum, being then king of Egypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned nineteen years, who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the king that periſhed in the Red ſea: of which our opinion being already laid open, I think it moſt expedient to refer the kings enſuing to their own times (which a chronological table ſhall lay open) and here to ſpeak of that great deliverance of Iſrael out of Egypt: which, for many great conſiderations depending thereupon, we may not lightly overpaſs.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Iſrael out of Egypt.

SECT. I.

Of the time of Moſes's birth, and how long the Iſraelites were oppreſſed in Egypt.

TRUE it is that the hiſtory it ſelf is generally and well known; yet concerning the time of Moſes's birth, who was the excellent and famous inſtrument of this and other great works of the Higheſt, the different opinions are very near as many, as the men that have written of that argument.

Lud.

Lud. Vives, in his annotations upon St. Auguſtine, citeth very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyry out of Sanchoniato, that Moſes lived in the time of Semiramis: but if he did mean the firſt Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for beſides that the ſame is contrary to all ſtories divine and human; while that Semiramis lived, ſhe commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof abſolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while ſhe ruled, in rerum natura.

A ſecond opinion he remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolemy a prieſt of the Mendes, who ſaith that Moſes was born while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Ameſis in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek hiſtory, the firſt book: that Moſes was born while Apis the third king ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Aſſyrius, who, tho' he cites ſome authorities that Moſes lived after the Trojan war, is himſelf of opinion, that Moſes was far more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, He ſetteth down the teſtimony of Numenius the philoſopher, who took Muſæus and Moſes to be one: confirming the ſame out of Artapanus, who confeſſeth that Moſes was called Muſæus, by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the ſame which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. [a] Euſebius alſo affirmeth, that Eupolemus in his firſt book De bono, Moſes vir Deo conjunctiſſimus is called Muſæus Judæorum. Euſebius, in his chronology, finds that Moſes was born while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moſes's birth, Thumoſis or Thmoſis: the ſame perchance which Appion the grammarian will have to be Amoſis, and elſewhere Amenophis the father of Sethoſis: to whom Lyſimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it ſeems moſt probable, that while Saphrus, called alſo Spherus or Ipherius, governed Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criaſus the Argives; that then (Seſoſtris the ſecond ruling in Egypt) Moſes was born. For if we believe St. Auguſtine, it was about the end of Cecrops's time, that Moſes led Iſrael out of Egypt: [b] Eduxit Moſes ex Egypto populum Dei noviſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium regis: Moſes, ſaith he, led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops's time, king of the Athenians. In this ſort therefore, is the time of Moſes's birth, and of his departure out of Egypt beſt proved. St. Auguſtine affirms (as before remembred) that Moſes was born, : Saphrus governing Aſſyria: and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops's time. Now Saphrus ruled twenty years; his ſucceſſor Mamelus thirty years; Sparetus after him forty years: in whoſe fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Aſcatades followed Sparetus, and held the empire forty-one: So as Moſes being born while Saphrus ruled Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criaſus, Argos (for theſe three kings lived at once at his birth, ſaith St. Auguſtine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moſes was in the nineteenth year of the Aſſyrian Saphrus: for take one year remaining of twenty (for ſo long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Mamelus, and the forty years of Sparetus, theſe make ſeventy-one, with which there were waſted three years of Cecrops's fifty years; then take nine years out of the reign of Aſcatades, who was Sparetus's ſucceſſor, thoſe nine years added to ſeventy-one make eighty, at which age Moſes left Egypt: and add theſe nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly ſpent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops's fifty: and ſo it falleth right with St. Auguſtine's words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops's time, Moſes led the people of Iſrael out of Egypt.

Now the time, in which the Hebrews were oppreſs'd in Egypt, ſeemeth to have had beginning ſome eight or nine years before the birth of Moſes, and fifty-four years, or rather more, after Joſeph; between whoſe death and the birth of Moſes there were conſumed ſixty-four years: ſome of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great ſervitude and miſery. For as it is written in Exodus i. They ſet task-maſters over them, to keep them under with burdens; and they built the cities, Pithom and Ramaſes, &c. And by cruelty they cauſed the children of Iſrael to ſerve; and made them weary of their lives, by ſore labour in clay and brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which, laid upon them by a maſtering power and a ſtrong hand, they endured to the time by the wiſdom of God appointed: even from fifty-four years, or not much more after the death of Joſeph, who left the world when it had laſted 2370 years, to the eightieth year of Moſes, and until he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which he performed in the world's age 2514 towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account 2513. And becauſe thoſe things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be underſtood, I think it neceſſary to ſpeak a few words of the principal places therein named, in this diſcourſe.

SECT. II.

Of divers cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this ſtory, or elſewhere in the ſcripture.

THIS city which the Hebrews call [c] Zoan, was built ſeven years after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and ſo doth Jeremy; the Septuagint, Tanis; Joſephus, Protaidis, after the name of an Egyptian queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis; Hegeſippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adjoineth to the land of Goſen, and is the ſame wherein Jeremy the prophet was ſtoned to death, for preaching againſt the Egyptian and Jewiſh idolatry.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moſes's time the metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly reſided; and not unlikely to be the ſame city where Abraham in his time found him. But Euſebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read aſtronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates king of Egypt. Alexander Polyhiſtor out of Eupolemus, hath it otherwiſe, ſaying, that Abraham inſtructed the Egyptian prieſts, and not the king; both which authorities [d] Euſebius citeth. The Septuagint and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Heliopolis; Pagninus, Vatablus, Junius, and our Engliſh, call it On; and Ptolemy, Onium. There are two cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the ſouth; the other ſomewhat lower on the eaſter-moſt branch of Nilus, falling into the ſea at Peluſium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the ſouth of the river Trajan, was the ſame which Vatablus and our Engliſh call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the ſcriptures take certain knowledge: the ſame which Pomponius Mela and Pliny call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy War, Malbec; the Arabians, Babalbeth; and Simeon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar prieſt, or prince, whoſe daughter Joſeph married married. In the territory adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this city, Onias, the high prieſt of the Jews, built a temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferiour to that of Jeruſalem (Ptolomy Philopater then governing in Egypt) which ſtood in the time of Veſpaſian, 333 years after the foundation by Onias, whom Joſephus falſely reporteth herein to have fulfilled a prophecy of Iſaiah c. 19. In die illa erit altare Domini in medio terræ Ægypti; In that day ſhall the altar of the Lord be in the midſt of the land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occaſion for the erecting of this temple in Egypt. Laſtly, There it was, that our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus remained, while Joſeph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which, ſaith Brochard, the fountain is ſtill found, called Jeſus-well, whoſe ſtreams do afterward water the gardens of Balſamum, no where elſe found in Egypt. And hereof ſee more in Brochard, in his deſcription of Egypt.

There is alſo the city of Noph, remembred by [a] Iſaiah and Ezekiel; the ſame which Hoſea the prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it took from a mountain adjoining ſo called; which mountain [b] Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great city which was called Memphis; and ſo the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalenſis, Mizraim.

Peluſium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our Engliſh write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna, is not the ſame with Damiata, as [c] Gul. Tyrius witneſſeth. In the time of Baldwin III. Peluſium was called Belbeis: Belbeis, ſaith Tyrius, quæ olim dicta eſt Peluſium; Belbeis, that in times paſt was called Peluſium.

The city of No, the [d] Septuagint call Dioſpolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Jerome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, becauſe it was ſo called in the future.

Bubaſtus (for ſo Jerome and Zeigler do write it) is the ſame which the [e] Hebrews call Pibeſeth.

To make the ſtory the more perceivable, I have added a deſcription of the land of Goſen, in which the Iſraelites inhabited, with thoſe cities and places ſo often remembred in the ſcripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethſemes, Balſephon, Succoth and the reſt; together with Moſes's paſſage thro' the deſarts of Arabia the ſtony. For all ſtory, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleaſure, ſo it no way enricheth the knowledge and underſtanding of the reader; neither doth any thing ſerve to retain what we read in our memories, ſo well as theſe pictures and deſcriptions do. In which reſpect I am driven to digreſs in many places, and to interpoſe ſome ſuch diſcourſe, otherwiſe ſeeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man Arias Montanus; who, in his preface to the ſtory of the Holy Land, hath theſe words: Si enim abſque locorum obſervatione res geſtæ narrentur, aut ſine topographiæ cognitione hiſtoriæ legantur, adeo confuſa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex iis nihil non obſcurum, nihil non difficile elici poſſit; If narration, ſaith he, be made of thoſe things which are performed, without the obſervation of the places wherein they were done, or if hiſtories be read without topographical knowledge, all things will appear ſo intricate and confuſed, as we ſhall thereby underſtand nothing but obſcurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greateſt difficulty.

SECT. III.

Of the cruelty againſt the Iſraelites young children in Egypt: and of Moſes's preſervation, and education.

BUT to return to the ſtory it ſelf. It appeareth that notwithſtanding the labour and ſlavery which the Iſraelites endured, yet they decreaſed not in numbers: inſomuch as Pharaoh conſidering the danger of diſcontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppreſſed multitude, how perilous they might be to his eſtate, by ſuggeſtion of the devil reſolved to ſlaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as ſoon as they ſhould be born. To which end he ſent for Sephora and Thura, women the moſt famous and expert amongſt them; Quæ præerant, ſaith Comeſtor, multitudini obſtetricum; who had command given them over all midwives; by whom (as it ſeemeth) he gave order to all the reſt for the execution of his edict. For to have called all the midwives of Egypt together, had been a ſtrange parliament. Now whether theſe two before named, were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diverſly diſputed. St. Auguſtine calls them Hebrews, becauſe it is written Exodus i. 16. The king of Egypt commanded the midwives of the Hebrew women, &c. But [f] Joſephus, Abulenſis, and Pererius believe them to be Egyptians. Whoſoever they were, when it pleaſed God to fruſtrate the execution of that ſecret murder, to the end the world might witneſs both the wickedneſs of the Egyptians, and the juſt cauſe, thereby made manifeſt, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding theſe women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howſoever, to deſtroy all the male Hebrew children born within his dominions.

Now beſides the doubts which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greateſt part of whom he might have aſſured, by affording them the juſtice which every king oweth to his vaſſals, and the reſt he might have employed or ſent away at his pleaſure, [g] Joſephus giveth another cauſe of his rage againſt them; namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian prieſt, that among the Hebrews there ſhould be born a child, who growing to man's eſtate, ſhould become a plague and terror to his whole nation. To prevent which (and preſuming that he could reſiſt the ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the laws of heaven and of nature) he ſtreched out his bloody and mercileſs hand to the execution of his former intent. The ſame prevention Herod long after practis'd, when fearing the ſpiritual kingdom of Chriſt, as if it ſhould have been temporal, he cauſed all the male children at that time born to be ſlaughtered. And that Pharaoh had ſome kind of foreknowledge of the future ſucceſs, it may be gathered by theſe his own words, in Exodus v. 10. Come, let us work wiſely with them, leſt they multiply; and it come to paſs, that if there be war, they join themſelves alſo unto our enemies, and fight againſt us, and get them out of the land. But we ſee, and time hath told it us, from the beginning, how God derideth the wiſdom of the worldly men, when, forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own moſt feeble, and altogether darkned underſtanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this tyrant, was that great prophet and miniſter of God's marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an ark of reeds, a ſucking and powerleſs infant. And this princeſs having beheld the child's form and beauty, tho' but yet in the blouth, ſo pierced her compaſſion, as ſhe did not only preſerve it, and cauſe it to be foſtered; but commanded that it ſhould be eſteemed as her own, and with equal care to the ſon of a king nouriſhed. And for memory that it was her deed, ſhe called the child Moſes, as it were extractus or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water; or after Joſephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expreſſing water, and hiſes, as much as to ſay, that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. [a]Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moſes was circumciſed, before he was put into the ark of reeds, and that Amram his father, had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care and at the charge of Pharaoh's daughter; and by men of the moſt underſtanding taught and inſtructed: Quem regio more educavit, præfectis ei ſapientibus Ægyptiorum magiſtris, à quibus erudiretur, ſaith Baſil; Unto whom ſhe gave princely education, appointing over him wiſe maſters of the Egyptians for his inſtructors. Thereby (ſaith Joſephus and [b]Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which alſo the Martyr Stephen in the ſeventh of the Acts confirmeth. And Moſes was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians. Which wiſdom or ſapience, ſuch as it was, or at leaſt ſo much thereof as Sixtus Senenſis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moſes and the reign of Joſhua.

SECT. IV.

Of Moſes's flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient hiſtorians of his war in Ethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo's judgment of his paſtoral life: and that of Pererius of the books of Geneſis and Job.

WHEN Moſes was grown to man's eſtate, Joſephus and Euſebius, out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years war that he made againſt the Ethiopians: of the beſieging of Saba, afterwards by Cambyſes called Meroe; and how he recovered that city by the favour of Tharbis, a daughter of Ethiopia, whom he took to wife. So hath Comeſtor a pretty tale of Moſes, How after the end of that war, Tharbis reſiſting his return into Egypt, Moſes, moſt ſkilful in Aſtronomy, cauſed two images to be engraven in two precious ſtones: whereof the one increaſed memory, the other cauſed forgetfulneſs. Theſe he ſet in two rings, whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reſerving the other of memory for himſelf: which ring of forgetfulneſs, after ſhe had a while worn, ſhe began to neglect the love ſhe bare her husband: and ſo Moſes without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving theſe fancies to the authors of them: it is true, that about the 40th year of Moſes's age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppreſſed Hebrews, moved by compaſſion in reſpect of his brother, and ſtirred up by diſdain againſt the other, in the contention he ſlew the Egyptian. Soon after which act, finding a diſpoſition in ſome of his own nation to accuſe him, for whoſe defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whoſe choſen ſervant he was, he fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering country to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forſaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a nation of barbarous ſtrangers; and who in future times were the irreconcileable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleaſed God (working the greateſt things by the weakeſt worldly means) to make the watering of a few ſheep, and the aſſiſting the daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occaſion whereby to provide him a wife of one of thoſe, and a father-in-law, that fed him, and ſuſtained him in a country neareſt Egypt, fitteſt to return from; neceſſary to be known, becauſe interjacent between Egypt and Judea, thro' which he was to lead the Iſraelites; and wherein God held him, till the occaſion, which God preſented, beſt ſerved. And laſtly, where the glory of the world ſhined leaſt, amidſt mountainous deſarts, there the glory of God, which ſhineth moſt, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a king's ſon, or an adopted child of great Pharaoh's daughter, but as a meek and humble ſhepherd, ſitting at a mountain foot; a keeper and commander of thoſe poor beaſts only.

In that part of Arabia, near Madian, he conſumed 40 years. And tho' (as Philo in the ſtory of Moſes's life obſerveth) he did not neglect the care of thoſe flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that paſtoral knowledge; yet in that ſolitary deſart he enjoy'd himſelf: and being ſeparated from the preſs of the world, and the troubleſome affairs thereof, he gave himſelf to contemplation, and to make perfect in himſelf all thoſe knowledges, whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the ſame author alſo judging, that his paſtoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the principality, which he afterwards obtained. Eſt enim (ſaith Philo) ars paſtoralis, quaſi præludium ad regnum, hoc eſt, ad regimen hominum, gregis manſuetiſſimi. Quemadmodum bellicoſa ingenia præexercent ſe in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod poſtea in militia & bello perfectura ſunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero præfectura manſueti pecoris habet quiddam ſimile cum regno in ſubditis; ideoque reges cognominantur paſtores populorum, non contumeliæ ſed honoris gratia; The art of keeping ſheep is, as it were, an introductory exerciſe unto a kingdom, namely, the rule over men, the moſt gentle flock: even as warlike natures do beforehand exerciſe themſelves in hunting, practiſing on wild beaſts thoſe things, which after they will accompliſh in warfare: thoſe brute beaſts affording matter, wherein to train themſelves, both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattle, hath a kind of reſemblance unto a kingly rule over ſubjects; therefore, kings are ſtyled ſhepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moſes, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the book of Job, as Pererius ſuppoſeth, I cannot judge of it, becauſe it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I ſubſcribe to [c]Pererius's opinion, that Moſes, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the books of Geneſis; altho' I cannot deny the reaſon of Pererius's conjecture, that by the example of Job's patience he might ſtrengthen the oppreſſed Hebrews: and by the promiſes of God to Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, put them in aſſurance of their delivery from the Egyptian ſlavery, and of the land of reſt, and plenty promiſed.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to perſuade Pharaoh, that he was the meſſenger of the moſt High, the particulars are written in the firſt 14 chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needleſs. But for the firſt, it is to be noted, that when [a]Moſes deſired to be taught by God, by what name he ſhould make him known, and by whom he was ſent; he received from God ſo much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he delivered him in the firſt part of his anſwer, a name to be conſidered of by the wiſeſt: and in his ſecond, to be underſtood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it ſelf, but the eternal: which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment: their ſubſtance waſteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one ſtay, nor being the ſame ſo long, as while one may ſay, Now. Likewiſe, whatſoever is conſumed in the longeſt continuance of time, the ſame in every ſhorteſt piece of time ſuffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one ſtate. [b]Una eſt Dei & ſola natura, quæ vere eſt: id enim quod ſubſiſtit non habet aliunde, ſed ſuum eſt. Cætera quæ creata ſunt, etiamſi videntur eſſe, non ſunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & poteſt rurſum non eſſe, quod non fuit; It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himſelf, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, altho' they ſeem to be, yet they are not; for ſometimes they were not: and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in reſpect of the divine nature, the ſaying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra eſt, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a ſhadow, either empty or deceitful: in compariſon of whom, ſaith Iſaiah xl. 17. All nations are as nothing, leſs than nothing, and mere vanity.

Of the ten plagues wherewith the Egyptians were ſtricken, the firſt was by changing the rivers into blood: God puniſhing them by thoſe waters, into which their forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of Revel. xvi. 5. may be fitly applied. And I heard the angel of the waters ſay, Lord, thou art juſt, which art, and which waſt: and holy, becauſe thou haſt judged theſe things; for they ſhed the blood of thy ſaints and prophets, and therefore haſt thou given them blood to drink.

The reſt of the plagues by frogs, lice, flies, or ſtinging waſps; by the death of their cattle; by leprous ſcabs; by hail and fire; by graſhoppers; by darkneſs; after which Pharaoh forbad Moſes his preſence: moved the hardned heart of the unbelieving king no longer than the pain and peril laſted, till ſuch time as his own firſt-born, and the firſt-born of all his nation periſhed. He then, while he feared his own life (a time wherein we remember God perforce) ſtood upon no condition: whereas before, he firſt yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women and children, reſerving their beſtial; but he was now content for the preſent, that the Iſraelites ſhould not only depart with all their own, but with a part of the ſilver, gold and jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being paſt) he ſuddenly repented him, as his purſuit after them proved. For when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moſes received) ſlain a lamb, without ſpot or blemiſh, for the paſſover (a ſacrament of the moſt clean and unſpotted Saviour) and with the blood thereof coloured the poſt and lintern of the doors; the angel of God in the dead of the night ſmote every firſt-born of Egypt, from the ſon of the king, to that of the beggar and ſlave: the children of the Iſraelites excepted. At which terrible judgment of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is ſaid, to their departure. The Egyptians, ſaith [c]Epiphanius, did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Iſraelites uſed after the paſſover; aſcribing an exceeding virtue to the red colour: and therefore they did not only mark their ſheep and cattle, but their trees bearing fruit, to preſerve them from lightning and other harms.

SECT. V.

Of Pharaoh's purſuit of the Iſraelites: and of their paſſage towards the Red ſea, ſo far as Succoth.

NOW, when the people were removed, and on their way (his heart being hardned by God) he bethought him as well of the honour loſt, as of the ſhame remaining after ſo many calamities and plagues, in ſuffering them to depart with the ſpoils of his people, and in deſpight of himſelf. And having before this time great companies of ſoldiers in readineſs, he conſulted with himſelf, what way the Iſraelites were like to take. He knew that the ſhorteſt and faireſt paſſage was thro' the country of the Philiſtines. But becauſe theſe people were very ſtrong, and a warlike nation, and in all probability of his allies, he ſuſpected that Moſes meant to find ſome other out-let, to wit, thro' the deſart of Etham; and there, becauſe the country was exceeding mountainous, and of hard acceſs, and that Moſes was peſtered with multitudes of women, children, and cattle, he thought it impoſſible for the Iſraelites to eſcape him that way. In the mean while hoving gathered together all the chariots of [d]Egypt, and 600 of his own, and captains over them; he determined to ſet upon them in the plains of Goſen, which way ſoever they turned themſelves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in thoſe chariots, armed with broad and ſharp hooks on both ſides, in faſhion like the mower's ſcythe. Which kind of fight in chariots, but not hooked, the Britains uſed againſt the Romans, while they made the war for the conqueſt of this land. Of this army of Pharaoh, [e]Joſephus affirmeth, that it conſiſted of 50000 horſe, and 20000 foot; which were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to aſſail the Hebrews at their departure, or to deſtroy them in Goſen; and refuſed them paſſage, till ſuch time as he had prepared an army to ſet on them. For, as it is written in the firſt of Exodus, he doubted two things; either that the Hebrews might join themſelves to his enemies within the land; or being ſo multiplied, as they were, might leave his ſervice, and get themſelves thence at their pleaſure. But the plagues which God grieved him withal, enforc'd him at this time to give an aſſent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwiſe, and Joſephus partial in this affair, yet by the words of the text Exod. xiv. 7. it appeareth, that he gathered all the chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haſte. For Moſes made but three days march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the laſt day he went on ſixteen miles: which, in ſo hot a country, and to drive their cattle and ſheep with them, peſtered with a world of women and children, was a march witneſſing the dread of a powerful enemy at hand. Now, as Moſes well knew, that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his underſtanding in all his enterprizes: ſo he lay not ſtill in the ditch crying for help, but uſing the underſtanding derſtanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed, becoming a wiſe man, and a valiant and ſkilful conductor; as by all his actions and counſels from this day to his death well appeared.

When Moſes perceived that Pharaoh was enraged againſt him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his preſence: after that he had warned Iſrael of the paſſover, he appointed a general aſſembly or rendezvous of all the Hebrews at Ramaſes, in the territory of [a] Goſen, a city ſtanding indifferent to receive from all parts of the country the diſperſed Hebrews; and gave commandment, that every family ſhould bring with them ſuch ſtore as they had of dough and paſte, not ſtaying to make it into bread; knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having conſidered the great ſtrength of Pharaoh's horſemen and chariots, of which kind of defence Moſes was utterly unprovided (tho', as it is written, the Iſraelites went up armed) he marched from Ramaſes [b] eaſtward towards the deſarts of Etham, and encamped at Succoth; which he performed on the 15th day of the month Abib. Which month from that time forward, they were commanded to account as the firſt month of the year. Whether in former times they had been accuſtomed to begin their year in ſome other month, following the manner of the [c] Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moſes to the rule of their forefathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politick year, which was not now abrogated, but rather, by ſome ſolemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and ſtill continued in uſe. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, midſt or ending of the year; that diſtinction of the ſacred, and the politick year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every month, and the whole form of their year, like enough it is, that Moſes himſelf in forty years ſpace, did ſufficiently inſtruct the prieſts, to whoſe care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in truſt: but that any rule of framing their kalendar was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now becauſe time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to ſhew here at their firſt ſetting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew year: with the difference between them and other nations, in ordering the account of time.

SECT. VI.

Of the ſolary and lunary years: and how they are reconciled: with the form of the Hebrew year, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew months are thus named.

The firſt month, Niſan, or Abib.	1. March.
The ſecond, Jar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
The third, Sivan, or Sinan, or Siban.	3. May.
The fourth, Tamuz.	4. June.
The fifth, Ab.	5. July.
The ſixth, Ehul.	6. Auguſt.
The ſeventh, Tyſri, or Ethavin or Ethanim.	7. September.
The eighth, Marcheſuan, or Mechaſuan, or Bul, or with [d] Joſephus, Marſonane.	8. October.
The ninth, Chiſleu or Caſleu.	9. November.
The tenth, Tebeth, or Thobeth.	10. December.
The eleventh, Sebeth or Sabath.	11. January.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. February.

Ve Adar was an intercalary month, added, ſome years, unto the other twelve, to make the ſolar and lunary year agree; which (beſides the general inconvenience that would otherwiſe have riſen, by caſting the months of ſummer into the winter ſeaſon, to the great confuſion of all account) was more neceſſarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, becauſe of the [e] divine precept. For God appointed eſpecial feaſts to be celebrated preciſely in ſuch a month of the year, and withal on a ſet day, both of the moon and of the month; as, the feaſt of the firſt-fruits, the new moons, and the like: which could not have been ſo kept, if either the day of the moon had fallen in ſome other part of the month, or the month it ſelf been found far diſtant from his place in the ſeaſon of the year.

Other nations, the better to obſerve their ſolemnities in the due time, and to aſcertain all reckonings and remembrances (which is the principal commodity of time, that is the meaſure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding ſometimes, and ſometimes abating one or more days, as the error committed in foregoing years required. The error grew at firſt by not knowing what number of days made up a compleat year. For tho' by the continual courſe of the ſun, cauſing ſummer and winter duly to ſucceed each other, it is plain enough even to the moſt ſavage of all people, when a year hath paſſed over them; yet the neceſſity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a ſhorter tally, makes this long meaſure of whole years inſufficient for the ſmaller ſort of more daily affairs. Therefore men obſerved the monthly conſpicuous reſolution of the moon, by which they divided the year into 12 parts, ſubdividing the month into [f] 29 days and nights, and thoſe again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are ſenſible and eaſily diſcerned: ſo the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the underſtanding. Twelve revolutions of the moon, containing leſs time by 11 days or thereabouts, than the yearly courſe of the ſun, thro' the zodiac, in the ſpace of 16 years, every month was found in the quite contrary part of the year to that wherein it was placed at the firſt. This cauſed them to add ſome days to the year, making it to conſiſt of 12 months, and as many days more, as they thought would make the courſes of the ſun and moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the ſun determine his yearly revolution by any ſet number of whole days; neither did the moon change always at one hour; but the very minutes and leſſer fractions were to be obſerved by him, that would ſeek to reduce their motions (which motions alſo were not ſtill alike) into any certain rule. Here lay much wiſdom and deep art, which could not ſoon be brought to perfection. Yet as making an eſtimate at random, the Athenians held the year to contain 360 days, wherein moſt of the Greeks concurred with them. That 360 days filled up the Grecian year (beſides many collateral proofs) it is manifeſt by that which [g] Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the ſtatues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (ſaith he) 360, whilſt as yet the year exceeded not that number of days. By this account neither did any certain age of the moon begin or end their months; neither could their months continue many years, in their own places: but muſt needs be ſhifted by little and little, from winter to ſummer, and from ſummer to winter, as the days forgotten to be inſerted into the almanack by men, but not forgotten by the ſuperiour bodies in their courſes, ſhould occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, becauſe the ſolemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full moon, and withal on the fifteenth day of the month Hecatombæon (which anſwereth in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this month might ever begin with the new moon; which they effected by adding ſome two days to the laſt month of every year: thoſe games being held once in four years. This intercalation ſufficed not to make the matter even; which cauſed them ſometimes to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the ſecond of the month Bædromian; agreeing nearly with our Auguſt, ſometimes not to omit it, or, which is all one, to inſert another for it in their fourth lunary year, accounting by the moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithſtanding, their month of June would every year have grown colder and colder, had they not ſought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other's Olympiad, that is, each eighth year one whole month, which they called the ſecond Poſideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who alſo taught them to make one month of 29 days, another of 30, and ſo ſucceſſively thro' the whole year. Thus with much labour they kept their year as near as they could, unto the high way of the planets; but theſe marks which they obſerved, were found at length to be deceitful guides. For it was not poſſible ſo to faſhion this eighth year's intercalation, that it ſhould not deceive them in 11 hours and 18 minutes at the leaſt, or ſome ways in 34 hours and 10 minutes, or 36 and 41 minutes; which differences would in few ages have bred much confuſion. The firſt that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth year's intercalation, deviſed a Cycle of 19 years, where the moon having 235 times run out her circuit, met with the ſun in the ſame place, and on the ſame day of the year, as in the 19th year before paſt ſhe had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applauſe, and paſſing from Greece to Rome, was there inſerted into the kalendar in golden letters, being called the golden number; which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been uſed; for by the intercalation of ſeven months in the 19 years, all was ſo even, that no ſenſible difference could be found. Yet that errour, which in one year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of thoſe Cycles; the new moons anticipating in one Cycle, ſeven hours, and ſome minutes of the preciſe rule. Therefore Calippus deviſed a new Cycle containing four of Meton's, that is to ſay, 76 years; and afterwards Hipparchus, a noble Aſtrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus's periods, each of them finding ſome errour in the former obſervations, which they diligently corrected. The laſt reformation of the kalendar was that which Julius Ceſar made, who, by advice of the beſt Mathematicians then to be found, examining the courſes of thoſe heavenly bodies, reduced the year unto the form which is now in uſe with us, containing 365 days and ſix hours, which hours, in four years make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24th of February. The correction of the Julian year by pope Gregory XIII. Anno Domini 1582, is not as yet entertained by general conſent; it was indeed but as a note added unto the work of Ceſar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obſerved, that the ſun, which at the time of the Nicene council, Anno Dom. 324, entered the equinoctial on the 21ſt day of March, was in the year 1582, ten days ſooner found in that time, pope Gregory ſtruck out of the kalendar ten days, following the fourth of October, ſo that inſtead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moveable feaſts depending on the ſun's entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in ſuch time, as at the Nicene council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the council of Trent ordained, that from thenceforward in every hundredth year, the leap-day ſhould be omitted, excepting ſtill the fourth hundredth; becauſe the ſun doth not in his yearly courſe take up full ſix hours above the 365 days, but faileth ſo many minutes, as in 400 years make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of 19 years, which the Hebrews uſed, was ſuch as neither did need any nice curioſity of hours, minutes, and other leſſer fractions to help it; neither did in ſumming up the days of the whole year, neglect the days of the moon, confounding one moon with another. For with them it fell out ſo, that always the kalends or firſt day of the month was at the new moon, and becauſe that day was feſtival, they were very careful as well to obſerve the ſhort year after the moon, paſſing thro' all the 12 ſigns in one month, as that longer of the ſun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. Firſt therefore, they gave to Niſan their firſt month, which is about our March or April, 30 days; to Jar their ſecond month 29 days; and ſo ſucceſſively 30 to one, 29 to another. Hereby it came to paſs, that every two months of theirs contained ſomewhat evenly two revolutions of the moon, allowing 29 days 12 hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The ſpare minutes were beſtowed among the ſuperfluous or epact days, which made up ſeven months in 19 years; to ſix of which ſeven were commonly given 30 days; to one of them 29 days, or otherwiſe as was found requiſite. Their common year (as appeareth by the ſeveral days of each month) contained 354 days, which fail of the year; wherein the ſun finiſheth his courſe, 11 whole days, with ſome fractions of time. But theſe days, and other broken pieces, howſoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19 years were ſo diſpoſed of by convenient intercalations, that ſtill at the end of that Cycle, both the ſun and moon were found on the ſame day of the year, month and week, yea commonly on the ſame hour of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it 19 years before.

Divers have diverſly ſet down the form of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. [a] Sigonius tells us, that every ſecond year they did add a month of 22 days; every fourth year a month of 23, in the regard of 11 days and a half wanting in 12 moons to fulfil a year of the ſun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the moon doth never finiſh her courſe in 22 or 23 days: and therefore to have added ſo many days to the end of the year, had been the way to change the faſhion of all the months in the years following, which could not have begun as they ought, with the new moon. [b] Genebrard ſaith, that every third year, or ſecond year, as need required, they did intercalate one month, adding it at the year's end unto the other 12. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of conſideration) methinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenneſs until the very laſt of the 19 years. For (to omit ſuch as err groſly) ſome there are who ſay, that after three years, when beſides the days ſpent in 36 courſes of the moon, 33 days are left remaining, that is, 11 days of each year; then did the Hebrews add a month of 30 days; keeping three days as it were in pluſſage unto the next account. The like, ſay they, was done at the end of the ſixth year; at which time, beſides the intercalary month, remained ſix days, namely, three ſurmounting that month, and the epact of three years, beſides the three formerly reſerved. Thus they go on to the 18th year; at which time they have 18 days in hand: all which with the epact of the 19th year, make up a month of 29 days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet ſurely it muſts needs have bred a great confuſion, if in the 18th year every month were removed from his own place by the diſtance of 48 days, that is, half a quarter of the year and more; which inconvenience by ſuch a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore I prefer the common opinion, which preventeth ſuch diſlocation of the months, by ſetting down a more covenient way of intercalation in the 8th year. For the ſix days remaining after the two former intercalations made in the 3d and 6th years, added unto the 22 days, ariſing out of the epacts of the 7th and 8th years, do fitly ſerve to make up a month, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two days is ſo far from cauſing any diſorder, that indeed it helps to make the years enſuing vary the leſs from the proper ſeaſon of every month. This may ſuffice to be ſpoken of the Hebrew months and years, by which they guided their accounts.

SECT. VIII.

Of the paſſage of Iſrael from Succoth towards the Red ſea: and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

FROM Succoth in the morning following, Moſes led the Iſraelites towards the deſart of Etham, to recover the mountain foot, by the edge of that wilderneſs, though he intended nothing leſs than to go out of that way, of all other the neareſt. But being aſſured of the multitude of horſemen and armed chariots, that followed him, he kept himſelf from being incompaſſed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he reſted but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the ſouth; the diſtance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabia being then in ſight thereof, it ſeemeth to proceed from three reſpects; the firſt two natural; the third divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moſes took, perſuaded himſelf, that the numbers which Moſes led, conſiſting of above a million, if not two millions of ſouls (for as it is written Exodus the 12th, Great multitudes of ſundry ſorts of people went out with them [a]) could not poſſibly paſs over thoſe deſart and high mountains with ſo great multitudes of women, children, and cattel, but that at the very entrance of that faſtneſs he ſhould have overtaken them, and deſtroy'd the greateſt numbers of them. For theſe his own words, They are entangled in the land, the wilderneſs hath ſhut them in, do ſhew his hopes and intents; which Moſes by turning another way did fruſtrate. Secondly, Moſes, by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the eaſt ſide of the land of Goſen, or Rameſes: from whence (miſſing Moſes there) his purſuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reaſon of the roughneſs of the way; and howſoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the mountain foot on the left hand, they were better ſecured from the over-bearing violence both of the horſe and chariots. Thirdly, Moſes's confidence in the all-powerful God was ſuch, by whoſe ſpirit, only wiſe, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an eſcape the next way, or by the ſtrength of his multitude, conſiſting of 600000 men, to caſt the ſucceſs upon his own underſtanding, wiſe conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the valley of Pihacheroth, 16 miles diſtant; and ſat down between two ledges of mountains adjoyning to the Red ſea; to wit, the mountains of Etham on the the north, and Baalzephon towards the ſouth: the ſame which Oſorius calleth [b] Climax: on the top whereof there ſtood a temple dedicated to Baal. And as Phagius noteth, the word ſo compounded, is as much to ſay, as Dominus ſpeculæ ſive cuſtodiæ, Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at leaſt made their ſlaves believe, that if any of them offered to eſcape that way into Arabia, this idol would both arreſt them, and force them to return to their lords and maſters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Ægyptii Diis fœcundi; the Egyptians were fruitful in gods, ſaith St. Jerome. But Moſes, who incamped at the foot of this mountain with a million of ſouls, or, as others conceive, with two millions, found this lord of the watch tower aſleep, or out of countenance.

Now theſe two paſſages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm land [c] Moſes refuſed, as well that of Peluſium and Caſiotis, the faireſt and ſhorteſt of all other, in reſpect of Judea, as the other by Etham; from which he reflected, for the reaſons before remembred, and took the way by the valley of Pihacheroth, between the mountains, which made a ſtraight entrance towards the ſea. After whom Pharaoh made ſo great ſpeed with his horſemen and chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to reſt them after ſo long a march; but got ſight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and waſh of the ſea: inſomuch as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's ſudden approach, began to deſpair, and to mutiny, at that time when it behoved them moſt to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moſes's charge, that themſelves foreſaw thoſe perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, [d] which, ſaith the book of Wiſdom, is the betraying of thoſe ſuccours which reaſon offereth, made them both deſpair in God's former promiſes, and to be forgetful of their own ſtrength and multitudes.

SECT. VIII.

Of their paſſage over the Red ſea: and of the Red ſea it ſelf.

BUT Moſes, who feared nothing but God himſelf, perſuaded them to be confident in his goodneſs, who hath never abandoned thoſe, that aſſuredly truſt in him; uſing this comfortable and reſolved ſpeech: [e] Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians, whom you have ſeen this day, ye ſhall never ſee them again. The Lord ſhall fight for you. After which Moſes called on God for ſuccour, received encouragement, and commanded to go on, in theſe words: [f] Wherefore crieſt thou unto me? ſpeak unto the chil-

[a] It is probable that all thoſe Egyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moſes at his departure. [b] Climax is rather ſo called in reſpect of a paſſage up and down, than that it is any proper name. [c] Exod. 13. 17. dren of Iſrael that they go forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and ſtretch out thine hand upon the ſea, and divide it, and let the children of Iſrael go on dry ground through the midſt of the ſea. Moſes obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night finding the ſands uncovered, paſs'd on towards the other ſide and coaſt of Arabia: two parts of the night being ſpent ere he entred the ford, which it pleaſed God by a forcible eaſtern wind, and by Moſes's rod, to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the ſame dry ground which Moſes trod on. Therefore as it is written, The angel of God which went before the hoſt of Iſrael, removed, and went behind them: alſo the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and ſtood behind them; which is, that it pleaſed God therein either by his immediate power, or by the miniſtry of his angel, to interpoſe his defence between the Hebrews and their enemies; to the end that the [a]Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in ſuch ſort as they could not purſue Iſrael with any harmful ſpeed. But in the morning watch Moſes ſeiſed the other bank of Arabia ſide: and Pharaoh (as the dawn of day began to illighten the obſcure air) finding a beginning of the ſeas return, haſted himſelf towards his own coaſt: [b]But Moſes ſtretched forth his hand, and the ſea returned to his force; that is, the ſea moved by the power of God, ran back towards the land with irreſiſtible fury and ſwiftneſs, and overwhelmed the whole army of Pharaoh, ſo as not one eſcaped. For it is written, that God took off their chariot-wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the ſands, the Egyptians being ſtricken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and miſſing the path by which they had paſs'd on after the Hebrews, their wheels ſtuck faſt in the mud and quick-ſands, and could not be drawn out: the ſea coming againſt them with ſupernatural violence.

Lyranus upon Exodus xiv. and others, following the opinions or old traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moſes had by the power of God divided the Red ſea, and that the children of Iſrael were fearful to enter it, Aminadab, prince or leader of the tribe of Juda, firſt made the adventure, and that therefore was that tribe ever after honoured above the reſt, according to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xiix. 8. Thy fathers ſons ſhall bow down unto thee. But Jerome upon the 11th of Hoſea condemns this opinion. And tho' it be true, that Juda had the firſt place in all their marches in the deſart, and, as we now call it, led the vanguard (whereupon it may be inferred, that he alſo led the way through the Red ſea) yet that Moſes himſelf was the conducter of Iſrael at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the lxxviith Pſalm, Thou didſt lead thy people like ſheep by the hand of Moſes and Aaron.

The Hebrews have alſo another fancy, that the Red ſea was divided into 12 parts, and that every tribe paſs'd over in a path apart, becauſe it is written in the cxxxvth Pſalm, according the Vulgar, Diviſit mare rubrum in diviſiones; He divided the Red ſea in diviſions. Alſo that the bottom of the ſea became as a green field or paſture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulenſis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to conſider, that there were not 12 pillars nor 12 armies of the Egyptians. It is written Pſalm lxxvii. 16. Thy way is in the ſea; not thy ways; and in the laſt of the book of Wiſdom, ver. 7. In the Red ſea there was a way.

Now this ſea, through which Moſes paſs'd, and in which Pharaoh, otherwiſe called Chencres, periſhed in the 16th year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red ſea; tho' the ſame differ nothing at all in natural colour from other waters. But as Philoſtratus in his 3d book noteth, and our ſelves know by experience, it is of a blueiſh colour, as other ſeas are. It entreth at a narrow ſtrait between Arabia the happy and Ethiopia, or the land of the Abyſſins: the mouth of the indraught from the cape, which Ptolemy calleth Poſſodium, to the other land of Ethiopia, hath not above ſix leagues in breadth: and the ſame alſo filled every where with iſlands, but afterwards it extendeth it ſelf 58 leagues from coaſt to coaſt: and it runneth up between Arabia the happy, and Arabia Petræa, on one ſide, and Ethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermoſt end and indraught of that ſea: where the Turk now keepeth his fleet of gallies. The coſmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian gulf: but the north part towards Sues, and where Moſes paſs'd, is called Heropolites of the city Hero, ſometime Troy: and of later times Sues. [c]Pliny calls it Cambiſu, by which name it was known, ſaith he, before it was called Hero, many years. The Arabians call this ſea towards the north, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum: king Juba Læniticum: others more properly Elaniticum, of the port and city Elana: which the Septuagint call [d]Elath: Ptolemy Elana: Pliny Læna: [e] Joſephus Ilana, and Marius Niger Aila: there is alſo Ilalah in Aſſyria, to which Salmanaſſar carried the Iſraelites captive, 2 Kings viii. 11. which Ilalah in Aſſyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the 1ſt of Chron. the 5th Ala. But as for this Red ſea, or the parts thereof, thus diverſly named, the Moors and Arabians (vaſſals to the Turks) know it by no other appellation, than the gulf of Meca, after the name of Mahomet's town Mecca. The Greeks write it the ſea Erythræum: of a king called Erythras, or Erythræus: and becauſe Erythros in the Greek ſignifieth red, hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythræus, the ſon of Perſeus and Andromeda, yet it took the name of the Red ſea, as Quin. Curtius conjectureth: which [f]Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it ſeemeth to me by the view of a diſcovery of that ſea in the year 1544, performed by Stephen Gama, viceroy of the eaſt India, for the king of Portugal, that this ſea was ſo called from a reflection of redneſs, both from the banks, cliſts, and ſands of many iſlands, and part of the continent bordering it. For I find by the report of Caſtro, a principal commander under Gama (which diſcourſe I gave Mr. Richard Hacluit to publiſh) that there is an iſland called Dalaqua, ſometimes Leques, containing in length 25 leagues, and 12 in breadth, the earth, ſands, and cliſts of which iſland, being of a reddiſh colour, ſerve for a foil to the waters about it; and make it ſeem altogether of the ſame colour. Secondly, the ſame Caſtro reporteth, that from 24 degrees of ſeptentrional latitude, to 27 (which make in length of coaſt 180 miles, lying as it doth northerly and ſoutherly) all the cliſts and banks are of red earth, or ſtone, which by reflection of the ſun-beams, give a kind of reddiſh luſter to the waters. Thirdly, thoſe Portugals report, and we know it by many teſtimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this ſea towards the ſhore, great abundance of red ſtones, on which the great ſtore of coral grows, which is carried into moſt parts of Europe, and elſewhere. There are alſo on the iſlands of this ſea many red trees, ſaith Strabo, and thoſe growing under water, may alſo be a cauſe of ſuch a colour. Of theſe appearances of redneſs by the ſhadows of theſe ſtones, ſands, earth, and cliſts, I ſuppoſe that it firſt took the name of the Red ſea, becauſe in ſo many places it ſeemeth to be ſuch: which Johannes Barros, in his ſecond decade, eighth book, and firſt chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this ſea from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient coſmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which waſheth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16 or 17 leagues together, along northward towards Sues, ſome three leagues or nine Engliſh miles over, and from this port of Toro, to Sues, and the end of this ſea, it is in length about 28 leagues, of which the firſt 26 have 9 miles breadth as aforeſaid, and afterwards the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thruſt themſelves into the ſea, and ſtraiten it ſo faſt, as for 6 miles together it is not above 3 miles over; from thence upward the land on Egypt ſide, falleth away, and makes a kind of bay or cove for ſome 10 miles together, after which the land grows upon the ſea again, and ſo binds it into the very end thereof, at 4 miles breadth, or thereabouts, in which tract it was that Moſes paſs'd it over, tho' others would have it to be over againſt Elana or Toro; but without judgment: for from Ramaſes to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not above 30 miles interjacent, or 35 miles at moſt, which Moſes paſs'd over in three days: and between the land of Egypt oppoſite to Elana or Toro, the diſtance is above 80 miles. For Ramaſes to which city Moſes came (being the metropolis of Goſen) when he left Pharaoh at Zoan, and took his laſt leave, ſtandeth in 30 degrees 5 minutes of ſeptentrional latitude: and Migdol, or the valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the mountain Climax, or Baalſephon, in 29 and a half, which made a difference of 35 Engliſh miles: the way lying in effect north and ſouth.

SECT. IX.

That the paſſage through the Red ſea was miraculous, and not at a low ebb.

THE Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other heathen writers, who in hatred of the Hebrews, have objected that Moſes paſs'd over the Red ſea at a low ebb, upon a great ſpring-tide, and that Pharaoh conducted more by fury than diſcretion, purſued him ſo far, as before he could recover the coaſt of Egypt, he was overtaken by the flood, and therein periſhed, did not well conſider the nature of this place with other circumſtances. For not to borrow ſtrength from that part of the ſcriptures, which makes it plain, that the waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an eaſterly wind, and by the hand and rod of Moſes (which authority to men that believe not therein perſuadeth nothing) I ſay, that by the ſame natural reaſon unto which they faſten themſelves, it is made manifeſt, that had there been no other working power from above, or aſſiſtance given from God himſelf to Moſes, and the children of Iſrael, than ordinary and caſual, then could not Pharaoh and all his army have periſhed in that purſuit.

For whereſoever there is any ebbing of the ſea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the land: and run downward towards the ocean: leaving all that part towards the land as far as the ſea can ebb, or fall off, to be dry land. Now Moſes entring the ſea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) muſt have left all that end of the Red ſea towards Sues, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a paſſage were made by falling away of the water, 10 or 12 miles farther into the ſea than Sues, and between it and where Moſes paſs'd; who enter'd the ſame ſo far below it, and towards the body of the ſame ſea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the ſleeve or ſtrait, had been by the ebb of a ſpring-tide diſcovered, when Pharaoh found the flood increaſing, he needed not to have returned by the ſame way toward Egypt ſide, but might have gone on his return before the tide, on his right hand: and ſo taken ground at the end of that ſea, at Sues itſelf, or elſewhere. But the ſcriptures do truly witneſs the contrary, that is, That the ſea did not fall away from the land, as naturally it doth; but that Moſes paſs'd on between two ſeas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwiſe, Pharoah by any return of waters could not have periſhed, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great army's deſtruction, prove the cauſe to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himſelf. Again, thoſe words of the ſcriptures, that God cauſed the ſea to run back by a ſtrong eaſt-wind, do rather prove the miracle, than that thereby was cauſed an ebb more than ordinary: for that ſea doth not lie eaſt and weſt, but, in effect, north and ſouth. And it muſt have been a weſt and north-weſt wind, that muſt have driven thoſe waters away thro' their proper channels, and to the ſouth-eaſt into the ſea. But the eaſt-wind blew athwart the ſea, and cut it aſunder: ſo as one part fell back towards the ſouth and main body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the north: which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was check'd by that ſea, which uſed in all times before to ebb away, the flood preſs'd him and overwhelmed him. Thirdly, ſeeing Joſephus avoweth, that Moſes was not only of excellent judgment generally, but alſo ſo great a captain, as he overthrew the Ethiopians in many battles, being employed by Pharaoh, and won divers cities ſeeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this groſsneſs, and diſtraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardneſs of a mountainous paſſage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have truſted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and preſs'd him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it ſeemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out againſt Moſes, and deſpaired altogether of their ſafety: and when Moſes prayed unto God for help, he was anſwered by God: Wherefore cryeſt thou unto me? ſpeak unto the children of Iſrael that they go forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and ſtretch out thy hand upon the ſea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at the time of Pharaoh's approach any ebb at all; but that God did diſperſe and cut thro' the weight of waters, by a ſtrong eaſt-wind, whereby the ſands diſcovered themſelves between the ſea on the left hand towards Sues, from whence the waters moved not, and the ſea which was towards the ſouth on the right hand, So that the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand and on the left hand, Exod. xiv. 22. that is, the waters ſo defended them on both ſides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the ſame path; not that the waters ſtood upright as walls do, as ſome of the ſchoolmen have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any ſuch buildings in the ſea, they would ſoon have quitted the chace and purſuit of Iſrael. Furthermore, there is no man of judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all nations in the obſervations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and refluxes of the ſea, in his own country, on his own coaſt, and in his own moſt traded and frequented ports and havens, and wherein his people having had ſo many hundreds of years experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, thro' ignorance, nor by any foreknown or natural accident, but by God's powerful hand only; which then falleth moſt heavily on all men, when looking thro' no other ſpectacle but their own proſperity, they leaſt diſcern it coming, and leaſt fear it. Laſtly, if the army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the flood, before they could recover their own coaſt; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that ſea, and not have been caſt aſhore on that coaſt of Arabia where Moſes landed, to wit, upon the ſea-bank over-againſt Baalzephon, on Arabia ſide: where it was that the Iſraelites ſaw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red ſea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them: which flood doth not any-where croſs the channel, and run athwart it, as it muſt have done from Egypt ſide to Arabia, to have caſt the Egyptians bodies there; but it keeps the natural courſe towards the end of that ſea: and to which their carcaſes ſhould have been carried, if the work had not been ſupernatural and miraculous. Apollonius in the lives of the fathers affirmeth, that thoſe of the Egyptians which ſtay'd in the country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the purſuit of Iſrael, did ever after honour thoſe beaſts, birds, plants, or other creatures, about which they were buſied at the time of Pharaoh's deſtruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden made a god of that plant or root, about which he was occupied: and ſo of the reſt. But how thoſe multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reaſon ſhall be given elſewhere. Oroſius, in his firſt book and tenth chapter againſt the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived ſome 400 years after Chriſt, the prints of Pharaoh's chariot wheels were to be ſeen at a low water on the Egyptian ſands: and tho' they were ſome time defaced by wind and weather, yet ſoon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Iſraelites from the Red ſea, to the place where the law was given them: with a diſcourſe of laws.

SECT. I.

A tranſition, by way of recapitulation of ſome things touching chronology: with a continuance of the ſtory, until the Amalekites met with the Iſraelites.

BUT to go on with the ſtory of Iſrael, in this ſort I collect the times. [a] Moſes was born in the year of the world 2434. Saphrus then governing Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sycionia, or Peloponneſus; Criaſus, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Deucalion, Theſſaly. He fled into Midian, when he had lived 40 years, in the year of the world 2474, and two years after was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the year 2514, in the laſt month of that year. On the 14th day of the firſt Hebrew month Abib, or the 15th of that month, beginning the day (as they) at ſun-ſetting, in the year of the world 2514, was the celebration of the paſſover; and in the dead of the night of the ſame day were all the [b] firſt-born ſlain thro' Egypt, or in all thoſe parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. The [c] 15th day of the firſt month of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the world 2514, Moſes with the children of Iſrael removed from the general aſſembly at Ramaſes, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third ſtation at [d] Etham: and journeying from Etham they incamped in the valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the mountain [e] Baalzephon; and in the ſame night after midnight, they paſſed the Red ſea: Pharaoh and his army periſhing in their return, about the firſt dawn of the day. Moſes having recovered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God for the delivery of Iſrael; and making no ſtay on that coaſt, entred the deſarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur, but finding no water in that paſſage, he incamped at [f] Marah, in the deſart of Etham, which in Exodus xv. 22. is alſo called Sur, twenty-five miles from the ſea: where the children of Iſrael, preſs'd with extreme thirſt, murmured againſt [g] Moſes a ſecond time; firſt at Pharaoh's approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moſes taking the branches of a tree, growing near a lake of bitter water, and caſting the ſame thereinto, made the ſame ſweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviour; who upon the tree of the croſs changed the bitterneſs of everlaſting death, into the ſweetneſs of eternal life. Pliny remembers theſe bitter fountains in his ſixth book and 29th chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Seſoſtris firſt, Darius after him, and laſtly Ptolemy the ſecond, began to cut an artificial river, thereby by boats and ſmall ſhipping to trade and navigate the Red ſea, from the great cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to [h] Elim, the ſixth manſion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelve fountains of ſweet water, and ſeventy palm-trees, he reſted divers days.

Whether this Helim were the name of a town or city in Moſes's time, I cannot affirm. And yet the ſcarcity of waters in that region was ſuch, as Helim, which had twelve fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William archbiſhop of Tyre, in his hiſtory of the holy war, found at Helim the ruins of a great and ancient city. And at ſuch time as Baldwin the firſt paſs'd that way into Egypt, [i] Ingreſſus, ſaith he, Helim, Civitatem antiquiſſimam populo Iſraelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum perveniſſet, loci illius incolæ, regis adventu prænognito, naviculam ingredientes in mare vicinum ſe contulerunt; Entring Helim a very ancient city, well known ſometime to the people of Iſrael; whither when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the king's approach, took boat, and ſhifted themſelves into the ſea, lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the ſouth, and ſat down by the banks of the Red ſea: the ſeventh manſion. For it ſeemeth that he had knowledge of Amalek, who prepared to reſiſt his paſſage thro' that part of Arabia. And Moſes, who had not as yet trained thoſe of the Hebrews, appointed to bear arms: nor aſſured the minds of the reſt, who encountering with the leaſt miſery, were more apt to return to their quiet ſlavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every-where accompanied them in that paſſage, or at this time to undertake dertake or ſuſtain ſo dangerous an enemy: he therefore made ſtay at this manſion, until the fifteenth of the ſecond month called Zim, or Ijar; and made the eighth manſion in the deſart of [a] Zin; where the children of Iſrael mutinied againſt Moſes the third time, having want of food. In the ſixteenth chapter of Exodus, Moſes omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red ſea, but in the collection of every ſeveral encamping, in the thirty-third of Numbers it is ſet down.

Here it pleaſed God to ſend ſo many flights of quails, as all the country about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it alſo rained manna, being the ſixteenth of their month, which ſerved them inſtead of bread. For [b] now was the ſtore conſumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And tho' they had great numbers of cattle and ſheep among them, yet it ſeemeth that they durſt not feed themſelves with many of thoſe: but reſerved them both for the milk to relieve the children withal, and for bread to ſtore themſelves when they came to the land promiſed.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two removes of twenty miles; the one to Daphca, the other to Aluſ, diſtant from Raphidim ſix miles. Here being again preſs'd with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themſelves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beaſts, than to ſuffer a caſual and ſometimes neceſſary want, and to undergo the hazards and travels which every manly mind ſeeketh after, for the love of God and their own freedoms. But [c] Moſes, with the ſame rod which he divided the ſea withal, in the ſight of the elders of Iſrael, brought waters out of the rock, wherewith the whole multitude were ſatisfied.

SECT. II.

Of the Amalekites, Midianites, and Kenites, upon occaſion of the battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming: who being a Kenite, was prieſt of Midian.

AND while Moſes incamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledge of his approach, and gueſſed that he meant to lead the children of Iſrael thro' their country (which being barren of it ſelf, would be utterly waſted by ſo great a multitude of people and cattle) thought it moſt for their advantage to ſet upon them at Raphidim; where the want of water, and all other things needful for the life of man infeebled them. On the other ſide Moſes perceiving their reſolutions, gave charge to [d] Joſhua, to draw out a ſufficient number of the ableſt Hebrews, to encounter Amalek. Between whom and Iſrael, the victory remained doubtful, for the moſt part of the day: the Hebrews and Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulſes for many hours. And had not the ſtrength of Moſes's prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent, than all reſiſtance and attempt made by the bodies of men, that valiant and warlike nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprize. For thoſe bodies which are unacquainted with ſcarcity of food, and thoſe minds whom a ſervile education hath dulled, being beaten, and deſpaired in their firſt attempts, will hardly, or never be brought again to hazard themſelves.

After this victory Jethro repaired to Moſes, bringing with him Moſes's wife, and his two ſons, which either Jethro forbare to conduct, or Moſes to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalek the better aſſured himſelf of that part of Arabia. For it is written Exodus xviii. 1. When Jethro the prieſt of Midian, Moſes's father-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moſes, &c. of which the laſt deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalek, gave Jethro courage and aſſurance, he then repaired to his ſon-in-law Moſes, at Sinai; where, amongſt other things, he adviſed Moſes to appoint judges, and other officers, over Iſrael; being himſelf unable to give order in all cauſes and controverſies, among ſo many thouſands of people full of diſcontentment and private controverſy.

This Jethro, altho' he dwelt amongſt the Midianites, yet he was by nation a Kenite, as in Judges iv. 11, 17. it is manifeſt; where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the ſon of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moſes, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his tents until the plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kedeſh. Likewiſe in the firſt of Samuel, [e] Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, leſt he ſhould deſtroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin Kadeſh, and the Amalekites dwelt in the plains, according to the ſaying of Balaam, ſpeaking of the Kenites; [f] Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou haſt put thy neſt in the rock. And that [g] Saul ſpared this nation, he giveth for cauſe, that they ſhewed mercy to all the children of Iſrael, when they came up from Egypt. For theſe Kenites were a nation of the Midianites, and the Midianites were of the iſſues of [h] Midian, one of the ſix ſons which Abraham begat on Keturah: and might alſo take that name of Kenites from Keturah, of whom they deſcended by the mother, who as it ſeemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moſes, when he fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them idolaters) have made Jethro's daughter the mother of his children. And altho' the Kenites are named amongſt thoſe nations, which God promiſed, that the ſeed of Abraham ſhould root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by theſe, who are deſcended from Abraham himſelf: but by ſome other nation bearing the ſame name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in Geneſis xv. 19. theſe Kenites or Chuſites are liſted with the Hittites and Perezites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergeſites and Jebuſites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But theſe Kenites deſcended from [i] Abraham, had ſeparated themſelves from among the reſt, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, [k] Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to ſay, from thoſe Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedeſh or Kadeſh. Again, Moſes nameth that nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other ſons were born: which he did (referring my ſelf to better judgment) rather, becauſe they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, ſo we may conſider of the [l] Midianites, parted by Moſes into five tribes. For ſome of them were corrupted, and heathens; as thoſe of Midian by the river Zared afterwards deſtroyed by Moſes. But the Midianites near the banks of the Red ſea, where Moſes married his wife Zipporah, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalek, ſeem likewiſe not to have been corrupted. For theſe

Midianites

Midianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the desarts. But the Midianites in Moab, and to the north of the metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red sea were not touched.

And tho' it may be doubted, whether those of Midian, of whom Jethro was priest, and the other cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000 Israelites, as far back as the Red sea, from the plains of Moab, to have destroy'd that Midian, where his wife's kindred inhabited: seeing himself coming with 600000 able men, was encountred by Amalek in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable desarts, wherein himself and Israel had wandred 40 years.

That Jethro or Jothor, Raguel or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel; and our English, Revel; Exod. ii. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. iii. 1. iv. 18. xviii. 1. and vi. 9, 10, 12. and in Numbers x. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

SECT. III.

Of the time when the law was given: with divers commendations of the invention of laws.

THE rest of the months of this year 2515, were spent in the desart of Sinai, near the mountain of Sinai or Horeb, the 12th mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountains: Jerome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many scriptures. For in Exod. iii. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. xxiv. 16. it is written Sinai. In Psalm cvi. 19. Horeb: in Exod. xix. 11. Sinai. And so it is called Galatians iv. 24. and again, Deut. iv. 10, 15. and Deut. v. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the 1st of Kings viii. 6. and the 2d of Chron. v. 10. and in Malachy iv. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus xlviii. 7. they are named as one. Which heardst (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgment of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disjoined at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: who in the year 1588, pass'd out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair spring of water into the valley adjoining: where he found two monasteries of christian Marronites, containing some 100 religious persons of divers nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same [a] author) give entertainment to all strangers, which pass that way.

Now, that there was some such torrent of water near Sinai in Moses's time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped thereabout almost a year, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written Exod. xxxii. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden calf to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this mountain, the law by the angel of God was given to Moses, where he staid a whole year, wanting some 10 or 12 days: for he removed not till the 20th day of the 2d month of the 2d year; and he arrived about the 45th day after the egression: the law being given the 50th day.

At this mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the xxixth chapter of Exodus, to the end of that book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers to the xth chapter. Whereof (because there is no story nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speak somewhat of the law, and the kinds and use thereof: whereby, if the reader find the story any way disjoined, he may turn over a few leaves, and, omitting this, find the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any common-wealth, without the rule, level, and square of laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfullest mean (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the north-star is the most fixed director of the sea-man to his desired port: so is the law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haven of eternal life: the law of nature, from God's eternal law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the law human, depending on both these, the guard of kings, magistrates, and virtuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinews of every estate in the world, by which they live and move: the law, to wit, a just law, being resembled to an heart without affection, to an eye without lust, and to a mind without passion; a treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have.

This benefit the ancients, tho' barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those, which were taken for the first makers of laws, were honoured as gods, or as the sons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posterity for men of no less virtue, and no less liberally beneficial to their countries, than the greatest and most prosperous conquerors that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, received their laws from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romans sometimes from their first kings, from their Decemviri, from their senators, from their lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the prince, nobility, and people; as in England, France, and in other christian monarchies and estates.

SECT. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, law and right.

THE word lex, or law, is not always taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent sense used. For if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of grammar, and other arts, are called laws. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of superiours to inferiours: for the commandments of tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees do also usurp that title, according to the general acceptation of the word law: of which Isaiah, [b] Wo unto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call laws, tho' evil and unsufficient. [c] Mala lex est, quæ tumultuarie posita est; It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of laws.

The word law is alſo taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and faſhioning them according to it ſelf, as to their pattern and platform. And thus the law of the fleſh, which the divines call legem fomitis, is to be underſtood. For every law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which ſenſe as [a] elſewhere, this moral habit or diſpoſition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: ſo in St. Paul to the Romans it is called a law. But I ſee another law in my members, rebelling againſt the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of ſin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are ſometimes called [b] laws, ſo far as they agree with the reaſon of the law eternal; as the law of a lion, to be fierce or valiant.

Alſo private contracts among merchants and other tradeſmen, do often put on the name of laws. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, preſcribing a neceſſary mean, for the good of a common-wealth, or civil community. The reſt, to wit, the commandments of tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentiæ magis quam leges, rather compulſions than laws: And whatſoever is not juſt, St. Auguſtine doth not allow for laws, howſoever eſtabliſhed: for he calls them iniqua hominum conſtituta, quæ nec cura dicenda, nec putanda ſunt; the unjuſt conſtitutions of men, which are neither to be termed or thought laws. For ſaith Ariſtotle, [c] Legalia juſta ſunt factiva, & conſervativa fœlicitatis; Juſt laws are the workers and preſervers of happineſs: becauſe by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: yea, to life everlaſting, according to the ſcriptures. For the end of the law, ſaith [d] Plato, is God and his worſhip: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the law, is ſo called by the Latins, a legendo, or a ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, ſaith Varro; for after laws were written and publiſhed, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other etymology, a ligando, is no leſs agreeable with the nature of a law: whence in the ſcripture it is called alſo a yoke, and a band: as [e] confregerunt jugum, diruperunt vincula; They have broken the yoke, they have broken the bands. And in the ſecond Pſalm, [f] Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus a nobis funes ipſorum; Let us break their bands in ſunder, and caſt away their cords from us.

The covenant it is called, becauſe of the conditional promiſes of God: and becauſe of God's people's voluntary ſubmiſſion of themſelves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the epiſtle to the Hebrews, uſe the word διαθήκη, a teſtament or laſt will: which name it hath, becauſe it is not otherwiſe effectual for our ſalvation, but in reſpect of the death of the teſtator; for without the death of the teſtator, the teſtament is of no force: as Heb. ix. 17. it is ſaid, Teſtamentum in mortuis ratum eſt.

The Hebrews call the law Thorah of teaching, becauſe every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and men. The Greeks call it Nomos of diſtributing, becauſe it diſtributeth to every man his own due; the power of the law is the power of God: juſtice being an attribute proper unto God himſelf. Imperium legis imperium Dei eſt; The reign of the law is the reign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the philoſophers: Lex eſt vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ ſunt ſequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to ſhun: or Lex eſt omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum regina; Law is the queen or princeſs of things both human and divine. But this deſcription is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wiſdom of nature: the reaſon and underſtanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index ſui & curvi, the demonſtrance of it ſelf and of the crooked: ſo is the law, the judge and meaſure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the law a directive rule to goodneſs of operation: and tho' law as touching the ſubſtance and eſſence, conſiſt in underſtanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis, yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word jus is alſo diverſly taken, as ſometimes for the matter of the law, and for common right: ſometimes for the law it ſelf: as jus civile, or jus gentium. [g] Iſidore diſtinguiſheth the two general words jus and fas: whereof jus, ſaith he, hath reference to men, fas to God. Fas lex divina, jus lex humana. To go over another man's field, is permitted, by God's law, not by man's; and therefore in a thing out of controverſy, Virgil uſed both theſe words: as Fas & jura ſinunt, God and men permit.

The word jus or right, is derived or taken from the old ſubſtantive noun juſſus, a bidding or commandment: or perhaps from the Greek ζεὺς, which is the name of Jupiter, or of the Latin genitive caſe Jovis; becauſe as the ſcripture ſpeaks, [h] the judgment is God's. For it is certain, that jus-jurandum came from jovis-jurandum (for ſo we find it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which ſenſe the ſcripture calls it juramentum Jehovæ) ſo alſo we may ſay, that jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis eſt: becauſe as God is the author, and pattern, and maintainer of right, ſo alſo in his [i] vicegerents the magiſtrates, he is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this jus the juſt are denominated, juſtus a jure, and juſtitia a juſto; the right gives name to the righteous: and juſtice takes her name from the juſt.

SECT. V.

Of the definition of laws, and of the law eternal.

BUT becauſe laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, firſt to divide and diſtinguiſh them. I mean thoſe ſorts of laws, from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of human laws to their infinite and horrible confuſion.

Law

The law eternal is thus defined by Thomas: [a] Lex æterna est æternus divinæ sapientiæ conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præcognitarum; The eternal law is the eternal conceipt of God's wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or [b] Lex æterna est summa atque æterna ratio divinæ sapientiæ: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternal reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity according to their several natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: that as the same divine understanding directs all these to their proper ends; so it is called providence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the natures of all things which it directs, so is it called a law.

Of this eternal law Cicero took knowledge, when, in his book of laws, he wrote in this manner: Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a delicto avocans: quæ non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad jubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Jovis; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightful actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with divine understanding, and therefore a true law and a fit princess to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternal law (if we consider it in God, or as God) is always one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, so the reason of man finds it diverse and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent; another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternal law all things are directed, as by the counsel and providence of God: from this law all laws are derived, as from the rule universal: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

[c] The eternal, and the divine law, differ only in consideration; the eternal directing more largely, as well every creature to their proper and natural ends, as it doth man to his supernatural: but the divine law to a supernatural end only: the natural law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternal, as it were a stream from this fountain.

The law human or temporal is also thence drawn, in that it hath the form of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition, and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternal law all things are subjected, as well angels and men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, natural or moral, and human. For the law eternal runneth through all the universal, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, natural and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director: as, [d] Praise him all ye his angels: praise him sun and moon, all bright stars: heavens of heavens, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not pass: praise ye the Lord from the earth ye dragons and all depths: fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormy winds, which execute his word: mountains and hills: fruitful trees and all cedars: beasts, and all cattel, &c. Now as the reasonable creatures are by this eternal law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other natural things and creatures, have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and natural instinct: things without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward: things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is apposed. This kind of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference used in terms only; it being no other than God's general providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves thence derived: there-under subjected: thence-from by his eternal law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thencefrom, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetition, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to St. Augustine, [e] Lex æterna est, qua justum est ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, It is disputed, whether the eternal law be immutable, yea or no? but the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which St. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first book of Free-Will, the sixth chapter. For the law of Moses, which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last until the time of the Pedagogy of God's people, or introduction to Christ should be expired; which time of expiration ſome think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the croſs he ſaid, [a] Conſummatum eſt. But I rather think theſe words of our Saviour to have no other ſignification, than that now the prophecy of their giving him vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For ſo St. John expounds it, when he ſaith, ver. 28. That Chriſt ſeeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut conſummaretur ſcriptura, That the ſcripture in this alſo might be fulfilled, ſaid, I thirſt: tho' I deny not, but at the ſame time alſo the date of the law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremonial, and of ſo much of the judicial, as appertaineth peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the law of the new teſtament and goſpel of Chriſt. For the immutable law of God, tho' preſcribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it ſelf; but the things preſcribed, change according to this eternal ordinance, of which the Wiſdom of Solomon, And being one ſhe can do all things, and remaining in herſelf reneweth all.

SECT. VI.

Of the law of nature.

OF the law of nature, as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the ſchoolmen: only as it is conſidered in man, it is called, The impreſſion of divine light, and a participation of the eternal law in the reaſonable creature; [b] Lex naturalis eſt impreſſio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis æternæ in rationali creatura. [c] Ulpian defines the natural law to be the ſame which nature hath taught all living creatures; Jus naturale eſt quod natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterwards addeth, Jus iſtud non humani generis proprium, ſed omnium animalium quæ terra marique naſcuntur, avium quoque commune eſt; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the ſame is common to all living creatures, as well to birds, as to thoſe which the land and ſea produceth. But this definition is not general, but of the natural law in things of life.

The law of nature in general, I take to be that diſpoſition, inſtinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, inlightning our formal reaſon; ſo is it more than ſenſe in beaſts; and more than vegetation in plants. For it is not ſenſe alone in beaſts, which teacheth them at firſt ſight, and without experience or inſtruction, to fly from the enemies of their lives: ſeeing that bulls and horſes appear unto the ſenſe more fearful and terrible, than the leaſt kind of dogs: and yet the hare and deer feed by the one, and fly from the other, yea, tho' by them never ſeen before, and that as ſoon as they fall from their dams. Neither is it ſenſe which hath taught other beaſts to provide for winter, birds to build their neſts, high or low, according to the tempeſtuous or quiet ſeaſons: or the birds of India to make their neſts on the ſmalleſt twigs which hang over rivers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elſewhere, to ſave their eggs and young ones from the monkies, and other beaſts, whoſe weight ſuch a twig will not bear: and which would fear to fall into the water. The inſtances of this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that ſome trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not bear any fruit, except the male grow in ſight. But this they do by that law, which the infinite and unſearchable wiſdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In man this law is double, corrupt and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reaſon of man hath made it ſelf ſubject, and a vaſſal to paſſions, and affections brutal: and incorrupt, where time and cuſtom hath bred in men a new nature, which alſo, as is aforeſaid, is a kind of law. For it was not by the law of nature incorrupt, which [d] St. Auguſtine calleth the law of reaſon, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft, and that other nations were by law conſtrained to become idolaters; that by the laws of [e] Lycurgus it was permitted to men to uſe one another's wife, and to the women to chooſe them others beſides their huſbands, to beget them with child: which law in thoſe parts hath laſted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The [f] Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawful to bury with them the beſt beloved wives: as alſo they have many other cuſtoms remembred by G. Valentia, againſt nature and right reaſon.

And I know not from what authority it is, that theſe laws ſome men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithleſs among the faithleſs: to provide for our ſelves by another man's deſtruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to deſtroy thoſe whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of natural laws, either out of [g] St. Auguſtine or Aquinas (the one calling it the impreſſion of divine light; the other, the dictate or ſentence of practic reaſon) the ſame can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exerciſe of juſtice and uprightneſs: and not to offer or perform any thing towards others, ſave that which we would be content ſhould be offered or performed towards our ſelves. For ſuch is the law of nature to the mind, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to [h] David ſheweth us good, that is, the obſervation of thoſe things which lead us thereby to our laſt end; which is eternal life: tho' of themſelves not ſufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforeſaid, the impreſſion of God's divine light in men, and a participation of the law increated and eternal. For without any law written, the right reaſon and underſtanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our ſelves, ſufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God, and diſtribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchaſe for our ſelves. [i] For when the Gentiles (ſaith St. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature thoſe things contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themſelves. Now, to love God by whom we are, and to do the ſame right unto all men, which we deſire ſhould be done unto us, is an effect of the pureſt reaſon: in whoſe higheſt turrets, the quiet of conſcience hath made her reſting place, and habitation; In arce altiſſima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (ſaith St. Paul) [k] which ſhew the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their conſciences for a witneſs of thoſe effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuſe them.

And it is moſt true, that whoſoever is not a law unto himſelf (while he hopeth to abuſe the world by the advantage of hypocriſy) worketh nothing elſe, but the betraying of his own ſoul, by crafty unrighteouſneſs, purchaſing eternal perdition. For it

helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the world's eye, ſeeing from him who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: ſome garlands we may gather in this may-game of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, areſcit; Thoſe flowers wither while we diſcourſe of their colours, or are gathering them. That we ſhould therefore inhabit and dwell within our ſelves, and become fearful witneſſes of our ſecreteſt evils, did that reverend philoſopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum, maxime omnium verere teipſum; Commit nothing foul or diſhoneſt, ſaith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart, but above all men reverence thine own conſcience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reaſon: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to thoſe operations, which are anſwerable to their own form; as fire to give heat. Now, as the reaſonable mind is the form of man, ſo is he aptly moved to thoſe things which his proper form preſenteth unto him: to wit, to that which right reaſon offereth; and the acts of right reaſon, are the acts of virtue: and in the breach of the rules of this reaſon, is man leaſt excuſable, as being a reaſonable creature. For all elſe, both ſenſitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God impoſed on them at their firſt creation.

The earth performeth her office, according to the law of God in nature; for it bringeth forth the bud of the herb which [a] ſeedeth ſeed, &c. and the beaſt which liveth thereon. He gave a law to the ſeas, and commanded them to keep their bounds: which they obey. [b] He made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He cauſed the ſun to move, and to give light, and to ſerve for ſigns and for ſeaſons. Were theſe as rebellious as man, for whoſe ſake they were created, or did they once break the law of their natures and forms; the whole world would then periſh, and all return to the firſt Chaos, darkneſs and confuſion.

By this natural law, or law of human reaſon, did Cain perceive his own wickedneſs, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the diſpleaſure of God, but the revenge of men: it being written in his reaſon, that whatſoever he performed towards others, the ſame by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal law, before the law written: Moſes in the perſon of God witneſſeth, Gen. iv. If thou do well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, ſin lieth at thy door.

The ſchoolmen are large alſo in this queſtion of the natural law, the ſame being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not to my purpoſe to write a volume of this ſubject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An act of reaſon taken properly, and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practic reaſon: they divide into indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration (as that good is to be followed, and evil eſchewed;) and demonſtrable, which is evidently proved, out of higher and more univerſal propoſitions. Again, as it anſwereth the natural appetite, preſcribing things to be deſired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the firſt, to deſire to live, and to ſatisfy hunger, &c. and of the ſecond, to eſchew pains, ſorrow, and death;) in this conſideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. [c] For in every man there are three ſorts of appetites, which anſwer the three degrees of natural law. The firſt is to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the deſire both to live, and to preſerve our being and life, alſo the deſire of iſſue, with care to provide for them: for the father after his death lives in his children; and therefore the deſire of life comprehends the deſire of children. And to theſe appetites are referred the firſt indemonſtrable laws of nature, for the moſt part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures ſhould deſire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their iſſue, when they cannot in themſelves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res; ſo he doth deſire good and ſhun evil. For it is common to all things, to deſire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to deſire their own good. And ſo is good defined by [d] Ariſtotle, to be that which all deſire. Which definition Baſil upon the xlivth Pſalm approveth: Recte quidem bonum definierunt, quod omnia expetunt; Rightly have ſome men defined good or goodneſs, to be that which all things deſire.

The ſecond kind of appetite is of thoſe things which appertain to us, as we have ſenſe. Whence, by the law of nature, we deſire the delights of every ſenſe; but with ſuch moderation, as may neither glut us with ſatiety, nor hurt us with exceſs. For as ſenſe it ſelf is for the preſervation of life and being: ſo is it meet, even by the law of nature, that the ſenſitive appetite ſhould not carry us to the deſtruction, either of our life or being. And altho' (ſeeing both theſe kinds of appetites are in beaſts) we may well ſay, that nature hath given divers laws unto them: in which ſenſe the civilians define natural right, or jus naturale, to be the ſame which nature hath taught all living creatures; yet the ſchoolmen admit not, that the inſtincts of beaſts can be properly called a law, but only a jus, or right, which is the matter and aim of every law. For ſo they diſtinguiſh it, where Ulpian affirmeth, that jus naturale is that, which nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place, ſaith Valentia, jus is not to be taken for a law, but for the matter of the law. And yet where Ulpian alſo diſtinguiſheth the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to men; calling the one jus naturæ, the other jus gentium: the divines underſtand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reaſon, both in beaſts and men; and reſtrain the law of nations to a kind of human right.

The third appetite is of thoſe things which appertain properly to man, as he is a living creature reaſonable: as well with relation to God, and to our neighbour, as for our ſelves; and the laws of this appetite are the commandments of our religion.

Now altho' there are many other branches and diviſions of this law of nature anſwering the diviſion of matter, which it preſcribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: firſt, becauſe it hath one fountain or root in the natural or motive faculty, which is but one, ſtirring up to good, and declining the contrary: ſecondly, Becauſe all is contained in that general natural precept, that good is to be followed and ill avoided: and thirdly, Becauſe all the parts are reduced to one and the ſame laſt end.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifeſt: and chiefly man, becauſe he is endued with reaſon; in whom as reaſon groweth, ſo this band of obſerving the law of nature increaſeth; [e] Poſtquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod ſcriptum eſt, adveniente mandato, peccatum revixit;

[a] Gen. 1. [b] Job 28. [c] Tho. q. 94. Art. 2. [d] Ethic. l. 1. c. 1. [e] Baſil.

When

When reaſon grew to perfection, then it came to paſs, which was written by St. Paul, when the commandment came, ſin revived. Neither is it a ſmall warrant for this law of nature, when thoſe which break the ſame, are ſaid by St. Paul, [a]To be delivered over unto a reprobate ſenſe (or mind) to do thoſe things which are not convenient: and again, [b]that their conſciences bear witneſs and their thoughts accuſe them. For tho' this law of nature ſtretch not to every particular; as to command faſting and the like, yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatſoever is agreeable to right and reaſon. And therefore, ſaid Damaſcene, [c] Homines facti ſunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam eſt; Men, ſaith he, are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to nature: and St. Auguſtine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam eſt; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature ſo ſtreight, but that they ſuffer exceptions in ſome particulars. For whereas by this law all men are born lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil, and giving to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men ſhall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themſelves: according to the rules of juſtice and equity.

And tho' the law of nature command, that all things be reſtored which are left in truſt, yet in ſome cauſes, this her law ſhe ſuffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was ſober. But the univerſal principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to [d] St. Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot deny himſelf.

SECT. VII.

Of the written law of God.

AFTER the eternal and natural, the law poſitive or impoſed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds; divine and human. Again, the divine poſitive law is double; the old and new: the old was given unto Moſes in mount Sinai or Horeb, at ſuch time as the world had ſtood 2513 whole years, and in the 67th day of this year, when as [e] Aſcatades or Aſcades governed the Aſſyrians; Merathus, the Sycionians; Triopus, the Argives; Cecrops, Attica, and Acherres, Egypt: to wit, after the promiſe to Abraham 430 years. And this, it ſeems, was the firſt written law which the world received. For the very word Nomos ſignifying a law, was not then, nor long after, invented by the Grecians; no not in Homer's time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80 years at leaſt: and Troy it ſelf was caſt down 335 years after Moſes led Iſrael out of Egypt. This law it pleaſed God to ingrave in ſtone, that it might remain a laſting book of his expreſs'd will in the Church; and that the prieſts and people might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Chriſt: and that ſo theſe children of Iſrael, tho' bred among an idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuſe: the ſlight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reaſon known to us why this law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their lives long, the elders of families might eaſily without any written law inſtruct their own children: and yet as they encreaſed, ſo doubtleſs they had, beſides the law of nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, foraſmuch as the law of nature did not define all kinds of good and evil; nor condemn every ſin in particular: nor ſufficiently terrify the conſciences of offenders: nor ſo expound divine worſhip, as for thoſe after-ages was required, who gave every day leſs authority than other to the natural law; in theſe reſpects it was neceſſary, that the law ſhould be written, and ſet before the eyes of all men: which before they might, but would not read in their own conſciences. The ſchoolmen, and the fathers before them, inlarge the cauſes and neceſſity why the law was written, whereof theſe are the chiefeſt.

The firſt, for reſtraining of ſin, directly grounded upon this place of David; The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting ſouls: the teſtimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wiſdom to children. For the human law, ſaith St. Auguſtine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or puniſhment; ſeeing thereby it might take away ſomething ſeeming neceſſary, and hinder common profit: but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, It ſerveth for the direction of our minds. For the laws of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our diſpoſition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no leſs clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our ſouls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts firſt generated, according to the cabaliſts. Actiones hominum nullæ eſſent, niſi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men, ſay they, would be none at all, were they not firſt conceived in the mind.

Thirdly, It leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reaſon of diverſity of opinion, and difference of peculiar laws among ſundry nations, we cannot be aſſured of; but the law of God bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore alſo ſaid David; That the the teſtimony of the law of God is faithful: giving wiſdom to children.

SECT. VIII.

Of the unwritten law of God, given to the patriarchs by tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, between the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reaſon and nature, it doth not appear. For the patriarchs of the firſt age received many precepts from God himſelf, and whatſoever was firſt impoſed by Adam, the ſame was obſerved by Seth, who inſtructed Enos: from whom it deſcended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Iſaac, Jacob, Joſeph, and Moſes. Yea many particular commandments afterwards written, were formerly impoſed and delivered over by tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterwards called Cabala, or Receptio; Precepts received from the mouth of their prieſts and elders: to which the Jews after the law written, added the interpretation of ſecret myſteries, reſerved in the boſoms of their prieſts, and unlawful to be uttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the divine law revealed to the patriarchs, and from them delivered to the poſterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he ſhould impoſe names to all beaſts, according to their natures; to whoſe perfection of underſtanding they were ſufficiently known. For finding the reaſon of his own name Adam or Adamah, earth, or red clay, he gave other names ſignificant, not only to beaſts, but to his children and nephews, which afterwards his iſſues imitated; as the name of Seth ſignifieth, as ſome take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was ſlain: and Enoſh ſignifieth man or miſerable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God alſo gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam alſo was marriage firſt inſtituted: all men thence after being commanded to cohabit with their wives, rather than with their father and mother.

That murder and cruelty was alſo forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it ſelf, is manifeſt. God himſelf making it appear, that it was one of the greateſt cauſes of the deſtruction of mankind by the general flood. For God ſaid unto Noah, An end of all fleſh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold I will deſtroy them [a] from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all periſhed, could not be unknown to all that periſhed: God's mercy and juſtice interpoſing between the untaught and revenge.

This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried up from the earth. [b] Whoſo ſheddeth man's blood, by man ſhall his blood be ſhed: for in the image of God hath he made man.

Alſo the law of honouring and reverencing our parents, was obſerved among the faithful, and the contrary puniſhed by the father's curſe: as, [c] Curſed be Canaan, a ſervant of ſervants ſhall he be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural ſin of the Sodomites was puniſhed in the higheſt degree; as with fire from heaven. The ſin of adultery and raviſhment, was before the law no leſs deteſted than the reſt, as appeareth by that revenge, taken for [d] Dina's forcing: and by the judgment which [e] Juda gave againſt Tamar, That ſhe ſhould be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, againſt whom this ſentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, becauſe of the woman which thou haſt taken: for ſhe is a man's wife. To theſe we may add the ordinance of ſacrifice, of diſtinction of clean beaſts, of circumciſion, of the brother to raiſe up ſeed to his brother, that left a widow childleſs, and divers other conſtitutions, partly moral, and partly ceremonial, which being delivered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine law impoſed, of which the law of Moſes containeth that which is called the Old Teſtament, may be ſaid, not only to have been written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in ſtone, but alſo in ſubſtance, to have been given in precept to the patriarchs. For as St. Paul witneſſeth of himſelf, I knew not ſin, but by the law: ſo the law ever naturally preceded, and went before offences, tho' written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by ſome kind of unwritten law; the angels intuitively; men by reaſon; beaſts by ſenſe and inſtinct, without diſcourſe; plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their neceſſary motions, without ſenſe or preception.

SECT. IX.

Of the moral, judicial, and ceremonial law, with a note preſixed, How the ſcripture ſpeaketh not always in one ſenſe, when it nameth the law of Moſes.

NOW as the word [law] in general, as is aforeſaid, hath divers ſignifications, and is taken for all doctrine which doth preſcribe and reſtrain: ſo this law, called the law of Moſes in particular, is taken by St. Paul diverſly; as ſometimes for all the Old Teſtament, as, [f] Now we know whatſoever the law ſaith, it ſaith to them which are under the law.

When it is oppoſed, or differenced from the prophets and Pſalms, it is there taken for the five books of Moſes. For ſo St. Luke hath diſtinguiſhed them; as, [g] All muſt be fulfilled which are written of me in the law, in the prophets, and in the pſalms.

When it is oppoſed to the goſpel, then it is taken for the law moral, ceremonial, and judicial; as, [h] Therefore we conclude, that a man is juſtified by faith without the works of the law.

When it is oppoſed to grace, it ſignifieth the declaration of God's wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and ſummum jus: as, [i] For ye are not under the law, but under grace.

When it is oppoſed to the truth, namely, where the ceremonies or ſigns are taken for the things ſignified; as the ſacrifice for Chriſt, and the like: then it ſignifieth but ſhadows and figures; as [k] The law was given by Moſes, but grace and truth came by Jeſus Chriſt.

Laſtly, When it is oppoſed to the time of Chriſt's coming, it ſignifieth the whole policy of the Jews commonweal; as, [l] Before faith came, we were kept under the law, &c. or the law of the order and inſtitution of the Aaronical prieſthood; as, [m] All the prophets, and the law, or the prieſts, propheſied unto John. And if the prieſthood be changed, the law alſo, to wit, of the prieſthood, muſt needs be changed.

The word [law] is ſometimes alſo taken by the figure Metonymia, for intereſt, authority, and empire, or for conſtraining force; as, [n] The law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of ſin and death, the enforcements of concupiſcence, &c.

But the written law of Moſes, or the law of the Old Teſtament, of which we now ſpeak, is thus defined: The law is a doctrine, which was firſt put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moſes, or by him repeated, commanding holineſs and juſtice, promiſing eternal life conditionally, that is, to the obſervers of the law, and threatning death to thoſe which break the law in the leaſt. For, according to St. James, [o] Whoſoever keepeth the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition of the ſchoolmen, in which both the old and new law are comprehended, is thus given, Lex divina eſt divinum decretum, hominibus præſcribens modum neceſſarium ut apte pervenire poſſint ad ſupernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ eſt ultimus humanæ vitæ finis; The divine law (ſay they) is the decree of God, preſcribing unto men a neceſſary mean, whereby they may aptly attain ſupernatural beatitude, which is the laſt end of man's life.

[a] The common reading is cum terra: but God did not deſtroy the earth, and why may not this prepoſition in this place have the ſame force which it hath, according to Junius, Gen. 4. 1. Item 44. 4. and Deut. 34. 1. Eſpecially, ſeeing theſe words are but a repetition of that which is ſaid, verſe 7. Delebo hominem de ſuperficie terræ. [b] Gen. 9. 6. [c] Gen. 9. 25. [d] Gen. 34. 25. [e] Gen. 38. 24. [f] Rom. 3. 19. [g] Luke 24. 44. [h] Rom. 3. 28. [i] Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 18. [k] John 1. 17. [l] Gal. 3. 23. Luke 16. 6. [m] Heb. 7. 12. and 10. 1. [n] Rom. 8. 2. and 7. 23. [o] James 2. 10.

The law of Moſes hath three parts: moral, ceremonial, and judicial. The moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular; as alſo it declareth, for whoſe ſake it is to be done; as do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commands it but in general. Again, the moral law entreateth of virtue and goodneſs; the ceremonial of divine ſervice, and of holineſs (for external worſhip, and the order of hallowing ourſelves unto God, is called ceremony;) and the judicial teacheth the particular government, fit for the commonwealth of the Jews, and preſcribeth orders for juſtice and equity. And therefore was it ſaid of St. Paul, Rom. vii. 12. The commandment is juſt, holy and good: juſt, or juſtice, being referred to the judicial; holy or holineſs, to the ceremonial; good, or honeſt, to the moral. The judicial part is touching the government of the commonwealth of the Jews, in which many things muſt needs be proper to that eſtate, as ſuch as were inſtituted either in reſpect of place or perſons.

The ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things, of which it ſpeaketh, to wit, ſacrifice, holy things, ſacraments, and obſervances. To ſacrifices belong beaſts, and the fruits of the earth; to holy things the tabernacle, temple, veſſels, altars, and the like; to ſacraments, circumciſion, the paſſover and ſuch like. For the obſervances, they conſiſted either in prohibition of certain meats, as not to eat the blood and fat of beaſts: or in ſome other outward things, as in waſhings, purifyings, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt garments of linen and woollen; as alſo it prohibiteth other unnatural and improper commixtions, as, Thou ſhalt not yoke together in a plough an ox and an aſs, or caſt mingled ſeed in one field. It alſo exhorteth natural compaſſion, and forbiddeth cruelty even to beaſts, birds and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be deſtroyed without any profit to man. For ſo ſome refer theſe precepts; Thou ſhalt not kill the bird ſitting on her neſt, nor beat down the firſt buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring ox, and the like, to the ceremonial law.

Neither is there any of theſe three parts of the law of Moſes, but it hath as yet in ſome reſpects, the ſame power which it had before the coming of Chriſt. For the moral liveth ſtill, and is not abrogated or taken away: ſaving in the ability of juſtifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worſhip God, and to uſe charity one towards another; which for ever ſhall be required at our hands. Therein alſo are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by ſpecial rules and precepts of life it retaineth ſtill. For theſe things alſo are commanded in both teſtaments to be obſerved; tho' principally for the fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The ceremonial alſo liveth in the things which it fore-ſignified. For the ſhadow is not deſtroyed, but perfected, when the body itſelf is repreſented to us. Beſides, it ſtill liveth, in that it giveth both inſtruction and teſtimony of Chriſt, and in that it giveth direction to the Church for ſome ceremonies and types of holy ſignification, which are ſtill expedient; tho' in a far fewer number than before Chriſt's coming, and in a far leſs degree of neceſſity.

Laſtly, The judicial liveth in ſubſtance, and concerning the end and the natural and univerſal equity thereof.

But the moral faileth in the point of juſtification, the ceremonial, as touching the uſe and external obſervation (becauſe Chriſt himſelf is come, of whom the ceremonies were ſigns and ſhadows) and the judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews commonweal and policy.

SECT. X.

A propoſal of nine other points to be conſidered, with a touch of the five firſt.

AS for that which remaineth in the general conſideration of the divine written law, it may in effect be reduced into theſe nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the law.
2. The majeſty of the law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Teſtament.
7. The end and uſe of the law.
8. The ſenſe and underſtanding of the law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the law is ſufficiently proved by St. Paul in theſe words, Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, and juſt, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforeſaid, to the moral, ceremonial, and judicial.

2. The majeſty of the law-giver is approved in all his creatures: who, as he hath given all things their lives, and beings, ſo he only gave the law, who could only give the end and reward promiſed, to wit, the ſalvation of mankind: but he gave it not to Moſes immediately, but by the miniſtry of angels, as it is ſaid. [a] And the law was ordained by angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gave the law by the ordinance of angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiving this law, is in three reſpects. Firſt, In that they were prepared: Secondly, In that they were a nation apart and diſſevered: Thirdly, In that they were the children of the promiſe made to Abraham. Prepared they were, becauſe they had the knowledge of one God, when all other nations were idolaters. A nation apart and ſevered they were, becauſe of God's choice and election. Children of the promiſe they were, for the promiſe was made by God unto Abraham, and his ſeed: not unto his ſeeds, as to Eſau and Jacob, but to his ſeed, as to Jacob, or Iſrael ſingularly, of whom Chriſt. [b] Now to Abraham and his ſeed were the promiſes made: he ſaith not to the ſeeds, as ſpeaking of many, but to thy ſeed, as of one, which is Chriſt.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by St. Auguſtine: that it was about the middle time, between the law of nature and grace: the law of nature continued from Adam to Moſes: the law written in the commandments, received by Moſes in the world's year 2514, continued to the baptiſm of John; from which time began the law of grace, which ſhall continue to the world's end. Other reaſons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth conſideration is of the efficacy of this law, the ſame being a diſpoſition to, or ſign of, our juſtification: but not by itſelf ſufficient, but as a figure of Chriſt in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteouſneſs in moral precepts. For through the paſſion of Chriſt were ſins forgiven, who taketh away the ſins of the world: and therefore St. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law [a] beggarly and weak; beggarly, as containing no grace, weak; as not able to forgive and juſtify. The [b] blood of goats and bulls, and the aſhes of an heifer could only cleanſe the body; but they were figures of Chriſt's blood, which doth cleanſe the inward ſoul. [c] For if the law could juſtify, then Chriſt died in vain.

SECT. XI.

Of the ſixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new teſtament.

THE old and new teſtament differ in name, and in the mean and way propoſed for attaining to ſalvation; as the old by works, the new by grace: but in the thing it ſelf, or object and remote end, they agree: which is, man's happineſs and ſalvation.

The old teſtament, or law, or letter, or the witneſs of God's will, was called the old, becauſe it preceded the new teſtament; which is an explication of the old: from which the new taketh witneſs. Yet the new of more excellency, in that it doth more lively expreſs, and openly and directly delineate the ways of our redemption. It is alſo called the old, to ſhew that in part it was to be abrogated: [d] In that he ſaith the new teſtament, he hath abrogated the old. For the old law, tho' greatly extolled by the prophets, and delivered with wonderful miracles, yet was it conſtituted in a policy periſhable: but the new was given in a promiſe of an everlaſting kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypſe, a teſtament and goſpel for ever during.

The old teſtament is called a law, becauſe the firſt and chief part is the law of Moſes, of which the prophets and Pſalms are commentaries, explicating that law.

The new teſtament is called the goſpel, becauſe the firſt and chief part thereof is the glad tidings of our redemption: the other books, as the epiſtles or letters of the apoſtles, and the acts or ſtory of the apoſtles, are plentiful interpreters thereof: the word Euangelion ſignifying a joyful, happy, and proſperous meſſage, or (as Homer uſed it) the reward given to the meſſenger, bringing joyful news. It is alſo ſometimes taken for a ſacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleaſing ſucceſs, as by Xenophon. In the ſcriptures it hath three ſignifications. Firſt, for glad tidings in general, as in Iſaiah lii. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellency it is reſtrained to ſignify that moſt joyful meſſage of ſalvation, as in Luke ii. 10. whence alſo by figure it is taken for the hiſtory of [e] Chriſt: and ſo we underſtand the four goſpels.

Laſtly, For the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Chriſt, as 1 Cor. ix. 14. and 2 Cor. viii. 18.

The agreement of both teſtaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in volumes) is by Daneus compriſed in theſe four.

In their author.
In the ſubſtance of the covenant, or things promiſed.
In the foundation, to wit, Chriſt.
In the effects, that is, in righteouſneſs and juſtification.

In the author they agree, becauſe both are of God, and therefore both one teſtament and will of God in ſubſtance of doctrine. For as there was ever one church, ſo was there one covenant, one adoption, and one doctrine. As the old law doth point at Chriſt, ſo doth the new law teach Chriſt: the old propoſing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the ſame thing being promiſed in both; both tending to one and the ſame end, even the ſalvation of our ſouls: which, according to St. Peter, is the end of our faith. For altho' it be ſaid, that Moſes did promiſe by obſerving the law an earthly kingdom, a land flowing with milk and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly bleſſings: yet all theſe were but figures to teach, and pledges to aſſure the fathers of thoſe ſpiritual bleſſings by Chriſt; for by the earthly he raiſed their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the fathers, notwithſtanding theſe worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themſelves ſtrangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Jeruſalem: According to this place of Heb. xi. 13. All theſe died in faith, and received not the promiſes, but ſaw them afar off, and believed them: confeſſing that they were ſtrangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpoſe alſo St. Auguſtine; [f] Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promiſſa terrena æterna promitti; Few (ſaith he) do underſtand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternal are promiſed. And St. Jerome, [g] Noluit Deus paſcere Judæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibuſque, ut Judæi ſomniant; God would not feed the Jews as beaſts with corporal gifts and riches, as themſelves dream. And this may be gathered out of God's own words, Ego ſum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God; for the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the preſent, or for periſhable things, that God gave them this promiſe; but in reſpect of the future: to wit, the ſafety of their ſouls. For as God created both body and ſoul, ſo hath he of his goodneſs not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

The agreement between the old and new teſtament in ſubſtance, infers alſo the agreement in foundation. For Chriſt is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the apoſtles and prophets: in whom all the promiſes of God in the old and new, are aſſured: the fathers having eaten the ſame ſpiritual food, which we eat in our ſacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our ſin and miſery, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and, as it were, ſerveth in ſubordination to the goſpel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and ſalvation: to which the law ſerving as an introduction (for to thoſe which acknowledge their ſin and miſery, God ſheweth his mercy and ſalvation) may be ſaid to agree with the goſpel in the effects. For otherwiſe, if we ſever the law from ſubordination to the goſpel, the effects are very different: the one ſheweth the way of righteouſneſs by works, the other by faith; the law woundeth, the goſpel healeth: the law terrifieth, the goſpel allureth: Moſes accuſeth, Chriſt defendeth: Moſes condemneth, Chriſt pardoneth: the old reſtraineth the hand, the new the mind. [h] Data eſt lex quæ non ſanaret (ſaith St. Auguſtine) ſed quæ ægrogantes probaret; The law was given not to help, but to diſcover ſickneſs: and St. Chryſoſtom, Data eſt lex, ut ſe homo inveniret; non ut morbus ſanaretur, ſed ut medicus quæreretur; The law was given that man might find and know his own imperfection: not that his diſeaſe was thereby holpen: but that he might then ſeek out the phyſician. For Chriſt came to ſave the world, which the law had condemned. And as [i] Moſes was but a ſervant, and Chriſt a ſon, ſo the greateſt benefit was reſerved to be brought, as by the worthieſt perſon, ſaith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

SECT. XII.

SECT. XII.

Of the reſt of the points propoſed.

THE ſeventh conſideration is of the end and uſe of the law: which is to bring us to Chriſt: for finding no righteouſneſs in our own works, we muſt ſeek it in ſome other. But this is the laſt, and remote, and utmoſt end: the next and proper end of the law, is to preſcribe righteouſneſs, and to exact abſolute and perfect obedience to God. [a] Curſed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The ſecond end of the law, is to render us inexcuſable before God: who knowing ſo perfect a law, do not keep it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or half obedience: but both inward and outward righteouſneſs, and performance of duty to God and men.

The third and chief end of the law is, as hath been ſaid, to ſend us to Chriſt, and his Grace, being in our ſelves condemned and loſt. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a moſt violent and fearful tempeſt, threatning eternal death.

The fourth end of the law was to deſign, and preſerve, the place of the church and true people of God; and to hold them in one diſcipline and awe, till the coming of Chriſt: after whom the church was to be diſperſed over the whole world.

Theſe be the ends of the moral law. The end and uſe of the ceremonial law, is to confirm the truth of Chriſt, and the new teſtament. The uſe of the judicial, to teach us natural equity and right, whereto we muſt conform our ſelves.

The ſenſe and underſtanding of the law is double, literal and ſpiritual: by the literal, we are taught the worſhip and ſervice of God: by the ſpiritual, the figures and myſtical fore-ſpeakings of Chriſt.

Laſtly, for the durance or continuance of the [b] law, the ſame had being until the paſſion of Chriſt: before which time, and while Chriſt taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true ſacrifice was offered upon the altar of the croſs, then the Jewiſh ſacrifices and ceremonies, which were types and figures of Chriſt (Chriſt being the body of thoſe ſhadows) ceaſed to bind the conſciences any longer: the myſtery of our redemption being now by Chriſt and in him finiſhed. In token whereof the veil of the temple rent aſunder; noting that the ceremonial veils and ſhadows were now to be removed, not that the moral law of the commandments was hereby aboliſhed, or weakened at all: otherwiſe than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewiſh doctrine, as aforeſaid. For the obſerving of the law was by Chriſt himſelf ſeverely commanded: our love towards God being thereby to be witneſſed. And herein David ſo much rejoiced, as he preferred the obſervation of the law, before all that the world could yield. In via teſtimoniorum tuorum delectatus ſum, ſicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law as in all manner of riches: and again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thouſands of gold and ſilver. This is the love of God (ſaith St. John i. 5.) that we keep his commandment. And that there is no excuſe for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himſelf in Deuteronomy witneſſeth, [c] This commandment (ſaith he) which I command thee this day is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven that thou ſhouldſt ſay who ſhall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cauſe us to hear it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the ſea, that thou ſhouldeſt ſay, who ſhall go over the ſea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very near unto thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (ſaith Moſes) I have ſet before thee this day life and death, good and evil, in that I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his ordinances, and his laws, that thou mayſt live, &c. Neither is it ſaid in vain in St. Matthew ix. 17. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, ſerva mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments: and in St. John xii. 50. Scio quia mandatum ejus vita æterna eſt; I know that his commandment is life everlaſting. And if this be the charity of God, or of men towards God, as St. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his commandments: certainly he is but a liar, that profeſſeth to love God, and neglecteth to obſerve the word of his will, with all his power. And tho' I confeſs it is not in man's ability, without the ſpecial grace of God, to fulfil the law (Chriſt only as man excepted) yet if we rightly conſider the merciful care which God had of his people in thoſe his commandments, we ſhall find in our ſelves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let ſlip our affections, and voluntarily looſen them, from the chains of obedience, to which the word of God and divine reaſon hath faſtened them, than that we are excuſable by thoſe difficulties and impoſſibilities, which our mind (greedy of liberty) propoſeth to it ſelf. For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous, 1 John iii. 12. and if we examine every precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our conſciences; it is not hard for any man to judge, by what eaſy perſuaſions, we ſteal away from our own power, as unwilling to uſe it againſt our pleaſing deſires.

SECT. XIII.

Of the ſeveral commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in reſpect of the commandments, but by our default.

FOR by the firſt we are commanded to acknowledge, ſerve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? ſeeing every reaſonable man may conceive and know, that infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities: and that it is of neceſſity that by this Almighty unity, all things have been cauſed, and are continued. And if brute beaſts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath alſo provided for every of them, [d] which giveth to beaſt their food, &c. there is no doubt but that they would alſo ſerve and love him only.

The ſecond precept is the forbidding of idolatry, and worſhip of images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, ſeeing this is generally true: [e] Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta ſunt; All ill examples did ſpring and ariſe from good beginnings. For their firſt erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their virtue: until (ſaith Lactantius) the devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the firſt intent) working in weak and ignorant ſouls, changed the nature of the one, and the reaſon of the other, to ſerve himſelf thereby. For what reaſonable man, if he be not forſaken of God, will call on thoſe blind, deaf, and dumb, and dead ſtocks, more worthleſs than the moſt worthleſs of thoſe, that having life and reaſon, implore their help, which have neither: yea, of more vile prize and baſer, than the baſeſt of beaſts, who have ſenſe and eſti-

mation? for what do we thereby (ſaith the Wiſdom of Solomon) [a] but call to the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, aſſiſtance in our journies of him that cannot go, and ſucceſs in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the idolater, or the block, to which he prayeth, be more ſenſeleſs, David maketh a doubt. [b] For (ſaith he) they that make them are like unto them, and ſo are all the reſt that truſt in them.

The breach of the third commandment is neither perſuaded by worldly pleaſure, nor worldly profit: the two greateſt inchanters of mortal men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible diſdain of God, unleſs the hate of good men, and God's curſe, be accounted an advantage. For as our corrupteſt nature gives us nothing towards it, ſo can it ſatisfy no one appetite, except everlaſting ſorrow, and hell dwell in our deſire. And therefore this ſtrange cuſtom hath the devil brought up among men, without all ſubtlety of argument, or cunning perſuaſion, taking thereby the greateſt and moſt ſcornful advantage over us. For ſlaughter ſatisfieth hatred, theft gives ſatisfaction to need, adultery to luſt, oppreſſion to covetouſneſs: but this contemptuous offence of blaſphemy, and the irreverent abuſe of God's name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, ſo the moſt ſavage nations of the world do not uſe it.

The fourth commandment, to keep the ſabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth reſt to the labourer, and conſolation to their maſters. And that this law was impoſed on man for his benefit, Moſes teacheth in the reaſon of the law: as in Exod. xxiii. 12. And in the ſeventh day thou ſhalt reſt, that thine ox and thine aſs may reſt, and the ſon of thy maid, and the ſtranger may be refreſhed.

The firſt of the ſecond table to honour our parents, with whom we are one and the ſame, is a gratitude which nature it ſelf hath taught us towards them, who after God gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cheriſhed us in our weak and helpleſs infancy, and beſtowed on us the harveſt and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore in the temporal and judicial ordinances, curſing of parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou ſhalt not murder, that is, thou ſhalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our own laws, and in effect the law of all nations, have made difference between ſlaughter caſual, and furious. Affectio enim tua (ſaith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work ſuch as it is. And certainly whoſoever cannot forbear to commit murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any uſe of his own will.

The third of the ſecond table, commands us from adultery. Now, if the preſervation of [c] virginity have been poſſible, for thouſands of men and women, who in all ages have maſtered their fleſhly deſires, and have returned chaſt to the grave: it cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the diſhonour and injury, which we offer to others by ſuch a violation, ſeeing marriage is permitted by the laws of God, and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the deſire of beauty and form hath ſo conſtrained, but he might with eaſe forbear the proſecution of this ill: did not himſelf give ſuck to this infant, and nouriſh warmth till it grow to ſtrong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the ſecond table, is, that we ſhall not ſteal. And if that kind of violent robbery had been uſed in Moſes's time, which many ruffians practiſe now-a-days in England, and, to the diſhonour of our nation, more in England than in any region of the world among Chriſtians, out of doubt he would have cenſured them by death, and not by reſtitution, tho' quadruple. For I ſpeak not of the poor and miſerable ſouls, whom hunger and extreme neceſſity inforceth, but of thoſe deteſted thieves, who, to maintain themſelves lordlike, aſſault, rob, and wound the merchant, artificer, and labouring-man, or break by violence into other men's houſes, and ſpend in bravery, drunkenneſs, and upon harlots, in one day, what other men ſometimes have laboured for all their lives; impoveriſhing whole families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this commandment might eaſily be obſerved, it would ſoon appear, if princes would reſolve but for a few years to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of ſparing the firſt offence, that encourageth theſe hell-hounds. And if every man preſume to be pardoned once, there is no ſtate or commonwealth, but theſe men would in a ſhort time impoveriſh or deſtroy it.

The fifth commandment of this ſecond table, is, the prohibition of falſe witneſs: from which if men could not forbear, all ſurety of eſtate and life were taken away. And ſo much did God deteſt a falſe witneſs, and a falſe accuſer, eſpecially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to ſuffer the ſame death or puniſhment, which he ſought by falſhood to lay on his brother.

The laſt of the ten commandments forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiſcence, or their goods for deſire of gain. And this precept ſeemeth the hardeſt for men to obſerve; ſo eſteemed by reaſon of our frail affections: and yet if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconſiderate fancies and vain thoughts. For altho' it be not eaſy to maſter all our ſudden paſſions, yet we may reſtrain and hinder their growing, and farther increaſe, if we pleaſe to intend our ſtrength, and ſeek for grace. How the word coveting reacheth to all thoſe, it is to be conſidered. For Concupiſcentia, according to ſome, eſt effrænatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unreſtrained appetite of having: And as touching ſuch an appetite, we cannot excuſe our ſelves by any our natural frailty, or unadviſed error; but, as I ſuppoſe, the word concupiſcence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for ſome urging inclination thereunto. All the queſtion is of the later ſort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id eſt, non deliberatus ratione quæ eſt principium proprium actûs boni aut vitioſi; Such paſſions or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reaſon, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And ſure, it may ſeem, that ſo long as we reſiſt ſuch motions, they harm us not: as they ſay, Quamdiu refragamur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as we give no aſſent unto them, it is thought by ſome that they hurt us not: and that then only they hurt when we ſuffer them to bear ſway. But theſe men, as it ſeems, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what have been forbidden in the other: for in every commandment, not only the outward act, but alſo the inward aſſent unto evil, tho' it break not out into act, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this commandment and the reſt, the diſtinction of deſires is to be held: that ſome are with aſſent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without aſſent. For ſo even the moral philoſopher can tell us, that the continent man hath evil deſires, but without aſſent (for they are bridled by the ſtrength of right reaſon) as on the other ſide, the incontinent hath good deſires, but reſtrained and ſuppreſſed by contrary paſſions. The evil deſires, when they are accompanied with aſſent, are in every commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore if we will have any thing proper to this commandment, we muſt needs ſay, that the evil deſires of the continent man (that is, even thoſe which we reſiſt and bridle) are here forbidden. For tho' he that bridleth his evil deſires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them: yet ſuch a man, even according to the heathen philoſopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Ariſtotle himſelf makes continentia, not to be virtue, but only a degree unto it: confeſſing, that tho' the continent man do well in bridling his evil affections; yet he doth not all, ſeeing he ought not ſo much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he ſaith, that in the continent man the having of theſe evil deſires, tho' he reſiſt them, is the cauſe that he cannot be called a virtuous man: ſo we, that the having of them is a ſin. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of divinity to give the true reaſon of this doctrine: which is, that every one ſinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil deſires of the continent man, that is, of him that bridleth them, muſt needs be ſin: ſeeing ſuch deſires, tho' bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleaſed God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his commandments, we witneſs our love towards himſelf: we may not ſafely give liberty to our vanities, by caſting back upon God (who is juſtice it ſelf) that he hath given us precepts altogether beyond our power, and commandments impoſſible for us to keep. For, as he is accurſed (ſaith St. Jerome) that avows that the law is in all things poſſible to be obſerved: ſo he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impoſſibilia Deum præcepiſſe; Accurſed is he that ſaith that God hath commanded things (in themſelves, and not thro' our fault) impoſſible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the law: ſo is our weakneſs alſo in the ſcriptures laid before us; and therefore it is thus ſafely to be underſtood, that we ſhould without evaſion, or without betraying of our ſelves, do our faithful endeavours to obſerve them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our deſires therein. For that there is no man juſt, David witneſſeth; [a] Enter not into judgment with thy ſervant, for in thy ſight no fleſh that liveth ſhall be juſtified. And in 1 Kings viii. 46. There is no man that ſinneth not: and again, [b] Who can ſay I have made my heart clean? But ſeeing there is no ſin grievous without deliberation; let every man's conſcience judge him, whether he give way willingly, or reſtrain himſelf in all that he can; yea, or no: for when a king gives to his ſubject a commandment upon pain of loſs of his love, to perform ſome ſervice: if the ſubject neglecting the ſame, ſeek to ſatisfy his ſoveraign with ſhifting excuſes, out of doubt ſuch a prince will take himſelf to be derided therein.

SECT. XIV.

If there were not any religion nor judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were moſt neceſſary to be obſerved.

AND if we conſider adviſedly, and ſoberly, of the moral law, or ten commandments, which God by the hand of Moſes gave unto his people, it will appear that ſuch was his merciful providence in the choice of them, as were there neither pain nor profit adjoined to the obſerving, or not obſerving of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any religion among men; yet if we did not for our own ſakes ſtrive to obſerve theſe laws, all ſociety of men, and all endeavours, all happineſs and contentment in this life would be taken away, and every ſtate and common-wealth in the world fall to the ground and diſſolve. Therefore, theſe laws were not impoſed as a burthen, but as a bleſſing: to the end that the innocent might be defended; that every man might enjoy the fruits of his own travel; that right might be done to all men from all men; that by juſtice, order, and peace, we might live the lives of reaſonable men, and not of beaſts; of free-men, and not of ſlaves; of civil men, and not of ſavages. And hereof making our human reaſon only judge, let us ſee the inconveniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of theſe laws.

As firſt, What would the iſſue be if we acknowledged many Gods? Would not a far greater hatred, war, and blood-ſhed follow, than that which the difference of ceremony, and diverſity of interpretation, hath already brought into the world, even among thoſe nations which acknowledge one God, and one Chriſt?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to idols, and images of gold, metal, dead ſtones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loſs of time, and an impoſſibility to receive thencefrom, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third commandment bringeth therewith this diſadvantage and ill to man, that whoſoever taketh the name of God in vain, ſhall not at any time benefit himſelf by calling God to witneſs for him, when he may juſtly uſe his holy name.

The obſerving the ſabbath holy, giveth reſt to men and beaſts, and nature her ſelf requireth intermiſſion of labour.

If we deſpiſe our parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our own children to ſcorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If murther were not forbidden, and ſeverely puniſhed, the race of mankind would be extinguiſhed: and whoſoever would take the liberty to deſtroy others, giveth liberty to others to deſtroy himſelf.

If adultery were lawful and permitted, no man could ſay unto himſelf, this is my ſon: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour deſcend to poſterity, no endeavour by virtue and undertaking to raiſe families; murthers and poiſonings between man and wife, would be daily committed, and every man ſubject to moſt filthy and unclean diſeaſes.

If ſtealth and violent rapine were ſuffered, all mankind would ſhortly after periſh, or live as the ſavages, by roots and acorns. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And ſuch is the miſchief of robbery, as where Moſes for leſſer crimes appointed reſtitution four-fold, policy of ſtate and neceſſity hath made it death.

[a] Pſal. 143. [b] Prov. 20. 9.

To

To permit falſe witneſſes, is to take all mens lives and eſtates from them by corruption: the wicked would ſwear againſt the virtuous: the waſter againſt the wealthy: the idle beggar and loiterer, againſt the careful and painful labourer: all trial of right were taken away, and juſtice thereby baniſhed out of the world.

The coveting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a diſtraction of mind with an inward vexation: for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitleſs hopes, ſo long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the deſire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wives or goods of our neighbours, we can look for no other, but that ourſelves ſhall alſo, either by theft or by ſtrong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burden of God's commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in reſpect of himſelf, did the moſt merciful and provident God ordain them; without the obſervation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the bleſſings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable and of no uſe. For we ſhould remain but in the ſtate of brute beaſts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

SECT. XV.

Of human law, written and unwritten.

HUMAN law, of which now it followeth to ſpeak, is firſt divided into two, viz. Written, and unwritten. The unwritten conſiſts of uſage, approved by time: which Iſidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Conſuetudines vetuſtate probatæ, to be cuſtoms approved by antiquity or unwritten laws. Now cuſtom differeth from uſe, as the cauſe from the effect: in that cuſtom is by uſe and continuance eſtabliſhed into a law: but yet there, where the law is defective, ſaith Iſidore.

And of cuſtoms there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars, the firſt are written cuſtoms, received and exerciſed by nations, as the cuſtoms of Burgundy and Normandy: the ancient general cuſtom of England, and the cuſtoms of Caſtile, and other provinces.

The ſecond are theſe petty cuſtoms, uſed in particular places, cities, hundreds, and manors. The general or national cuſtoms are ſome written, others unwritten.

The particular of petty cuſtoms are ſeldom written, but witneſſed by teſtimony of the inhabitants. The cuſtoms of the dutchy of Cornwall comprehending alſo the Stannery of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin cauſes, are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howſoever uſe and time hath made theſe cuſtoms as laws, yet ought every cuſtom to be rationabilis, as well as præſcripta. [a] Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de jure ab initio non ſubſiſtit; That which at firſt was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (ſaith Ulpian) [b] Quod ab initio vitioſum eſt, non poteſt tractu temporis convaleſcere; Courſe of time amends not that which was naught from the firſt beginning. For theſe two defences are neceſſary in all laws of cuſtom; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law divine and natural; the other, that the cauſe and reaſon be ſtrong, proving a right birth, and neceſſary continuance: it being manifeſt, that every cuſtom, which is againſt the law, had its beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former conſiderations to be allowed. And it is true, that all cuſtoms of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, tho' they have been ſince continued, becauſe poſterity is not bound to examine by what cauſe their anceſtors were thereto moved. For non ſufficit ſimplex toleratio. And it is in this ſort overruled in the law; Per populum conſuetudo contra legem induci non poteſt, niſi de voluntate illius qui novam legem, & novam conſtitutionem ſtatuere poteſt, qui ſolus princeps eſt; The people cannot bring in a new cuſtom againſt law, ſave by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the prince.

Human law generally taken, to wit, human law written, is by ſome defined to be the decree or doom of practic reaſon: by which human actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the law a common precept, the adviſement of wiſemen, and the reſtraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Iſidore calls the law a conſtitution written, agreeing with religion, fitteſt for government and common profit: and more largely, Omne id quod ratione conſiſtit; All that ſtands with reaſon.

Laſtly, and more preciſely it is thus defined: [c] Human law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the law natural and eternal: made by the rational diſcourſe of thoſe that exerciſe publick authority: preſcribing neceſſary obſervances to the ſubject. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, St. Auguſtine teacheth, ſaying: Mihi lex eſſe non videtur, quæ juſta non fuerit; It ſeems to be no law at all to me, which is not juſt: and juſt it cannot be, except it agree with the law natural and eternal. For there is no law juſt and legitimate (ſaith St. Auguſtine) which the law-makers have not derived from the eternal; [d] Nihil juſtum atque legitimum eſt, quod non ab æterna lege ſibi homines derivaverint.

Secondly, It ought to be conſtituted by diſcourſe of reaſon, whereby it is diſtinguiſhed from the law natural, to wit, the natural, indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration, from whence the law human is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, That it ought to be made by an authorized magiſtracy, it cannot be doubted, be the government, of what kind ſoever. For it falleth otherwiſe under the title of thoſe decrees called Violentiæ, or Iniquæ Conſtitutiones; Violences, or Wicked Conſtitutions.

Of human law there are four properties, eſpecially anſwering theſe four conditions in the former definition. Firſt, As it is drawn out of the law of nature: ſo every particular of the human law may be reſolved into ſome principle or rule of the natural.

Secondly, It is to be conſidered as it is referred unto, and doth reſpect the common good.

Thirdly, It is to be made by publick authority.

Fourthly, Concerning the matter of the law, it preſcribeth, and directeth, all human actions. And ſo is the law as large and diverſe, as all human actions are diverſe, which may fall under it. For according to Thomas, [e] Alia lex Julia de adulteriis, alia Cornelia de ſicariis; The law of Julian againſt adultery is one, the Cornelian againſt ruffians, is another. Now the human law, generally taken, is, in reſpect of the firſt of theſe conſiderations, divided into the law of nations, and the civil.

The law of nations is taken leſs or more properly; leſs properly for every law which is not of it

ſelf, but from other higher principles deduced: and ſo it ſeemeth that Ulpian underſtands it: for he defineth jus gentium, or the law of nations, to be that which is only common amongſt men, as religion, and the worſhip of God: which is not in the very nature of this law of nations: but from the principles of the ſcriptures, and other divine revelations. But the law of nations properly taken, is that dictate, or ſentence, which is drawn from a very probable, tho' not from an evident principle, yet ſo probable that all nations do aſſent unto the concluſion, as that the free paſſage of Ambaſſadors be granted between enemies, &c. which national law, according to divers acceptations, and divers conſiderations had of the human law, may be ſometimes taken for a ſpecies of the natural, ſometimes of the human.

Jus Civile, or the civil law, is not the ſame in all common-wealths, but in divers eſtates it is alſo diverſe and peculiar, and this law is not ſo immediately derived from the law of nature, as the law of nations is: for it is partly deduced out of ſuch principles, as all nations do not agree in, or eaſily aſſent unto; becauſe they depend on particular circumſtances, which are diverſe, and do not fit all eſtates. Hereof Ulpian, [a] Jus civile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei ſervit: itaque cum aliquid addimus vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id eſt civile, efficimus; The civil law (ſaith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of nature and nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore, when we add ought to, or take from the law that is common, we make a law proper, that is, the civil law.

The law now commonly called the civil law, had its birth in Rome: and was firſt written by the Decemviri 303 years after the foundation of the city. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, and other Grecian laws, as out of the ancient Roman cuſtoms and laws regal. The regal laws were deviſed by the firſt kings, and called leges regiæ, or Papyrianæ, becauſe they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then reigning. For tho' ſo many of the former laws as maintained kingly authority were aboliſhed, with the name: yet thoſe of [b] Servius Tullius, for commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve tables. [c] To theſe laws of the twelve tables were added (as the times gave occaſion) thoſe made by the ſenate, called Senatus-conſulta: thoſe of the common people, called Plebi-ſcita: thoſe of the lawyers called reſponſa prudentum: and the edicts of the annual magiſtrate: which edicts being firſt gathered and interpreted by Julian, and preſented to Adrian the emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetual laws: and the volume ſtyled, Edictum perpetuum: as thoſe and the like collections of Juſtinian afterwards were.

The difference anciently between laws and edicts, which the French call Reglements, conſiſted in this, that laws are the conſtitutions made or confirmed by ſoveraign authority (be the ſoveraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withal general and permanent: but an edict (which is but Juſſum magiſtratus, unleſs by authority it be made a law) hath end with the officer, who made the ſame, ſaith Varro. Qui plurimum edicto tribuunt, legem annuam eſſe dicunt; They who aſcribe the moſt unto an edict, ſay that it is a law for one year. Tho' Iſidore doth alſo expreſs by the word conſtitutions or edicts, thoſe ordinances called Acts of prerogatives: as Conſtitutio vel edictum eſt, quod rex, vel Imperator, conſtituit, vel edicit; An ordinance or edict is that which a king or emperour doth ordain or proclaim.

Laſtly, The human law is divided into the ſecular, and into the eccleſiaſtical, or canon. The ſecular commanding temporal good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the commonwealth: the eccleſiaſtical the ſpiritual good, and right government of the eccleſiaſtical commonwealth, or church: Illud naturæ legem, hoc divinam ſpectat; That reſpecteth the law of nature, this the law of God. And ſo may jus civile be taken two ways: firſt, As diſtinguiſhed from the law of nations, as in the firſt diviſion: ſecondly, As it is the ſame with the ſecular, and diverſe from the eccleſiaſtical. But this diviſion of the ſchoolmen is obſcure: for altho' the civil be the ſame with the ſecular, as the civil is a law; yet the ſecular is more general, and comprehendeth both the civil and all other laws not eccleſiaſtical. For of ſecular laws, in uſe among chriſtian princes, and in chriſtian commonwealths, there are three kinds; the civil which hath every-where a voice, and is in all Chriſtian eſtates (England excepted) moſt powerful; the laws of England called common, and the laws of cuſtom or provincial. In Spain beſides the law civil, they have the cuſtoms of Caſtile, and other provinces. In France beſides the civil, the cuſtoms of Burgundy, Bloys, Berry, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. [d] Tous lieux ſitues & aſſis en Lodunois, ſeront governez ſelon les coſtumes du dit Pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, ſhall be governed according to the cuſtoms of that place. There are alſo in France the cuſtoms of Normandy, and theſe of two kinds, general and local; and all purged and reformed by divers acts of the three eſtates. The charters of confirmation of theſe ancient cuſtoms, before and ſince their reformation, have theſe words: Nos autem regiſtrum prædictum, uſus laudabiles, & conſuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate regia confirmamus; The regiſter aforeſaid, laudable uſe, and ancient cuſtoms, we praiſe, approve, and by our kingly authority confirm. The common law of England is alſo compounded of the ancient cuſtoms of the ſame, and of certain maxims by thoſe cuſtoms of the realm approved. Upon which cuſtoms alſo are grounded thoſe courts of Record, of the Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other ſmall courts.

Theſe ancient cuſtoms of England have been approved by the kings thereof, from age to age: as that cuſtom by which no man ſhall be taken, impriſoned, diſſeiſed, nor otherwiſe deſtroyed, but he muſt firſt be put to anſwer by the law of the land, was confirmed by the ſtatute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient cuſtom of England, that the eldeſt ſon ſhould inherit without partition: in Germany, France, and elſewhere otherwiſe, and by partition. In Ireland it is the cuſtom for all lands (that have not been reſigned into the king's hands) that the eldeſt of the houſe ſhall enjoy the inheritance during his own life: and ſo the ſecond and third eldeſt (if there be ſo many brothers) before the heir in lineal deſcent: this is called the cuſtom of Taniſtry. For example, If a lord of land have four ſons, and the eldeſt of thoſe four have alſo a ſon, the three brothers of the eldeſt ſon ſhall, after the death of their brother, enjoy their father's lands before the grandchild: the cuſtom being grounded upon the reaſon of neceſſity. For the Iriſh in former times having always lived in a ſubdivided civil war, not only the greateſt againſt the greateſt, but every baron and gentleman one againſt another, were inforc'd to leave ſucceſſors of age and ability to defend their own territories. Now as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other provinces of France, there are certain peculiar, and petty cuſtoms, beſides the great and general cuſtom of the land; ſo are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greateſt bulk of our laws, as I take it, are the acts of parliament: laws propounded and approved by the three eſtates of the realm, and confirmed by the king, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, becauſe they are acts of choice, and ſelf-deſire. [a] Leges nulla alia cauſa nos tenent quam quod judicio populi receptæ ſunt; The laws do therefore bind the ſubjects, becauſe they are received by the judgment of the ſubject. [b] Tum demum humanæ leges habent vim ſuam, cum fuerint non modo inſtitutæ, ſed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that human laws have their ſtrength, when they ſhall not only be deviſed, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Iſidore faſtneth theſe properties to every Chriſtian law, that the ſame be honeſt, that it be poſſible, that it be according to nature, and according to the cuſtom of the country; alſo for the time and place convenient, profitable, and manifeſt, and without reſpect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He alſo gives four effects of the law, which Modeſtinus comprehends in two: to wit, obligation and inſtigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice: the latter encourageth with hope, to follow virtue. For, according to Cicero, Legem oportet eſſe vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum; It behoveth the law to be a mender of vices, and a commender of virtues. The part obligatory or binding us to the obſervation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all laws: and it is two-fold, the one conſtraineth us by fear of our conſciences, the other by fear of external puniſhment. Theſe two effects the law performeth, by the exerciſe of thoſe two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The ſecond of theſe two effects remembred by Modeſtinus, is inſtigation, or encouragement to virtue, as Ariſtotle makes it the end of the law, to make men virtuous. For laws being ſuch as they ought to be, do, both by preſcribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing: laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchaſed. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are thoſe into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and ſubſtance thereof: ſaying, [c] Declina à malo & fac bonum; Decline from evil, and do good.

SECT. XVI.

That only the prince is exempt from human laws, and in what ſort.

NOW whether the power of the human law be without exception of any perſon, it is doubtfully diſputed among thoſe that have written of this ſubject, as well divines as lawyers; and namely, whether ſoveraign princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforeſaid, the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive, they ought to be ſubject, but not to that which conſtraineth. For as touching violence or puniſhments, no man is bound to give a prejudicial judgment againſt himſelf: and if equals have not any power over each other, much leſs have inferiours over their ſuperiours, from whom they receive their authority and ſtrength.

And ſpeaking of the ſupreme power of laws, ſimply then is the prince ſo much above the laws, as the ſoul and body united, is above a dead and ſenſeleſs carcaſe. For the king is truly called, Jus vivum & lex animata; An animate and living law. But this is true, that by giving authority to laws, princes both add greatneſs to themſelves, and conſerve it, and therefore was it ſaid of Bracton out of Juſtinian. Merito debet rex tribuere legi, quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipſe ſit rex; Rightfully ought the king to attribute that to the law, which the law firſt attributeth to the king; for it is the law that doth make kings.

But whereas [d] Bracton aſcribeth this power to the human law, he is therein miſtaken. For kings are made by God, and laws divine: and by human laws only declared to be kings. As for the places remembred by the divines and lawyers, which infer a kind of obligation of princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conſcience, and profit ariſing from the examples of virtuous princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God only.

[e] Tibi ſoli peccavi, ſaith David; Againſt thee only have I ſinned: therefore the prince cannot be ſaid to be ſubject to the law. Princeps non ſubjicitur legi: for ſeeing, according to the ſchoolmen, the law human is but Quoddam organum & inſtrumentum poteſtatis gubernativæ: non videtur poſſe ejus obligatio ad eum ſe extendere, ad quem ipſa vis poteſtatis humanæ non pertinet: ſed vis poteſtatis humanæ non ſe extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa reſidet. Ergo neque lex condita per talem poteſtatem obligare poteſt ipſum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, eſt principium tranſmutandi aliud: Seeing human law (ſay they) is but a kind of organ or inſtrument of the power that governeth, it ſeems that it cannot extend it ſelf to bind any one whom no human power can controul, or lay hold of: but the governour himſelf, in whom the governing power doth reſide, is a perſon that cannot by himſelf, or by his own power be controuled. And therefore the law which is made by ſuch a power, cannot bind the law-maker himſelf: for every active ability is a cauſe or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which itſelf reſides. And ſeeing princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the law. [f] Ergo etiam poteſt ipſemet princeps ſive legiſlator ſua ſe voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore alſo may a prince or law-maker at his own will and pleaſure deliver himſelf from the bond of the law. Therefore in the rules of the law it is thus concluded. Subditi tenentur leges obſervare neceſſitate coactionis, princeps verò ſola voluntate ſua, & intuitu boni communis; The ſubjects are bound to fulfil the law by neceſſity of compulſion, but the prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politic laws, given by Moſes to the nation of the Iſraelites whether they ought to be a precedent, from which no civil inſtitutions of other people ſhould preſume to digreſs, I will not preſume to determine, but leave it as a queſtion for ſuch men to decide, whoſe profeſſions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, that we ought not to ſeem wiſer than God himſelf, who hath told us, that there are no laws ſo righteous as thoſe which it pleaſed him to give to his elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all nations have their ſeveral qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no leſs than in their peculiar languages, which diſagreeable conditions to govern aptly one and the ſame law very hardly were able. The Roman civil laws did indeed contain in order, a great part of the then known world, without any notable inconvenience, after ſuch time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the adminiſtration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural cuſtoms of the ſundry people, which it governed. For whether it be thro' a long continued perſuaſion; or (as aſtrologers more willingly grant) ſome influence of the heavens; or peradventure ſome temper of the ſoil and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to ſteal, makes the Arabians to be thieves) very hard it were to forbid by law, an offence ſo common, with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be diſtinguiſhed from juſt and honeſt. By ſuch rigour was the kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Chriſtian religion, which it willingly at the firſt embraced, but after with great fury rejected, becauſe plurality of wives was denied unto them, I know not how neceſſarily, but more contentiouſly than ſeaſonably. In ſuch caſes, methinks, it were not amiſs to conſider, that the High God himſelf permitted ſome things to the Iſraelites, rather in regard of their natural diſpoſition (for they were hard-hearted) than becauſe they were conſonant unto the ancient rules of the firſt perfection. So, where even the general nature of man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjuſt; there may the law given by Moſes, worthily be deemed the moſt exact reformer of the evil, which forceth man, as near as may be, to the will and pleaſure of his Maker. But where nature or cuſtom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with ſo long and ſo publick approbation, that the virtue oppoſing it, would ſeem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the Engliſh faſhion of apparel in Turky: there may a wiſe and upright law-giver, without preſumption, omit ſomewhat that the rigour of Moſes's law required; even as the good king Hezekiah did, in a matter merely eccleſiaſtical, and therefore the leſs capable of diſpenſation, praying for the people; [a] The good Lord be merciful unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to ſeek the Lord, the God of his fathers, tho' he be not cleanſed according to the purification of the ſanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obſerved by Dr. Willet, that the moral judicials of Moſes do partly bind, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively that we are tied to the ſame ſeverity of puniſhment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the puniſhment of death ſhould not be adjudged, where ſentence of death is not given by Moſes: Chriſtian magiſtrates ruling under Chriſt the [b] Prince of peace, that is, of clemency and mercy, may abate of the ſeverity of Moſes's law, and mitigate the puniſhment of death, but they cannot add unto it to make the burden more heavy: for to ſhew more rigour than Moſes, becometh not the goſpel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the ſubject of many learned diſcourſes, neither will I take upon me to ſpeak any thing definitively in a caſe which dependeth ſtill in ſome controverſy among worthy divines. Thus much (as in honour of the judicial law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly ſay, that the defence of it hath always been very plauſible. And ſurely, howſoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and only law; yet ſhall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conſcience of a judge may reſt, with equal ſatisfaction, in making interpretation, or giving ſentence upon doubts, ariſing out of any law beſides it. Hereof, perhaps, that judge could have been witneſs, of whom Forteſcue, that notable bulwark of our laws, doth ſpeak, complaining of a judgment given againſt a gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accuſed by her own man, without any other proof, for murdering her husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to aſhes: the man who accuſed her, within a year after being convicted for the ſame offence, confeſſed that his miſtreſs was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whoſe terrible death he then (tho' over-late) grievouſly lamented: but this judge, ſaith the ſame author, [c] Sæpius ipſe mihi faſſus eſt, quod nunquam in vita ſua animum ejus de hoc facto ipſe purgaret; He himſelf often confeſſed unto me, that he ſhould never, during his life, be able to clear his conſcience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgment which other ſciences yield unto the metaphyſicks, that from thence are drawn propoſitions, able to prove the principles of ſciences, which out of the ſciences themſelves cannot be proved, may juſtly be granted by all other politick Inſtitutions, to that of Moſes; and ſo much the more juſtly, by how much the ſubject of the metaphyſicks, which is, Ens quatenus Ens, Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium, The being of beings, the only good, the fountain of truth, whoſe fear is the beginning of wiſdom. To which purpoſe well ſaith St. Auguſtine, Conditor legum temporalium ſi vir bonus eſt & ſapiens, illam ipſam conſulit æternam, de qua nulli animæ judicare datum eſt; The author of temporal laws, if he be good and wiſe, doth therein conſult the law eternal, to determine of which there is no power given to any ſoul. And as well prince Edward, in Forteſcue's diſcourſe, Nemo poteſt melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam poſuit Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The ſtory of the Iſraelites from the receiving of the law, to the death of Moſes.

SECT. I.

Of the numbering and diſpoſing of the hoſt of Iſrael, for their marches through the wilderneſs: with a note of the reverence given to the worſhip of God, in this ordering of their troops.

WHEN Moſes had received the law from God, and publiſhed it among the people, and finiſhed the tabernacle of the ark and ſanctuary; he muſtered all the tribes and families of Iſrael: and having ſeen what numbers of men, fit to bear arms, were found in every tribe, from 20 years of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the Lord, ſuch princes and leaders, as in worth and reputation were in every tribe moſt eminent. The number of the whole army was 603550 able men for the wars, beſides women and children; alſo, beſides the ſtrangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great army was divided by Moſes into four groſs and mighty battalions, each of which contained the ſtrength of three whole tribes.

[a] 2 Chron. 30. 18, 19. [b] Iſaiah 9. [c] Cap. 5. 3.

The

The first of these containing 186400 able men, consisted of three regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called armies; as containing the three whole tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men, led by Naasson: in Issachar 54400 led by Nethaneel: in Zabulon 57400 led by Eliab. All these marched under the standard of the tribe of Judah, who held the van-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incamping on the east-side of the army; which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second battalion, or army, called in the scriptures the host of Reuben, had joined unto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151,450. All which marched under the standard of Reuben. In the tribe of Reuben were 46500 under Elizur: in Simeon 59300 under Shelumiel: in Gad 45650 under Eliasah. These had the second place, and incamped on the south-side of the tabernable.

The third army marched under the standard of Ephraim, to whom were joined the regiments of Manasseh and Benjamin; who joined together, made in number 108100 able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the west quarter of the tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500 under Elishama: Manasseh 32200 under Gamaliel: Benjamin 35400 under Abidam.

The fourth and last army, or squadron, of the general army, containing 157600 able men, marched under the standard of Dan; to whom were joined the two tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the rere-ward, and moved last, incamping on the north-side. Dan had 62700 under Ahiezer: Asher 41500 under Pagiel: Nephtali 53400 under Ahira.

Besides these princes of the several tribes, there were ordained captains over thousands, over hundreds, over fifties, and over tens; as it may appear by that mutiny and insurrection against Moses, Numbers xvi. 1, 2. For there arose up against Moses 250 captains of the Assembly, famous in the congregation, and men of renown: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal mutineers, with those 250 captains that followed them, were not any of the twelve princes of the tribes, or general colonels before spoken of, as by their names Numb. i. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the division of the land of Promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them under their several standards in the wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedency and the greatest army, which also was wholly compounded of the sons of Leah, Jacob's wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had undergone his father's curse; and with Gad, the son of his mother's hand-maid. Joseph, who in temporal blessings had the prerogative of the first-born a double portion, was accounted as two tribes, and divided into two regiments: the younger (according to Jacob's prophecy) taking place before the elder. He was assisted by Benjamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacob's concubines, was given the leading of the fourth army, according to Jacob's prophecy. He had with him under his standard none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the sons of the hand-maids.

In the middle of these four armies, was the tabernacle, or portable temple of the congregation carried, surrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the heathens and pagans could not approach, by reason of these four powerful armies, which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the movable temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000 persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof: of which 8580 had the peculiar charge, according to their several offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the armies of the people observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the tabernacle; the Gershonites on the west, within the army and standard of Ephraim, over whom Eliasaph commanded, in number 7500. The family of Cohath on the south side, guided by Elizaphan, within the army of Reuben, and between him and the tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the family of Merari, over whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200, and these were lodged on the north side within the army of Dan; on the east side, and next within those tribes and forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate commanders, both of the ceremonies, and of the people; under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical families, was Eleazar the son of Aaron, his successor in the high-priesthood.

This was the order of the army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching: the tabernacle of God being always set in the middle and center thereof. The reverend care, which Moses the prophet and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the tabernacle, ark and sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeal borne towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutiful observance in the laying up and preserving the holy vessels; the solemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this superfine age, by those of the family, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kind of popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: insomuch as time would soon bring to pass (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of churches into barns, and from thence again into the fields and mountains, and under the hedges; and the offices of the ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all order, discipline, and church-government, left to newness of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soon after, as many kinds of religions would spring up, as there are parish-churches within England: every contentious and ignorant person cloathing his fancy with the spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; insomuch as when the truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no less variable than contrary to itself, the faith of men will soon after die away by degrees, and all religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that persuaded him to become a Lutheran,

Si

Si me adjungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab aliis; si me aliis adjungo, a vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, ſed quid ſequar non habeo; If I adjoin my ſelf to you, I am condemned by others; if I join with others, I am condemned by you; what I ſhould avoid I ſee, but I know not what I ſhould follow.

SECT. II.

The offerings of the twelve princes: the paſſover of the ſecond year: the departing of Jethro.

NOW when Moſes had taken order for all things neceſſary, provided for the ſervice of God, written the laws, numbred his army, and divided them into the battles and troops before remembred, and appointed them leaders of all ſorts: the twelve princes or commanders of the tribes, brought their [a] offerings before the Lord, to wit, ſix covered chariots, and twelve oxen to draw them, therein to tranſport, as they marched, the parts of the tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto, the ſanctuary excepted; which for reverence was carried upon the ſhoulders of the ſons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the chariots in which were conveyed the other parts of the tabernacle and veſſels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that ſervice, namely to the ſons of Gerſhan and Merari.

Beſides theſe chariots, each of theſe commanders, princes, or heads of tribes, offered unto God, and for his ſervice in the temple, a charger of fine ſilver, weighing 130 [b] ſheckles: a ſilver bowl of 70 ſheckels: after the ſheckle of the ſanctuary: and an incenſe cup of gold of ten ſheckles; which they performed at the ſame time when the altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards their conqueſt: beſides the beaſts which they offered for ſacrifice, according to the law ceremonial, the weight of all the twelve ſilver chargers, and twelve ſilver bowls, amounted unto 2400 ſheckles of ſilver: and the weight of gold in the incenſe cups, to 120 ſheckles of gold: which makes of ſheckles of ſilver 1200, every ſheckle of gold valuing ten of ſilver; ſo that the whole of gold and ſilver which they offered at this time, was about 420 l. Ster. This done, Moſes, as in all the reſt by the ſpirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the paſſover: which they performed on the 14th day of the ſecond month of the ſecond year: and on the 20th day of the ſame the cloud was lifted up from above the tabernacle, as a ſign of going forward; Moſes beginning his march with this invocation to God, Riſe up, Lord, and let thine enemies be ſcattered, and let them that hate thee, fly before thee. Then all the people of Iſrael removed from their encamping at the foot of the mountain Sinai, towards Paran; the army or great ſquadron of Juda, led by Naaſon, taking the vanguard, followed by Nethaneel and Eliab, leaders of the tribes of Iſſachar and Zabulon: after whom the reſt marched as in the figure expreſs'd. And becauſe the paſſage thro' ſo many deſarts and mountains was exceeding difficult: Moſes leaving nothing unforethought which might ſerve for the advancement of his enterprize, he inſtantly entreated his father-in-law, whom in Numbers x. he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan: promiſing him ſuch part and profit of the enterprize, as God ſhould beſtow on them: for this man as he was of great underſtanding and judgment (as appeared by the counſel he gave to Moſes for the appointing of judges over the people) ſo was he a perfect guide in all thoſe parts, himſelf inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it ſeemeth) a man of great years and experience, for he was then the prieſt or prince of Madian, when Moſes fled firſt out of Egypt, and married his daughter: which was 42 years before this requeſt made. And tho' Moſes himſelf had lived forty years in theſe parts of Arabia, thro' which he was now to travel: yet the better to aſſure his paſſage, and ſo great a multitude of ſouls, which could not be ſo few as a million, it was neceſſary to uſe many guides and many conductors. To this requeſt of Moſes it may ſeem by the places, Exod. xviii. 27. and Numb. x. 30. that Jethro, otherwiſe called Hobab, yielded not: for it is evident, [c] that he went back from Moſes into his own country. But becauſe it appeareth by other places of ſcripture, that the poſterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Iſraelites: it is moſt likely that this his return to his own country was rather to fetch away his family, and to take his leave of his own country, by ſetting things in order, than to abide there.

SECT. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cauſe of their returning back to the Red ſea.

AFTER this diſmiſſion of Hobab, Iſrael began to march towards the deſarts of Paran: and after three days wandring, they ſat down at the ſepulchres of luſt, afterward called Tabeera, or Incenſio: by reaſon that God conſumed with fire thoſe mutineers and murmurers, which roſe up in this remove, which happened about the 23d day of the ſame month. And from this 23d day of the ſecond month, of the ſecond year, they reſted, and fed themſelves with quails (which it pleaſed God by a ſea-wind to caſt upon them) to the 24th day of the third month, to wit, all the month of Sinan or June; whereof ſurfeiting, their died great numbers: from whence in the following month, called Thamus, anſwering to our July, they went on to Hazeroth: where [d] Miriam the ſiſter of Moſes was ſtricken with the leproſy, which continued upon her ſeven days, after whoſe recovery Iſrael removed toward the border of Idumea: and encamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, from whence Moſes ſent the twelve diſcoverers into the territory of Canaan: both to inform themſelves of the fertility and ſtrength of the country: as alſo to take knowledge of the ways, paſſages, rivers, fords and mountains. For Arad king of the Canaanites ſurprized divers companies of the Iſraelites, by lying in ambuſh near thoſe ways, thro' which the diſcoverers and ſearchers of the land had formerly paſs'd. Now after the return of the diſcoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned againſt [e] Iſrael; whoſe ingratitude and rebellion after his ſo many benefits, ſo many remiſſions, ſo many miracles wrought, was ſuch, as they eſteemed their deliverance from the [f] Egyptian ſlavery, his feeding them, and conducting them thro' that great and terrible wilderneſs (for ſo Moſes calleth it) with the [g] victory which he gave them againſt the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on and preſerved them, but to bring them, their wives and children to be ſlaughtered, and given for a prey and ſpoil to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported unto them, by the ſearchers of the land, that the cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many ſtrong towers and caſtles: that many of the people were giant-like (for they confeſs'd that they ſaw the ſons of Anak there) who were men of fearful ſtature, and ſo far over-topped the Iſraelites, as they appeared to them, and to themſelves, but as graſhoppers in their reſpect. Now as this mutiny exceeded all the reſt, wherein they both accuſed God, and conſulted to chuſe them a captain (or as they call it now-a-days an Electo) to carry them back again into Egypt: ſo did God puniſh the ſame in a greater meaſure, than any of the former. For he extinguiſhed every ſoul of the whole multitude (Joſhua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in God's promiſes, perſuaded the people to enter Canaan, being then near it, and at the mountain foot of Idumea, which is but narrow, laying before them the fertility thereof, and aſſuring them of victory. But as men, whom the paſſion of fear had bereaved both of reaſon and common ſenſe: [a] they threatned to ſtone theſe encouragers to death, accounting them as men either deſperate in themſelves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God reſiſted theſe wicked purpoſes, and interpoſing the fear of his bright glory between the unadviſed fury of the multitude, and the innocency and conſtancy of his ſervants, preſerved them thereby from their violence: threatning an entire deſtruction of the whole nation, by ſending among them a [b] conſuming and mercileſs peſtilence. For this was the tenth inſurrection and rebellion which they had made, ſince God delivered them from the ſlavery of the Egyptians. But [c] Moſes (the mildeſt or meekeſt of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies: alledging that this ſo ſevere a judgment, how deſervedly ſoever inflicted, would increaſe the pride of the heathen nations: and give them occaſion to vaunt that the God of Iſrael failing in power to perform his promiſes, ſuffered them to periſh in theſe barren and fruitleſs deſarts. Yet as God is no leſs juſt than merciful, as God is ſlow to anger, ſo is his wrath a conſuming fire, the ſame being once kindled by the violent breath of man's ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand leſs heavy than hoped for, he ſcourged this iniquity, ſo by the meaſure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and deriſion) he ſuffered not the wicked to paſs unpuniſhed; reſerving his compaſſion for the innocent; whom, becauſe they participated not with the offences of their fathers, he was pleaſed to preſerve, and in them to perform his promiſes, which have never been fruſtrate.

Of their unwillingneſs to return; with the puniſhment thereof, and of divers accidents in the return.

NOW when Moſes had revealed the purpoſes of God to the people: and made them know his heavy diſpleaſure towards them: they began to bewail themſelves, tho' over-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, having alſo their appointment. And then when God left them to themſelves, and was no more among them, after they had ſo often play'd and dallied with his merciful ſufferings; they would needs amend their former diſobedience by a ſecond contempt, and make offer to enter the land contrary again to the advice of Moſes; who aſſured them, that God was not now among them: and that the ark of his covenant ſhould not move, but by his direction, who could not err: and that the enemies ſword, which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no leſs ſharp than death: and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no leſs cruel. But as men, from whom God hath withdrawn his grace, do always follow thoſe counſels which carry them to their own deſtructions: ſo the Hebrews, after they had forſaken the opportunity by God and their conductors offered, and might then have entred Judea before their enemies were prepared and joined; did afterwards, contrary to God's commandment, undertake the enterprize of themſelves, and ran headlong and without advice into the mountains of Idumea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joined and attending their advantage, ſet on them, brake them, and of their numbers ſlaughtered the greateſt part: and following their victory and purſuit, conſumed them all the way of their flight even unto Hormah: the Amalekites, in revenge of their former loſs, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their diſplantation and deſtruction threatned. Of which powerful aſſembly of thoſe two nations (aſſiſted in all likelihood with the neighbour kings joined together for their common ſafety) it pleaſed God to forewarn Moſes, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by thoſe painful paſſages of the deſarts, thro' which they had formerly travelled, till they had found the banks of the Red ſea again: in which retreat, before they came back to paſs over Jordan, there were conſumed 38 years: and the whole number of the ſix hundredth and odd thouſand, which came out of Egypt (Moſes, Joſhua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the wilderneſs, the ſtubborn and careleſs generations were wholly worn out, and the promis'd land beſtow'd on their children: which were increaſed to 600000, and more. For beſides the double fault both of refuſing to enter the land upon the return of the diſcoverers, and the preſumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it ſeemeth that they had committed that horrible idolatry of worſhipping Molech, and the hoſt of heaven. For altho' Moſes doth not mention it, yet [d] Amos doth, and ſo doth the martyr Stephen; as alſo that the Iſraelites worſhipped the ſun and moon in after-times it is proved out of ſundry other places.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the camp at Kades, Moſes, according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the ſouth from whence he came, to recover the ſhores of the Red ſea. And ſo from Kades or Rithma he removed to Remmonparez, ſo called of abundance of pomegranates there found and divided among them. From thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the frankincenſe there found. From [e] Libnah he croſs'd the valley, and ſat down at Reſſa near the foot of the mountain. And after he had reſted there, he bended towards the weſt, and encamped at Ceelata: where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was ſtoned to death. After which, Moſes always keeping the valley, between two great ledges of mountains (thoſe which bound the deſart of Zin, and thoſe of Pharan) croſs'd the ſame from Ceelata, and marched eaſtward to the mountain of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the twentieth manſion. From thence he paſſed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah; and ſo to Thara or Thare, the four and twentieth manſion. Where, while Moſes reſted, the people began that inſolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan and Abiram: who, for their contempt of God and his miniſters, were ſome of them ſwallowed up alive, and by the earth opening her mouth devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered incenſe with Korah, were conſumed with fire from heaven; and 14700 of their party, which murmured againſt Moſes, ſtricken dead with a ſudden peſtilence: one of the greateſt marvels and judgments of God, that hath been ſhewed in all the time of Moſes's government, or before. For among ſo great a multitude, thoſe lay-men, who would have uſurped eccleſiaſtical authority, were ſuddenly ſwallowed up alive into the earth with their families and goods; even while they ſought to overthrow the order, diſcipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliouſly contending againſt the high prieſt and magiſtrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church and commonweal of his people. And the better to aſſure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleaſed him in this place alſo to approve by miracle the former election of his ſervant Aaron, by the twelve rods given in by the heads of the twelve tribes; of which Moſes received one of every head and prince of his tribe: which being all withered and dry wands, and on every rod the name of the prince of the tribe written, and Aaron's on that of Levi; it pleaſed God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable ſpirit, and having lain in the tabernacle of the congregation before the ark one night, had on it both buds, bloſſoms, and ripe almonds.

From Tharah the whole army removed to Methra, and thence to Eſmona, and thence to Moſeroth, (or Maſurit after St. Jerome) and from Moſeroth to Benejacon: and ſo to Gadgad, which Jerome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth manſion; where from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a river, which falleth into the Red ſea, between Madian and Ezion-gaber.

Now altho' it be very probable, that at Ezion-gaber, where Solomon furniſhed his fleets for the Eaſt-Indies, there was ſtore of freſh water; and tho' Herodotus, l. 3. maketh mention of a great river in Arabia the ſtony, which he calleth Corys, from whence, ſaith he, the inhabitants convey water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the king of Arabia relieved the army of Cambyſes: yet is Andrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding theſe ſprings at Gadgad, or Jetabata; being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth manſion. For it was at Punon, that thoſe ſprings are ſpoken of, which in Deut. x. 7. is alſo called Jetabata, or Jotbath, a land of running waters, and which by probability fall into the river Zared, the next adjoining. And that theſe ſprings ſhould fall into the Red ſea at Ezion-gaber, or Eloth, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers torrents of freſh water in thoſe ſandy parts of Arabia: which tho' they continue their courſe for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirſty ſand, before they can recover the banks of the Red ſea.

From Jetabata, Moſes directed his journey towards the Red ſea, and encamped at Hebrona; and from thence to Ezion-gaber: which city in Joſephus's time had the name of Berenice; and in Jerome's, Eſſia. From thence keeping the ſea and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the north, as he was by God commanded: [a]Ezion-gaber being the fartheſt place towards the ſouth-eaſt that Moſes travelled in that paſſage.

It ſeemeth that Ezion-gaber, or Azion-gaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in poſſeſſion of the kings of Edom. For it is ſaid, [b] That the Lord ſpake unto Moſes and Aaron in the mount Hor, near the coaſt of the land of Edom; ſo as the mount Hor was at that time on the border of Idumea. And if Ezion-gaber, and the other places near the Red ſea, had at this time been ſubject to the Idumeans, Moſes would have alſo demanded a free paſſage thro' them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained theſe places: for it is ſaid, [c] And they aroſe out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took men with them; which were thoſe companies that followed young Hadad of Idumea into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewiſe it is ſaid of Solomon, that he made a navy of ſhips in Ezion-gaber beſides Eloth, in the land of Edom.

SECT. V.

Of Moſes's arrival at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while they abode there.

FROM Ezion-gaber he turned again towards the north, and pitched in the wilderneſs of Zin, which is Kadeſh: or in Beroth, of the children of Jacan; where they ſat down in the firſt month of the fortieth year after they left Egypt. For at the next manſion Aaron died in the firſt day of the fifth month of the fortieth year: the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Ezion-gaber. And at this city of Kades (for ſo it was thought to be) or near it, died [d]Miriam, or Mary, Moſes's ſiſter, whoſe ſepulchre was to be ſeen in St. Jerome's time, as himſelf avoweth. From hence, ere they departed to mountain Hor, [e] all the people murmured moſt violently againſt Moſes, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of water. For neither the puniſhments by fire from heaven; by being devoured and ſwallowed up by the earth; by the ſudden peſtilence which often ſeiſed them; nor any miracle formerly ſhewing either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this nation any longer, than while they were full fed and ſatisfied in every of their appetites: but inſtead of ſeeking for help and relief at God's hands, when they ſuffered hunger, and thirſt, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed eſtates, and caſting ungratefully on Moſes all their miſadventures; yea, tho' they well knew, that their own fathers had left their bodies in the deſarts, and that they were now entered into the fortieth year, wherein all their miſeries were to take end. And being, as it were, in ſight of the land promiſed, they again as obſtinately tempted God as in former times, and neither truſted his promiſes, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purpoſes of God are without beginning; ſo his mercies being without end, he commanded [f] Moſes to ſtrike a rock adjoining with his rod; and the waters iſſued out in a great abundance, with which both themſelves and their cattle were ſatisfied. Nevertheleſs, becauſe God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moſes and Aaron, at this place: therefore he permitted mitted neither of them to enter the land promiſed; whereto perchance their worldly deſires might invite them. But it pleaſed him to end the travels of Aaron at the mountain Hor, being the next, and 34th ſtation. At which mountain of Hor, Aaron was deſpoiled of the garments of his prieſthood, and the ſame put on Eleazar his ſon, as God had commanded. Which done, Moſes and Eleazar deſcended the mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more ſeen.

Of this mountain called Hor, otherwiſe Moſera, as in Deut. x. 6. thoſe Horites took name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquiſhed. Some there are which make Moſera, which was the 27th manſion, and Moſera which they write Moſeroth for difference, which was the 34th manſion, and is alſo called Hor, to be two diſtinct places: becauſe Moſes, in paſſing from Cadesbarne towards Eſion-gaber, incamped at Moſera, after he departed from Heſmona, and before he came to Benjaacan. And this Moſera, which is alſo called Hor, he came unto after he left Cades, where [c] Miriam, Moſes's ſiſter died; the firſt being the 27th, and the ſecond being the 34th manſion. But for Hor, which is called Moſera, it ſhould have been written, Hor juxta Moſera, Hor near Moſera; for it is but one root of a mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: whereof the weſt part Moſes calleth Moſera, and the eaſt part Horeb. By the weſt part Moſes incamped, as he paſs'd towards the Red ſea, on his left hand; by the eaſt part, as he went back again northwards towards Moab: as in the deſcription of Moſes's paſſage thro' Arabia, the reader may perceive.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, becauſe Hor belonged to Edom, that Moſes ſent meſſengers to the prince of Idumea, praying him that he might paſs with the people of Iſrael thro' his territory into the land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neareſt way of all other from the city of Kadeſh, where Moſes then incamped; whereas otherwiſe taking his journey by the rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the paſſage of thoſe rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful kings, which commanded in thoſe regions. Now the better to perſuade the prince of Idumea hereunto, Moſes remembred him, that he was of the ſame race and family with Iſrael: calling him by the name of brother, becauſe both the Edomites and Iſraelites were the ſons of one father, to wit, Iſaac; inferring thereby, that he had more reaſon to favour and reſpect them, than he had to aſſiſt the Canaanites; againſt whom Eſau his anceſtor had made war, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient races deſcended of Cham) out of the region of Seir, calling it by his own name Edom, or Idumea. He alſo making a ſhort repetition of God's bleſſings beſtowed on them, and of his purpoſes and promiſes, aſſured Edom, or the king thereof, that he would no way offend his people, or waſte his country; but that he would reſtrain his army within the bounds of the common and king's highways, paying money for whatſoever he uſed, yea, even for the water, which themſelves or their cattle ſhould drink. For [b] Moſes was commanded by God not to provoke the children of Eſau. But the king of Edumea knowing the ſtrength of his own country, the ſame being near Canaan, rampard with high and ſharp mountains: and withal ſuſpecting, as a natural wiſe man, that 600000 ſtrangers being once entred his country, it would reſt in their wills to give him law, reſolvedly [c] refuſed them paſſage, and delivered this anſwer to the meſſengers: That, [d] if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and reſiſt them by all poſſible means. And not knowing whether ſuch a denial might ſatisfy or exaſperate, he gathered the ſtrength of his country together, and ſhewed himſelf prepared to defend their paſſage. For it is written: Then Edom came out againſt him (to wit, Moſes) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moſes conſidering, that the end of this enterpriſe was not the conqueſt of Seir or Edumea, and that the land promiſed was that of Canaan: like unto himſelf, who was of a natural underſtanding the greateſt of any man, and the skilfulleſt man of war that the world had, he refuſed to adventure the army of Iſrael againſt a nation, which, being overcome, gave but a paſſage to invade others; and which by reaſon of the ſeat of their mountainous country, could not but have endangered, or (at leaſt) greatly enfeebled the ſtrength of Iſrael, and rendred them leſs able, if not altogether powerleſs, to have conquered the reſt.

SECT. VI.

Of their compaſſing Idumea and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumea, turned himſelf towards the eaſt, and marched towards the deſarts of Moab. Which when Arad king of the Canaanites underſtood, and that Moſes had blanched the way of Edumea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom which Iſrael aimed at, he thought it ſafeſt, rather to find his enemies in his neighbour's country, than to be found by them in his own: which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moſes been inforc'd firſt to have made his way by the ſword thro' Idumea, and thereby, tho' victorious, greatly have leſſened his numbers. But altho' it fell out otherwiſe than Arad hoped for, yet being reſolved to make trial what courage the Iſraelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home, leading the ſtrength of his nation to the edge of the deſart, he ſet upon ſome part of the army; which, for the multitude, occupied a great ſpace, and for the many herds of cattle that they drave with them, could not incamp ſo near together, but that ſome quarter or other was evermore ſubject to ſurpriſe. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he ſlew ſome few of the Iſraelites, and carried with him many priſoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his predeceſſor, which joined his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an [e] overthrow to thoſe mutinous Iſraelites, which without direction from God by Moſes would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it ſeemeth that the greateſt number of that army were of the Canaanites, becauſe in the firſt of Deut. 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are ſaid to have beaten the Iſraelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the ſame that had a victory over Iſrael near Cadesbarne, or if it were his predeceſſor that then prevailed, this man finding that Moſes was returned from the Red ſea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the ſouth part of Canaan was firſt to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moſes's purpoſe to compaſs Moab, determined while he was yet in the deſart to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the 3d verſe of the xiith chapter of Numbers, that the Iſraelites utterly deſtroy'd

the Canaanites and their cities, they are much miſtaken that think, that this deſtruction was preſently performed by the Iſraelites. But it is to be underſtood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joſhua. For had Moſes at that time entred Canaan in the purſuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the deſarts of Zin and Moad, and have fetched a weariſome and needleſs compaſs, by the rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it ſelf, but that his territory lay without it, and near the mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the ſouth borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the ſouth of the land of [a] Canaan that Arad dwelt: which ſouth part of Canaan was the north part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for ſo far the Iſraelites after their victory purſued the Canaanites) is ſeated in the ſouth of Judea. There is alſo a city of that name in Simeon. But there is no ſuch place to the ſouth of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed preſently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the ſame was obtained in the future, and in Joſhua's time, and not at the inſtant of Arad's aſſault. For had the Iſraelites at this time ſack'd the cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great cities, there is alſo water and bread. But it was in the time of Joſhua, that the Iſraelites took their revenge, and after they had paſs'd Jordan: Joſhua then governing them; who in the xiith chapter and 14th verſe, nameth this Arad by the name of his city ſo called; and with him the king of Horma: to which place the Iſraelites purſued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongſt thoſe kings, which he vanquiſhed and put to death.

Now after this aſſault and ſurpriſe by Arad, Moſes finding that all entrance on that ſide was defended, he led the people eaſtward to compaſs Idumea and the Dead ſea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the plains of Moab, at that time in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites. But the Iſraelites, to whom the very name of a deſart was terrible, began again to rebel againſt their leader; till God by a multitude of fiery ſerpents (that is, by the biting of ſerpents, whoſe venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterwards, according to his plentiful grace, cured them again by their beholding an artificial ſerpent, by his commandment ſet up.

From the mount Hor, Moſes leaving the ordinary way, which lieth between the Red ſea and Coleſyria, incamped at Zalmora: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the brazen ſerpent; making theſe journies by the edge of Edumea, but without it. For Phunon was ſometime a principal city of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers xxi. 4. That from mount Hor, they departed by the way of the Red ſea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Iſraelites turned back towards the Red ſea; neither did they march (according to Fonſeca) per viam, quæ habet a latere mare rubrum, by the way that ſided the Red ſea; but indeed they croſs'd, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the countries of Moab to the Red ſea, that is, to Eſion-gaber; Eloth and Midian: which way, as it lay north and ſouth, ſo Iſrael, to ſhun the border of Edom, and to take the utmoſt eaſt part of Moab, croſs'd the common way towards the eaſt, and then they turned again towards the north, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the territory of Moab, adjoining to the land of Suph, a country bordering on the Dead ſea; and from thence to Abarim, the 38th manſion, that is, where the mountains ſo called take beginning, and are as yet but ſmall moutains of hills, on the eaſt border of Moab; from whence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the river of Zared, which riſeth in the mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead ſea, not far from Petra the metropolis thereof, being the 39th ſtation. And having paſs'd that river, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the cities of Moab; which Jeremy (chap. xlviii. ver. 22.) calleth the Houſe of Diblathaim, the ſame which afterwards was deſtroy'd among the reſt by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the river of Arnon, and incamped in the mountains of Abarim: tho' in Numbers xxii. Moſes doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but ſpeaketh of his remove from the river of Zared, immediately to the other ſide of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites: ſpeaking, as he found the ſtate of the country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, king of the Amorites: even from the predeceſſor of Balac-Peor then reigning. From Diblathaim, Moſes ſent meſſengers to Sehon king of the Amorites, to deſire a paſſage thro' his country: which tho' he knew would be denied him, yet he deſired to give a reaſon to the neighbour nations, of the war he undertook. And tho' Edom had refuſed him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moſes alſo in ſending meſſengers to Sehon obſerved the ſame precept, which he left to his poſterity, and ſucceſſors, for a law of the war, namely in Deut. xx. 10. in theſe words, When thou comeſt near unto a city to fight againſt it, thou ſhalt offer it peace, which if it do accept of and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and ſerve thee; but if it refuſe, &c. thou ſhalt ſmite all the males thereof with the edge of the ſword. Which ordinance all commanders of armies have obſerved to this day, or ought to have done.

Of the book of the battles of the Lord, mentioned in this ſtory, and of other books mentioned in ſcripture which are loſt.

NOW concerning the war between Iſrael and Sehon, Moſes ſeemeth to refer a great part of this ſtory to that book, entitled, [b] Liber bellorum Domini; The book of God's battles; and therefore paſſeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva tranſlation are theſe: Wherefore it ſhall be ſpoken in the book of the battles of the Lord, what things he did in the Red ſea, and in the rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copy differeth not in ſenſe from this: but the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect, [c] For thus it is ſaid in the book: the war of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. Junius, for the Red ſea, which is in the Geneven, and Vulgar edition, names the region of [d] Suph, a country bordering the Dead ſea towards the eaſt, as he conjectureth. The text he readeth thus. Idcirco dici ſolet in recenſione bellorum Jehovæ, contra Vahebum in regione Suph: & contra flumina, fluminaque Arnonis; Therefore it is ſpoken in repeating of the battles of Jehovah, againſt Vaheb in the country of Suph: and againſt the rivers, the rivers of Arnon. In which words he underſtands, that amongſt the wars which the Lord diſpoſed for the good of the [a] Iſraelites, there was in thoſe times a famous memory in the mouth of moſt men, concerning the war of Sehon againſt Vaheb the king of the Moabites, and of his winning the country near Arnon, out of the poſſeſſion of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate predeceſſor of Balac, who lived with Moſes: though it be written that this Balac was the ſon of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For it ſeems (as it is plain in the ſucceſſion of the [b] Edomites) that theſe kingdoms were elective and not ſucceſſive. And as Junius in this tranſlation underſtandeth no ſpecial book of the battles of the Lord: ſo others, as Vatablus in his annotations, doubt whether in this place any ſpecial book be meant; and if any; whether it be not a prediction of wars in future ages, to be waged in theſe places, and to be written in the book of Judges. Siracides, cap. xlvi. tells us plainly, that thoſe battles of the Lord were fought by Joſhua. Who was there (ſaith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battles of the Lord. But ſeeing the hiſtories of the ſcripture elſewhere often paſs over matters of great weight in few words, referring the reader to other books, written of the ſame matter at large: therefore it ſeemeth probable, that ſuch a book as this there was; wherein the ſeveral victories by Iſrael obtained, and alſo victories of other kings, making way for the good of the Iſraelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the ſame ſhould now be wanting, it is not ſtrange, ſeeing ſo many other volumes, filled with divine diſcourſe, have periſhed in the long race of time, or have been deſtroy'd by the ignorant and malicious heathen magiſtrate. For the books of Henoch, howſoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now ſuſpected, are remembred in an epiſtle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen περὶ ἀρχῶν; and by Tertullian.

That work alſo of the patriarch Abraham, of formation, which others beſtow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The books remembred by Joſhua, chap. x. ver. 13. and in the 2d of Samuel, chap. i. ver. 18. called the Book of Jaſher, or Juſtorum, is alſo loſt; wherein the ſtay of the ſun and moon in the midſt of the heavens is recorded, and how they ſtood ſtill, till Iſrael had avenged themſelves of their enemies: out of which alſo David took the precept of teaching the children of Juda, to exerciſe their bows againſt their enemies.

Some think this to be the book of eternal predeſtination, in which the juſt are written, according to Pſalm xlix. 28. where it is ſaid, Let them be put out of the book of life, neither let them be written with the righteous. [c] Jerome thinks, that David by this book underſtood thoſe of Samuel; Rabbi Solomon, that the books of the law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the juſt Abraham, of Iſaac, Jacob, and Moſes, are written; others, that it was the book of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a commentary upon Joſhua by an unknown author.

The book of Chozai, concerning Manaſſeh, remembred in the 2d of Chron. xxxiii. 18, 19. Of this book, alſo loſt, [d] Jerome conceives that the prophet Iſaiah was the author.

The ſame miſchance came as well to the ſtory of Solomon, written by Ahia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the kingdom of Iſrael from the ſon of Solomon: as to the books of Nathan the prophet, and to thoſe of Jeedo and Seer, remembred in the 2d of Chron. ix. 29. with theſe have the books of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the 2d of Chron. xii. 15. periſhed: and that of Jehu the ſon of Hanani, of the acts of Jehoſaphat, cited in the 2d of Chron. xx. 34. Alſo that book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Haſcirim, of 5000 verſes, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum only remaineth, 1 Kings iv. 32. and with this divers others of Solomon's works have periſhed, as his book of the natures of trees, plants, beaſts, fiſhes, &c. 1 Kings iv. 33. with the reſt remembred by Origen, Joſephus, Jerome, Cedrenus, Ciccus Aſculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of theſe and other books many were conſumed with the ſame fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the temple of Jeruſalem. But let us return thither where we left.

SECT. VIII.

Of Moſes's ſparing the iſſue of Lot: and of the giants of thoſe parts: and of Sehon and Og.

WHEN Moſes had paſt Arnon, he incamped on the other ſide thereof at Abarim, oppoſite to the city of Nebo, leaving the city of Midian on his left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that ſide. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the ſouth ſide of Arnon, having loſt all his ancient and beſt territory, which was now in the poſſeſſion of Sehon the Amorite. For [e] Moſes was commanded by God not to moleſt Moab, neither to provoke them to battel, God having given that land to the children of Lot; the ſame which was anciently poſſeſs'd by the Emims, who were men of great ſtature, and comparable to thoſe giants called Anakims, or the ſons of Anac.

God alſo commanded Moſes to ſpare the Ammonites, becauſe they likewiſe were deſcended of Lot: who had expelled from thence thoſe giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it ſeemeth that all that part, eſpecially to the eaſt of Jordan, even to the deſart of Arabia, as well on the weſt, as on the eaſt ſide of the mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by giants. And in the plantation of the land promiſed, the Iſraelites did not at any time paſs thoſe mountains to the eaſt of Baſan, but left their country to them, as in the deſcription following is made manifeſt. We find alſo, that as there were many giants both before and after the flood: ſo theſe nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the land it ſelf, had among them many families of giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which ſometimes was called the city of Arbah, which Arbah in [f] Joſhua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greateſt man of the Anakims. There had alſo been giants in the land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chief city was Aroer or Ar, near the river of Arnon. To the giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the ſame ancient Canaanites: and their chief city was Rabba, afterwards Philadelphia. They were alſo called Zuzims, which is as much to ſay, as Viri robuſti, horrendique gigantes; Strong men, and fearful giants, who inhabited other cities of Ham, or Hom, in the ſame province, and not far to the north of Aroer.

Now Moſes having paſs'd Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) ſent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a paſſage through his country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conqueſt upon Vaheb the Moabite, which nation the Amorites eſteemed but as ſtrangers and uſurpers (themſelves being of the ſons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refuſed to grant Iſrael any entrance that way; and withal prepared to encounter Moſes with as much ſpeed as he could, becauſe Moſes incamped in the country of his new conqueſts, to wit, the plains of Moab, the 42d and laſt manſion: which Moſes waſted with the multitude of his people and cattle. Towards him therefore haſting himſelf, they encountred each other at Jahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and diſcomfited: and the victory ſo purſued by Moſes, as few or none of the Amorites eſcaped. He alſo ſlaughtered all the women and children of the Amorites, which he found in Eſſebon, and all the other cities, villages, or fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as thoſe of Baſan alſo were: and deſcended of Emoreus or Amoreus: for [a] Moſes calleth the Baſanites alſo Amorites. And altho' Iſrael might now have taken a ready way and paſſage into Judea, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perilous to leave ſo great a part of that nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the region of Baſan or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his army to invade Og, a perſon of exceeding ſtrength and ſtature, and the only man of mark remaining of the ancient giants of thoſe parts, and who at that time had 60 cities walled and defenced: lying between the mountain of Hermon (which mountain, ſaith Moſes, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the river of Jordan. And it befell unto the king of Baſan (who attended Moſes's coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sihon: for he and his ſons periſhed, and all his cities were taken and poſſeſſed. After this, Moſes withdrawing himſelf back again to the mountains of Abarim, left the proſecution of that war unto Jair the ſon of Manaſſeh: who conquering the eaſt parts of Baſan, to wit, the kingdom of Argob, even unto the nations of the Geſſuri and Machati, 60 walled cities: called the ſame after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conqueſts afterwards the half tribe of Manaſſeh poſſeſs'd the north part as far as Edrei, but the eaſt part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Ruben and unto Gad.

SECT. IX.

Of the troubles about the Midianites, and of Moſes's death.

AFter theſe victories, and while Iſrael ſojourned in the valley of Moab, the Midianites and Moabites (over both which nations it ſeemeth that Balat king of the Moabites then commanded in chief) fought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by perſuading them to honour and ſerve their idols, to divide them both in love and religion among themſelves: thereby the better both to defend their own intereſt againſt them, as alſo to beat them out of Moab, and the countries adjoining. The Iſraelites, as they had ever been inclined, ſo were they now eaſily perſuaded to theſe evil courſes, and thereby drew on themſelves the plague of peſtilence, whereof there periſhed [b] 24000 perſons: beſides which puniſhment of God the moſt of the offenders among the Hebrews, were by his commandment put to the ſword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the ſon of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the plague ceaſed, and God's wrath was appeaſed. For ſuch was the love and kindneſs of his all-powerfulneſs, reſpecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in proſecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews became an idolater) as he forgave the reſt of Iſrael, and ſtay'd his hand for his ſake.

In this valley it was that Moſes cauſed the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to bear arms [c] 601730, of which at his laſt enterpriſe, he appointed 12000 to be choſen out, to invade the cities of Midian, who, together with the Moabites, practiſed with Balaam to curſe Iſrael: and after that ſought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worſhip of the true God, to the ſervice of Beth-Peor: and to the reſt of their barbarous idolatry. Over which companies of 12000 Moſes gave the charge to Phineas, the ſon of Eleazar the high prieſt: who ſlew the five princes of the [d] Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vaſſals of Sehon, as appeareth by [e] Joſhua. Theſe five princes of the Midianites ſlain by Eleazar, were at that time but the vaſſals of [f] Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba the dukes of Sehon, ſaith Joſhua. He ſlew alſo all the men, male-children, and women: ſaving ſuch as had not yet uſed the company of men, but thoſe they ſaved and diſpers'd them among the children of Iſrael to ſerve them.

And [g] Moſes having now lived 120 years, making both his own weakneſs of body known to the people, and his inability to travel: and alſo that he was forewarned of his end by the ſpirit of God: from whom he received a new commandment to aſcend the mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: he haſtned to ſettle the government in Joſhua: whom he perſuaded with moſt lively arguments to proſecute the conqueſt begun, aſſuring him of God's favour and aſſiſtance therein. And ſo having ſpent theſe his latter days after the conqueſt of Og and Sehon, kings of the Amorites, in the repetition and expoſition of the law (or an iteration of the law, according to [h] St. Auguſtine) uſing both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people: which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledge, love, fear, and ſervice, of the all-powerful God: he [i] bleſſed the twelve tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with ſeveral and moſt comfortable bleſſings: praiſing the greatneſs and goodneſs of him, unto whom in his prayers he commended them: he alſo commanded the prieſts to lay up the book of the law, by the ſide of the ark of God: the laſt that he indited was that prophetical ſong, beginning, [k] Hearken ye heavens and I will ſpeak, and let the earth hear the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and ſorrows of this life, unto that reſt which never afterwards hath diſquiet, he was buried in the land of [l] Moab, over againſt Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his ſepulchre to this day, which happened in the year of the world 2554.

SECT. X.

Obſervations out of the ſtory of Moſes, how God diſpoſeth both the ſmalleſt occaſions, and the greateſt reſiſtances, to the effecting of his purpoſe.

NOW let us a little, for inſtruction, look back to the occaſions of ſundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this ſtory of the life of Moſes, for (excepting God's miracles, his promiſe, and fore-choice of this people) he

wrought in all things elſe by the medium of mens affections, and natural appetites. And ſo we ſhall find, that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increaſe of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cauſe of the ſorrows and loſs, which befel himſelf, and the Egyptian nation: which numbers when he ſought, by cruel and ungodly policies, to cut off and leſſen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be ſlain, God (whoſe providence cannot be reſiſted, nor his purpoſes prevented by all the fooliſh and ſavage craft of mortal men) moved compaſſion in the heart of Pharaoh's own daughter, to preſerve that child, which afterwards became the moſt wiſe, and of all men the moſt gentle and mild, the moſt excellently learned in all divine and human knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppreſſed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his nation; even then, when he ſought by the ſtrength of his men of war, of his horſe and chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the duſt. The grief which Moſes conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own preſence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own nation, by threatning him to diſcover the ſlaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Midian: the contention between the ſhepherds of that place, and Jethro's daughters, made him known to their father: who not only entertained him, but married him to one of thoſe ſiſters: and, in that ſolitary life of keeping of his father-in-law's ſheep, far from the preſs of the world, contenting himſelf (tho' bred as a king's ſon) with the lot of a poor herdſman, God found him out in that deſart, wherein he firſt ſuffered him to live many years, the better to know the ways and paſſages thro' which he purpoſed that he ſhould conduct his people toward the land promiſed: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleaſure for his return into Egypt. The like may be ſaid of all things elſe, which Moſes afterwards by God's direction performed in the ſtory of Iſrael before remembred. There is not therefore the ſmalleſt accident, which may ſeem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no conſequence: but that the ſame is cauſed by God to effect ſomewhat elſe by; yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greateſt worldly importance, either preſently, or in many years after, when the occaſions are either not conſidered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the nations with whom the Iſraelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the men of renown in other nations, about the times of Moſes and Joſhua, with the ſum of the hiſtory of Joſhua.

SECT. I.

How the nations, with whom the Iſraelites were to have war, were divers ways, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the nations, with whom the Iſraelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the wilderneſs, or afterwards: we ſhall find them long before-hand, by the diſpoſing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in reſpect that they were moſt of them of the iſſue of Canaan, or at leaſt of Ham: and the reſt (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Iſmaelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Iſraelites ſtill continued ſtrangers, and ſeparate from them: and ſo partly in this reſpect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reaſon of diverſity in religion, were theſe nations, as it were, prepared to be enemies to the Iſraelites, and ſo to ſerve for ſuch purpoſes as God had reſerved them for. To make theſe things more manifeſt, we muſt underſtand, that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the north, by the ſame mountains continued as far as the ſprings of Arnon on the eaſt: by the way of Egypt, and the Red ſea on the ſouth, and by the Mediterranean ſea on the weſt: was inhabited and peopled by two nations, the one ſpringing from the ſons of Cham, the other from Sem: but thoſe of Sem, were but as ſtrangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with [a] one family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greateſt part were the Canaanites, the ancient lords and poſſeſſors of thoſe territories, by proceſs of time divided into ſeveral families and names: whereof ſome of them were of eminent ſtature and ſtrength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. Theſe (as men moſt valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter borders and mountains of their countries: the reſt were the Zidonians, Jebuſites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the ſons of Canaan, and after whom the country in general was ſtill called.

As for the Hebrews which deſcended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another family, and ſtrangers in that country: eſpecially the Iſraelites, and this was ſome cauſe why the Canaanites did not affect them, or endure them: no more than the Philiſtines did, who deſcended alſo of Cham by Mizraim. For tho' Abraham himſelf being a ſtranger was highly eſteemed and honoured among them, eſpecially by the Amorites inhabiting the weſt part of Jordan: yet now even they which deſcended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in thoſe parts, were alienated in affections from the Iſraelites: as holding them ſtrangers and intruders: [b] making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the reſt of the iſſue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity: than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that theſe nations deſcended of [c] Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themſelves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had ſo far poſſeſſed themſelves of the borders of thoſe regions, as they began to be equal in ſtrength to the bordering Canaanites, if not ſuperiour. For of Lot came thoſe two great families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Eſau the Idumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Iſmael, the eldeſt ſon of Abraham, came the Iſmaelites, with whom are joined, as of the ſame nation, the Amalekites, whom tho' the more common opinion thinketh to have been a tribe of Edom, becauſe Eſau had a grandchild of that name, yet manifeſt reaſon convinceth it to have been otherwiſe. For the Iſraelites were forbidden to provoke the [d] Edomites, or do them any wrong, whereas contrariwiſe Amalek was curſed, and endleſs war decreed againſt him: but hereof more elſewhere, Chap. viii. Sect. iii. Of [b] Exod. 17. 16. [c] Deut. 11. 5. [d] Deut. 11. 5.

[a] Iſmael's eldeſt ſon, Naboth, ſprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathæi. Now even as Abraham beſought God to bleſs Iſmael, ſo it pleaſed him both to [b] promiſe and perform it. For of him thoſe twelve princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that tract of land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur, which is the weſt part of the deſart of Arabia Petræa. Yet howſoever the ſtrength of theſe later named nations, which deſcended from Abraham, were great yet it is not unlikely but that ſome reaſon which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Iſraelites into Canaan, was in reſpect of fear: becauſe all princes and ſtates do not willingly permit any ſtranger or powerful nation to enter their territories. Wherefore, tho' all theſe families before named, were not ſo united, in and among themſelves, but that they had their jealouſies of each other, and contended for dominion; yet fearing a third more ſtrong than themſelves, whether they ſtood a-part, or united, they were taught by the care of their own preſervation, to join themſelves together againſt Iſrael; tho' they did it nothing ſo maliciouſly and reſolvedly as the Canaanites did. For the Idumeans only denied the Hebrews a paſſage: which the Moabites durſt not deny: becauſe their country lay more open; and becauſe themſelves had lately been beaten out of the richeſt part of their dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their country lay altogether out of the way, and the ſtrength of Sehon and Og, kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and beſides that, the [c] border of the Ammonites was ſtrong by reaſon of the mountains which divided it from Baſan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reaſon not much to interrupt Iſrael, in the conqueſt of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate: was, that the Moabites might hope after ſuch time as the Amorites were beaten by Moſes, that themſelves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the valleys and plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: but as ſoon as Sehon was ſlain, and that the king of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moſes allotted that valley to the tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practiſe with Balaam againſt Iſrael, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforeſaid, to allure them to idolatry. And thus at length the Moabites by ſpecial occaſion were more and more ſtirred up to enmities againſt Iſrael. And as for divers of the reſt that were deſcended from Abraham's kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the authors of their pedigrees, God permitted ſome enmity to be as it were preſages of future quarrels, which in the poſterity might be the eaſier incenſed by the memory of old grudges: and withal by ſome diſdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Iſhmaelites being deſcended from the eldeſt ſon of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldeſt ſon of Iſaac, Jacob being but a ſecond ſon of a ſecond brother, thoſe princes which were deſcended of the elder houſes, being natural men, might ſcorn to give place, much leſs to ſubject themſelves to their inferiours, as they took it; and for a more aggravation, the iſſues of Eſau, princes of Idumea, might keep in record, [d] that their parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was [e] deceived of his father's bleſſing alſo by him; and that [f] Jacob after reconciliation came not unto him, as he promiſed, unto Seir, or Idumea.

So alſo in the poſterity of Iſhmael, it might remain as a ſeed, or pretence of enmity, that their forefather was by the inſtigation of Sarah caſt out into the deſart, with his mother Hagar; and had therein periſhed, but that it pleaſed God by his angel to relieve them. Iſhmael alſo had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalek was alſo an Horite by his mother; which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Idumeans alſo, or Edomites, were by their maternal line deſcended of the Canaanites. For [g] Eſau took two wives of that nation: one of them was Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and the other Aholibamah the grand-child of Zibeon the Hevite, lord of Seir, before the ſame was conquered by Eſau, and called after his name Edom, or Edumea.

Laſtly, It appears that all thoſe families of the Iſhmaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceſs of time corrupted, and drawn from the knowledge and worſhip of God, and became idolaters, infected and ſeduced by the converſation of thoſe people among whom they dwelt, and by thoſe wives of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites, and thoſe Midianites which inhabited on the edge of the Red ſea, whereof Jethro was prieſt, or prince, or both, worſhipped the true and everliving God.

SECT. II.

Of the kings of the Canaanites and Midianites, mentioned in the ancient wars of the Iſraelites.

OF the kings of the Canaanites, deſcended of Cham for (Melchizedeck may be thought to be of a better pedigree) we find four named by Moſes, and thirty one remembred by Joſhua, tho' few of theſe named, otherwiſe than by theſe cities over which they commanded; to which each of them had a ſmall territory adjoining, and no other dominion. Theſe Canaanites in a general conſideration are to be underſtood for all thoſe nations deſcended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebuſites, Amorites, Gergeſites, Hevites, &c. and ſo here we underſtand this name in ſpeaking of the kings of the Canaanites: and ſo alſo we call the country of their habitation, the holy land, or the land of promiſe: for God hath appointed that the ſeven principal families ſhould be rooted out: and that his own people ſhould inherit their lands and cities. But if we conſider of the name and nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan on the eaſt, and by the Mediterranean ſea on the weſt: in which narrow country, and in the choiceſt places thereof, thoſe Canaanites which held their paternal name, chiefly inhabited.

The firſt kings of theſe nations, named in the ſcriptures, was [h] Hamor, or Hemer, of the Hevites, whom Simeon and Levi ſlew, together with his ſon Sichem, in revenge of their ſiſter's raviſhment.

Arad was the ſecond king which the ſcriptures have remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the ſouth, neighbouring Edom and the dead ſea; the ſame which ſurprized Iſrael, as they encamped in the [i] wilderneſs in the edge of Idumea.

The third named, was Sehon king of Eſſebon, who before Moſes's arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the weſt part of Arabia Petræa, or Nabathea, and thruſt them over [k] Arnon into the deſarts, the ſame whom Moſes overthrew in the plains of Moab; at which time he took Eſſebon, and all the cities of the Amorites.

Preſently after which victory, [l] Og was alſo ſlain by Iſrael, who commanded the north part of that valley between the mountains Traconi, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was alſo a king of the [m] Amorites.

The

The fifth was Adonizedek, king of the Jebuſites, and of Jeruſalem, with whom Joſhua nameth four other kings.

Hoham king of Hebron.
Piram king of Jarmuth.
Japia king of Lachis, and Deber king of Eglon; who were all [a] Amorites, overthrown in battle, and hanged by Joſhua. After this overthrow, Joſhua nameth Jabin king of Hazor, and Jobab king of Madon; whom he alſo ſlaughtered, and took his cities: and this Jabin ſeemed to have ſome dominion over the reſt, for it is ſaid in the text, [b] For Hazor before time was the head of all thoſe kingdoms.

After theſe Adonibezek that notorious tyrant is named; who confeſſed that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of ſeventy kings, inforcing them to gather crumbs under his table: who, after [c] Juda and Simeon had uſed the ſame execution upon himſelf, acknowledged it to be a juſt revenge of God: this king was carried to Jeruſalem, where he died.

The laſt king named is Jabin the ſecond, who as it ſeemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joſhua. For at ſuch time as he employed Siſera againſt Iſrael, whom he oppreſſed twenty years, after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, [d] Barak (encouraged by Deborah) overthrew; and his captain Siſera had by Jael, the wife of [e] Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he ſlept in her tent; Jabin himſelf periſhing afterwards in that war.

The Madianites had alſo their kings at times, but commonly mixt with the [f] Moabites; and they held a corner of land in Nabathea, to the ſouth-eaſt of the dead ſea. They deſcended from Madian, Abraham's ſon by [g] Keturah. Raguel ſurnamed Gethegleus or Jethres, ſaith Joſephus, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the firſt of Judges, the ſon of Dathan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Jokſham, the great grand-child of Abraham by [h] Keturah, was prieſt or prince of the Madianites by the Red ſea, whoſe daughter or niece Moſes married; and of whom I have ſpoken elſewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the ſame with Hobab, muſt be his father: and this Hobab had ſeven daughters. He guided Moſes in the wilderneſs, and became one of the Iſraelites: of him deſcended the Kenites, ſo called of his father [i] Raguel's ſurname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the ſecond, even now remembred.

At ſuch time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Iſrael, gave them warning to ſeparate themſelves: and yet the [k] Kenites had ſtrong ſeats, and lived in the mountains of the deſarts.

The kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were theſe.

1. Hemor the Hevite of Sichem.
2. Arad of the ſouth parts.
3. Sehon of Eſſebon.
4. Og of Baſon.
5. Adonizedek the Jebuſite, king of Jeruſalem.
6. [l] Hoham of Hebron.
7. Piram of Jarmuth.
8. Japia of Lachis.
9. Debir of Eglon.
10. Jabin of Hazor.
11. [m] Jobab of Modon.
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the ſecond king of Hazor.

Of the MADIANITES theſe:

[n] Evi or Evis.
Rekam or Recem, who built Petra, the metropolis of Petræa, ſo called by the Greeks: and by Iſaiah xvi. 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and ſo alſo it is called 2 Reg. xiv. 7. where it is alſo called Joktheel.

Zur.
Hur, and
Reba.
[o] Oreb.
Zeb.
Zebah.
Zalmunna.

After the death of Barac, judge of Iſrael, the four laſt named of theſe Madianite kings, vexed Iſrael ſeven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and ſlain by the Ephraimites, at the paſſage of Jordan, as in the 6th, 7th, and 8th of Judges it is written at large. Afterwards in the purſuit of the reſt, Gideon himſelf laid hands upon Zebah and Zalmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being priſoners; in which expedition of Gideon there periſhed 120000 of the Madianites, and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will ſpeak hereafter in the deſcription of their territories.

SECT. III.

Of the Amalekites and Iſhmaelites.

OF the kings of the Amalekites, and Iſhmaelites, I find few that are named; and tho' of the Iſhmaelites there were more in number than of the reſt (for they were multiplied into a greater nation, according to the promiſe of God made unto [p] Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites, were numbered among them, were more renowned in [q] Moſes's time than the reſt of the Iſhmaelites. So alſo were they when Saul governed Iſrael. For Saul purſued them from Sur into Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the deſart. The reaſon to me ſeemeth to be this: That the twelve princes which came of Iſhmael, were content to leave thoſe barren deſarts of Arabia Petræa, called Shur, Paran and Sin, to the iſſue of Abraham by Keturah, that joined with them (for ſo ſeem the Amalekites to have been, and ſo were the Midianites:) themſelves taking poſſeſſion of a better ſoil in Arabia the happy, and about the mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petræa. For Nabaioth, the eldeſt of thoſe twelve princes, planted that part of Arabia Petræa, which was very fruitful, tho' adjoining to the deſart, in which Moſes wandred, afterwards called Nabathea: the ſame which neighboureth Judea on the eaſt ſide. They alſo peopled a province in Arabia the happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathei, [b] changed into [p.]

Kedar, the ſecond of Iſhmael's ſons, gave his own name to the eaſt part of Baſan or Batanea which was afterwards poſſeſſed by Manaſſeh, ſo much thereof as lay within the mountains of Traconi, or Gilead. Which nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedræans.

Adbeel ſat down in the deſart Arabia, near the mountains which divided it from the happy; and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibſam was the parent of the Maſamancuſes, near the mountain Zamath, in the ſame Arabia the happy.

The Raabens were of Miſhma; who joined to the Orchens, near the Arabian gulf, where Ptolemy ſetteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumeans, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the city Dumeth ſometimes ſtood.

Of Maſſa the Maſſani; and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athritæ, who bordered the Napatheans in the ſame happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian mountains, where alſo the city of Thema is ſeated.

Of Jetur the Itureans, or Chamathens; of whom Tohu was king in David's time.

Of Naphri the [a] Nubeian Arabians; inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadezer commanded while David ruled Iſrael.

Cadma, the laſt and twelfth of Iſhmael's ſons, was the anceſtor of the Cadmoneans; who were afterwards called [b] Aſitæ, becauſe they worſhipped the fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gave their kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabians, Nabatheans, Aretas, as names of honour.

The Amalekites were the firſt that fought with Moſes, after he paſs'd the [c] Red ſea; when of all times they flouriſhed moſt, and yet were vanquiſhed.

Afterwards they joined with the [d] Canaanites, and beat the Iſraelites near Cades-barne. After the government of Othoniel, they joined them with the Moabites; after Barac with the Madianites, and invaded Iſrael. God commanded, that as ſoon as Iſrael had reſt, they ſhould root out the name of the Amalekites; which Saul executed in part, when he waſted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Havilah to Shur.

In [e] David's time they took Ziklag in Simeon: but David followed them, and ſurprized them, recovering his priſoners and ſpoils. And yet, after David became king, they again vexed him, but to their own loſs.

In Hezekiah's time as many of them as joined to [f] Idumea were waſted and diſplanted by the children of Simeon.

SECT. IV.

Of the inſtauration of civility in Europe about theſe times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THERE lived at this time, and in the ſame age together with Moſes, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily ſtrength, as in all ſorts of learning. And as the world was but even now enriched with the written law of the living God, ſo did art and civility (bred and foſtered far off in the eaſt, and in Egypt) begin at this time to diſcover a paſſage into Europe, and into thoſe parts of Greece neighbouring Aſia and Judea. For if Pelaſgus, beſides his bodily ſtrength, was choſen king of Arcadia, becauſe he taught thoſe people to erect them ſimple cottages, to defend them from rain and ſtorm: and learned them withal to make a kind of meal, and bread of Acorns, who before lived for the moſt part by herbs and roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched thoſe times were, and how falſly thoſe nations have vaunted of thoſe their antiquities, accompanied not only with civil learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the world, as both Euſebius and [g] St. Auguſtine have obſerved, that Prometheus flouriſhed: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formaſſe homines, quia optimus ſapientiæ doctor fuiſſe perhibetur; Of whom it is reported, that he formed men out of clay, becauſe he was an excellent teacher of wiſdom: and ſo Theophraſtus expoundeth the invention of fire aſcribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa ſapientiæ pertinere; To have reference to wiſe inventions: and [h] Eſchylus affirmeth, that by the ſtealing of Jupiter's fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the ſtars, and other celeſtial bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art ſo to uſe this fire, as thereby he gave life to images of wood, ſtone, and clay: meaning that before his birth and being, thoſe people among whom he lived had nothing elſe worthy men, but external form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the hill Caucaſus, his entrails the while devoured by an eagle, was meant the inward care and reſtleſs deſire he had to inveſtigate the natures, motions, and influences of heavenly bodies: for ſo it is ſaid; [i] Ideo altiſſimum aſcendiſſe Caucaſum, ut ſereno cœlo quam longiſſime aſtra, ſignorum obitus & ortus ſpectaret: That he aſcended Caucaſus, to the end that he might in a clear ſky diſcern a-far off, the ſettings and riſings of the ſtars: tho' Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwiſe, and others diverſly.

Of this man's knowledge Eſchylus gives this teſtimony.

[k] Aſt agebant omnia
Ut fors ferebat: donec ipſe reperi
Signorum obitus, ortuſque qui mortalibus
Sunt utiles: & multitudinem artium
His reperi: componere inde literas;
Matremque muſarum auxi ego memoriam
Perutilem cunctis, &c.

But fortune governed all their works, till when I firſt found out how ſtars did ſet and riſe:
A profitable art to mortal men:
And others of like uſe I did deviſe;
As letters to compoſe in learned wiſe
I firſt did teach: and firſt did amplify
The mother of the muſes memory.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 94 years after Ogyges. [l] Porphyrius ſays, that he lived at once with Inachus, who lived with Iſaac.

There lived alſo at once with Moſes, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the ſons of Japetus, of whom tho' it be ſaid, that they were born before Moſes's days, and therefore are by others eſteemed of a more ancient date; yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the world long after them. Beſides theſe ſons of Japetus, Æſchylus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus and Heſperus, who being famous in the weſt, gave name to the evening, and ſo to the evening-ſtar. Alſo beſides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the ſame name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that thoſe mountains which croſs Africa, to the ſouth of Morocco, Sus, and Hea, with the ſea adjoining took name, which memory Plato in Critias beſtows on Atlas, the ſon of Neptune.

and

Cicero, in the fifth of his Tuſculan queſtions, affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by thoſe names to expreſs divine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas ſuſtinere Cœlum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaſo, nec ſtellatus Cepheus cum uxore traderetur, niſi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxiſſet; Neither ſhould Atlas be ſaid to bear up Heaven, nor Prometheus to be faſtened to Caucaſus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be ſtellified, unleſs their divine knowledge had raiſed upon their names theſe erroneous fables.

Orpheus ſometimes expreſs'd Time by Prometheus, ſometimes he took him for Saturn; as Rheæ conjux alme Prometheu. But that the ſtory of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction; and that he lived about this time, the moſt approved hiſtorians and antiquaries, and among them Euſebius and St. Auguſtine have not doubted. For the great judgment which Atlas had in aſtronomy, ſaith [a] St. Auguſtine, were his daughters called by the names of conſtellations, Pleiades and Hyades: others attribute unto him the finding out of the moon's courſe, of which Archas the ſon of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Archas, Arcadia in Peloponneſus took name, and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the moon. [b] Et luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be underſtood, ſaith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obſervation of the moon's courſe; or of her working in inferiour bodies. And tho' there be that beſtow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Iſacius Tzetzes, a curious ſearcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Libya: who, beſides his gifts of mind, was a man of unequalled and incomparable ſtrength: from whom Thales the Mileſian, as it is ſaid, had the ground of his philoſophy.

SECT. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this age of the world, and while Moſes yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Theſſaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. [c] This Deucalion was the ſon of Prometheus, ſaith Herodotus, Apollonius, Heſiodus, and [d] Strabo. Heſiodus gave him Pandora for mother, the reſt Clymene: Homer, in the 15th of his Odyſſes, makes Deucalion the ſon of Minos; but he muſt needs have meant ſome other Deucalion; for elſe either Ulyſſes was miſtaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulyſſes, after his return from Troy, feigned himſelf to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was ſon to this latter Deucalion, the ſon of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken (for Idomeneus ſerved in that war) and this Deucalion the ſon of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moſes, was long before. In the firſt Deucalion's time happened that great inundation in Theſſaly: by which, in effect, every ſoul in thoſe parts periſhed, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and ſome few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Theſſaly, thoſe people exceeded in all kind of wickedneſs and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of God's vengeance, ſo did all that nation, for their foul ſins, periſh by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that general deſtruction by the flood univerſal. Only Deucalion and Pyrrha his wife, whom God ſpared, were both of them eſteemed to be lovers of virtue, of juſtice, and of religion. Of whom Ovid:

Non illo melior quiſquam, nec amantior æqui
Vir fuit: aut illâ reverentia ulla dearum.

No man was better, nor more juſt than he:
Nor any woman godlier than ſhe.

It is alſo affirmed that Prometheus foretold his ſon Deucalion of this overflowing, and adviſed him to provide for his own ſafety; who hereupon prepared himſelf a kind of veſſel, which Lucian in his dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And becauſe to theſe circumſtances, they afterwards add the ſending out of the dove, to diſcover the waters fall and decreaſe, I ſhould verily think that this ſtory had been but an imitation of Noah's flood deviſed by the Greeks, did not the times ſo much differ, and [e] St. Auguſtine, with others of the fathers, and reverend writers, approve this ſtory of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had theſe two of note, Helen, of whom Greece had firſt the name of Hellas; and Melantho, on whom Neptune is ſaid to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, ſo renowned among the heathen for the oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no leſs ſtrange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time alſo happened under Phaeton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Iſtria, a region in Italy, and about Cumæ, and the mountains of Veſuvius: of both which, the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many ſtrange fables.

SECT. VI.

Of Hermes Triſmegiſtus.

BUT of all other which this age brought forth among the heathen, Mercurius was the moſt famous and renowned: the ſame which was alſo called Triſmegiſtus, or Ter maximus: and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name: and how to diſtinguiſh, and ſet them in their own times, both St. Auguſtine and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was eſteemed the God of thieves, the God of wreſtlers, of merchants, and ſeamen, and the God of eloquence (tho' all by one name confounded) was not the ſame with that Mercury, of whoſe many works ſome fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries: of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worſhipped; one, the ſon of Nilus, whoſe name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury which ſlew Argos in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is ſaid to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them laws. But [f] Diodorus affirms, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato alſo confirmeth, ſaying, that letters were not found out by that Mercury which ſlew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwiſe Theuet; whom Philo Biblius writeth Taautus; the Egyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrians

Thot;

Thot; and the Greeks (as before) Hermes. [a] And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who lived about the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters. But St. Auguſtine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the ſon of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have ſlain Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the ſlayer of Argus, to be the grandchild of that Atlas which lived whilſt Moſes was yet young. And yet Lud. Vives upon St. Auguſtine ſeems to underſtand them to be the ſame with thoſe, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the reſt have remembred. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifeſt (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was tranſported out of Egypt, or Phenicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian, into Egypt. For they all confeſs that Cadmus brought letters firſt into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phenicia: it being true, that between Mercurius that lived at once with Moſes, and Cadmus, there were theſe deſcents caſt; Crotopus king of the Argives, with whom Moſes lived, and in whoſe time about his tenth year Moſes died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus who reigned 11 years; after him Danaus 50 years; after him Lynceus; in whoſe time, and after him in the time of Minos king of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moſes's time, flying out of Greece for the ſlaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of thoſe two Mercuries of Egypt, whom St. Auguſtine remembreth, the one the grandfather, the other the nephew or grandchild, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moſes found out letters, and taught the uſe of them to the Jews; of whom the Phenicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phenicians by Cadmus. But this invention was alſo aſcribed to Moſes, for the reaſon before remembred; that is, becauſe the Jews and the Phenicians had them firſt from him. For every nation gave unto thoſe men the honour of firſt inventors, from whom they received the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whoſe works he commenteth, to have been four deſcents after Moſes; which he hath out of [b] Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Moſes, the maternal grandfather of the firſt famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, calls the counſellor and inſtructor of that renowned Iſis, wife of Oſiris. But [c] Ficinus giveth no reaſon for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury inſtructed Iſis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that ſuch an inſcription was found on a pillar erected on the tomb of Iſis. Lud. Vives, upon the 26th chapter of the 8th book of St. Auguſtine de Civitate Dei, conceiveth that this Mercury, whoſe works are extant, was not the firſt which was entitled, Ter Maximus, but his nephew or grandchild. [d] Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phenician, who lived ſhortly after Moſes, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the ſcribe of Saturn, and called by the Phenicians, Taautus; and by the Egyptians, Thooth or Thoyt. It may be, that the many years which he is ſaid to have lived, to wit, 300 years, gave occaſion to ſome [e] writers to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by thoſe which have collected the grounds of the Egyptian philoſophy and divinity, he is found more ancient than Moſes: becauſe the inventor of the Egyptian wiſdom, wherein it is ſaid, that Moſes was excellently learned.

It is true, that altho' this Mercury, or Hermes, doth in his divinity differ in many particulars from the ſcriptures, eſpecially in the approving of images, which Moſes of all things moſt deteſted; yet whoſoever ſhall read him with an even judgment, will rather reſolve that theſe works which are now extant, were by the Greeks and Egyptian prieſts corrupted, and thoſe fooleries inſerted, than that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and ſpirit deviſed. For there is no man of underſtanding, and maſter of his own wits, that hath affirmed in one and the ſame tract, thoſe things which are directly contrary in doctrine and in nature. For out of doubt (Moſes excepted) there was never any man of thoſe elder times that hath attributed more, and in a ſtyle more reverend and divine, unto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if thoſe his two treatiſes, now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themſelves; I think it had not been perilous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moſes himſelf; and that the [f] Egyptian theology hereafter written, was deviſed by the firſt, and more ancient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joſeph the ſon of Jacob; whom, after the expoſition of Pharoah's dreams, they called Saphanet Phane, which is as much as to ſay, Abſconditorum Repertor, a finder out of hidden things. But theſe are over-adventurous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whoſoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this ſort: [g] Hic ſcripſit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus majeſtatem ſummi ac ſingularis Dei aſſerit, iiſdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos Deum & Patrem; He hath written many books belonging to, or expreſſing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the majeſty of the moſt High and One God, calling him by the ſame names of God, and Father, as we do. The ſame father alſo feareth not to number him among the ſibyls and prophets. And ſo contrary are theſe his acknowledgments to thoſe idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians, that for my ſelf, I am perſuaded, that whatſoever is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inſerted. For thus much himſelf confeſſeth: Deus omnium Dominus & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & ſpiritus; & omnia in ipſo, & ſub ipſo ſunt. Verbum enim ex ejus eſſe prodiens, perfectiſſimum exiſtens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (ſaith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountain, and life, and power, and light, and mind, and ſpirit: and all things are in him and under him. For his word out of himſelf proceeding, being moſt perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitful nature, made it alſo fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (ſaith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia Trinitate loquutus eſt: in Trinitate unum eſſe Deum aſſerens; Becauſe he ſpake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. Hic ruinam (ſaith Ficinus) prævidit priſcæ religionis, hic ortum novæ fidei, hic adventum Chriſti, hic futurum judicium, reſurrectionem ſæculi, beatorum gloriam, ſupplicia peccatorum. This Mercury foreſaw the ruin of the old or ſuperſtitious religion, and the birth of the new faith; and of the coming of Chriſt, the future judgment, the reſurrection, the glory of the bleſſed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will only add his two laſt ſpeeches reported by Calcidius the Platoniſt, and by Volteran out of Suidas. Hactenus fili pulſus a patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumque poſt paulum a vobis corporeis vinculis abſolutus diſceſſero, videtote ne me quaſi mortuum lugeatis: nam ad illam optimam beatamque civitatem regredior; ad quam univerſi cives mortis conditione venturi ſunt. Ibi namque ſolus Deus eſt ſummus princeps: qui cives ſuos replet ſuavitate mirifica; ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam exiſtimant, mors eſt potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O ſon, being driven from my country, I have lived a ſtranger and baniſhed man; but now I am preparing homeward again in ſafety. And when I ſhall after a few days (or in a ſhort time) by being looſed from theſe bonds of fleſh and blood depart from you, ſee that ye do not bewail me as a man dead; for I do but return to that beſt and bleſſed city, to which all her citizens (by the condition of death) ſhall repair. Therein is the only God, the moſt high and chief prince, who filleth or feedeth his citizens with a ſweetneſs more than marvellous; in regard whereof this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death, than a life. The other, and that which ſeemeth to be his laſt, is thus converted by others, agreeing in ſenſe, but not in words with Suidas. O cœlum magni Dei ſapiens opus, teque O vox patris quam ille primam emiſit, quando univerſum conſtituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus verbum & ſpiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miſeremini mei; I adjure thee, O heaven, thou wiſe work of the great God, and thee O voice of the father, which he firſt uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his only begotten Word and Spirit, comprehending all things, have mercy upon me.

But Suidas hath his invocation in theſe words; Obteſtor te Cœlum magni Dei ſapiens opus, obteſtor te vocem Patris quam locutus eſt primum cum omnem mundum firmavit, obteſtor te per unigenitum ſermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius eſto. I beſeech thee O heaven, wiſe work of the great God, I beſeech thee, O voice of the father, which he ſpake firſt when he eſtabliſhed all the world, I beſeech thee by the only begotten word, containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and ſome others that lived about thoſe times.

THere were alſo in this age both Eſculapius, which after his death became the God of phyſicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as [a] Vives thinks in his commentary upon Auguſtine, de Civitate Dei, l. 8. and alſo thoſe two notorious ſorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious art excelled all that ever have been heard of to this day: and yet Moſes himſelf doth not charge them with any familiarity with devils, or ill ſpirits; words indeed that ſeldom came out of his mouth; however by the Septuagint they are called Sophiſtæ or Veneficiand Incantatores, ſophiſt poiſoners, and inchanters: by Jerome, ſapientes & malefici, wiſe men and evil-doers: and ſo by Vatablus, who alſo uſeth the word Magi. The Greek it ſelf ſeems to attribute ſomewhat of what they did to natural magick; calling them [b] φαρμακους, workers by drugs. The Genevian, Sorcerers and Inchanters; Junius, Sapientes, Præſtigiatores & Magi. Magicians and wiſe-men here by him are taken in one ſenſe; and Preſtigiators are ſuch as dazel men's eyes, and make them ſeem to ſee what they ſee not; as falſe colours, and falſe ſhapes. But as ſome virtues and ſome vices are ſo nicely diſtinguiſhed, and ſo reſembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other (religion and ſuperſtition having one face and countenance) ſo did the works and workings of Moſes, and of Pharoah's ſorcerers, appear in outward ſhew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the ſame art and gift of knowledge. For the devil changeth himſelf into an angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the ways and workings of the moſt High. And yet on the contrary, every work which ſurmounteth the wiſdom of moſt men, is not to be condemned as performed by the help or miniſtry of ill ſpirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, as ſuch as where he alſo beſtoweth the knowledge to underſtand their hidden and beſt virtues, many things by them are brought to paſs, which ſeem altogether impoſſible, and above nature or art: which two ſpeculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabaliſts diſtinguiſhed by theſe names; Opus de Bereſith, & opus de Mercana: the one they call Sapientiam Naturæ, The wiſdom of nature: the other Sapientiam Divinitatis, The wiſdom of divinity: the one Jacob practiſed in the breeding the pied lambs in Meſopotamia; the other Moſes exerciſed in his miracles wrought in Egypt; having received from God the knowledge of the one in the higheſt perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other ſo far as it pleaſed God to portion him, both which he uſed to his glory that gave them; aſſuming to himſelf nothing at all, either in the leaſt or moſt. Alſo St. Auguſtine noteth that from the time that Moſes left Egypt, to the death of Joſhua, divers other famous men lived in the world, who after their deaths, for their eminent virtues and inventions, were numbred among the gods: as Dionyſius, otherwiſe Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the uſe of the vine in Attica: at which time alſo there were inſtituted muſical plays to Apollo Delphicus; thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrenneſs and ſcarcity upon that part of Greece, becauſe they reſiſted not the attempts of Danaus, who ſpoiled his temple and ſet it on fire: ſo did Erictbonius inſtitute the like games to Minerva; wherein the victor was rewarded with a preſent of oil, in memory of her that firſt preſs'd it out of the olive.

In this age alſo Xanthus raviſhed Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are alſo given to Jupiter by other hiſtorians. To theſe [c] St. Auguſtine addeth Hercules; the ſame to whom the 12 labours are aſcribed, native of Tyrinthia, a city of Peloponneſus: (or, as others ſay, only nurſed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and deſtroy'd many monſters there; being neither that Hercules, which Euſebius ſurnameth Delphin, famous in Phenicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philoſtratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifeſtum ſit, non Thebanum Herculem, ſed Egyptium ad Gades perveniſſe, & ibi finem ſtatuiſſe terræ (ſaith Philoſtratus, l. 2.) It is manifeſt that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the ſtreights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time alſo, while Moſes wandered in the deſarts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whoſoever they were, or how worthy ſoever they were that lived in the days and age of

[a] L. Vives in l. 8. Aug. de Civitate Dei, c. 26. [b] Exod. 9. 11. [c] Lib. De Civitate Dei, c. 12.

Moſes, there was never any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleaſed God to work greater things, whom he favoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he ſo often appeared; never any man more familiar and converſant with angels; never any more learned both in divine and human knowledge; never a greater prophet in Iſrael. He was the firſt that received and delivered the law of God entire; the firſt that left to poſterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God, his creating out of nothing the world univerſal, and all the creatures therein; that taught the deteſtation of idolatry, and the puniſhment, vengeance, and eradication which followed it.

[a] Syracides calleth Moſes the beloved of God and men, whoſe remembrance is bleſſed. He made him (ſaith the ſame author) like to the glorious ſaints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies, made him glorious in the ſight of kings, ſhewed him his glory, cauſed him to hear his voice, ſanctified him with faithfulneſs and meekneſs, and choſe him out of all men.

He is remembred among profane authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick; by Megaſtenes and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembred by Moſes, Eſtieus, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecatæus, Elanicus, Acuſilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the hiſtorian, confirm. The univerſal flood which God revealed unto Moſes, Beroſus, Nicolaus Damaſcenus, and others have teſtified. The building of the tower of Babel, and confuſion of tongues, Abydenus, Eſtieus, and Sybilla have approved. Beroſus alſo honoureth Abraham. Hecatæus wrote a book of him. Damaſcenus, before cited, ſpeaketh of Abraham's paſſage from Damaſcus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moſes. Eupolemon writeth the very ſame of Abraham which Moſes did. For, beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he ſaith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the city called Camerina, or Urien, excelled all men in wiſdom; and by whom the aſtrology of the Chaldeans was invented. Is juſtitia pietateque ſua (ſaith Euſebius out of the ſame author) ſic Deo gratus fuit, ut Divino præcepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibique habitaverit; For his juſtice and piety he was ſo pleaſing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phenicia, and dwelt there. Likewiſe Diodorus Siculus, in his 2d book and 5th chapter, ſpeaketh reverently of Moſes. There are many other among prophane authors, which confirm the books of Moſes, as Euſebius hath gathered in the 9th of his Preparation to the Goſpel, chapter the third and fourth, to which I refer the reader. Laſtly, I cannot but for ſome things in it commend this notable teſtimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moſes in theſe words. [b] Moſes enim affirmabat, docebatque, Ægyptios non recte ſentire, qui beſtiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemque Afros & Græcos, qui Diis hominum figuram affinxerunt: id vero ſolum eſſe Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod cœlum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cujus profecto imaginem, nemo ſanæ mentis, alicujus earum rerum, quæ penes nos ſunt, ſimilem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni ſimulachrorum effictione repudiata) dignum ei templum ac delubrum conſtituendum, ac ſine aliqua figura colendum. Moſes affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiſs, which attributed unto God the images of beaſts and cattle: alſo that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their gods the ſhapes of men; whereas that only is God indeed, which containeth both us the earth and ſea, which we call heaven, the world, and the nature of all things, whoſe image doubtleſs, no wiſe man will dare to faſhion out unto the likeneſs of thoſe things which are amongſt us; that therefore (all deviſing of idols caſt aſide) a worthy temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worſhipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wiſdom, for which the martyr Stephen commended Moſes, ſaying, [c] That Moſes was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in works and words; the ſame is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judæus, and Euſebius Cæſarienſis, and divided into four parts, viz. mathematical, natural, divine and moral.

In the mathematical part, which is diſtinguiſhed into geometry, aſtronomy, arithmetick, and muſick, the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For geometry, which is by interpretation, meaſuring of grounds, was uſeful unto them; becauſe it conſiſting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper lands and territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflown and confounded, ſo as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the ſecond part, to wit, aſtronomy, the ſite of the country being a level and ſpacious plain, free and clear from clouds, yielded them delight with eaſe, in obſerving and contemplating the riſings, fallings, and motions of the ſtars.

Arithmetick alſo, which is the knowledge of numbers, they ſtudied; becauſe without it, in geometry and aſtronomy, nothing can be demonſtrated or concluded. But of muſick they made no other account, nor deſired farther knowledge, than ſeemed to them ſufficient to ſerve and magnify their gods, their kings, and good men.

The natural part of this wiſdom, which handleth the principles, cauſes, elements, and operations of natural things, differs little from peripatetical philoſophy; teaching that materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mix'd bodies and living creatures have their being; that heaven is round like a globe; that all ſtars have a certain fovent heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that rains proceed and be from mutations in the air; that the planets have their proper ſouls, &c.

The divine part of this wiſdom, which is called theology, teacheth and believeth that the world had a beginning, and ſhall periſh; that men had their firſt original in Egypt, partly by means of the temperateneſs of that country, where neither winter with cold, nor ſummer with heat, are offenſive; and partly through the fertility that Nilus giveth in thoſe places: that the ſoul is immortal, and hath tranſmigration from body to body: that God is one, the father and prince of all gods; and that from this God, other gods are, as the ſun and moon, whom they worſhipped by the names of Oſiris and Iſis, and erected to them temples, ſtatues, and divers images, becauſe the true ſimilitudes of the gods is not known; that many of the gods have been in the eſtate of mortal men, and after death, for their virtues, and benefits beſtowed on mankind, have been deified. That thoſe beaſts, whoſe images and forms the kings did carry in their arms when they obtained victory, were adored for God's; becauſe under thoſe enſigns they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover, the Egyptian divines had a peculiar kind of writing, myſtical and ſecret, wherein the higheſt points of their religion and worſhip of God which was to be concealed from the vulgar ſort, were obſcured.

[a] Clemens diſtributeth the whole ſum of this latter Egyptian learning into three ſeveral ſorts, viz. Epiſtolar, which is uſed in writing common epiſtles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their prieſts; and Sacred, which ſacred containeth ſcripture of two kinds; the one proper, which is expreſſed by letters alphabetical in obſcure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written, The Ibis by the hornet participateth the beauty of the hawk; which is red thus: The moon doth by the ſun borrow part of the light of God; becauſe light is an image of divine beauty. The other ſymbolical, or by ſignatures, which is threefold, viz. imitative, tropical and enygmatical; imitative, which deſigneth things by characters, like to the things ſignified; as by a circle, the ſun; and by the horns of the moon, the moon itſelf: tropical or transferent, which applies the divers forms and figures of natural bodies or creatures, to ſignify the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods and of men. So with the Egyptian divines, the image of an hawk ſignifieth God; the figure of the hornet ſignifieth the ſun; the picture of the bird Ibis ſignifieth the moon; by the form of a man, prudence and ſkilfulneſs; by a lion, fortitude; by a horſe, liberty; by a crocodile, impudency; by a fiſh, hatred is to be underſtood. Enygmatical, is a compoſition or mixture of images or ſimilitudes; in which ſenſe, the monſtrous image of a lion's body having a man's head, was graven on their temples and altars, to ſignify, that to men all divine things are enygmatical and obſcure. So the image of the ſun ſet on the head of a crocodile (which liveth as well in the waters, as on land) expreſſeth, that the ſun nouriſheth meteors in the air, as well from the waters as from the earth. So a ſcepter, at the top whereof is made an eye, and an ear, ſignifieth God, hearing, ſeeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have been delighted with this kind of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, that when Darius ſending letters, threatned Idanthura, king of the Scythians, with the ruin and deſtruction of his kingdom, unleſs he would acknowledge ſubjection: Idanthura returned to him a mouſe, a frog, a bird, a dart, and a plough-ſhare; which Orontopagas, tribune of the ſoldiers, interpreted to ſignify, that by the mouſe, their dwellings; by the frog, their waters; by the bird, their air; by the dart, their weapons; by the plough their lands; were ſignified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their ſoveraign lord. But Xyphodres made another conſtruction, viz. that the king meant, that except Darius with his men did haſten away, as a bird thro' the air, or creep into holes as a mouſe, or run into the waters which they had paſſed as a frog, they ſhould not eſcape his arms, but either be ſlain, or (being made captives) till his grounds. The ſame hiſtory is with little difference reported by Herodotus, l. 4.

The fourth and laſt part which is moral and politick, doth contain eſpecially the laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, or Ter maximus deviſed; who in his books or dialogues of Pimander and Aſclepius, hath written ſo many things of God worthy of admiration; as well (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Chriſt, as of the laſt and fearful day of judgment: that (as ſaith the ſame author, the opinion being alſo ancient) he is not only to be accounted a philoſopher, but a prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his book of myſteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient hiſtorians for his authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menætus, affirmeth, thar this Mercury was not only the inventor of the Egyptian philoſophy, but of all other learning, called the wiſdom of the Egyptians, before remembred: and that he wrote of that ſubject 36525 books, or pages. Of which there were numbred of fiery ſpirits, 100 books; of aerial ſpirits as many; and of ſpirits celeſtial a thouſand: which becauſe they were out of the Egyptian language converted by certain learned philoſophers into the natural Greek, they ſeemed to have been firſt written in that tongue. [b] Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the books of Hermes, to wit, of the wiſdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36; of phyſick ſix books; of the orders of prieſts ten; and of aſtrology four.

SECT. VIII.

A brief of the hiſtory of Joſhua; and of the ſpace between him and Othoniel; and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of ſome cotemporaries to Joſhua; and of the breach of faith.

AFTER the death of Moſes, and in the one and fortieth year of the egreſſion, in the firſt month called Niſan, or March, Joſhua the ſon of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the ſpirit of wiſdom, took on him the government of Iſrael; God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to paſs the river of Jordan, and to poſſeſs and divide among the Iſraelites the land promiſed.

The beginning of Joſhua's rule, [c] St. Auguſtine dates with the reign of Amyntas, the eighteenth king in Aſſyria; with Corax the ſixteenth king in Sicyonia; when Danaus governed the Argives; and Erictbonius, Athens.

[d] Joſhua, imitating in all things his predeceſſor, ſent over Jordan certain diſcoverers to view the ſeat and ſtrength of Jericho, the next city unto him on the other ſide of the river, which he was to paſs over. Which diſcoverers being ſaved, and ſent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, becauſe ſhe kept a tavern or victualling houſe, made Joſhua know, that the inhabitants of Jericho, and thoſe of the country about it, hearing of the approach of [e] Iſrael, had loſt their courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the ſpies, which was the ſixth day of the one and fortieth year after the egreſſion, Joſhua removed from [f] Shittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his army to the banks of the river Jordan, and gave them commandment to put themſelves in order [g] to follow the ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the river; giving them withal this forcible encouragement, that they ſhould thereby aſſure themſelves of his favour and preſence, who is Lord of all the world, when the river of [h] Jordan ſhould be cut off, and divided, and the waters coming from above ſhould ſtand ſtill on a heap; whereby thoſe below towards the Dead ſea wanting ſupply, they might paſs over into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

He alſo commanded [i] Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manaſſeh, to prepare themſelves (according to their covenant made with Moſes) to march in the head of the reſt, and (as we call it in this age) to lead in the van-guard, which thro' all the deſarts of Arabia, from the mount Sinai to this place, thoſe of the tribe of Judah had performed. For theſe tribes being already provided of their habitations, and the country and cities of the Amorites, by the help of the reſt, conquered for them: it agreed with juſtice and equity, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manaſſeh ſhould alſo aſſiſt their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies poſſeſſion.

On the banks of Jordan they reſted themſelves from the ſixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the firſt month Niſan, or March, they paſs'd over to the other ſide, taking with them twelve ſtones from the dry ground in the midſt of the river: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they ſet up at Gilgal, on the eaſt ſide of the city of Jericho, where they encamped the firſt night. At which place [a] Joſhua gave commandment, that all born in the laſt fortieth year in the deſarts, [b] ſhould be circumciſed; which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof [c] St. Auguſtine giveth for cauſe, the people's contempt of their ſuperiors, [d] Thomas excuſeth it in this ſort; that the Iſraelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another; Damaſcen, that it was not needful by circumciſion to diſtinguiſh them from other nations, at ſuch time as they lived by themſelves and apart from all nations.

On the fourteenth day of the ſame month, the children of Iſrael celebrated the paſſover now the third time; firſt, At their leaving Egypt; ſecondly, At mount Sinai; and now at [e] Gilgal. After which being deſirous to taſte of the fruits of the country, and having, as it were, ſurfeited on manna, they parched of the corn of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and eat thereof.

And as Moſes began to diſtribute thoſe regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the land of the Amorites, which Og of Baſan, and Sihon held, ſo did Joſhua perform the reſt; and after a view and partition made of the territories, he gave to each tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and diſtribution was not done at once, but at three ſeveral times; firſt, By [f] Moſes to Gad, Reuben, and the half tribe of Manaſſeh, of the lands over Jordan; ſecondly, By Joſhua, to the tribe of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half tribe of Manaſſeh, about the fifth year of his government; proved in Joſhua xiv. 10. and a third diviſion was made to the other ſeven tribes at Shilo, where [g] Joſhua ſeated the Tabernacle of the congregation.

The victories of Joſhua againſt the kings of the Canaanites, are ſo particularly ſet down in his own books, as I ſhall not need to lengthen this part by their repetiton. In whoſe ſtory I chiefly note theſe particulars.

Firſt, How in the beginning of the war, thoſe little kings, or reguli of the Canaanites, had not ſo much underſtanding, as to unite themſelves together againſt the Iſraelites; but according to the cuſtom of thoſe eſtates, from whoſe governors God hath taken away all wiſdom and foreſight, they left thoſe of their own nation, which were next the invaders, to themſelves, and to their own defences; hoping that the fire kindled ſomewhat far off, might again have been quenched ere it could ſpread it ſelf ſo far as their own territories and cities. But after ſuch time as Jericho and Ai were entered, and the kings, people, and cities conſumed, five of thoſe thirty-one kings (all which at length periſhed in that war) joined themſelves together, firſt attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themſelves to Joſhua. Only five (the reſt looking on to ſee the ſucceſs) namely the king of the Jebuſites, in Jebus, or Jeruſalem, the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachis and Eglon addreſs'd themſelves for reſiſtance: whoſe army being by Joſhua ſurprized and broken, themſelves deſpairing to eſcape by flight, and hopeleſs of mercy by ſubmiſſion, creeping into a cave under ground, were thence by Joſhua drawn forth and hanged. In the proſecution of which victory he alſo took [h] Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam king of Gezar haſtned, and periſhed. After which Joſhua poſſeſſed himſelf of [i] Eglon, Heber, and Debir deſtroying theſe cities with their princes.

In the end, and when the ſouth countries were poſſeſſed, the cities thereof conquered, and their kings and people made duſt; the reſt of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counſels of neceſſity, united themſelves to make one groſs ſtrength and body of an army; which Jabin king of Hazor practiſed and gathered together, being at that time of all the Canaanite kings the moſt powerful; which army being by Joſhua diſcovered, as the ſame reſted near the lake of Merom, he uſed ſuch diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining an abſolute victory over them, he proſecuted the ſame to the utmoſt effect. And, beſides the ſlaughter of the defendants, he entered their cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reſerving the reſt for Iſrael to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Joſhua ſhewed himſelf a ſkilful man of war, for that in thoſe ancient times he uſed the ſtratagem of an ambuſh in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the armies of the firſt five kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by ſurprize: for he marched all night from his camp at [k] Gilgal, and ſet on them early the next day, when they ſuſpected no enemy at hand; as he did alſo at Merom, when he overthrew Jabin, and his confederates. After which, making the beſt profit of his victory, he aſſaulted the great city of Hazor.

Thirdly, The miracles which God wrought during this war, were exceeding admirable; as the ſtay of the river of Jordan at the ſprings, ſo as the army of [l] Iſrael paſs'd it with a dry foot; the fall of Jericho by the ſound of rams horns; the ſhowers of [m] hail-ſtones which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them periſhed, than by the ſword of Iſrael. Again, the arreſt of the ſun in the firmament, whereby the day was ſo much the more lengthened, as the Iſraelites had time to execute all thoſe which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work only proper to the All-powerful God.

Fourthly, Out of the paſſage between Joſhua and the Gibeonites, the doctrine of keeping faith is ſo plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evaſion, it admitteth no diſtinction, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiouſneſs, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called equivocation. For, notwithſtanding that theſe Gibeonites were a people of the [n] Hevites, expreſly and by name, by the commandment of God, to be rooted out, and notwithſtanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and, as it were, deride Joſhua, and the princes of Iſrael, by feigning to be ſent as ambaſſadors from a far country, in which travel their cloaths were worn, their bread mouldy, which they avowed to have been warm for newneſs when they firſt ſet out; their barrels and bottles of wine broken, their ſhoos patch'd, and their ſacks, rent and ragged: yet [o] Joſhua having ſworn unto them by the Lord God of Iſrael, he durſt not, tho' urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he ſpared both their lives, and the cities of their inheritance.

Now if ever man had warrant to break faith, and to retract his promiſe made, Joſhua had it. For firſt, The commandment which he received from God to root out this nation among the reſt, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, He might juſtly have put theſe men to the ſword, and have ſack'd their cities; if there be any evaſion from a promiſe made, whereof the living God is called to witneſs. For it was not to the Gibeonites that he gave peace, becauſe he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the [a] Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a ſtrange people that he gave faith, and to a nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Iſrael had done in Egypt and over Jordan, ſought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, The accord which [b] Iſrael made with theſe crafty Canaanites was without warrant. For it is written in the ſame place, That the Iſraelites accepted their tale; that is, believed what they had ſaid, and counſelled not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, Theſe men, who were known idolaters, and ſerved thoſe puppets of the heathen, men of an apiſh religion, as all worſhippers of images are, could not challenge the witneſs of the true God, in whom they believed not. I ſay therefore, that if ever man might have ſerved himſelf by any evaſion or diſtinction, Joſhua might juſtly have done it. For he needed not in this caſe the help of equivocation, or mental reſervation. For what he ſware, he ſware in good faith; but he ſware nothing, nor made any promiſe at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithleſs ſubtility of man ſhould borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promiſes he made in the name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithſtanding that they to whom he had ſworn it, were worſhippers of the devil.

For it is not as faithleſs men take it, that he which ſweareth to a man, to a ſociety, to a ſtate, or to a king, and ſweareth by the name of the living Lord, and in his preſence, that this promiſe (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a ſociety, to a ſtate, or to a prince; but the promiſe in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect; we therein profeſs that we fear him not, and that we ſet him at naught and defy him. If he that without reſervation of honour giveth a lie in the preſence of the king, or of his ſuperiour, doth in point of honour give the lie to the king himſelf, or to his ſuperiour; how much more doth he break faith with God, that giveth faith in the preſence of God, promiſeth in his name, and makes him a witneſs of the covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a ſon to break the promiſe, will, or deed of the father; for a ſtate, or kingdom, to break thoſe contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick faith. For tho' it were 400 years after Joſhua, that Saul, even out of devotion, ſlaughtered ſome of thoſe people deſcended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgat not what the predeceſſors and fore-fathers of Saul and the Iſraelites had ſworn in his name, afflicted the whole nation with a conſuming famine; and could not be appeaſed, till ſeven of Saul's ſons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous diſtinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to ſwear one thing by the name of the living God, and to reſerve in ſilence a contrary intent: the life of man, the eſtates of men, the faith of ſubjects to kings, of ſervants to their maſters, of vaſſals to their lords, of wives to their husbands, and of children to their parents, and of all trials of right, will not only be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn aſunder. It is by oaths (when kings and armies cannot paſs) that we enter into the cities of our enemies, and into their armies. It is by oath that wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an oath thus powerful, but this: That he that ſweareth by the name of God, doth aſſure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the world is true, whom he calleth for a witneſs, and in whoſe preſence, he that taketh the oath hath promiſed? I am not ignorant of their poor evaſions, which play with the ſeverity of God's commandments in this kind: but this indeed is the beſt anſwer: That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whoſoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Chriſtians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greateſt, and had brought the caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only loſe it again, but were ſoon after beaten out of the Holy Land itſelf: by reaſon (ſaith William of Tyre, a reverend biſhop which wrote that ſtory) that Almerick the fiftieth king after Godfrey brake faith with the caliph Elhadeck, and his vicegerent, the ſoldan Sanar; who being ſuddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk, Syracon, to their aid; whoſe nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Chriſtians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden croſs (the very croſs, ſay they, that Chriſt died on) give them victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their laſt refuge; ſeeing they had foreſworn themſelves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy Ghoſt, [c] That he that ſpeaketh lies, ſhall be deſtroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, ſlayeth the ſoul: how much more perilous is it (if any peril be greater than to deſtroy the ſoul) to ſwear a lie? It was Eugenius the pope that perſuaded, or rather commanded the king of Hungary after his great victory over Amurath the Turk, and when the ſaid king had compelled him to peace, the moſt advantageous that ever was made for the Chriſtians, to break his faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the war. and tho' the ſaid king was far ſtronger in the field than ever; yet he loſt the battle with 30000 Chriſtians, and his own life. But I will ſtay my hand: for this firſt volume will not hold the repetition of God's judgments upon faith-breakers; be it againſt Infidels, Turks, or Chriſtians of divers religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-days is rather made a matter of cuſtom than of conſcience.

It is alſo very remarkable; that it pleaſed God to leave ſo many cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Iſrael, to ſcourge and afflict them, by foreſeeing their idolatry, and as it is ſaid in the ſcriptures, [d] To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make war. For theſe cities hereafter named, did not only remain in the Canaanites poſſeſſion all the time of Joſhua, but ſoon after his death, the [a] children of Dan were beaten out of the plain countries, and enforc'd to inhabit the mountains, and places of hardeſt acceſs. And thoſe of Judah were not able to be maſters of their own vallies; becauſe, as it is written in Judges i. 19. The Canaanites had chariots of iron. And thoſe principal cities which ſtood on the ſea-ſide, adjoining unto [b] Judah, were ſtill held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philiſtines; as Azzah, Gath, Aſdod, out of one of which cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manaſſeh over Jordan expel the [c] Geſhurites, nor the Maachathites; which inhabited the north parts of Baſan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nephtalims poſſeſs themſelves of Bethſhemiſh, nor of Bethanah; but they enforc'd thoſe Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did [d] Aſher expel the Zidonians, nor thoſe of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib, Heblah, Aphike, and Rehob, nor enforce them to a tribute.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. Alſo the Canaanites dwelt in [e] Gezer among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manaſſeh, on the weſt of Jordan, the Canaanites held [f] Bethſhean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megiddo; yea, Jeruſalem itſelf did the Jebuſites defend above four hundred years, even till David's time.

Now Joſhua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Iſrael, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expreſſed in the ſcriptures, which cauſeth divers to conjecture diverſly of the continuance. Joſephus gives him five and twenty years; Seder Ollam Rabbi, the author of the Hebrew chronology, eight and twenty; and Maſſeus ſix and twenty; Maimonius, cited by Maſſius, fourteen; Joannes Lucidus, ſeventeen; Cajetanus, ten; Euſebius giveth him ſeven and twenty, and ſo doth St. Auguſtine; Melanæthon, two and thirty; Codoman five and twenty. But whereas there paſſed 480 years from the deliverance of Iſrael out of Egypt, unto the building of the temple, it is neceſſary that we allow to Joſhua only eighteen of them, as finding the reſt ſupplied otherwiſe, which to me ſeems the moſt likely, and, as I think, a well approved opinion.

The ſame neceſſity of retaining preciſely 480 years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the temple, convinceth of error ſuch as have inſerted years between Joſhua and Othoniel, of whom [g] Euſebius finds eight years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reaſon in his four and twentieth and laſt chapters upon Joſhua: Bunting reckons it nine years, Bucholzer and Reuſner but one, Codoman twenty, and Nicephorus no leſs than three and thirty; whereas following the ſure direction of theſe 480 years, there can be no void years found between Joſhua and Othoniel, unleſs they be taken out of thoſe eighteen aſcribed unto Joſhua by the account already ſpecified. The praiſes and acts of Joſhua are briefly written in the ſix and fortieth chapter of Eccleſiaſticus, where, among many others things, it is ſaid of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battles of the Lord?

That he wrote the book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, becauſe it is ſaid in the laſt chapter, verſe 26. And Joſhua wrote theſe words in the book of the law of God; which ſeemeth rather to have been meant by the covenant which Joſhua made with Iſrael in Sichem, where they all promiſed to ſerve and obey the Lord, which promiſe Joſhua cauſed to be written in the book of the law; and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulenſis: Theodoret doth likewiſe conceive that the book of Joſhua was collected out of an ancient volume, intitled Liber Juſtorum; remembred by Joſhua himſelf; and others, that it was the work of Samuel; for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon theſe words of the 26th verſe, And Joſhua wrote theſe words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it; for when the people had anſwered Joſhua, [h] The Lord our God will we ſerve, and his voice will we obey; it followeth that Joſhua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the ſame in the book of the law of God.

There lived at once with Joſhua, Erichthonius in Attica, who taught that nation to yoke beaſts together, thereby to till the ground with more eaſe and ſpeed: and about the ſame time the fifty daughters of Danaus (as it is ſaid) ſlew the fifty ſons of Egyptus, all but Lynceus, who ſucceeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived alſo with Joſhua, Phœnix and Cadmus, and near the end of Joſhua's life, Jupiter is ſaid to have raviſhed Europa the daughter of Phœnix (afterwards married to Aſterius king of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But [i] St. Auguſtine reports this raviſhment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the ſons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether [k] Minos was father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perſon a young or ſtrong man at the ſame Trojan war. And ſo doth Neſtor reckon up in the counſel of the [l] Greeks, Theſeus and Perithous for men of antiquity, and of ages paſt: Minos being yet more ancient than any of theſe. But hereof elſewhere.

SECT. I.

The proem to the deſcription of the whole land of Canaan, with an expoſition of the name of Syria.

THE ſtory of the Judges ought to follow that of Joſhua, after whom the commonwealth of the Jews was governed by kings, of which ſo many of them as ruled the ten tribes, ſhall be remembred when we come to the deſcription of Samaria: but becauſe the land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the ſtages and theatres, whereon the greateſt part of the ſtory paſs'd, with that which followeth hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better underſtanding of both) to make a geographical deſcription of thoſe regions; that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be underſtood and conceived. To which purpoſe (beſides the addition of the neighbour countries) I have beſtowed on every tribe his proper portion; and do ſhew what cities and places of ſtrength were by the Jews obtained; and what numbers it pleaſed God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and ſcourge them, when ungrateful for his many graces, they at ſundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thoſe deaf and dead idols of the heathen. Divina bonitas (ſaith St. Auguſtine) ideo maxime iraſcitur in hoc ſæculo, ne iraſcatur in futuro; & miſericorditer temporalem adhibet ſeveritatem, ne æternam juſte inferat ultionem; the divine goodneſs is eſpecially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come; and doth mercifully uſe temporal ſeverity, that it may not juſtly bring upon us eternal vengeance.

To the cities herein deſcribed, I have added a ſhort ſtory of the beginnings and ends of divers kingdoms and common-wealths; and to help my ſelf herein, I have peruſed divers of the beſt authors upon this ſubject; among whom, becauſe I find ſo great diſagreement in many particulars, I have rather in ſuch caſes adventured to follow mine own reaſon, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And becauſe Canaan, with Paleſtina of the Philiſtines, and the lands of Og and Sihon kings of Baſan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but ſmall provinces of Syria; it ſhall be neceſſary, firſt to divide and bound the general, and ſo deſcend to this particular, now called the holy land.

[a] Syria, now Soria, according to the largeſt deſcription, as it was anciently taken, imbraced all thoſe regions from the Euxine ſea to the Red ſea; and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called [b] Leucoſyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it ſhorter, and from the coaſt of Cilicia, which is the north border, unto Idumea towards the ſouth, Tigris towards the ſun-riſing, and the Mediterranean ſea weſtward: it then containeth, beſides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Deſart, and Arabia Petræa, that region alſo which the Greeks call Meſopotamia; the Hebrews Syria, of the two rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for ſo Aram-Nahairaijm is expounded; alſo Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syriæ, becauſe the two rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

[c] Edeſſa, ſometimes Rages, now Rage, was the metropolis of this region of Syria. In Syria, taken largely, there were many ſmall provinces, as Cœleſyria, which the Latins call Syria Cava, becauſe it lay in that fruitful valley between the mountains of Lybanus and Anti-lybanus, in which the famous cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were ſeated. Then Damaſcena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the city [d] Damaſcus, and the mountains of Lybanus, the regal ſeat of the Adades, the firſt kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the province of Sophene, or [e] Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal; over which Adadezer commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phenicia and the people Syraphœnices: and laſtly, Syria Paleſtina bordering Egypt; of which [f] Ptolemy maketh Judea alſo a part; and to that province which Moſes calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syria Judea.

SECT. II.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan, and of the promiſes touching this land.

BUT that land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phenicia, and ſtretcheth from behind Lybanus to the great deſarts between Idumea and Egypt; bounded by the midland ſea on the weſt, and the mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon towards the eaſt; the ſame hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconitæ, and Ptolemy Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from [g] Canaan the ſon of Cham, & lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was alſo called Canaan, ſaith Montanus; and after Hebræa of the Hebrews, who took name from Heber, the ſon of Sale, according to [h] St. Auguſtine. But Arius Montanus not ſo well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all thoſe of Noah's ſons, which paſs'd over Euphrates towards the weſt ſea. For the word Heber, ſaith he, is as much as tranſiens, or tranſmittens, of going or paſſing over. And becauſe the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding; therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were paſſengers, which is alſo the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of [i] Euſebius long before them both. It had alſo the name of Judea from Juda; and then afterwards intitled the holy land, becauſe therein our Saviour Chriſt was born, and buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four, namely, into Edom (otherwiſe Seir, or Edumea) Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is double, the ſuperior, called Gentium, and the inferior; and that Galilee and Judea are diſtinguiſhed, it is plain in the [k] evangeliſts, tho' both of them belong to Phenicia.

Now beſides theſe provinces of Phenicia, and Paleſtina (both which the river of Jordan boundeth; ſaving that Phenicia ſtretcheth a little more eaſterly towards Damaſcus) that part alſo to the eaſt of Jordan, and within the mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwiſe Traconi, fell to the poſſeſſion of half Manaſſeh, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan alſo; as well becauſe anciently poſſeſs'd by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoy'd by the Iſraelites; which eaſtmoſt parts are again divided into Baſan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the territories of the Machati, Geſſuri, Argobe, Hus. They are known to the latter coſmographers by the name of Arabia in general; and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will ſpeak in their proper places.

But where Moſes deſcribeth the land of Canaan in the tenth of Geneſis, he maketh no mention of the latter provinces, which fell to Manaſſeh, Gad, and Reuben; for theſe be his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comeſt to Gerar until Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the country north and ſouth; then it followeth in the text; And as thou goeſt unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Laſha; by which words Moſes ſetteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead ſea to the Mediterranean. But in [l] Deuteronomy, it ſeemeth to be far more large; for it is therein written: All the places whereon the ſoles of your feet ſhall tread ſhall be yours: your coaſt ſhall be from the wilderneſs, and from Lebanon, and from the river Perah, unto the uttermoſt ſea. Now for the length of the country north and ſouth, this deſcription agreeth with the former; only Lebanon is put for Zidon: and the wilderneſs for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent eaſt and weſt, if Perah be taken for Euphrates, then the land promiſed ſtretcheth it ſelf both over Arabia Petræa and the deſart, as far as the border of Babylon, which the Iſraelites never poſſeſs'd, nor at any time did ſo much as invade or attempt.

And

And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the river Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates; taking light from this place of Joshua; [a] Behold I have divided unto you by lot these nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your tribes; from Jordan, with all the nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great sea westward.

And tho' it be true, that David greatly enlarged the territory of the holy land: yet, as [b] Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it but per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the east as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: for when both their kings, magistrates, and people fell from his worship and service, it pleased him, not only to inclose them within that territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein, and elsewhere, to subject them unto those idolatrous nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obey'd. And sure, the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of [c] Canaan, and the lasting injoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other, than all mankind could or can expect; who knew, that all sorts of comforts, from the merciful goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in Deuteronomy xi. 8. the keeping of God's commandments, was a condition joined to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your days in the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heavens are above the earth. [d] For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these nations before you, and ye shall possess great nations, and mightier than you. And here, tho' it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of God's commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his All-powerful majesty, to the idolatry of the heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed. Yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon; for, saith he, ostendit promissionem præcipuam non esse de hoc politico regno; He sheweth that his chief promise is not of a civil kingdom. To which agrees that answer, which St. Jerome made to a certain heretick, in his epistle ad Dardanum, who accused St. Jerome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an allegory, and ad illam duntaxat viventium terram quæ in cœlis est (that is) Only to that land of the living which is in heaven. Quoniam tota Judæorum regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160 milliarium, latitudinem vero 40, & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Judæis occupata, sed tantum divina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole country of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160 miles in length, and 40 miles in breadth; and in these are countries, places, cities, and many towns, which the Jews never possess'd, but were only granted by divine promise. In like manner the same father speaketh upon Isaiah, touching the blessings promised unto Jerusalem; where he hath these words, [e] De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palæstina regione petendam: quæ totius provinciæ deterrima est, & saxosis montibus asperatur; & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut cœlestibus utatur pluviis, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extructione soletur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur festinaverunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learn, that Jerusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole province, and ragged, with craggy mountains, and suffereth the penury of thirst: so as it preserveth rain water, and supplieth the scarcity of wells, by building of cisterns: but this Jerusalem is in God's hands, to which it is said thy builders have hastned; so far St. Jerome. Where also, to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself; Neque hoc dico in suggillationem terræ Judææ, ut hæreticus sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historiæ veritatem: quæ fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis, sed ut decutiam supercilium Judæorum: qui synagogæ angustias latitudini ecclesiæ præferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem, ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Judea (as the heretical sycophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the history, which is the foundation of spiritual understanding, but to beat down the pride of the Jews; which enlarge the straits of the synagogue, farther than the breadth of the church: for if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickning spirit, let them shew the land of promise flowing with milk and honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the west bound in the place, Deut. xi. 24. had his truth in the literal sense; that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the east bound, should be taken only for a spiritual sense) yet nevertheless that Jerome's opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates: and that the promise it self was never so large, much less the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this holy land, because Asher, Nephtalim, and Zabulon, held the northermost part, and were seated in Phenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which tribe, yet before I speak, I must admonish the reader touching the names of places in this, and the other tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of translators, are diversly expressed; so that to the unskilful they may seem diverse, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly, because the ancient editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew editions have; and partly, because the ancients expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the latter do think fit.

SECT. III.

The Tribe of ASHER.

† I.

The bounds of the tribe of Aſher.

THE Aſherites deſcended of Aſher, the ſon of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increaſed while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500 and odd perſons, all men above 20 years of age, and able to bear arms at the time, when they were muſtered by Moſes at mount Sinai: all which number periſhing in the deſarts, there remained of their iſſues, beſides women and children, 53400 bodies fit for the wars: which paſs'd the river of Arnon, into the plains of Moab; and, after the conqueſt of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phenicia, from Zidon, and the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon along the ſea coaſt, containing 30 Engliſh miles, or thereabouts; and from the midland ſea to the eaſt border, ſome 12 miles; tho' [a] Antoninus makes it ſomewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in wine, oil, and wheat, beſides the Balſamum, with other pleaſant and profitable commodities; according to that prophecy, Aſſer pinguis panis; concerning Aſher, his bread ſhall be fat; [b] And he ſhall give pleaſures for a king.

† II.

Of Zidon.

THE firſt city ſeated on the north border of the territory of Aſher, was Zidon, which Joſhua calleth the great Zidon, both for ſtrength and magnitude. The Greeks, and Q. Curtius, make Agenor the founder thereof: and [c] Juſtin derives the name from the abundance of fiſh found on thoſe ſhores; whereof it hath been called Zidona. But that it was far more ancient, [d] Moſes, Joſhua, and Joſephus witneſs, the ſame being founded by Zidon, the eldeſt of Canaan's ſons: and ſo ſtrong it was in Joſhua's time, as neither did himſelf attempt it, neither could the Aſſerites, or any of their ſucceſſors, maſter it: but it continued all the time of the judges and kings, even unto the coming of Chriſt, a city interchangeably governed, by their own princes, or other magiſtrates: tho', according to the warnings and threats of the prophets [e] Iſaiah, Jeremy, Ezekiel and Zachary; it was often afflicted, both by the enemies ſword, and by the peſtilence.

Zidon is ſeated on the very waſh of the Phenician ſea, which is a part of the Mediterranean, or midland ſea. It hath to the north, the city of Berythus, and the river Leontis; and to the ſouth, Sarepta, or Sarphat, which ſtandeth between it and Tyre; the diſtance between which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14000 paces, ſaith [f] Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it 200 furlongs, and ſo doth Weiſſinbury, in his deſcription of the holy land, and both from Strabo: which 200 furlongs make 25 miles. This difference of diſtance, as well between theſe two known cities, as all the reſt, make it over-difficult to deviſe any new ſcale to the map and deſcription of the holy land.

What kings it had till Agenor's time, there is no memory. The ſtory which Zeno the philoſopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time conſumed and loſt. It ſeemeth to be more ancient than Tyre; which was alſo built by the Zidonians. For as [g] Strabo noteth, Homer ſpeaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre; becauſe it was but a member of Zidon, and a city ſubject to the kings thereof: tho' it be true, that in after-times it contended with Zidon for primacy, and became far more renowned, opulent, and ſtrong. From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel their principal workmen, both in timber and ſtone, for the building of the temple. For as it flouriſhed in all ſorts of learning, ſo did it in all other mechanical arts and trades: the prophet [h] Zachary calling them the wiſe Zidonians. The city was, both by nature and art, exceeding ſtrong, having a caſtle or citadel on the north ſide, ſtanding upon an unacceſſible rock, and compaſſed by the ſea; which after the citizens became Chriſtians, was held and defended by the knights of the Dutch order: and another caſtle it hath on the ſouth ſide, by the port of Egypt, which the templers guarded. It alſo ſent many other colonies beſides that of Tyre, into places remote; as unto Thebes, and Sephyra, cities of Beotia in Greece.

Strabo and [i] Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of [k] glaſs, which they uſed to make of thoſe ſands which are taken out of the river Belus, falling into the Mediterranean ſea, near Ptolomais or Acon; and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of thoſe clear glaſſes which they make at Murana; of which St. Jerome and Pliny. Zidon inſignis artifex vitri, Zidon vitrariis officinis nobilis; Zidon a famous glaſs-maker, or a ſkilful worker in glaſs-houſes.

They were in religion idolaters (as the reſt of the Canaanites) worſhippers of Baal and [l] Aſtaroth: which idols, tho' common to the other of the iſſue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1 Sam. xxxi. 10. and Judges x. 6.) yet eſpecially and peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians; as appears 1 Kings xi. 5. in the ſtory of Solomon's idolatry, where Aſtaroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1 Kings xvi. 33. in the ſtory of Achab, the chief worſhipper of Baal, where it is ſaid, that he marrying Jezebel, the daughter of the king of the Zidonians, worſhipped their Baal. Divers Baals, and divers Aſtaroths, in their idolatries, they acknowledged; as it appears by the plural names of Baalim and Aſtaroth, 1 Sam. xii. 10. and elſewhere: for even the name Aſtaroth, as I am informed by a ſkilful Hebrician, is plural; the ſingular being Aſtoreth: whence Judg. ii. 13. the Septuagint read ἐλάτρευσαν ταῖς ἀσταρτίαις; They worſhipped the Aſtarties. The occaſion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Aſtoreths, may be diverſly underſtood; either in reſpect of the diverſity of the forms of the images, or of the worſhip in divers places, or of the ſtories depending upon them; which (as fables uſe to be) were doubtleſs in divers cities diverſe. Auguſtine Quæſt. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Aſtarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by ſome ſuch name as Aſtarte, Tull. l. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making divers goddeſſes of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Aſtarte; whom he makes to be born of Tyrus and Syria, and to have been the wife of Adonis. As alſo Macrob. 2. Saturn. cap. 21. ſays, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worſhipped of the Aſſyrians. And Jerome, upon Ezekiel viii. 44. notes, that Thammuz (whom there the idolatrous women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may ſeem, that in the worſhip of Aſtarte, or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis. As alſo the Grecians did in their ſongs of Adonis, [a] Mourn for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit, others in that place of Ezekiel, not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Oſiris, in the ſacrifices of Iſis: whoſe loſs of her huſband Oſiris, was as famous in the Egyptian idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus's loſs of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iſide & Oſiride; that Oſiris with the Egyptians, is called Ammuz: which word may ſeem to be the ſame with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howſoever theſe Zidonians were thus anciently foſtered with the milk of idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the doctrine and goſpel of Chriſt after this aſcenſion, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moſes, and the prophets, ſo many years, whereof our Saviour, in Matthew and Luke; [b] Wo be to thee Chorazin, &c. For if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agone, &c. But I ſay unto you, it ſhall be eaſier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of judgment, than for you.

It received a Chriſtian biſhop with the firſt; who was afterwards of the dioceſe of Tyre. But in the year of our redemption 636, it fell into the hands of the Saracens; and continued in their poſſeſſion till Baldwinus the firſt, then king of Jeruſalem in the year 1111, by the help of the Danes and Norways, who came with a fleet to viſit the holy land, and took port at [c] Joppa; it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Euſtace Gremer, a nobleman of that country. And again, in the year 1250, it was re-edified and ſtrengthened by Lodowick the French king; while he ſpent four years in the war of the holy land. [d] Laſtly, in the year 1289, it was reconquered by the Saracens; and is now in poſſeſſion of the Turks, and hath the name of Zai.

† III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief hiſtory of Tyre in the ſame coaſt.

Sarepta, or, after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next city ſouthward from Zidon, between it and the river called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) ſtanding in the way towards Tyre, a city very famous for the excellent wine growing near it: of which Sidonius;

Vina mihi non ſunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæque Sareptano palmite miſſa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This city had alſo a biſhop of the dioceſe of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the reſt, and now called Saphet, ſaith Poſtellus.

Not far from Sarepta, was ſituate that ſome time famous city of Tyre, whoſe fleets of ſhips commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterranean ſea, and the borders thereof; during which time of greatneſs and power, the Tyrians erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa; of which Virgil; [e] Urbs antiqua fuit Tyrii tenuere coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called [f] Punica quaſi Phœnicum, a colony of the Phenicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italy, Nola. In Aſia the leſs, Dromos Achillis, which city the [g] Scholiaſt of Apollonius placeth near the river Phyllis in Bithynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor; and ſo it is written in Joſhua xix. taking name from the ſituation, becauſe built on a high rock, ſharp at one end. The Latins, as it ſeems, knew it by the name of Sarra; for [h] Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Oſtrum Sarranum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day, the place being ſtill known by the name of the ancient Tyre: and becauſe it was a colony of the Zidonians, the prophet Iſaiah xxiii. calleth it the daughter of Zidon: which Trogus alſo confirmeth, tho' Beroſus, by affinity of name, makes Thiras the ſon of Japhet to be the parent thereof: and tho', no doubt, it was very ancient (for ſo much the prophet Iſaiah xxiii. alſo witneſſeth, Is not this your glorious city, whoſe antiquity is of ancient days?) yet, that Thiras the ſon of Japhet ſet himſelf in the boſom of the Canaanites, who built Zidon, and peopled all that region, I ſee nothing to perſuade me.

But that new Tyre, in after-times ſo renowned, ſeemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was [i] Curtius and Joſephus. And Euſebius makes this city elder than Solomon's temple 240 years: Cedrenus 361, who alſo addeth that Tyrus, the wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor, I will ſpeak more at large in the ſtory of their kings.

For ſtrength, and for the commodiouſneſs of the harbour, and the better to receive trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an iſland 700 paces from the continent; and therefore [k] Ezekiel placeth it in the midſt of the ſea, as ſome read; or as others, in the innermoſt part of the ſea; whence he calleth it, ſituate at the entrance of the ſea; as alſo the ſame prophet calleth it, the mart of the people for many iſles: and Iſaiah xxiii. 3. A mart of the nations. And ſo proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this city, as the prophet Iſaiah xxvii. 8. calleth the merchants thereof princes, and their chapmen the nobles of the world.

It excelled, both in learning, and in manufacture; eſpecially in the making and dying of purple and ſcarlet cloth: which, ſaith Julius Pollux, was firſt found out by Hercules's dog, who paſſing along the ſea coaſt, and eating of the fiſh Conchilis or Purpura, the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worſhipped the ſame idols that Zidon did; ſaving that Hercules became their patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians preſented him with a crown of gold, and other gifts, deſiring to remain his friends and allies, anſwered them, that he had vowed a ſacrifice to Hercules, the defender of their city, and the anceſtor of the Macedonian kings, and muſt therefore enter it. Whereupon they ſent him word, that Hercules's temple was in the mountain of old Tyre, where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not, for Alexander was not ſo ſuperſtitious, as ambitious; he deſired to enter the town, which being denied, he, as one whom no peril could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ſhips as he could, and brought from Li- banus ſo great a number of cedars, and ſo many weighty ſtones from the old city of Tyre adjoining, as notwithſtanding that his materials were often waſhed away with the ſtrength of the ſea and the tides, yet he never reſted, till he had made a foot paſſage from the continent to the iſland: and having once approached their walls, he over-topp'd them with turrets of wood, and other frames; from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving ſpirit of reſolution) he became lord thereof, putting all to the ſword that reſiſted; after which, he cauſed 2000 more to be hung up in a rank all along the ſea-ſhore; which execution in cold blood he performed (as ſome authors affirm) upon the iſſues of thoſe ſlaves which had formerly ſlain all their maſters, taking their wives, children, riches, and power of government to themſelves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, [a] Joſephus remembreth; and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000 ſoldiers; who was the laſt ſatrapa, or provincial governour, which Darius ſeated in Samaria; the ſame who having married his daughter to Manaſſeh, brother to Jaddus the high prieſt of Jeruſalem, obtained of Alexander that a temple might be built on the mountain Garizim, over Samaria; that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which prieſthood he beſtowed on his ſon-in-law Manaſſeh, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander beſieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom [b] Gulielmus Tyrius calleth Sanabula, died.

Long before this deſolation of Tyre, by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanaſſar the Aſſyrian king; when the growing pride of the Aſſyrians, after that they had conquered the ten tribes, with the reſt of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that city. He beſieged it both on the land ſide, and with threeſcore ſhips of war held the port; to the end that neither any victuals nor any ſupply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve ſail ſcattered that fleet, and took five hundred priſoners of the [c] Aſſyrians; notwithſtanding, the Aſſyrian continued his reſolution, and lay before it by his lieutenants five years, but with ill ſucceſs. And this ſiege Menander Epheſius, cited by Joſephus, made report of in his chronicles, as he found the ſtory among the annals of the Tyrians (which the ſaid Menander converted into Greek) adding that Elulæus, whom Tyrius calleth Heliſæus, was then king of Tyre, having governed the ſame ſix and twenty years. Soon after this repulſe of Salmanaſſar, and about 200 years before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonoſor, at ſuch time as he deſtroyed Jeruſalem with the temple, came before this city; who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that deſpairful work of joining it to the continent. For Nabuchodonoſor had formerly done it; tho' by the diligence of the citizens, and the ſtrength of the ſea, the ſame cawſey and paſſage was again broken down and demoliſhed.

Againſt Nabuchodonoſor for many years the Tyrians defended themſelves; for ſo long did theſe Babylonians continue before it: As every head was made bald, and every ſhoulder made bare, ſaith, Ezekiel xxix. 18. who with the prophet Iſaiah ch. 23, &c. had manifeſtly foretold the deſtruction of this proud place. In the end, and after thirteen years ſiege or more, the Tyrians, deſpoiled of all their hopes, and remembring over-late the predictions and threatnings of God's prophets, having prepared a convenient number of ſhips, abandoned their city, tranſporting with themſelves the ableſt of all that remained; and with their wives, children, and portable riches, ſailed thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other maritimate cities of their tributaries, or confederates; ſo as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to ſatisfy ſo many labours and perils, or any perſon upon whom to avenge themſelves for the loſs of ſo many bodies in that war. It pleaſed God in recompence thereof (who ſtrengthened this reſolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nabuchodonoſor victorious over the [d] Egyptians; and gave him that kingdom and the ſpoil thereof, as it were in wages for his army. Whereupon St. Jerome noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the heathen unrewarded; who tho' they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attain unto that eternal happineſs reſerved for his ſervants and ſaints; yet ſuch is the boundleſs goodneſs of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal bleſſings.

Now of this enterpriſe of Nabuchodonoſor againſt Tyre, profane hiſtorians have not been ſilent. For both Diocles and Philoſtratus (as [e] Joſephus citeth them) the one in his ſecond book, the other in his Phenician hiſtories remember it.

After theſe two great vaſtations by the kings of Babylon and Macedon, this city of Tyre repaired and recovered itſelf again; and continued in great glory about 300 years, even to the coming of our Saviour Chriſt; and after him flouriſhed in the Chriſtian faith near 600 years; the archbiſhop whereof gave place to none but to the patriarch of Jeruſalem only; who within his own dioceſe had fourteen great cities, with their biſhops and ſuffragans; namely, [f] Caipha, otherwiſe Porphyria, Acon or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæſarea Philippi, Berytus, Biblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthoſia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Tortoſa) and Maraclea. But in the year 636, it was with the reſt of that beautiful region of Phœnicia and Paleſtina, ſubjected to the cruel and faithleſs Saracen. Under the burden and yoke of whoſe tyranny it ſuffered with the other Paleſtine cities 488 years.

[g] In the year 1112, it was attempted by Baldwin king of Jeruſalem, but in vain; yet in the year 1124, by Guaremonde, patriarch of Jeruſalem, vicegerent to Baldwin II. with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, and their fleet of gallies, it was again recovered, and ſubjected to the kings of Jeruſalem, and ſo it remained 165 years.

Finally, in the year 1189, Saladine having firſt taken Jeruſalem, removed his whole army, and ſat down before Tyre, drawing his fleet of ſhips and gallies from Alexandria into the port, this city as then only remaining in the Chriſtian power.

The citizens finding themſelves reduced into great famine, and many other miſeries, they at once with certain rafters of timber, fired, burnt and brake the Saracens fleet, and ſallying out reſolvedly upon his army, ſlew ſo great numbers of them, and followed their victory with ſuch fury, as that the Saracens forſaking their trenches and tents, removed in great diſorder and diſhonour. Two years after which victory, the body of that famous Frederick Barbaroſſa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Chriſtians enemies over a river unfordable, periſhed by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the cathedral church of Tyre, near unto that glorious ſepulchre of Origen, garniſhed and graven with guilt pillars of marble, 940 years before therein buried; but in the year 1289, the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth ſubject to the Turks.

Of Ptolomais, or Acon.

THE third city along the coaſt of the ſea, which the Aſherites could not obtain, on the ſouth bound of Aſher was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof, after Jerome; tho' other good authors affirm, that it took name from Acon the brother of Ptolemy. [a] Pliny calleth it Ace; and otherwiſe the colony of Claudius. It had alſo the name of Coth, or Cod; and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

But, laſtly, it was intitled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolemies; which city alſo, as it is 1 Mac. 11. another of the [b] Ptolemies perfidiouſly wreſted from his ſon-in-law Alexander, which called himſelf the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, the ſame Alexander having married Cleopatra, daughter of the ſaid Ptolemy, not long before. Therein alſo was Jonathan Maccabeus treacherouſly ſurprized and ſlain, as it is 1 Maccab. xii. 48. by the perfidiouſneſs of [c] Tryphon; whom ſoon after Antiochus purſued, as it is in the ſtory enſuing; and by like reaſon, about the ſame time, was the aforeſaid Alexander in the war againſt Demetrius, one of the ſons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolemy joined, overthrown and treacherouſly murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian, to whom he fled for ſuccour; and his head preſented unto his father-in-law Ptolemy, who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treaſon above three days, for [d] God ſtruck him by death.

For the beauty and ſtrength of this city, this Alexander made it his regal ſeat; two parts of the ſame being environed by the ſea; and the port of ſafety and capacity, not inferiour to any other in all that tract. This city is diſtant from Jeruſalem ſome 34 miles: four miles to the north, from the mountain Carmel, and as much to the ſouth from Caſtrum Lamberti: from Tyre, [e] Antoninus maketh it 32 Italian miles. In the midſt of the city there was a tower of great ſtrength, ſome time the temple of Belzebub, and therefore called the caſtle of flies; on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual light, like unto that called [f] Pharus in Egypt; to give comfort in the night to thoſe ſhips, which came near and ſought that part. it had in it a biſhop's ſeat, of the dioceſe of Tyre, after it became Chriſtian; but in the year 636 (a fatal year to the Chriſtians in thoſe parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the year 1104, it was regained by [g] Baldwin I. by the help of the gallies of Genoa; to whom a third of the revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God 1187, Saladine, king of Egypt and Syria, became lord thereof. In the year of Chriſt 1191, by Richard king of England, and Philip king of France, it was repoſſeſſed and redelivered to the Chriſtians. Laſtly, In the year 1291, it was, by the fury of the Saracens, beſieged with an army of 150000, entred, ſack'd, and utterly demoliſhed; tho' in ſome ſort afterward re-edified, and it is now Turkiſh.

Of the caſtle of St. George.

FIVE miles from Ptolomais, toward the eaſt, is the caſtle of [h] St. George ſeated, in which he was born; the valley adjoining bearing the ſame name. And tho' for the credit of [i] St. George's killing the dragon, I leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the kings of England had not ſome probable record of that his memorable act, among many others, it was ſtrange that the order, full of honour, which Edward III. founded, and which his ſucceſſors royally have continued, ſhould have borne his name, ſeeing the world had not that ſcarcity of ſaints in thoſe days, as that the Engliſh were driven to make ſuch an erection upon a fable, or perſon feigned. The place is deſcribed by Adrichomius, in his deſcription of Aſher, to have been in the fields of Libanus, between the river Adonis and Zidon. His own words are theſe: Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inclitum Chriſti militem D. Georgium, regis filiam ab immaniſſimo Dracone aſſervâſſe: eamque mactata beſtia parenti reſtituiſſe. In cujus rei memoriam eccleſia poſtmodum fuit ædificata; In this place, which by the inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men ſay that the famous knight of Chriſt, St. George, did reſcue the king's daughter from a huge dragon; and having killed the beaſt, delivered the virgin to her parent. In memory of which deed, a Church was afterwards built there: Thus far Adrichomius. His authors he citeth Ludovicus Roman. Patric. Navigationum, l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach, Itin. 5. The valley under this caſtle ſome time called Aſher, was afterward called the valley of St. George. If this authority ſuffice not, we may rather make the ſtory allegorical, figuring the victory of Chriſt, than accept of George the Arian biſhop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

† VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BETWEEN Ptolomais and Tyre along the ſea-coaſt, was the ſtrong city of Acziba, or Achazib, which [k] St. Jerome calleth Achziph, and Joſephus, Ecdippos; Pliny, Ecdippa, one of thoſe which defended itſelf againſt the Aſherites. Belforeſt finds Acziba and Sandalium, or the caſtle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelve ſearchers of the land which Moſes ſent from Cades-barne, travelled as far to the north as Roob, or Rechob, in the tribe of Aſher, which Recbob, as alſo Berothæ, which by Ezekiel xlvii. 16. is placed in theſe north borders, belong'd, in David's time, to the king Hadarezer, as it may be gathered out of 2 Sam. viii. 8. and x. 6. and it defended itſelf againſt the Aſherites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomai, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whoſe wall falling down, ſlew 27000 of Benhadad's ſoldiers after that 100000 had been ſlaughtered by the Iſraelites, under the conduct of Ahab. Here Junius finds that the Philiſtines incamped, a little before the battle at Gilboa, tho' in his note upon 1 Sam. ix. 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battle the ark was taken) to have been in [l] Juda. Of which Joſhua xv. 53. and in 2 Kings xiii. 17. he reads Fortiter,

The next place along the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of land which extendeth itself into the sea, between Azciba and Tyre: which castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified, in the year of Christ 1157, when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this castle, there ariseth that most plentiful spring of water, which Solomon remembreth, called the [a]Well of living waters: from whence, not only all the fields and plains about Tyre, are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn; but the same spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travel till it recover the sea, driveth six great mills in that short passage, saith [b]Brochard.

Within the land, and to the east of [c]Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hosa: and beyond it, under the mountains of Tyre, the city of Achsaph, or Axab, or after St. Jerome, Aciſap, a city of great strength, whose king, amongst the rest, was slain by Joshua, at the waters of Merom.

† VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

FARTHER into the land, towards Jordan, was seated the castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the eastermost hills of Tyre, in the year 1107, thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians; the place adjoining being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant, From this castle, the lords of Thoron, famous in the story of the wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their nobility. It had in it a curious chappel, dedicated to the blessed virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, constable to Baldwine III. king of Jerusalem, lieth buried: There were five castles besides this within the territory of Asher; whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other; to wit, Castrum Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum regium, and Belfort. The first near the sea, under the hills of Saron; the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort and Regium, stand more within the land, and belonged to the brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians, at such time as the Saracens possessed the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which order was in Ptolomais Acon. The first fortress was, for beauty and strength, called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the river Naar, near the city Rama: of which in this tribe, Joshua xix 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma, making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels; from the siege of this castle of [d]Belfort, the great Saladine, king of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians army raised, and, with great loss and dishonour, repulsed.

To the east of Belfort, is the strong city of Alab (or Achlab) which St. Jerome calleth Chalab; one of those that defended themselves against Asher, as Roob (or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the south from Roob, they place Gabala (which Herod, surnamed the Ascalonite, rebuilt) making it of the territory of Chabol, [e] Quod Syrorum lingua displicere significat (saith Weishenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre, was ill pleased with those twenty cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the temple. Others think this [f]Chabol, or Chabul, containing a circuit of those twenty cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land; tho' bordering Asher on the north side: as it is said, 1 Reg. ix. 11. that they were in regione limitis; that is, in limite regionis, in the border of the country: for it was not lawful, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possession allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears 2 Chron. viii. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David, from the Syri Rechobeæ, whose city Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the castle of Thoron, they place the cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the son of Levi, who from a mean estate, gathering together 400 thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee; at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judea; by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second book of those wars, chap. 36. This John betraying, in all he could, the city of Giscala (whereof he was a native) to the Roman state: and finding a resistance in the city, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and the Gadarims, to surprize it; who at the same time forced it, and burnt it to the ground: But being by Josephus's authority rebuilt, it was afterwards rendred to Titus by composition. They find also the cities of Cana major, and [h] Cades (or Cedessa;) of the first was that Syro-Phenician, whose daughter Christ delivered of the evil spirit. Near the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Maccabæus overthrew the army of Demetrius.

There are, besides these forenamed cities within the tribe of Asher, divers others; as on the south border, and near the sea, Messal, or Misheal: within the land [i] Besara, [k] Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the south border, between Asher and Zabulon: on the north-side, joining to Syro-Phœnicia, is the city of Hethalon, or Chethlon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way; under which, towards the sea, is Chali, and then [l] Enoch, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his son Enoch, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Joshua xix. 28. where also we read of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Asherites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made Judges i. 30. to which, out of [m] Joshua, we may add Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth, and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the rivers and mountains of Asher.

THE rivers to the north of Asher, are Adonis, afterwards Canis, to which Zeigler joineth Lycus, Ptolemy, Leontis: both which fall into the ſea near Berytus: which river of Leontis, Montanus draws near unto Zidon: finding his head notwithſtanding, where [a]Ptolemy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath alſo a river called Fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome, out of Brochard, entitleth Eleutherus: for which he alſo citeth [b]Pliny; and 1 Maccabees xi. but neither of thoſe authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Aſher: for this river falleth into the ſea at the iſle of Aradus, not far from Balanæa, witneſs [c]Ptolemy: and therefore [d]Pinetus calleth it Valania, and Poſtellus, Valana: which river boundeth Phœnicia on the north-ſide: to which Strabo alſo agreeth: but this principal river of Aſher Arius Montanus calleth Gabatus. Chriſtianus Schrot, out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laicſtan (which Laicſtan in this our age both viewed and deſcribed the Holy Land) calleth the main river, Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the ſtreams which runneth into it from the north-ſide, Naar; and another from the ſouth-weſt, Chabul, of the city adjoining of the ſame name; for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is alſo another river deſcribed by Adrichome, named Jepthael, which I find in no other author, and for which he citeth Joſhua xix. but the word [e]Ghe, which is added there to Jepthael, is not taken for a river, but for a valley: and for a valley, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arius Montanus turn it. There is alſo found in Aſher the river of Belus, remembred by Joſephus and Tacitus, which is alſo called Pagidas, ſaith [f]Pliny: out of the ſands of this river are made the beſt glaſs, which ſome time the Zidonians practiſed; and now the Venetians at Murana. Arius Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim; which it cannot be; for Belus is known to flow from out of the lake Cendevia; as all coſmographers, both ancient and modern, and the later travellers into thoſe parts witneſs. It is true, that the river of Chiſon, taketh water from Chedumim; but not in that faſhion which Montanus hath deſcribed it: neither doth it find the ſea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus, but farther to the ſouth, between Caiphas and Sicaminum, witneſs Zeigler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Beſides theſe rivers, there are divers famous ſprings and fountains, as that of living waters adjoining to Tyre: and [g]Maſerephot, or after St. Jerome, Maſerephotmaim, whoſe well filled by the flood of the ſea adjoining (they ſay) the inhabitants, by ſeething the water, make ſalt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The mountains which bound Aſher on the north, are thoſe of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœleſyria; two great ledges of hills, which from the ſea of Phœnicia, extend themſelves far into the land eaſtward, four hundred ſtadia, or furlongs, according to [h]Strabo: for that length he giveth to the valley of Cœleſyria; which thoſe mountains incloſe: but [i]Pliny gives them 1500 furlongs in length from the weſt (where they begin at Theipſophon, or Dei facies, near Tripolis) to the mountains of Arabia beyond Damaſcus; where Antilibanus turneth towards the ſouth. Theſe ledges, where they begin to part Traconitis and Baſan from the deſart Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moſes alſo nameth Sion; the Phenicians, Syrion; and the Amorites, Sanir; neither is this any one mountain apart, but a continuation of hills; which running farther ſoutherly, is in the ſcriptures called Galaad, or Gilead: the ſame being ſtill a part of Libanus, as the prophet Jeremy proveth; Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the higheſt of thoſe hills of Libanus. [k]Strabo knows them by the name of Traconitæ; and Ptolemy by Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth theſe mountains bordering, Aſher, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other coſmographers, but he giveth no reaſon for his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops; becauſe, according to Tacitus, the higheſt of them are covered with ſnow all the ſummer; the Hebrew word Libanos (ſaith Weiſſenburgh) ſignifieth whiteneſs. Others call them by that name of the frankincenſe which thoſe trees yield; becauſe λιβανωτος is alſo the Greek word for that gum.

[l]Niger out of Aphrodiſeus affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kind of honey-dew, which is by the ſun congealed into hard ſugar, which the inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latin word Saccharum.

The rivers which Libanus beſtoweth on the neighbour regions, are, Chryſorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The reſt of the mountains of Aſher, are thoſe hills above Tyre, and the hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful; but thoſe are but of a low ſtature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the mountain of Abarim, in Ruben, Moſes beheld Libanus 60 miles diſtant.

SECT. IV.

The Tribe of NEPHTALIM.

† I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next portion of the land of Canaan, bordering Aſher, was the upper Galilee; the greateſt part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the ſon of Jacob by Billa, the handmaid of Rachel: who, while they abode in Egypt, were increaſed to the number of 53400 perſons, able men to bear arms, numbred at mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the deſarts, there entred the holy land of their ſons 45400, beſides infants, women, and children, under 20 years of age. The land of Nephtalim took beginning on the north part from the fountains of Jordan, and the hills of Libanus adjoining, as far ſouth as the ſea of Galilee, bounded on the weſt by Aſher, and on the eaſt and ſouth-eaſt by Jordan.

On the north ſide of Libanus, and adjoining to this territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) alſo inhabit; in which tract, and under Libanus, was the city of Heliopolis; which the height of the mountains adjoining ſhadowed from the ſun, the better part of the day. Poſtellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebeca.

Of this name of [m]Heliopolis, there are two great cities in Egypt: the firſt called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean paraphraſt, otherwiſe Bethſemes,

There is alſo, in the ſame valley adjoining to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod, Agrippa, and Berenice the queen commanded.

Abilon alſo gave name to the region adjoining; of which Lyſanius, the ſon of Herod the elder, became tetrarch or governour; whereof Ptolemy gave it the addition of Lyſanii, and called it Abila Lyſanii. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous ſophiſter, was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this city of Abila, or Aphila, had received the Chriſtian faith, Priſcillinus became biſhop thereof; ſlain afterwards by our Britiſh Maximus at Trever. For diſtinction of this city (if it be not the ſame, as it may be thought to be the ſame) it is to be remembred, that in the tribe of [a] Manaſſeh, joining upon the bounds of the tribe of Nephtalim, there is another city of the ſame name, ſaving that it is written with an [E] for an [I], and called Abela, remembred in the xxth chapter of the 2d of Samuel. The ſame Joſephus calls Abelmachea, and Jerome, Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel, for diſtinction ſake, it is written, Abel Beth-Mahaca (for belike it was the town of Mahaca, the wife of Macir, the ſon of Manaſſeh, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This city Joab beſieged; becauſe Seba the ſon of Bichri, who rebelled againſt David, fled thereinto for ſuccour; but a certain wiſe woman of the city perſuading the people to caſt Seba's head over the wall, Joab retired his army. The ſame city was afterwards taken by the king of Damaſcus, Benhadad; and after a while by Teglatphalaſar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to ſignify bewailing, or a plain ground, and therefore no marvel, that many towns (with ſome addition for diſtinction ſake) were thus called; for even of bewailing many places took name, as Bochim, Judg. ii. 4. and ſo doubtleſs [b] Abel-Miſraim, Gen. l. 11. and yet Junius, in his note upon Numb. xxxiii. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was ſo called, rather by reaſon of the plain ground there (to wit, in the land of Moab) and ſo perhaps Abel-Mehola in the tribe of Ephraim; the town of Eliſha the prophet; alſo Abel-Vinearum of the Ammonites, whither Jeptha purſued them.

† II.
Of Hazar.

IN this tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous city of Jabin, in Joſhua's time, called Aſar (or, after the Chaldean paraphraſt, Haſzor) by Joſephus, Aſora; by Junius, [c] Chatzor; which Laicſtan names Heſron, the regal city and metropolis of Canaan, ſeated in the weſt part of Nephtalim, towards Aſher. In this city was that great rendezvous, and aſſembly of thoſe 24 kings againſt Joſhua; who being all overthrown, ſlain, and ſcattered, this their powerful city was by Joſhua taken and burnt to duſt. But in proceſs of time, the ſame being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a ſecond king Jabin, 137 years after the death of this firſt Jabin, invaded the Iſraelites: and being ordained of God to puniſh their idolatry, he prevailed againſt them, and held them in a miſerable ſervitude 20 years; till Deborah the propheteſs overthrew Siſera, Jabin's lieutenant, and his army, near the mountain Tabor. This city Solomon reſtored at ſuch time as he alſo re-edified Gezar, burnt by Pharaoh of Egypt, with [d] Megiddo, Bethoron, and other cities; but about 260 years after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalaſar, king of the Aſſyrians. It is now, ſaith Adrichomius, called Antiopia; it was one of the principal cities of Decapolis. There is another city of this name in the territory of Benjamin, ſeated on the confines of Aſcalon, called the new Hazar, [e] ſaith Jerome.

† III.
Of Cæſaria Philippi.

THere was alſo on the border, and within the territory of Nephtalim, that renowned city of Laiſh, or Lajiſch, as Junius writes it, or [f] Leſchem; which city the children of Dan (being ſtraightned in their territory under Juda) invaded and maſtered, and gave it the name of their own parent Dan; and by that name it is written in Gen. xiv. at which place Abraham ſurpriſed Chedorlaomer and his confederates; and followed his victory as far as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diviſion of Syria, otherwiſe called Sophena. And after the poſſeſſion of the Danites, it had the joint name of Leſchem Dan. Weiſſenburgh writes it Lacis; the Geneva, [g] Laiſh; Joſephus, Dana; Benjamin, Balina; Breitenbach, Belena; but the now inhabitants know it by the name of Balina to this day: witneſs Nubrigenſis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the monk, and Poſtellus; who alſo taketh this city to be the ſame which in Matthew xv. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan: for which the Greek text hath Magdala in that place; and in St. Mark viii. 10. ſpeaking of the ſame ſtory, Dalmanutha. At ſuch time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it ſeemeth that it was either a free city, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or elſe ſubject unto the kings thereof; for it is written, Judges xviii. 28. And there was none to help, becauſe Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no buſineſs with other men; for it was above 30 Engliſh miles from the Mediterranean ſea, and from Zidon.

In after-times, when theſe regions became ſubject to the ſtate of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a fountain adjoining ſo called; and therefore Ptolemy calls it Cæſaria Paniæ. Hegeſippus calls it Parnium, ſaith Weiſſenburgh: but he had read it in a corrupt copy, for in Hegeſippus, ſet out by Badius, it is written Paneum, without an [R]: and at ſuch time as Philip the ſon of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, became governour of Traconitis, ſome time Baſan, this city was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tibe- rius Cesar, he called it [a] Cæsaria Philippi; and so it became the metropolis, and head city of Traconitis; and one of the first cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa, in the succeeding age, greatly adorned; by him, in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that emperor, but the memory of his impiety; so in St. Jerome's time the citizens remembred their former Paneas, and so recalled it, with the territory adjoining, by the ancient name. Of this city was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hem of his garment with a constant faith: who afterwards, as she was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindful of God's goodness, and no less grateful for the same, as [b] Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two statues to be cast in pure copper; the one representing Christ, as near as it could be moulded; the other made like her self, kneeling at his feet, and holding up her hands towards him. These she mounted upon two great bases or pedestals, of the same metal, which she placed by a fountain near her own house; both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, even to his own time; which himself had seen, who lived in the reign of Constantine the great. But in the year after Christ 363, that monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy monument to be cast down and defaced, setting up the like of his own in the same place; which image of his was with fire from heaven broken into fitters; the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Saliminius, in his 5th book and 20th chapter.

This city built by the Danites, was near the joining together of those two rivers which arise from the springs of Jor and Dan, the two [c] apparent fountains of Jordan; in a soil exceeding fruitful and pleasant; for as it is written, Judges xviii. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this city, it was that St. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the son of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this city received the Christian Faith, it was honoured with a bishop's seat: and it ran the same fortune with the rest, for it was afterwards taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians; under Fulch the 4th king of Jerusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bulloin, the king of Damascus wrested it from the Christians: and shortly after by them again it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth, with all that part of the world, subjected to the Turks.

† IV.

Of Capernaum, and the cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable cities within this tribe, Capernaum is not the least; so often remembred by the evangelists. This city had the honour of Christ's presence three years; who for that time was as a citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the doctrine of our salvation; according to that notable prophecy of Isaiah ix. The people that walked in darkness, have seen a great light: they that dwelt in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, even where it entreth into the sea of Galilee, in an excellent and rich soil: of whose destruction Christ himself prophesied in these words: And thou Capernaum, which art lifted up unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatness of that city; for it was one of the principal cities of Decapolis, and the metropolis of Galilee. And tho' there were some marks of this city's magnificence in St. Jerome's time, as himself confesseth, it being then a reasonable burgh, or town; yet those that have since, and long since seen it, as Brochard, Bridenbech, and Saliniac, affirm, that it then consisted but of six poor fishermens houses.

The region of ten principal cities, called Decapolitana, or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned; and in St. [d] Matthew, Mark, and Luke, also remembred; but I find no agreement among the cosmographers, what proper limits it had; and so Pliny himself confesseth: for [e] Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the north by the mountain Casius in Casiotis, and endeth it to the south at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it embraceth Phenicia, a part of Cœlesyria, all Palestina, and Judea.

[f] Pliny also makes it large, and for the ten cities of which it taketh name, he numbreth four of them to be situated towards Arabia; to wit, first these three, Damascus, [g] Opotos, Raphana; then Philadelphia (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or, as I guess, Amona rather, because it was the chief city of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabbah, before Ptol. Philadelphus gave it this latter and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime Nysa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his nurse, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Bethsan: for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœlesyria, which was also called Antioch and Seleucia;) but it is Gadara in Basan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, seated on a high hill, near the river Hieromaix. This river Ortelius takes to be the river Jaboc, which boundeth Gad and Manasseh over Jordan: but he mistaketh it, for Hieromaix falleth into the sea of Galilee, between Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Jaboc entreth the same sea between Ephron and Phanuel. For the seventh, he nameth [h] Hippos or Hippion, a city so called of a colony of horsemen there garisoned by Herod, on the east side of the Galilean sea, described hereafter in the tribe of Manasseh over Jordan. For the eighth, Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the south border of the region over Jordan, called Peræa. For the ninth, Gelasa, which Josephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Cœlesyria by Josephus, Hegesippus and Stephanus; but by Ptolemy (whom I rather follow) in Phenicia. The tenth, and last, Pliny nameth Canatha; and so doth Suetonius, and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala; but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a city in the region of Basan over Jordan, so called, because those two hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a camel. But the collection of these ten cities, whereof this region took name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saliniac, which make them to be these; Cæsaria Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other authors disagree herein, and give no reason for their opinion. One place of the evangeliſt St. Matthew makes it manifeſt, that this region, called Decapolitana, was all that tract between Zidon, and the ſea of Galilee. For thus it is written in Matthew iv. And he departed again from the coaſts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came unto the ſea of Galilee, through the midſt of the coaſts of Decapolis: ſo that it was bounded by Damaſcus and Libanus on the north, by the Phenician ſea, between Zidon and Ptolemais on the weſt; by the hills of Gelbo and Bethſan on the ſouth; and by the mountains Tracones, otherwiſe Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the eaſt; which is, from eaſt to weſt, the whole breadth of the holy land; and from the north to the ſouth, near the ſame diſtance, which may be each way 40 Engliſh miles.

† V.

Of Hamath.

BUT to look back again towards Libanus, there is ſeated, near the foot thereof, the city of [a] Hammath, or Chammath, of which (as they ſay) the country adjoining taketh name: the ſame which Joſephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathenſis: [b] Jacobus Zeigler, Ituræa. Ituræa regio tenet borealia tribus Nephtali, per montem Libanum uſque Trachones. The country of Ituræa, ſaith he, containeth the north parts of the tribe of Nephtali, along the mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis, Ituræa, he miſtakes the ſeat of this region; and ſo doth Mercator. For indeed, were Ituræa (which Hegeſippus calls Peræa, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the ſame with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it ſelf is far more to the eaſt than Hammath in Nephtalim; for Traconitis lieth between Cæſaria Philippi, and the mountains Trachones, which the Hebrews call Gilead: and this Hammath, or Chammath, is ſeated under Cæſaria, towards the ſea weſtward. And it ſeemeth that this miſtaking grew, by confounding Emath, or Hamath the great in Cœleſyria, beyond the mountains Trachones, which [c] Jerome upon Amos calls Antiochia; with Hammath, or Hamath the leſſer in Phenician; and Nephtalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our tranſlation Hamath (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. viii. 3. is ſet far from the north border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numb. xxxiv. 8. and Numb. xiii. 22. and in Ezek. xlvii. 16. In the firſt of which places, it bordereth the land of promiſe: theſe being the words; From mount Hor you ſhall point (that is, direct or draw a line) until it come to Hamath. In the ſecond place, thus: So they went up and ſearched out the land from the wilderneſs in Sin, unto Rehob to go to Hamath. Then in Ezekiel; The weſt part alſo ſhall be the great ſea from the border, till a man come over-againſt Hamath; that is, the coaſt of the ſea ſhall be the weſt border from the ſouthermoſt part of the holy land, till you come directly over-againſt Hamath northward: from whence, if a line be drawn to the ſea, it will touch the walls of Zidon; which is [d] the north-weſt corner of the holy land.

Now that this Hamath or Hammath, which Moſes alſo made the confine of the holy land, is that of Nephtalim, both the reference which it hath to the weſt ſea, and the city of [e] Rehob adjoining prove it: the other Hamath or Emath (being far removed, and beyond the forenamed mountains, which incloſe all thoſe lands which Iſrael ever had poſſeſſion of) is that Emath, which is alſo called Ituræa, witneſs [f] Stella and Laicſtan; and not that in Nephtalim, where [g] Jonathus Macchabæus attended the army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

For tho' Traconitis be comprehended within Ituræa (and therefore it is ſaid to be finitima Galilææ Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the mountains Traconis, and ſo it ſtretcheth into the plains of the territory of Ituræa; whence Philip the brother of Herod was tetrarch or preſident, both of Ituræa and Traconitis; both which are over Jordan towards the eaſt. But Chamath in Nephtalim, is on the weſt ſide of Jordan towards the Mediterranean ſea.

The country Ituræa was ſo called of Jethur, one of the ſons of Iſhmael; it is placed in the bounds of Cœleſyria and Arabia [h] the deſart.

The people of Ituræa were valiant and warlike men, and excellent archers. Of whom Virgil;

Ituræos taxi torquentur in arcus,
Of yew the Itureans bows were made.

The city Chamath, or Hamath, in Nephtalim, ſeems to have been as ancient as the other in Ituræa, both built by Amatheus, the 11th ſon of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tohu for king, it is not certain; for Hamath, or Emath, beyond the mountains, and Hammath in Nephtalim were both neighbours to Damaſcus; at whoſe ſubjugation Tohu rejoiced, becauſe Hadadeſer, whom the Damaſceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tohu fearing the ſtrength and proſperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his territory, bought his peace with many rich preſents, and with many ancient veſſels of gold, ſilver, and braſs.

But it ſeemeth that David in ſuch great ſucceſs, would not have had peace with Tohu, if he had been king of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tſoba; which city Solomon, after his father's death, made himſelf maſter of, as a part of the lands ([i] in the larger and

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after divers mutations and changes, both of name and fortune, being, as it hath been ſaid, poſſeſſed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While St. Jerome lived, it remained a city well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and divers other towns.

IN the border of Hamath, or Emath, towards Jordan, ſtandeth the city Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountain Daphnis, which falleth into the lake of Meron. Hereunto was Zedekiah brought priſoner, after his ſurpriſe in the fields of Jericho, and delivered to Nabuchodonoſor: who, to be avenged of Zedekiah's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, firſt cauſed the princes his children to be ſlain in his preſence: and to the end that this miſerable ſpectacle might be the laſt that ever he ſhould behold in this world, and ſo the moſt remembred, he commanded both his eyes preſently to be thruſt out: and binding him in iron chains, he was led a ſlave to Babylon, in which eſtate he ended his life. Of which ſeldom-exampled calamity, tho' not in expreſs words, [a] Jeremiah the prophet foretold him in Jeruſalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, ſpeaking in the perſon of God, [b] I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans, yet ſhall he not ſee it, tho' he ſhall die therein.

There are beſides theſe before-remembred, many other ſtrong cities in Nephtalim; as that which is called [c] Cedes: there are two others of the ſame name, one in [d] Iſſachar, another in Juda, of which Joſh. xv. 23. and therefore to diſtinguiſh it, it is known by the addition of [e] Nephtalim, as Judg. iv. It is ſeated on a high hill, whence Joſh. xx. 7. Kedeſh in Galilæa in monte Nephtali: Joſephus calls it Cedeſis: and in St. Jerome's time it was called Cidiſſus. Belforeſt greatly miſtakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the deſart of Pharan.

After the king thereof, among other of the Canaanites, periſhed by the hand of Joſhua, it was made a city of refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barak born, who overthrew the army of the ſecond Jabin of Hazor, at the mount Tabor. It was ſome time poſſeſs'd by Teglatphalaſſar, when he waſted all Nephtalim: afterwards by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten cities of the Decapolitan region: when it had embraced the Chriſtian Faith, it was honoured with a biſhop's ſeat; but in time it fell with the reſt into the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demoliſhed.

From Cedes, ſome four Italian miles towards the ſouth-weſt, ſtandeth Sephet, otherwiſe Zephet, which was alſo one of the ten Decapolitan cities; a place exceeding ſtrong, and for many years the inexpugnable fortreſs of the Chriſtians, and afterwards of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour cities of thoſe regions, both inland and maritimate near it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, ſeated northward near Sephet: this is to be noted, that there are [f] divers places of this name in Paleſtine, all ſeated on hills; and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebræis excelſum, Rama with the Hebrews is high.) Alſo that from this Rama, Joſh. xix. 36. they read Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of divers towns) to be a part of the word: whence caſting away the aſpiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the weſt, they place [g] Bethſemes, of which Joſh. xix. 38. which defended it ſelf againſt Nephtalim, Judges i. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other ſide of Sephet, towards the eaſt, was Bethanath, who alſo kept their city from the Nephtalims.

Adjoining to which ſtandeth Carthan [h] or Kiriathajim, a city of the Levites, not far from the mountain, out of which the ſprings of Capernaum ariſe, called Mons Chriſti; a place by our Saviour often frequented: as alſo then when calling his diſciples together, he made choice of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his apoſtles or meſſengers; of which place, or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the [i] evangeliſts.

Adjoining to theſe are Magdalel, a place of ſtrength; and [k] Maſaloth, of which we read, that it was forced by Bacchides, in the time of the [l] Maccabees: alſo (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothaes of Nephtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this tribe; [m] one near Chamath in the north border, of which Ezek. xlvii. 6. Another (upon a weak conjecture out of Joſeph. Ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth, in this tract, near the waters of Merom; becauſe the kings that joined with Jabin againſt Joſhua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Joſh. xi. 5. are by Joſephus ſaid to have incamped at the city Berotha in Galilee, not far from Cedeſa Superior, which is alſo in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. ſeeing it is in that Galilee which is called the Upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The ſame Adrichomius placeth the region of Berim near Abela (of which Abela, or Abel-beth-mahacah, we have ſpoken already;) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, 2 Sam. xx. 14. where ſome read Abel & Bethmahacah, & omnia loca Berim; but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Beræi; for Sheba being of Benjamin (in which tribe alſo there is a city called Berotha, or Beeroth) drew the men of that city after him.

To the north of Berotha of Nephtalim, ſtandeth Sebarim under Libanus, remembred by Ezekiel xlvii. and Aroſeth gentium, near the waters of Merom, or Samochonitis, the city of Siſara, lieutenant of the army of the ſecond Jabin: from whence, not far off, towards the ſea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a ſtrong city; beſides many others, whereof I find no particular ſtory of importance; as Ser in Joſh. xix. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the firſt of their fenced cities: whence they make two cities, Aſſedim and Ser: then Adama, which they call Edama; alſo Hion, which they call Ahion; of which in the books of Kings. Then the ſtrong city of Cinnereth, afterwards called Gennezareth, whence we read of the land and lake of Gennezareth; the ſame lake which is alſo called the ſea of [n] Tibereas.

In

In the body of the land they place Galgala to the ſouth border; of which [a] Maccab. xix. 2. alſo divers named, Joſh. xix. as Urucа, or Chukkok: Horem and Azanoth-tabor (which they place towards the eaſt parts) and out of the ſame place of Joſhua: Jirzon, Lakkum, Jepnael, Heleb, and [b] Reccath; which two laſt they place near Ceſaria Philippi: To theſe they add out of Joſhua, Nekeb, and Adami; for which two Junius readeth Foſſa Adamæi, making it no town, but a ditch caſt by ſome of Adamath, as it ſeems; or at leaſt the cuſtody of which march or limit belonging to the town. To theſe out of Numb. xxxiv. 10. they add Sephano, which 1 Sam. xxx. 21. ſeems to be called Sipmoth. As for Tychon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. xlvii. 16. and the latter out of Joſhua xix. 33. it may appear by Junius's tranſlation, that neither are to be taken for cities: for the former he readeth Mediani, and for the latter Quercetum. The city of [c] Nephtalim, which they make the native place of Toby, and Naaſſon near unto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar tranſlation, Tob. vii. 7. but in the Greek text there is no ſign, neither of the one nor of the other.

SECT. V.

The Tribe of ZABULON.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulon, another of the ſons of Jacob by Leah, there were muſtered at mount Sinai 57400 able men, beſides women, children, and aged unable perſons; all which dying in the deſarts, there entred the Holy Land of their iſſues 65000 fit to bear arms; who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Aſher to the river of Chiſon; ſouthward, and from the ſea of Galilee to the Mediterranean, eaſt and weſt.

The cities within this tribe, which border Aſher, are Sicaminum on the ſea-ſhore, of which Joſeph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbaſet of which Joſhua 19. 11. Jeconam, or [a] Jokneham (whoſe king was [e] ſlain by Joſhua, and the city was given to the Levites) and Gaba, afterward called the City of horſemen, of a regiment there gariſoned by Herod. Then the city which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the City of men, exceeding ancient or magnificent, [f] burnt to the ground by Coſtius, lieutenant of the Roman army. Adrichomius makes it the birth city of [g] Elon judge of Iſrael, becauſe he is called Zabulonita; not marking that in the ſame place he is ſaid to be buried at Ajalon.

To the eaſt of this city of Zabulon is Cateth, of which Joſhua xix. 15. on the border of Aſher; and beyond it the leſſer [h] Cana of Galilee, where Chriſt converted water into wine; the native city of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the mountains of Zabulon: and then the city of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended itſelf againſt Zabulon. Then Berſabe, which ſtandeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Joſephus againſt the Romans. Not far from hence ſtandeth Shimron of Meron, whoſe king was ſlain by Joſhua.

Then Damna or Dimna, a city of the Levites; then Noa, or rather Neha, of which Joſhua xix. 13. Then Dothan, or Dothain, where Joſeph found his brethren feeding their flocks; the ſame wherein Eliſæus, beſieged by the Syrians, ſtruck them all blind.

Beyond it, towards the eaſt, they imagine [i] Amthar, or Amathar; then Remmon of the Levites. The laſt of the cities on the north border of Zabulon, is Bethſaida, one of the ten cities of Decapolis, ſeated on the Galilean ſea, and watered by the ſprings of Capernaum, the native city of the apoſtles, Peter, Andrew and Philip. Herein Chriſt did many miracles; but theſe people being no leſs incredulous than the Capernaims, and others, received the ſame curſe of threatned miſeries; as, Wo be unto thee Bethſaida, &c.

Along the weſt border of Galilee, towards the ſouth from Bethſaida, was the ſtrong caſtle of Magdalum, the habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long ſince ſtanding.

And beyond it the ſtrong and high ſeated city of Jotapata, fortified by Joſephus in the Roman war: but in the end, after a long ſiege, ſurprized by Veſpaſian; who ſlaughtered many thouſands of the citizens; and held 1200 priſoners, whereof Joſephus the hiſtorian was one.

The laſt and greateſt of the cities on that [k] ſea, and the lake of Genezareth within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias; from whence afterward the Galilean ſea alſo changed name, and was called, The ſea of the city Tiberias, ſo named in honour of Tiberius Ceſar; it was one of the ten cities, and the metropolis of the region Decapolitan, and the greateſt and laſt of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew, from the toll or cuſtom-houſe, to be an apoſtle, and near unto it raiſed the daughter of Jairus from death; it was built (as Joſephus reports) by Herod the tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius Ceſar, in the moſt fruitful part of Galilee, but in a ground full of ſepulchres; Quum juxta noſtras leges (ſaith he) ad ſeptem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our law he ſhould be ſeven days held as unclean who inhabited in ſuch a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Joſephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as ſome have thought) the ſame as the old Cinnereth, which was ſeated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtalim.

Near unto this Tiberias at Amaus, there were hot baths, where Veſpaſian the emperor encamped againſt Tiberias: more into the land, toward the ſouth-weſt, is Bethulia, ſeated on a very high hill, and of great ſtrength, famous by the ſtory of Holofernes and Judith, ſuch as it is. Near which ſtandeth Bethlehem of Zabulon; and adjoining unto it, Capharath fortified by [l] Joſephus againſt the Romans; and Japha an exceeding ſtrong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury, ſlew [m] 15000 of the citizens, and carried away above 2000 priſoners.

On the ſouth-ſide are the cities of [n] Cartha of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Joſephus in his own life; then Jafie according to Adrichomius (of which Joſh. 19. 12.) for he thinks that it is not that Japha of which we ſpake but now out of Joſephus. Jidea- la, of which Joſh. xix. 15. Jerome calls it Jadela; under it weſtward Legio (afterwards a biſhop's ſeat) and the city Belma, in ancient times exceeding ſtrong, remembred Judith vii. 3. otherwiſe Chelma. Between Legio and Nazaret, is the city [a]Saffa, or Saffra, the birth city of Zebedæus, Alphæus, James, and John: then Sephoris or Sephora, according to Joſephus: Sephorum, according to Brochard; which afterwards, ſaith Hegeſippus and Jerome, was called Diocæſaria; the city of Joachim and Anna, the parents of the Virgin Mary, it was called by Herod the tetrarch; and by him, as [b]Joſephus ſpeaks, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he ſaith, Urbium Galilæarum maximæ Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Veſpaſian ere he won it. Herod Antipas, when he made it the regal ſeat of the nether Galilee, and ſurrounded it with a ſtrong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much as to ſay, imperial, ſaith Joſephus; and it is now but a caſtle called Zaphet.

To the ſouth-weſt of this Sephoris, or Diocæſarea, was that bleſſed place of Nazareth, the city of Mary the mother of Chriſt, in which he himſelf was conceived; it ſtandeth between mount Tabor, and the Mediterranean ſea. In this city he abode chiefly 24 years, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Chriſtians afterwards were for many years. It was erected into an archbiſhoprick in the following age. Near unto it are the cities Buria, afterwards well defended againſt the Turks, and Nahalal, of which Joſh. xix. 15. and Judg. i. 30. where it is called Nahalal: and Joſh. xxi. 35. where it is a city of the Levites, near the ſea; adjoining to the river of Chiſon, is Sarid, noted in Joſhua for the uttermoſt of Zabulon.

In this territory of Zabulon, there are divers ſmall mountains; but Tabor is the moſt renowned, by the apparition of Moſes and Elias: and by the transfiguration of Chriſt, in the preſence of Peter, James and John; unto whom Moſes and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the mountain, the empreſs Helen built a ſumptuous chappel.

The chief river of Zabulon, is Chiſon; which riſing out of Tabor, runneth with one ſtream eaſtward to the ſea of Galilee, and with another ſtream weſtward into the great ſea. This river of Chiſon, where it riſeth, and ſo far as it runneth ſouthward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the ſame which Ptolemy calleth Chorſeus; tho' others diſtinguiſh them, and ſet Chorſeus by Cæſaria Paleſtinæ. There is a ſecond torrent, or brook, that riſeth in the hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the ſea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is branch of a river riſing out of the fountains of Capernaum, which falleth alſo into the ſame ſea, and near [c]Magdalum; which torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the city from which it paſſeth eaſt-ward to Bethſaida, and ſo joining with Jordanis Parvus, which runneth from the valley of [d]Jephthael, which Joſhua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the ſea of Galilee.

SECT. VI.

The Tribe of ISSACHAR.

THE next adjoining territory to Zabulon, to the ſouth and ſouth-weſt, was Iſſachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were encreaſed in Egypt, as appeared by their muſters at mount Sinai, 54400 able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the reſt in the deſarts, there entered the Holy Land, 64300.

The firſt city of this tribe, near the ſea of Galilee, was [e]Tarichea diſtant from Tiberias eight Engliſh miles, or ſomewhat more, a city wherein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upſtart, John the ſon of Levi) took arms againſt Joſephus the hiſtorian, then governor of both Galilees. This city was firſt taken by Caſſius, and 3000 Jews carried thence captive; and afterwards, with great difficulty by Veſpaſian, who entered it by the ſea-ſide, having firſt beaten the Jews in a ſea-fight upon the lake or ſea of Galilee, he put to the ſword all ſorts of people, and of all ages; ſaving that his fury being quenched with the rivers of blood running thro' every ſtreet, he reſerved the remainder for ſlaves and bondmen. Next to Tarichea is placed [f]Ceſſion, or Ciſhion, of the Levites, and then Iſſachar, remembred in 1 Kings iv. 17. then Abes, or Ebets, Joſh. xix. 20. and Remeth, of which Joſh. xix. 21. otherwiſe Ramoth, 1 Chron. vi. 73. or Jarmuth, Joſh. xxi. 29. this alſo was a city of the Levites, from whoſe territory the mountains of Gilboa take beginning; and range themſelves to the Mediterranean ſea, and towards the weſt as far as the city of Jezrael; between which and Ramoth are the cities of Bethphefes, or Bethpaſſes, according to Zeigler, and Enadda, or Hen-chadda: near which Saul ſlew himſelf: under thoſe [g]Aphec, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Iſſachar; between which and Suna, he ſaith, that the Philiſtines encamped againſt Iſrael, and afterwards againſt Saul, a land thirſty of blood; for herein alſo, ſays he, the Syrians, with 32 Reguli aſſiſting Benhadad, incountred Achab, and were overthrown and ſlaughtered: to whom the king of Iſrael made a moſt memorable anſwer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory; which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harneſs boaſt himſelf, as he that putteth it off; meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the year following, in the fields, as they ſay, adjoining to this city, was the ſame vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and diſcomfited by Achab, and 100000 footmen of the Aramites, or Syrians, ſlain: before which overthrow, the ſervants and counſellors of Benhadad (in deriſion of the God of Iſrael) told him, [h]That the Gods of Iſrael were Gods of the mountains; and therefore if they fought with them in the plains, they ſhould overcome them.

Under Aphec, towards the ſea, they ſet the city of Eſdrelon, in the plains of Galilee, called alſo the great field of Eſdrelon, and Maggedo; in the border whereof are the ruins of Aphec, to be ſeen, ſaith Brochard and Breidenbach. After theſe are the cities of [i]Caſaloth, of which 1 Maccab. ix. 2. Anem, or Hen-Gannim of the Levites; and Seeſima, or Shahatſima, the weſt border of Iſſachar, of which Joſh. xix. 22. From hence ranging the ſea-coaſt, there is found the caſtle of pilgrims; a ſtrong caſtle, environed with the ſea, ſome-time the ſtore-houſe and magazine of the Chriſtians, and built by the earl of St. Giles, or Tolouſe.

From the caſtle of pilgrims the ſea maketh a great bay towards the north, and at the farthermoſt ſhore beginneth mount Carmel, not far from the river Chiſon; where Elijah aſſembled all the prophets and prieſts of Baal, and prayed king Achab, and the people aſſembled, to make trial, whether the God of Iſrael, or the idol of Baal, were to be worſhipped, by laying a ſacrifice without fire on the altar: which done, the prieſts of Baal prayed, and cut their own fleſh after their manner, but the fire kindled not; while Elijah in deriſion told them, that their God was either in purſuit of his enemies, not at leiſure, or perchance aſleep, &c. But at the prayer of Elijah, his fire kindled, notwithſtanding that he had cauſed the people to caſt many veſſels of water thereon; by which miracle the people incenſed, ſlew all thoſe idolaters on the banks of Chiſon adjoining.

At the foot of this mountain, to the north, ſtandeth Caiphas, built, as they ſay, by Caiphas the high prieſt. It is alſo known by the name of Porſina and Porphyria, ſometime a ſuffragan biſhop's ſeat. Returning again from the ſea-coaſt, towards Tiberias, by the banks of Chiſon, there are found the city of Hapharaim, or Aphraim, and the caſtles of Meſra and Saba; of which Brochard and Breidenbach; and then Naim on the river Chiſon, a beautiful city while it ſtood, in the gates whereof Chriſt [a] raiſed from death the widow's only ſon.

Then Seon, or Shion, named Joſh. xix. between the two hills of Hermon, in Iſſachar: beyond it ſtandeth Endor, famous by reaſon of the enchantreſs that undertook to raiſe up the body of Samuel, at the inſtigation of Saul.

Beyond it ſtands Anadarath and Rabbith, named Joſh. xix. 19, 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named Joſh. xxi. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named 1 Chron. vi. 72. This city (which ſtretcheth itſelf over Chiſon) was a city of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela ſituate, near the caves of thoſe two thieves which ſo greatly moleſted Galilee in Herod's time. It joineth on one ſide to the mountain of Iſſachar or Hermon, and on the other the valley of Jezreel; which valley continueth itſelf from Bethſan, or Scythopolis, the eaſt border of Iſſachar, even to the Mediterranean ſea; two parts whereof are encloſed by the mountains of Giliboa on the ſouth, and by Hermon and the river Chiſon on the north. In theſe plains [b] Gideon overthrew the Madianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought againſt the Philiſtines, Achab againſt the Syrians, and the Tartars againſt the Saracens.

SECT. VII.

The Half of the Tribe of MANASSEH.

† I.

Of the bounds of this half tribe, and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therſa, and others.

THE next tribe which joineth itſelf to Iſſachar towards the ſouth, is the half of Manaſſeh, on the weſt-ſide of Jordan. Manaſſes was the firſt begotten of Joſeph, the 11th ſon of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, prieſt and prince of Heliopolis: which Manaſſes, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongſt the ſons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve patriarchs.

Of Manaſſeh, there were increaſed in Egypt, as they were numbred at mount Sinai, 32200 able men: all which being conſumed in the deſarts, there entred of their iſſue 52700 bearing arms. The territory which fell on this one half of Manaſſeh, was bounded by Jordan on the eaſt, and Dora upon the Mediterranean ſea on the weſt, Jezrael on the north, and Machmata is the ſouth border.

The firſt and principal city which ſtood in this territory, was Bethſan, ſometime [c] Nyſa, ſaith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his nurſe there buried, of the ſame name, which Solinus confirms. Afterwards, when the Scythians invaded Aſia the leſs, and pierced into the ſouth, to the uttermoſt of Cœleſyria, they built this city anew, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the city of Scythians given it by the Greeks.

Theſe barbarous northern people, conſtrained the Jews to fight againſt their own nation and kindred, by whoſe hands when they had obtained victory, they themſelves ſet on the Jews which ſerved them, and ſlew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmoſt towards the ſouth of Cœleſyria: and Strabo joins it to Galilee. It is ſeated between Jordan and the hills of Gilboa, In aulone ad montes Acrabitenæ, ſaith Zeigler. But I find it in the eaſt part of the valley of Jezrael near Jordan: after that Jordan ſtraitneth itſelf again into a river, leaving the ſea or lake Genezereth. Notwithſtanding Montanus deſcribes it far to the weſt, and towards the Mediterranean ſea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laicſtan, Adrichome, and all other the beſt authors. This city was the greateſt of all thoſe of Decapolis: but the children of Manaſſeh could not expel the inhabitants thereof, and therefore called it Sane, an enemy; or Beth-ſan, the houſe of an enemy.

Over the walls of [d] Beth-ſan, the Philiſtines hung the body of Saul and his ſons, ſlain at Gilboa. It had, while the Chriſtian religion flouriſhed in thoſe parts, an archbiſhop, who had nine other biſhops of his dioceſe numbred by Tyrius, in lib. 14. cap. 12. but the ſame was afterwards tranſlated to Nazareth. The later travellers in thoſe parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubbiſh and the ruins of that city, goodly pillars, and other pieces of excellent marble, which witneſs the ſtately buildings and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and deſolate village.

From Beth-ſan, keeping the way by Jordan, they find an ancient city called Salim; which city, the ancient Rabbins, ſaith [e] Jerome, do not find to be the ſame with Jeruſalem; there being, in the time of Jerome, and ſince, a town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembred; which if the place of ſcripture, Gen. xiii. 18. do not confirm, where the Vulgar readeth Tranſivitque in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others read, Venit incolumis ad civitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John iii. 13. where it is ſaid, that John was baptizing in Ænon near Saleim, may ſomewhat ſtrengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Saleim of which St. John ſpeaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. ix. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shuhal; of which we read, 1 Sam. xiii. 17. for as for that which is added out of Cant. vi. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a woman of this Saleim, near Ænon, it hath no probability.

Not far from thence, where they place Salem, they find Bezek the city of Adonibezek; Joſephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul aſſembled the ſtrength of Iſrael and Juda, to the number of 330000, when he meant to relieve Jabeſh-Gilead, againſt Naaſh the Ammonite; who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to ſuffer their right eyes to be thruſt out. Near Bezek, is the city of Bethbera, or rather Beth-bara, of which Judg. vii. 24. in the ſtory of Gideon; and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited; in the border whereof ſtood an altar conſecrated to Baal: which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that ſtone on which Abimelech the baſtard ſlew his ſeventy brothers (an heatheniſh cruelty, practiſed by the Turks to this day;) and not far hence, between the village of Aſophon and Jordan, Ptolomæus Lathurus overthrew Alexander king of the Jews; and ſlaughtered, as [a] Joſephus numbreth them, 3000; but according to Timagenes 5000: after which victory, as Ptolemy paſs'd by the villages of the Jews, he ſlew all their women, and cauſed the young children to be ſod in great caldrons, that the reſt of the Jews might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be men-eaters, and ſtrike them with the greater terror.

Towards the weſt, and on the border of Iſſachar, they place the cities of [b] Aner of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Judg. vii. 22. placeth in Ephraim; it was the habitation of Heliſæus the prophet, numbred among thoſe places, 1 Reg. iv. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon; to whoſe charge alſo Tahanach belonged, a place of great ſtrength, which at the firſt reſiſted Joſhua, tho' their king was afterward hanged, and their city given to the Levites.

In the body of this territory of Manaſſeh, but ſomewhat nearer to Jordan than to the Mediterranean ſea, were three great cities, to wit, Therſa, whoſe king was one of thoſe that Joſhua ſlew; which the kings of Iſrael uſed for their regal ſeat, till ſuch time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her ſon's health; who knowing her, tho' ſhe were diſguiſed, told her of her ſon's death.

The ſecond was Thebes, near Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame; in the aſſault of the tower of this town, whereunto the citizens retired, the baſtard Abimilech was wounded by a weighty ſtone, thrown by a woman over the wall; who deſpairing of his recovery, [c] commanded his page to ſlay him out-right, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he periſhed by the ſtroke of a woman. But others ſet this city in Ephraim, near Sichem or Neapolis.

The third is Acrabata, of which the territory adjoining is called Acrabatena (one of the ten toparchies or governments in Judea) for which Jerome, 1 Maccab. v. reads Arabathena; but in the Greek it is Acrabatine: Iſidore calls it Agrabat. This city had one of the largeſt territories of all Paleſtine, belonging to the governour thereof. Joſephus remembreth it often, as in his ſecond book of the Jews wars, c. 11, 25, 28. and elſewhere.

The difference between a tetrarchy and a toparchy, was, that the firſt was taken for a province, and the other for a city, with ſome leſſer territory adjoining; and a tetrarch is the ſame with Præſes in Latin, and preſident in Engliſh, being commonly the fourth part of a kingdom, and thereof ſo called. [d] Pliny nameth ſeventeen tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and ſo hath the kingdom of Ireland to this day, [e] Lempſter, Ulſter, Connath, and Munſter.

To the ſouth-weſt of Acrabata, they place the cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Joſh. xxi. 25. and 1 Chron. vi. 70. gathers, that theſe two are but one; and that Jibleham, Joſh. xvi. 11. is another name of the ſame city.

Then is Jezrael a regal city, ſet at the foot of the mountains of Gilboa, towards the ſouth-weſt: herein Jezabel, by a falſe accuſation, cauſed Naboth to be ſtoned, to the end ſhe might poſſeſs his vineyard joining to the city; which Naboth refuſed to ſell, becauſe it was his inheritance from his father.

Joram alſo was caſt unburied into the ſame field; for which his mother [f] Jezabel murdered Naboth.

Towards the ſea, from Jezrael, is the city which they call Gaber; in whoſe aſcent, as Ahaziah king of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had ſlain Joram, he was wounded with the ſhot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adjoining. The ſcripture calls this city of Gaber, [g] Gur.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good king Joſias was ſlain by Necho king of Egypt, in a war unadviſedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Aſſyria againſt the king thereof, by the commandment of God; whom Joſias thought to reſiſt in his paſſage: it was afterwards called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour city to Adadremmon was [h] Maggeddo, often remembred in the ſcriptures; whoſe king was ſlain among the reſt by [i] Joſhua; yet they defended their city for a long time againſt Manaſſeh. The river which paſſeth by the town, may perhaps be the ſame which Ptolemy calleth Chorſeus: and not that of which we have ſpoken in Zabulon. For becauſe this name is not found in the ſcriptures, many of thoſe that have deſcribed the holy land, delineate no ſuch river. Moore only ſets it down in his geography of the twelve tribes: but the river which paſſeth by Maggeddo, he underſtandeth to be but a branch falling thereinto. Laicſtan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place; agreeable to this ſcripture in the vth of Judges; Then fought the kings of Canaan in Tanaac, by the waters of Maggeddo. But theſe authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the torrent ſo called.

But ſeeing that ancient coſmographers ſtretch out the bounds of Phenicia even to Sebaſte, or Samaria; and [k] Strabo far beyond it on the ſea-coaſt: and Joſephus calls Cæſaria Paleſtinæ a city of Phenicia: yea, Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phenicia as far as Gaza: ſeeing alſo Ptolemy ſets down Chorſeus for the partition of Phenicia and Judea, this river running eaſt and weſt parallel with Samaria; it is very probable that this torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the city which it watereth, is the ſame which Ptolemy in his 4th table of Aſia, calleth Chorſeus. The later travellers of the holy land call Maggeddo, Subimbre at this day.

Of Cæſaria Paleſtinæ, and ſome other towns.

FRom Maggeddo towards the weſt, and near the Mediterranean ſea, was that glorious city of Cæſaria Paleſtinæ: firſt, the tower of Straton: the ſame which Pliny calls Apollonia: tho' Ptolemy ſets Apollonia elſewhere, and towards Egypt, between this city and Joppe, to which Veſpaſian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod rebuilt, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world: for beſides the edifices, which he reared within the walls, of cut and poliſh'd marbles, the theatre and amphitheatre, from whence he might look over the ſeas far away, with the high and ſtately towers and gates, he forced a harbour of great capacity, being in former times but an open bay: and the wind blowing from the ſea, the merchants haunting that port, had no other hope, but in the ſtrength of their cables and anchors. This work he performed with ſuch charge and labour, as the like of that kind hath not been found in any kingdom, nor in any age: which, becauſe the materials are fetched from far, and the weight of the ſtones was ſuch, as it exceedeth belief, I have added Joſephus's own words of this work, which are theſe: [a] Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnæ claſſi recipiendæ ſufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia ſaxa demiſit: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodecim, altitudine novem-pedali: fuerunt quædam etiam majora, minora alia. To mend this inconvenience of place (ſaith Joſephus) he compaſs'd in a bay wherein a great fleet might well ride: and let down great ſtones twenty fathom deep: whereof ſome were 50 foot long, 18 foot broad, and 9 foot thick: and ſome bigger and ſome leſſer. To this he added an arm or cauſway of 200 foot long to break the waves: the reſt he ſtrengthned with a ſtone wall, with divers ſtately towers thereon builded: of which the moſt magnificent he called Druſus, after the name of Druſus the ſon-in-law of Ceſar: in whoſe honour he intitled the city it ſelf, Cæſaria of Paleſtine: all which he performed in 12 years time. It was the firſt of the eaſtern cities that received a biſhop: afterwards erected into an archbiſhoprick, commanding 20 others under it, ſaith [b] Tyrius.

St. Jerome nameth Theophilus, Euſebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Gelaſius, to have been biſhops thereof. In this city was Cornelius the centurion baptized by St. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the apoſtle. St. Paul was herein two years priſoner, under the preſident Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Feſtus: by whom, making his appeal, he was ſent to Ceſar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was paſſing on to celebrate the Quenquennalia, taking delight to be called a God by his flatterers, he was ſtricken by an angel unto death, ſaith Joſephus.

To the north of Cæſaria ſtandeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as ſome read, Joſh. i. 2. ſo called (ſaith Adricomius) becauſe it joineth to the ſea, whoſe king was ſlain by Joſhua. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reads in tractibus Dor: and ſo the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, altho' 1 Kings iv. 11. for the like ſpeech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: the Septuagint in the place of Joſhua call it Nephith-Dor, and in the other of the kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Joſh. xii. 23. Judg. i. 27.) may ſeem to be Dor. It was a ſtrong and powerful city, and the fourth in account of thoſe 12 principalities, or ſitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Macc. xv. 11. placeth it between the hill Carmel, and the mouth of the river Chorſeus: for ſo ſome name the river Corſeus, of which we have ſpoken already.

Into this city, for the ſtrength thereof, Typhon fled from Antiochus the ſon of Demetrius, where he was by the ſame Antiochus beſieged with 120000 footmen, and 8000 horſe: the ſame perfidious villain that received 200 talents for the ranſom of Jonathan [c] Macchabeus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then ſlew him: and after him ſlew his own maſter, uſurping for a while the kingdom of Syria. It had alſo a biſhop's ſeat of the dioceſe of Cæſaria.

From Cæſaria towards the ſouth, they place the cities of Caparnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for beſides that Caparnaum famous in the evangeliſts, they find in theſe parts near the weſt ſea, another of the ſame name. Of Gabe, Jerome, in locis Hebraicis. [d] The famous Galgal, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they ſay it was, whoſe king was ſlain by Joſhua.

Then Antipatris, ſo called of Herod, in honour of his father: but in the time of the [e] Macchabees, it was called Capharſalama: in the fields whereof Judas Macchabæus overthrew a part of the army of Nicanor, lieutenant to Demetrius: an army drawn into Judea by a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the prieſthood, firſt under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was St. Paul carried priſoner from Jeruſalem, conducted by 470 ſoldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the army of Godfry of Bulloign attempted it in vain; yet was it taken by Baldwin. It was honoured in thoſe days with a biſhop's ſeat, but it is now a poor village, called Aſſur, ſaith Brochard. Near unto this city the prophet Jonas was three days preſerved in the body of a whale.

Into the land, from Antipatris and Cæſaria, ſtandeth Narbata, whereof the territory taketh name: which Ceſtius the Roman, waſted with fire and ſword, becauſe the Jews which dwelt at Cæſaria fled thence, and carried with them the book of Moſes. Near unto it is the mountain of Abdia, the ſteward of king Achab; wherein he hid an hundred prophets, and fed them: after which he himſelf is ſaid to have obtained from God the ſpirit of prophecy alſo.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the kingdom of Phenicia.

SECT. I.

The bounds, and chief cities, and founders, and name of this kingdom: and of the invention of letters aſcribed to them.

BEcauſe theſe five tribes, of Aſher, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Iſſachar, and the half of Manaſſeh, poſſeſs'd the better part of that ancient kingdom of Phenicia, to wit, of ſo much as lay to the ſouth part of Anti-libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of thoſe kings which have governed therein: at leaſt ſo many of them as time (which devoureth all things) have left to poſterity: and that the reſt periſhed, it is not ſtrange: ſeeing ſo many volumes of excellent learning in ſo long a race and revolution, and in ſo many changes of eſtates, and conqueſts of heathen princes, have been torn, caſt away, or otherwiſe conſumed.

The limits of this kingdom, as touching the ſouth parts, are very uncertain: but all coſmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the north, where that part of Syria, which is called Caſiotis, ends: moſt of them bounding it by Orthoſia to the north of Tripolis. [f] Ptolemy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the river Eleutherus that falls into the ſea at the iſland of Aradus, ſomewhat to the north of Orthoſia, and ſtretching from thence along the coaſt of the Mediterranean ſea, as far as the river of Chorſeus; which ſeems to be that which the Jews call the torrent, or river of Maggeddo. [g] Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budæus, Joppe and Gaza. Phænicia apud priſcos appellata (ſaith Budæus) quæ nunc Palæſtina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phenicia of old (ſaith he) which now is called Paleſtina of Syria.

[a] Strabo comprehends in this country of Phenicia all the ſea ſide of Judea, and Paleſtina, even unto Peluſium, the firſt port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cœleſyria, which he boundeth not. But for my ſelf, I take a middle courſe, and like beſt of Ptolemy's deſcription, who was ſeldom deceived of his own art. It had in it theſe famous maritimate cities (beſides all thoſe of the iſlands) to wit, Aradus, Orthoſia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæſaria Paleſtinæ: and by reaſon of the many ports and goodly ſea-towns, it anciently commanded the trade of the eaſtern world: and they were abſolute kings of the Mediterranean ſea.

The ancient regal ſeat of thoſe princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the firſt ſon of Canaan: and the people then ſubject to that family were called Zidonians; the ſame ſtate continuing even unto Joſhua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one king of all that region, afterwards called Phenicia: which Procopius alſo confirmeth in his ſecond book of Vandal Wars. But in proceſs of time the city of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the [b] prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them firſt built, and peopled.

But after the death of Moſes, and while Joſhua yet governed Iſrael, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phenician bred in Egypt, came thence with his ſons Cadmus, Phenix, Cyrus, and Cilix (ſay Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and poſſeſs'd the cities of Tyre and Zidon, to wit, the new Tyrus; and brought into Phenicia (ſo called after the name of his ſecond ſon) the uſe of letters: which alſo Cadmus, in his purſuit after his ſiſter Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus king of Crete, when he ſurpriſed Tyre, had ſtolen her thence: of which the poets deviſed the fable of Jupiter's transformation into a bull, by whom that ſtealth was alſo ſuppoſed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the firſt king of Phenicia; and finds Cadmus his ſucceſſor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it ſeemeth that Belus was the father of Agenor, and not Neptune: becauſe the ſucceſſors of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Aſdrubal, Hannibal: whoſe memory Virgil alſo toucheth in theſe verſes.

Hic regina gravem gemmis auroque poposcit,
Implevitque moro pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo ſoliti.

The queen anon commands the weighty bowl
(Weighty with precious ſtones and maſſy gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus' line.

Whether this Belus were father or grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it ſeems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was anceſtor to theſe Phenicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the ſon of Neptune by Libya the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the ſon of Telegonus, according to Euſebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops's time, ſaith St. Auguſtin, Moſes left Egypt: Agenor's ſucceſſor living at once with Joſhua. Now that Agenor returned about the ſame time into the territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that region the name of Phenicia, in honour of his ſon. But inſtead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonoſor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the ſame nation, and brought up in Egypt, where he learned the uſe of letters (Egypt flouriſhed in all kind of learning in Moſes's time) or were he by nation an Egyptian; yet it is very likely, that either he came to ſave his own territory; or otherwiſe to defend the coaſt of Canaan from the Iſraelites, who were by Moſes led out of Egypt, to the great loſs and diſhonour of that nation, and by Joſhua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and poſſeſs the Canaanites land. For tho' the Egyptians, by reaſon of the loſs which they received by the hand of God in the Red ſea, and by the ten plagues caſt on them before that, and by the ſlaughter of ſo many of the male children at the ſame time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by land, which alſo they knew had ſo many powerful nations to defend it; the deſarts interjacent, and the ſtrong Edomites, Moabites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having ſuch veſſels or ſhips, or gallies, as were then in uſe, did not in all probability neglect to garriſon the ſea-coaſt, or aſſiſt Agenor with ſuch forces as they had to ſpare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philiſtines, which held the ſhores of Canaan next adjoining unto them, were their friends and confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the courſe of the ſtory, thoſe cities of Phenicia, which Agenor was ſaid to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended againſt Joſhua, and againſt the tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Joſhua xix. 29. called the ſtrong city, Accho afterwards Ptolomais, Achzib and Dor) were all that Phenicia had in thoſe days.

That the kings of Phenicia were mighty, eſpecially by ſea, it appears, firſt by their defence againſt Iſrael: ſecondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not maſter them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their cities, tho' they were then but reguli, defended it ſelf 13 years againſt a king of kings, Nabuchodonoſor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, ſeemed irreſiſtible) ſpent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conqueſt of all the cities in Aſia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Beroſus out of Joſephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the ſon of Japhet. And for the region it ſelf, tho' Caliſthenes derives it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phonos of ſlaughter, becauſe the Phenicians ſlew all that came on their coaſts; yet for my ſelf, I take it that Phœnix the ſon of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phenicia, or Cadmus his ſon in Greece, were the inventors of letters it is ridiculous: and therefore the diſpute unneceſſary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the firſt light of all thoſe arts, ſciences, and civil policies, which they afterwards profeſſed and taught others: and that Pythagoras himſelf was inſtructed by the Libyans; to wit, from the ſouth and ſuperiour Egyptians: from whom thoſe which inhabited nearer the out-let of Nilus, as they ſay, borrowed their divinity and philoſophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received civility. Again, the Phenicians challenge this invention of letters and learning, acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do

In rude characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the ſon of Agenor, and was a Phenician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that anſwer made by Zeno; when he in a kind of reproach was called a ſtranger, and a Phenician;

[b] Si patria eſt Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipſe
Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros.

If a Phenician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was ſo: to whom Greece owes
The books of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phenicians were very ancient: and from the records and chronicles of Tyre, [c] Joſephus the hiſtorian confirms a great part of his antiquities. The Thracians again ſubſcribe to none of theſe reports; but affirm conſtantly, that the great Zamolixis flouriſhed among them, when Atlas lived in Mauritania, Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt, and Ochus in Phenicia. Yea, ſome of the French do not bluſh to maintain, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greeks the uſe of letters, and other ſciences. And do not we know that our Bards and Druids are as ancient as thoſe Gauls, and that they ſent their ſons hither to be by them inſtructed in all kind of learning?

Laſtly; whereas others beſtow this invention on Moſes: the ſame hath no probability at all; for he lived at ſuch time as learning and arts flouriſhed moſt, both in Egypt and Aſſyria, and he himſelf was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that letters were invented by thoſe excellent ſpirits of the firſt age, and before the general flood, either by Seth or Enos, or by whom elſe God knows; from whom all wiſdom and underſtanding hath proceeded. And as the ſame infinite God is preſent with all his creatures, ſo hath he given the ſame invention to divers nations; whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other, as well in this as in many other knowledges; for even in Mexico, when it was firſt diſcovered, there were found written books after the manner of thoſe hieroglyphicks, anciently uſed by the Egyptians, and other nations: and ſo had thoſe Americans, a kind of heraldry, and their princes differing in arms and eſcutcheons, like unto thoſe uſed by the kings and nobility of other nations: [d] Jura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Natural laws are common, and general.

SECT. II.

Of the kings of Tyre.

BUT whatſoever remaineth of the ſtory and kings of Phenicia (the book of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnaſeas, and others of that nation, being no where found) the ſame is to be gathered out of the ſcriptures, Joſephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Joſhua, to whom ſucceeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and ſo far towards the north as Aradus, took the name of Phenicia: what king ſucceeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at ſuch time as the Grecians beſieged Troy, Phaſis governed Phenicia.

In Jeremy's time, and while Jehoiakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a king apart: for Jeremy xxvii. 3. ſpeaketh of the kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of ſeveral kings.

In Xerxes's time, and when he prepared that incredible army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramneſtus ruled that part of Phenicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as ſome writers affirm, Xerxes's fleet, or rather, as I ſuppoſe, thoſe 300 gallies, which himſelf brought to his aid: for at this time it ſeemeth, that the Phenicians were tributaries to the Perſians: for being broken into Reguli, and petty kings in Jeremy's time, they were ſubjected by Nabuchodonoſor; of whoſe conqueſts in the chapter before remembred, Jeremiah propheſied.

Tennes, tho' not immediately, ſucceeded Tetramneſtus, remembred by D. Siculus in his fourteenth book.

Strato, his ſucceſſor, and king of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, becauſe of his dependency upon Darius, and that his predeceſſors had ſerved the eaſt empire againſt the Grecians. But divers kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were conſumed 130 years, and ſomewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander eſteemed the more unworthy of reſtitution, becauſe (ſaith Curtius, l. 4.) he rather ſubmitted himſelf by the inſtigation of his ſubjects (who foreſaw their utter ruin by reſiſtance) than that he had any diſpoſition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, [e] Athenæus, out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living, and moſt voluptuous; alſo that he appointed certain games and prizes for women-dancers and ſingers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and aſſembled: that having beheld the moſt beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own uſe and delights. Of the ſtrange accident about the death of one Strato king of theſe coaſts, St. [f] Jerome and others make mention: who having heard that the Perſians were near him with an army too weighty for his ſtrength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, becauſe of his falling away from that empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himſelf, but fainting in the execution, his wife being preſent, wreſted the ſword out of his hand, and ſlew him: which done, ſhe alſo therewith pierced her own body, and died.

After Alexander was poſſeſſed of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the kingdom to Hephæſtion to diſpoſe of: who having received great entertainment of one of the citizens, in whoſe houſe he lodged, offered to recompenſe him therewith, and willingly offered to eſtabliſh him therein: but this citizen, no leſs virtuous than rich, deſired Hephæſtion that this honour might be conferred on ſome one of the blood and race of their ancient kings: and preſented unto him Balonimus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus; Juſtin, Abdolomius; and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal eſtate, was with his own hands working in his garden, ſetting herbs and roots, for his relief and ſuſtenance: tho' otherwiſe a wiſe man, and exceeding juſt.

Theſe were the ancient kings of Zidon: whoſe eſtate being afterwards changed into popular or Ariſtocratical, and by times and turns ſubjected to the emperors of the eaſt, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the tribe of Aſher.

The kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuel's time, it doth not appear: Joſephus the hiſtorian, as is ſaid, had many things wherewith he gar-niſhed his antiquities from the Tyrian chronicles: and out of Joſephus and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a deſcent of ſome 20 kings of the Tyrians; but theſe authors, tho' they both pretend to write out Menander Epheſius, do in no ſort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the firſt king of the Tyrians, that Joſephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the ſame perchance that the ſon of Sirach mentioneth in his 46th chapter, ſpeaking of the princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Suron ſucceeded, if he be not one and the ſame with Abibalus. David (ſaith [a] Euſebius out of Eupolemus) conſtrained this Suron to pay him tribute, of whom alſo David complaineth, Pſalm lxxxiii.

Hiram ſucceeded Suron, whom Joſephus calls Irom, and Theophilus ſometimes Hieronimus, ſometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and ſent him cedars, with maſons and carpenters, to perform his buildings in Jeruſalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebuſites. The ſame was he that ſo greatly aſſiſted Solomon: whom he not only furniſhed with cedars, and other materials towards the raiſing of the temple, and with great ſums of money, but alſo he joined with him in his enterpriſe of the eaſt India, and of Ophir: and furniſhed Solomon with mariners and pilots; the Tyrians being of all nations the moſt excellent navigators: and lent him 120 talents of gold. Of this [b] Hiram, there is not only mention in divers places of ſcripture, but in Joſephus's antiquities, the 7th and 8th chap. ver. 2, 3. in Theophilus's 3d book, in Tatianus's oration againſt the Greeks, and in Zonaras, tome the firſt. This prince ſeemeth to be very mighty and magnificent; he deſpiſeth the 20 towns which Solomon offered him: he defendeth himſelf againſt that victorious king David: and gave his daughter in marriage to [c] Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whoſe ſake he was contented to worſhip Aſteroth, the idol of the Phenicians. Hiram lived 53 years.

Balaſtartus, whom [d] Theoph. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, ſucceeded Hiram king of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7 years, according to Joſephus.

Abdaſtartus the eldeſt ſon of Baleaſtartus, governed 9 years, and lived but 20 years according to Joſephus: but after Theophilus, he reigned 12 years, and lived 54, who being ſlain by the 4 ſons of his own nurſe, the eldeſt of them held the kingdom 12 years.

Aſtartus, brother to Abdaſtartus, recovered the kingdom from this uſurper, and reigned 12 years.

[e] Aſtarimus, or Atharimus, after [e] Theophilus, a 3d brother, followed Aſtartus, and ruled 9 years, and lived in all 54.

[f] Phelles the 4th ſon of Baleaſtartus, and brother to the 3 former kings, ſlew Aſtarimus, and reigned 8 months, and lived 50 years.

Ithobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) ſon to the 3d brother Aſtarimus, who was the chief prieſt of the goddeſs Aſtarta, which was a dignity next unto the king, revenged the death of his father, and ſlaughtered his uncle [g] Phelles: and reigned 32 years, the ſame which in 1 Kings xvi. is called Ethbaal, whoſe daughter Jezebel Achab married.

Badezor, or Bazor, the ſon of Ithobalus, or [h] Ethbaal, brother to Jezebel, ſucceeded his father, and reigned 6 years, and lived in all 45.

Mettimus ſucceeded Badezor, and reigned but 9 years (ſaith [k] Joſephus) he had two ſons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Eliſa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his father 40 years, and lived 56. In the 7th year of whoſe reign, Eliſa ſailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143 years and 8 months after the temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289 years after Troy was taken, and 143 before Rome; and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido muſt be far out of ſquare. For Pygmalion, covetous of Sicheus's riches, who had married his ſiſter Eliſa, ſlew him traiterouſly as he accompanied him in hunting: or, if we believe [l] Juſtin and Virgil, at the altar: whereupon Eliſa, fearing to be deſpoiled of her huſband's treaſure, fled by ſea into Africa, as aforeſaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to purſue, he was by his mother's tears, and by threats from the oracle arreſted. Barca accompanied his ſiſter, and aſſiſted her in the erection of Carthage: and from him ſprang that noble family of Barcæ in Africa, of which race deſcended many famous captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, becauſe of her manlike acts: others from Jedidia, a ſurname of Solomon.

Eluleus ſucceeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36 years: the ſame that overthrew the fleet of Salmanaſſar, in the port of Tyre: notwithſtanding which he continued his ſiege before it on the land ſide 5 years, but in vain.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himſelf to be as wiſe as Daniel: and that he knew all ſecrets (ſaith Ezekiel) of whom the prophet writeth at large in his xxviiith chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this prince died, or was ſlain in that long ſiege of Nabuchodonoſor: who ſurrounded and attempted Tyre 13 years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10 years a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonoſor: for after his death, it was governed by divers judges, ſucceeding each other: firſt by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the prieſt, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them ſome 7 years and odd months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a king for one year: after him Merbalus ſent from Babylon 4 years; after him Irom, ſent thence alſo 20 years. In the 17th of whoſe reign Cyrus began to govern Perſia.

SECT. III.

Of Bozius's conceit, that the Edumeans inhabiting along the Red ſea, were the progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phenicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this kingdom and ſtate of the Tyrians, mixed with a diſcourſe of divers other nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a tract at large, intitled, De ruinis Gentium. And altho' the great and many alterations found in this and other cities, yea in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable and the ſame for ever; yet whereas the ſaid Bozius, inforcing here-hence, that the proſperity and ruin of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forſaking the true religion; to prove this his aſſertion, ſuppoſeth the Tyrians to have been Edumeans, deſcended from Eſau, Jacob's brother: firſt, it can hardly be believed that Tyre, when it flouriſhed moſt in her ancient glory, was in any ſort truly devout and religious. But to this end [i] beſides the proof which the ſcriptures give of Hiram's good affection, when Solomon built the temple) he brings many conjectural arguments, whereof the ſtrongeſt is their pedigree and deſcent: it being likely in his opinion, that the poſterity of Eſau received from him by tradition the religion of Abraham and Iſaac. That the Tyrians were Edumeans, he endeavours to ſhew, partly by weak reaſons painfully ſtrained from ſome affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others witneſs, that the Tyrians came from the Red ſea, in which there were three iſlands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Zidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the cities of Phenicia. Conſidering therefore that all the coaſt of the Red ſea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumeans: as Elah and Eſiongaber, or under the Amalekites who deſcended of Amalek the nephew of Eſau, whoſe chief city was Madian, ſo called of Madian the ſon of Abraham by Cethura, whoſe poſterity did people it: the conſequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in religion from the children of Iſrael. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his companions brought not into Greece the worſhip of Aſtartis the idol of the Sidonians. That the parents of Thales and Pherecides being Phenicians, themſelves differed much in their philoſophy from the idolatrous cuſtoms of the Greeks. That in Teman, a town of the Edumeans, was an univerſity, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who diſputed with Job, religion was ſincerely taught.

Such is the diſcourſe of Bozius, who labouring to prove one paradox by another, deſerves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumeans, they were then of the true religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumeans at all. In what religion Eſau brought up his children, it is no where found written; but that himſelf was a profane man, and diſavowed by God, the ſcriptures in plain terms expreſs. That his poſterity were idolaters, is directly proved in the 25th chapter of the 2d book of Chronicles, that the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the houſe of Iſrael, ſave only when David and ſome of his race, kings of Juda, held them in ſubjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of David's unfriendly behaviour amongſt them, when firſt they were ſubdued? Surely, it was not any argument of kindred or alliance between Tyrus and mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with David; even then when Joab ſlew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill treated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſdom of Eliphaz the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumeans puniſhed, for being ſuch as David in his own days found them. Altho' indeed the city of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reaſon with Job, is not that in Edumea, but another of the ſame name, lying eaſt from the ſea of Galilee, and adjoining to Huſ, the country of Job: and to Sueh the city of Bildad the Shuite; as both ſuch chorographers who beſt knew thoſe parts, do plainly ſhew, and the holy text maketh manifeſt. For Job is ſaid to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wiſdom, all the people of the eaſt; not the inhabitants of mount Seir, which lay due ſouth from Paleſtina. True it is, that Eiephaz the ſon of Eſau had a ſon called Teman: but that fathers were wont in thoſe days to take name of their ſons, I no where find. And Iſhmael alſo had a ſon called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the eaſt had the name; for as much as in the ſeventh chapter of the book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the eaſt are called Iſhmaelites. He that well conſiders how great and ſtrong a nation Amalek was, which durſt give battle to the hoſt of Iſrael, wherein were 600000 able men, will hardly believe that ſuch a people were deſcended from one of Eſau's grandchildren. For how powerful and numberleſs muſt the forces of all Edom have been, if one tribe of them, yea, one family of a tribe had been ſo great? ſurely mount Seir, and all the regions adjoining, could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalek, or aſſiſted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalek is no where in ſcripture named for a tribe in Edom, but a nation of itſelf, if diſtinct from the Iſhmaelites. The like may be ſaid of Midian, that the founder thereof being ſon to Abraham by Keturah, doubtleſs was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seigniory of the Red ſea coaſt, which Bozius imagines the Edumeans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held ſome places, as Elan and Ezion-gaber on the Red ſea ſhore, yet in Moſes's time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moſes himſelf ſaith, that Iſrael did compaſs all the borders of Edom; within which limits had Midian ſtood, Moſes muſt needs have known it: becauſe he had ſojourned long in that country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural arguments, how probable ſoever, are needleſs in ſo manifeſt a caſe. For in the lxxxiii. Pſalm, Edom, Amalek, and Tyre, are named as diſtinct nations: yea, the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good authors ſhew, and Bozius himſelf confeſſeth, were Canaanites, as appears Gen. x. 15, 19. appointed by God to have been deſtroyed, and their lands given to the children of Aſher, Joſh. xxix. becauſe they were idolaters, and of the curſed ſeed of Canaan, not couſins to Iſrael, nor profeſſors of the ſame religion. For tho' Hiram ſaid, Bleſſed be God who hath ſent king David a wiſe ſon: we cannot infer that he was of David's religion. The Turk hath ſaid as much of Chriſtian princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sidonians then worſhipped Aſhteroth, and drew Solomon alſo to the ſame idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great proviſion of corn and oil, and the offer of twenty towns or villages in Galilee. And if we rightly conſider things, it will appear, that Hiram in all points dealt merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over-peſtered, being otherwiſe apt to yield ſilks: as the Andarine ſilks which come from thence, and other good commodities. For corn and oil, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well ſpare to Solomon. Alſo gold for land: wherein Solomon was the wiſer; who having got the gold firſt, gave to Hiram the worſt villages that he had; with which the Tyrian was ill pleaſed. But it was a neceſſary policy, which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Iſrael. For David had ſubdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thro' which countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carry their wares on camels, to their fleets on the Red ſea, and back again to Tyrus: ſo that Solomon being lord of all the countries thro' which they were to paſs, could have cut off their trade.

But the Iſraelites were no ſeamen, and therefore glad to ſhare with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as lord of the ſea-towns, which his father had taken from the Philiſtines, might have greatly greatly diſtreſſed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into ſubjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his father's treaſure in magnificent works, than in purſuing the conqueſt of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and ſent him cunning workmen, to increaſe his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and inſtruments of pleaſure.

As theſe paſſages between Solomon and Hiram, are no ſtrong arguments of piety in the Tyrians: ſo thoſe other proofs which Bozius frames negatively upon particular examples, are very weak. For what the religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knows. It ſeems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchaſed divine honours: which his daughters, nephews, and others of his houſe obtained, but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of ſuch hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but ſingle examples. Every ſavage nation hath ſome whoſe wiſdom excelleth the vulgar, even of civil people. Neither did the moral wiſdom of theſe men expreſs any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the gods of Greece; whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to ſay, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I think, the iſlands beforementioned in the Red ſea to have been, for they traded in all ſeas) were idolaters, even from their firſt beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were ſo likewiſe.

This their idolatry from Solomon's time onwards, is acknowledged by Bozius, who would have us think them to have been formerly a ſtrange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancy he is ſo peremptory, that he ſtileth men of contrary opinion, impios politicos; as if it were impiety to think that God (who even among the heathen, which have not known his name, doth favour virtue, and hate vice) hath often rewarded moral honeſty, with temporal happineſs. Doubtleſs this doctrine of Bozius would better have agreed with Julian the apoſtate, than with Cyril. For if the Aſſyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all thoſe nations of the Gentiles, did then proſper moſt, when they drew neareſt unto the true religion: what may be ſaid of the foul idolatry which grew in Rome, as faſt as Rome itſelf grew; and was inlarged with ſome new ſuperſtition, almoſt upon every new victory? How few great battles did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a temple to ſome new God, or ſome new honour to one of their old Gods? Yea, what one nation, ſave only that of the Jews, was ſubdued by them, whoſe gods they did not afterwards entertain in their city? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman majeſty. Shall we hereupon inforce the leud and fooliſh concluſion, which heathen writers uſed againſt the Chriſtians in the primitive Church; that ſuch idolatry had cauſed the city of Rome to flouriſh, and that the decay of thoſe abominations, did alſo bring with it the decay of the empire? It might well be thought ſo, if proſperity were a ſign or effect of true religion. Such is the blind zeal of Bozius, who writing againſt thoſe whom he falſly terms impious, gives ſtrength to ſuch as are impious indeed. But ſuch indiſcretion is uſually found among men of his humour; who having once either fooliſhly imbraced the dreams of others, or vainly faſhioned in their own brains, any ſtrange Chimera's of divinity, condemn all ſuch in the pride of their zeal, as atheiſts and infidels, that are not tranſported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pity it is, that ſuch mad dogs are oftentimes encouraged by thoſe, who having the command of many tongues, when they themſelves cannot touch a man in open and generous oppoſition, will wound him ſecretly by the malicious virtue of an hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the tribe of Ephraim; and of the kings of the ten tribes, whoſe head was Ephraim.

SECT. I.

Of the memorable places in the tribe of Ephraim.

HAVING now paſs'd over Phenicia, we come to the next territory adjoining; which is that of Ephraim, ſometime taken, per excellentiam, for the whole kingdom of the ten tribes. Ephraim was the ſecond ſon of Joſeph; whoſe iſſues, when they left Egypt, were in number 45000; all which dying in the deſarts, Joſhua excepted, there entered the Holy Land of their children, grown to be able men, 32500, who ſat down on the weſt ſide of Jordan, between Manaſſeh and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the north and ſouth; as Jordan and the Mediterranean ſea did by the eaſt and weſt.

The firſt and chief city which Ephraim had, was Samaria the metropolis of the kingdom of Iſrael, built by Amris, or Homri, king thereof, and ſeated on the top of the mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the ſea-coaſt. It was afterwards called Sebaſte, or Auguſta, in honour of Auguſtus Ceſar. This city is often remembred in the ſcriptures: and magnificent it was in the firſt building; for as Brochard obſerveth, the ruins which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than thoſe of Jeruſalem, tell thoſe that behold them, what it was when it ſtood upright: for to this day there found great ſtore of goodly marble pillars, with other hewen and carved ſtone, in great abundance, among the the rubbiſh.

It was beaten to the ground by the ſons of Hyrcanus the high prieſt: reſtored and built by the firſt Herod, the ſon of Antipater; who, to flatter Ceſar, called it Sebaſte. Herein were the prophets Heliſæus and Abdias buried; and ſo was John Baptiſt. It now hath nothing but a few cottages filled with Grecian monks.

Near Samaria towards the ſouth, is the hill of Bethel, and a town of that name; on the top of which mountain Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves to be worſhipped; with which he ſeduced the Iſraelites.

In ſight of this mountain of Bethel, was that ancient city of Sichem; after the reſtauration called [b]Neapolis, now Peloſa, and Napolaſa: it was deſtroyed by Simeon and Levi, in revenge of the raviſhment of their ſiſter Dinah: and after that by Abimelech evened with the ſoil. Jeroboam raiſed it up again; and the Damaſcenes a third time caſt it down.

Under

Under Sichem towards the ſea, ſtandeth Pharaton, or Pirhaton, on the mountain [a]Amalek, the city of Abdon judge of Iſrael; and under it Bethoron of the Levites, built, as it is ſaid, by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Near to this city, Judas Maccabeus overthrew Seron and Lyſias, lieutenants to Antiochus. This city had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Between Bethoron and the ſea, ſtandeth Samir, of which Joſh. x. and Saron, whoſe king was ſlain by [b]Joſhua: it is alſo mentioned Acts ix. 35. And of this Saron the valley taketh name; which beginning at Cæſaria Palæſtinæ, extendeth itſelf along the coaſt as far as Joppe, ſaith Adrichome. Tho' indeed the name Sarona is not particularly given to this valley, but to every fruitful plain region; for not only this valley is ſo called, to wit, between Ceſaria and Joppe, but that alſo between the mountain Tabor and the ſea of Galilee; for ſo St. Jerome, upon Iſaiah xxxv. interprets the word Saron: and ſo doth the ſame father, in his commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Aſſaron; underſtanding thereby a plain near Lidda: which Lidda, in his time, was called Dioſpolis, or the city of Jupiter, one of the toparchies of Judea, the fifth in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where St. Peter (non ſua ſed Chriſti virtute) cured Æneas. [c]Niger calls all that region, from Antilibanus to Joppe, Sarona. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, thoſe ravens and ſpoilers of all eſtates, diſturbers of commonwealths, uſurpers of other princes kingdoms: who with no other reſpect led, than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themſelves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the moſt ſavage and barbarous nations.

In Dioſpolis (ſaith Will. of Tyre) was [d]St. George beheaded, and buried; in whoſe honour and memory, Juſtinian the emperor cauſed a fair Church to be built over his tomb; theſe be Tyrius's words; Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Joppe, per latè patentem planitiem Eleutheriam pertranſeuntes, Liddam quæ eſt Dioſpolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii uſque hodie ſepulchrum oſtenditur, pervenerunt, ejus eccleſiam quum ad honorem ejuſdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus princeps Romanorum, Auguſtus Juſtinianus multo ſtudio & devotione prompta ædificari præceperat, &c. They having left, ſaith he, on the right hand, the ſea-towns Antipatris and Joppe, paſſing over the great open plain of Eleutheria, came to Lidda, which is Dioſpolis; where the ſumptuous tomb of the famous martyr St. George is at this day ſhewed: whoſe Church, when the godly and orthodox prince of the Romans, high and mighty Juſtinian, had commanded to be built, with great earneſtneſs and preſent devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius, by whoſe teſtimony we may conjecture that this St. George was not that Arian biſhop of Alexandria, but rather ſome better Chriſtian; for this of Alexandria, was ſlain there in an uproar of the people, and his aſhes caſt into the ſea, as [e]Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet alſo it may be, that this Georgius was a better Chriſtian than he is commonly thought: for his words of the temple of Genius, How long ſhall this ſepulchre ſtand? occaſioned the uproar of the people againſt him, as fearing leſt he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful temple. This alſo Marcellinus reports; who tho' he ſays, that this Georgius was alſo deadly hated of the Chriſtians, who elſe might have reſcued him: yet he addeth, that his aſhes, with the aſhes of two others, were therefore caſt into the ſea, leſt if their relicts had been gathered up, Churches ſhould be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not Georgius, whoſe name lives in the right honourable order of our knights of the garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius, above cited, witneſſeth to have been buried at Lidda, or Dioſpolis. The ſame alſo is confirmed by [f]Vitriac. St. Jerome affirms that it was ſometimes called Tigrida; and while the Chriſtians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a biſhop ſuffragan.

Near to Lidda, or Dioſpolis, ſtandeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama and Ramula, the native city of Joſeph, which buried the body of Chriſt. [g]There are many places which bear this name of Rama: one they ſet in the tribe of Judah near Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which, they ſay, adjoineth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the ſame with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama in the hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the north, along the coaſt, are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which 1 Chron. vi. Apollonia, of which [h]Joſephus in his antiquities, and in the wars of the Jews. Alſo Balſaliſa (for which Junius, 2 Kings iv. 42. reads Planities Shaliſtæ) they place hereabout in this tribe of Ephraim: but Junius, upon 1 Sam. vi. where we read of the land of Shaliſha, findeth it in Benjamin.

On the other ſide of the mountains of Ephraim, ſtandeth Goſna, one of the toparchies, or cities of government, the ſecond in dignity, of which the country about it taketh name.

Then [i]Thamnath-ſara, or, according to the Hebrew Thimnath-ſerach; one alſo of the ten toparchies or preſidencies of Judea, which they call Thamnitica; a goodly city and ſtrong, ſeated on one of the high hills of Ephraim, on the north of the hill called Gaas; which city and territory Iſrael gave unto their leader Joſhua; who alſo amplified it with buildings, near which he was buried. His ſepulchre remained in [k]St. Jerome's time, and over it the ſun engraven, in memory of that greateſt of wonders which God wrought in Joſhua's time.

In the places adjoining ſtandeth Adarſa, or Adaſa; where [l]Judas Maccabeus, with 3000 Jews, overthrew the army of Nicanor, lieutenant of Syria, near to Gaſer, or Gezer, which Joſhua took, and hang'd their king, a city of the Levites. It was afterwards taken by Pharaoh of Egypt, the people all ſlain, and the city razed: Solomon rebuilt it.

To the eaſt of this place, is the frontier city of Jeſleti, of which Joſh. xvi. 3. otherwiſe Pelethi, whence David had part of his pretorian ſoldiers, under the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous mountain and city of Silo, whereon the ark of God was kept ſo many years, till the Philiſtines got it.

To this they join the city of [m]Machmas, or Michmas, in which Jonathan Maccabeus inhabited; a place often remembred in the ſcriptures. It ſtandeth in the common way from Samaria towards Jeruſalem, and is now called Byra.

Then the village of Najoth where Saul propheſied; and near it [n]Ephron, one of thoſe cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboam, after the great overthrow given him. Then Kibtſaim of the Levites, of which Joſh. xxi. 22. which Junius thinks to be the ſame with Jokmeham, of which 1 Chron. vi. 68. As for Abſalom's Baalhaſar, which they find hereabout, Junius reads it in the plain of Chatſor; and finds it in the tribe of Juda; as Joſhua xv. we read of two Chatſors in that tribe, one near Kadeſh, ver. 23. and the other the ſame as Chetzron, ver. 25. towards Jordan.

In this tribe alſo they find the city of Mello; whoſe citizens, they ſay, joined with the Sichimites in making the baſtard Abimelech king: adding, that for the building thereof, with other cities, Solomon raiſed a tribute upon the people. But it ſeems that Mello, or [a] Millo, is a common name of a ſtrong fort or citadel: and ſo Junius, for Domus Millo, reads incolæ munitionis; and for Salomo ædificabat Millo, he reads, ædificabat munitionem; and ſo the Septuagint read τὴν ἄκραν in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Jeruſalem.

The other cities of note in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whoſe king was ſlain by Joſhua; and Janoach, or Janoah, ſpoiled by Teglatphalaſſar: Pekah then governing Iſrael; with divers others, but of no great fame.

The mountains of Ephraim ſometime ſignify the greateſt part of the land of the ſons of Joſeph, on the weſt of Jordan; ſeveral parts whereof are the hill of Samron, or Samaria, 1 Reg. xvi. 24. [b] the hill of Gahas, Judg. ii. 9. the hill of Tſalmon, or Salmon, Judg. ix. 48. the hills of the region of Tſuph, or Tſophim, Judg. ix. 5. where Rama Sophim ſtood, which was the city of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitful vines upon the ſides of theſe mountains, was the occaſion that Jacob in the ſpirit of prophecy, Gen. xlix. 22. compared Joſeph's two branches, Ephraim and Manaſſeh, to the branches of a fruitful vine planted by the well ſide, and ſpread her [c] daughter-branches along the wall: which allegory alſo Ezek xxii. in his lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten tribes, whoſe head was Ephraim) proſecutes: as alſo in his lamentation for Judah, he followeth the other allegory of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 9. comparing Judah to a lion. Upon the top of one of the higheſt of theſe hills of Ephraim, which overlooketh all the plains on both ſides of Jordan, they find the caſtle called Dok; which they make to be the ſame with Dagon, of which Joſeph. 1. bell. Jud. c. 2. in which caſtle, as it is 1 Mac. xvi. Ptolemy moſt traiterouſly, at a banquet, ſlew Simon Maccabæus his father-in-law.

Among the rivers of this tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in 2 Sam. xxiii. 30. where tho' Junius reads, Hiddai ex una vallium Gahaſi; yet the Vulgar, and Vatablus, read Giddai of the river of Gaas. Alſo in this tribe they place the river of Carith, by which the prophet Elias abode during the great drought, where he was [d] fed by the ravens: and after that the river was dried up, he travelled (by the ſpirit of God) towards Sidon, where he was relieved by the poor widow of Zarepta, whoſe dead ſon he revived, and increas'd her pittance of meal and oil, whereby ſhe ſuſtained her life.

SECT. II.

Of the kings of the ten tribes, from Jeroboam to Achab.

OF the firſt kings of Iſrael, I omit in this place to ſpeak, and reſerve it to the catalogue of the kings of Judah; of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the kings of the ten tribes; but briefly, beginning after the diviſion from Judah, and Benjamin, now it followeth to ſpeak. The firſt of theſe kings was Jeroboam the ſon of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda; who being a man of ſtrength and courage, was by Solomon made overſeer of the buildings of the Millo or munition of Jeruſalem, for as much as belong'd to the charge of the tribes of Ephraim and Manaſſeh, and ſo many of them as wrought in thoſe works. During which time, as he went from Jeruſalem, he encountred the prophet Ahijah; who made him know that he was by God deſtined to be king of Iſrael, and to command ten of the twelve tribes. After this, fearing that thoſe things might come to Solomon's knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shiſhak, whom Euſebius calleth Oſochores, whoſe daughter he married: the predeceſſor of which Shiſhak (if not the ſame) did likewiſe entertain Adad the Idumean, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his captain Joab; which Adad, the king of Egypt married to his wife's ſiſter Taphnes; uſing both him and Jeroboam as inſtruments to ſhake the kingdom of Judea, that himſelf might the eaſilier ſpoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Reboboam, [e] Shiſhak ſack'd the city of Jeruſalem, and carried thence all the treaſure of David and Solomon, and all the ſpoils which David took from Adadezer of Soba, with the preſents of Tohu king of Hamath, which were of an ineſtimable value.

This Jeroboam, after the death of Solomon, became lord of the ten tribes: and tho' he were permitted by God to govern the Iſraelites, and from a mean man exalted to that ſtate: yet preferring the policies of the world, before the ſervice and honour of God (as fearing that if the tribes under his rule ſhould repair to Jeruſalem to do their uſual ſacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worſhip (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, ſaith [f] St. Ambroſe, or rather of Aaron's calf in Horeb;) further, he made election of his prieſts out of the baſeſt and unlearned people. This king made his chief ſeat and palace at Sichem: he deſpiſed the warning of the Judean prophet, whom Joſephus calleth Adon, and Glycas, Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again reſtored; but continuing in his idolatry, and hardned, upon occaſion that the prophet returning was ſlain by a lion, Ahijah makes him know, that God purpoſed to root out his poſterity.

He was afterward overthrown by [g] Abia king of Judah, and died, after he had governed 22 years; whom Nadab his ſon ſucceeded: who in the ſecond year of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was ſlain, and rooted by Baaſha, who reigned in his ſtead; ſo Nadab lived king but two years.

Baaſha the ſon of Ahijah, the third king after the partition, made war with Aſa king of Judah: he ſeated himſelf in Therſa, and fortified Rama againſt Judah, to reſtrain their excurſions. Hereupon

upon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the materials, with which Baasha intended to fortify Rama; but being an idolater, he was threatned by Jehu the prophet, that it should befal his race, as it did to [a] Jeroboam; which afterward came to pass. He ruled twenty-four years, and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his son, who at a feast at his palace of Therza, was in his cups slain by Zambris, after he had reigned two years: and in him the prophecy of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a king seven days: but Ambris in revenge of the king's murder, set upon [b] Zambris, or Zimri; and inclosed him in Therza, and forced him to burn himself.

Ambris, or Homri, succeeded Ela, and transferred the regal seat from Therza to Samaria, which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This [c] Ambris was also an idolater, no less impious than the rest; and therefore subjected to Tabremmon king of Syria; the father of Benhadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras. But how this should stand, I do not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the son of Tabremmon, was invited by [d] Asa king of Juda, to assail Baasha king of Israel, the father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned 12 years, 6 in Therza, and 6 in Samaria, and left two children, Achab, and Athalia.

SECT. III.

Of Achab and his successors; with the captivity of the ten tribes.

ACHab, or Ahab, succeeded Omri, who not only upheld the idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians; but he married Jezabel the Zidonian; and as Jeroboam followed the religion of his Egyptian wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian; and erected an altar and a grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias; Elias prevailed in the trial of the sacrifice, and killeth the false prophets, and afterwards flieth for fear of Jezabel.

Benhadad, not long after, besieged Samaria; and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which the prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michæas) reproveth him: afterwards he caused Naboth, by a false accusation, to be stoned. Then joining with Josaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth; he was slain, as Michæas had foretold him.

He had 3 sons named in the scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Joas; besides 70 other sons by sundry wives and concubins.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himself by a fall; he sent for counsel to [e] Beelzebub the god of Acharon. Elijah the prophet meeteth the messenger on the way; and misliking that Ochozias sought help from that dead idol, asked the messenger, if there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth 2 captains, and with each 50 soldiers to bring Elijah unto him; both which, with their attendants, were consumed with fire. The 3d captain besought mercy at Elijah's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the king; avowing it to the king that he must then die: which came to pass in the 2d year of his reign.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, succeeded: he allured Josaphat king of Juda, and the king of Edom, to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000 sheep. The 3 kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the desarts. The prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The [f] Moabites are overthrown; their king flieth to Kirharaseth; and being besieged, according to some expositors, burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, whereat the three kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that region. Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the text to speak of the son of the king of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatning, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel, to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other kings refused to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatning, had burnt the king of Edom's son upon the rampire, that all the assailants might discern it: the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsook the party of the other kings; for want of whose assistance the siege was broken up.

After this the king of Aram sent to Joram, to heal Naaman the captain of his army of the leprosy. The answer of Joram was; am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth send to heal a man from his leprosy? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrel against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the king to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a prophet in Israel; and so Naaman was healed, by washing himself seven times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman. But his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof; from whence the sellers of spiritual gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are [g] Simonians, of Simon Magus.

Afterwards Benhadad, king of Aram or Damascus, having heard that this prophet did discover to the king of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his most secret council, sent a troop of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha struck blind, and brought them captives into Samaria; Joram then asked leave of the prophet to slay them; Elisha forbad him to harm them, but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own prince in safety.

The king of Aram, notwithstanding these benefits, did again attempt Samaria; and brought the citizens to extream famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the prophet Elisha. Elisha, by prayer, caused a noise of chariots and armour to sound in the air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege; an act of great admiration, as the same is written in [h] 2 Kings vii. After this, when Azael obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his master; Joram entring upon his frontier, took Ramoth Gilead; in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezrael to be cured. But whilst he lay there, Jehu (who commanded the army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the prophets sent by Elisha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, destroyed not only the race of his foregoers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupy the throne unto the 4th generation. Yet he upheld the idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous war, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who ſpoiled all the countries to the eaſt of Jordan; in which war he was ſlain (ſaith Cedrenus) whereof the ſcriptures are ſilent. Jehu reigned 28 years.

Joachaz, or Jehoahaz, the ſon of Jehu, ſucceeded his father, whom Azael and his ſon Benhadad often invaded, and in the end ſubjected, leaving him only 50 horſe, 20 chariots, and 10000 foot; and as it it written in [a] the ſcriptures, he made them like duſt beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17 years.

After Joachaz, Joas's ſon governed Iſrael; who, when he repaired to Eliſha the prophet, as he lay on his death-bed, the prophet promiſed him three victories over the Aramites: and firſt commanded him to lay his hand on his bow; and Eliſha covered the king's hands with his, and bad him open the window weſtward (which was towards Damaſcus) and then ſhoot an arrow thence-out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who ſmote it thrice, and ceaſed. The prophet then told him, that he ſhould have ſmitten five or ſix times; and then he ſhould have had ſo many victories over the Aramites as he gave ſtrokes. And ſo it ſucceeded with Joas, who overthrew the Aramites in three battles, and recovered the cities and territory from Benhadad the ſon of Azael, which his father Joachaz had loſt. He alſo overthrew [b] Amazia king of Juda, who provoked him to make the war; whereupon he entred Jeruſalem, and ſacked it, with the temple. This Joas reigned 16 years, and died; in whoſe time alſo the prophet Eliſha exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam, the third from Jehu, followed Joas his father, an idolater as his predeceſſors: but he recovered all the reſt of the land belonging to Iſrael, from Hamath, which is near Libanus, to the Dead ſea, and reigned 41 years.

Zacharias, the fourth and laſt of the houſe of Jehu, ſlain by Shallum his vaſſal, who reigned in his ſtead, governed ſix months. Shallum held the kingdom but one month, being ſlaughter'd by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem, who took revenge of Shallum, uſed great cruelty to thoſe that did not acknowledge him; ripping up the bellies of thoſe that were with child. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, [c] bought his peace with 10000 talents of ſilver; which he exacted by a tribute of 50 ſheckles for every man of wealth in Iſrael. Menahem governed 20 years.

Pekahiah, or Phaceia, or, after Zonaras, Phaceſia, ſucceeded; and after he had ruled two years, he was ſlain by Phaca, or Pekah, the commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekah's time, Phulaſſar, or Tiglat-Phylaſſar, invaded the kingdom of Iſrael, and won Ijon, Abel-Bethmaaca, Janoach, Kedeſh, Haſor, and Gilead, with all the cities of Galilee, [d] carrying them captives into Aſſyria: he was drawn in by Achas king of Judah, againſt Pekah and Rezin, the laſt of the Adades. For Achas being waſted by Pekah of Iſrael, and by Rezin of Damaſcus, did a third time borrow the church riches, and therewith engaged the Aſſyrian, who firſt ſuppreſſed the monarchy of Syria and Damaſcus, and then of Iſrael; and this inviting of the great Aſſyrian, was the utter ruin of both ſtates, of Iſrael and of Judah. Pekah reigned 20 years.

Then Hoſhea, or Oſea, who ſlew Pekah, became the vaſſal of Salmanaſſar; but hoping to ſhake off the Aſſyrian yoke, he ſought aid from So, or Sua, or Sebicus king of Egypt: which being known to the Aſſyrian, he caſt him into priſon, beſieged Samaria, and maſtered it; carried the ten idolatrous tribes into Nineveh in Aſſyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other eaſtern regions, and there diſperſed them: and replanted Samaria with divers nations, and chiefly with the Cuthæ (inhabiting about Cutha a river in Perſia, or rather in [e] Arabia Deſerta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with thoſe of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Meſopotamia upon Euphrates, of whoſe conqueſt Senacherib vaunteth) alſo with thoſe of Ava; which were of the ancient Avins, who inhabited the land of the Philiſtines in Abraham's time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out; and at this time they were of Arabia the deſart, called Havæi; willing to return to their ancient ſeats. To theſe he added thoſe of Chamath or Ituræa, the ancient enemies of the Iſraelites, and ſometimes the vaſſals of the Adads of Damaſcus, which ſo often afflicted them. And thus did this Aſſyrian adviſe himſelf better than the Romans did: for after Titus and Veſpaſian had waſted the cities of Judea and Jeruſalem, they carried the people away captive; but left no others in their places, but a very few ſimple labourers, beſides their own thin garriſons, which ſoon decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this tranſmigration, plantation, and diſplantation, happened in the year of the world 3292, the 6th year of Ezekiah, king of Judah; and the 9th of Hoſea the laſt king of Iſrael.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Judah, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manaſſeh.

SECT. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other towns.

NOW following the coaſt of the Mediterranean ſea, that portion of land aſſigned to the tribe of Dan, joineth to Ephraim, whereof I ſpake laſt: of which family there were num-bred at mount Sinai, 62700 fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the reſt in the deſarts, there entred the holy land of their ſons 66400 bearing arms. The firſt famous city in this tribe on the ſea coaſt was Joppe, or Japho, as in Joſhua xix. 46. one of the moſt ancient of the world, and the moſt famous of others on that coaſt, becauſe it was the port of Jeruſalem. From hence Jonas imbarked himſelf when he fled from the ſervice of God, towards Tharſis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this city received many changes: and while Judas Macchabæus governed the Jews, the Syrians that were garriſoned in Joppe, having their fleet in the port, invited 200 principal citizens aboard them, and caſt them all into the ſea: which [a] Judas revenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which ſought to eſcape to the ſword.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Ceſtius the lieutenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Chriſt 1250, Lodowick the French king gave it new walls and towers: it is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain rocks in that port, whereunto it is reported that Andromeda was faſtned with chains, and thence delivered from the ſea-monſter by Perſeus. This fable (for ſo I take it) is confirmed by [b] Joſephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scaurus, during his office of Edileſhip, ſhewed the bones of this monſter to the people of Rome. St. Jerome upon Jonas ſpeaks of it indifferently.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where [c] Judas Macchabæus burnt the reſt of the Syrian fleet: the fire and flame whereof was ſeen at Jeruſalem, 240 furlongs off. It had ſometimes a biſhop's ſeat, ſaith [d] Will. of Tyre; but there is no ſign of it at this time that ſuch a place there was.

After Jamnia, is the city of Geth or Gath, ſometime Anthedon, ſaith Volaterran. And ſo Montanus, fol. 244. ſeems to underſtand it. For he ſets it next to Egypt, of all the Philiſtine cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volaterran gives neither reaſon nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolemy ſets Anthedon far to the ſouth of Joppe: and Geth was the firſt and not the laſt (beginning from the north) of all the great cities of the Philiſtines: and about 16 miles from Joppe, where St. Jerome in his time found a great village of the ſame name. It was ſometime the habitation and ſeminary of the [e] Anakims: ſtrong and giant-like men, whom Joſhua could not expel, nor the Danites after him; nor any of the Iſraelites, till David's time: who ſlew Goliah, as his captains did divers others, not much inferiour in ſtrength and ſtature unto Goliah.

Rehoboam the ſon of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the ſon of Amazia deſtroyed it again. It was alſo laid waſte by Azael king of Syria. Fulk, the 4th king of Jeruſalem, built a caſtle in the ſame place out of the old ruins. Whether this Geth was the ſame that [f] Will. of Tyre in the holy war calls Ibijlin, I much doubt; the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Not far from Geth, or Gath, ſtandeth Bethſemes, or the houſe of the Sun. In the fields adjoining to this city (as is thought) was the ark of God brought by a yoke of two kine, turned looſe by the [g] Philiſtines: and the Bethſemites preſuming to look therein, there were ſlain of the elders 70, and of the people 50000, by the ordinance of God. After which ſlaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great [h] Abel, ſaith St. Jerome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other cities of this name; one in [i] Nephtalim, another in Juda; and another in Iſſachar; Jerome finds a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the ſea-coaſt, the ſtrong city of Accaron offereth it ſelf, ſometimes one of the five ſatrapies, or governments of the Philiſtines. St. Jerome makes it the ſame with Cæſuria Palæſtinæ. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: it was one of thoſe that defended it ſelf againſt the Danites and Judeans. It worſhipped Beelzebub the god of hornets or flies. To which idol it was that [k] Ahaziah king of Iſrael ſent to enquire of his health: whoſe meſſengers Elijah meeting by the way, cauſed them to return, with a ſorrowful anſwer to their maſter. This city is remembred in many places of ſcripture.

Chriſtianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron, or Ekron. This Azotus, or Aſdod, was alſo an habitation of the Anakims, whom Joſhua failed to deſtroy, tho' he once poſſeſs'd their city. Herein ſtood a ſumptuous temple, dedicated to the [l] idol Dagon: the ſame idol which fell twice to the ground of it ſelf, after the ark of God was by the Philiſtines carried into their temple: and in the ſecond fall it was utterly broken and defaced. Near it was that famous [m] Judas Macchabæus ſlain by Bacchides and Alcimus, the lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterwards it was taken by Jonathan: and the reſt of the citizens being put to the ſword, all that fled into the temple of Dagon were, with their idol, therein conſumed with fire: near which alſo he overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinius the Roman rebuilt it. It had a biſhop's ſeat while Chriſtianity flouriſhed in thoſe parts. But in St. Jerome's time it was yet a fair village. And this was the laſt of the ſea-towns within the tribe of Dan.

The cities which are within the land eaſt-ward from Azotus, and beyond the fountain of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the apoſtle baptized the eunuch, are Tſorah, or Sarara, and Eſthaol, and between them Caſtra Danis near Hebron: tho' this place where Sampſon was born, may ſeem by the words, Judg. xviii. 12. to be in the tribe of Judah, as the other alſo were bordering towns between Dan and Juda.

After theſe, within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor: or, as it is, 1 Macc. xv. Cedron, which Cendebæus the lieutenant of Antiochus, fortified againſt the Jews, and near which himſelf was by the [n] Maccabees overthrown.

Then Modin, the native city of the Maccabees; and wherein they were buried, on whoſe ſepulcher the 7 marble pillars, which were erected of that height, as they ſerved for a mark to the ſeamen, remained many hundreds of years after their firſt ſetting up, as Brochard and Breidenbach witneſs.

There are, beſides theſe, the city of [o] Cariathiarim, that is, the city of the woods: ſeated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the ark of God remained 20 years in the houſe of Aminadab; till ſuch time as David carried it thence to Jeruſalem: of this place (as they ſay) was Zacharias the ſon of Barachias, or Jehoida, who was ſlain between the temple and the altar: alſo Urias, whom Joachim king of Jeruſalem ſlaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this tribe, rather as I take it upon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caspin, taken with great slaughter by [a] Judas Maccabæus: and Lachis, whose king was slain by Joshua, in which also Amazias was slain: the same which Senacherib took, Ezechias reigning in Juda.

Of other cities belonging to this tribe, see in Joshua xix. from the 41st verse, where also it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of families: and therefore that they invaded Leshem, and inhabited it: which city, after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæsarea Philippi, as before, and made the metropolis of Ituræa, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was tetrarch: but of this city see more in Nephtalim. In this tribe there are no mountains of fame.

It hath two rivers or torrents: the northermost riseth out of the mountains of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the sea by Sachrona. [b] The other hath the name of Sorek, or Sored, whose banks are plentiful of vines, which have no seeds or stones: the wine they yield is red, of excellent colour, taste, and savour, &c. In this valley of Sorek, so called from the river, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loved.

SECT. II.

The tribe of Simeon.

THE tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt; who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that family, while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at mount Sinai, 59300 able men; all which ending their lives in the desarts, there entred the land of promise of their issues 22200 bearing arms, who were [c] in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small territory on the sea-coast, belonging to Edumæa; of which the first city adjoining to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli, or petty kings thereof, were called Ascalonitæ; of which [d] Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the history of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being imploy'd by Aciamus king of the Lydians, with an army in Syria, falling in love with a young woman of that country, built this city, and called it after his own name: the same hath Nicolaus in his history, saith Volaterran.

Diodorus Siculus, in his third book, remembreth a lake near Ascalon, wherein there hath been a temple dedicated to Derceto the goddess of the Syrians; having the face of a woman, and the body of a fish: who, as I have said before, in the story of Ninus, was the mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this lake, and fed and relieved by doves. And therefore was the dove worshipped, both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the poet:

Alba Palæstino sancta columba Syro.

The white dove is for holy held, in Syria-Palestine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest cities of the Philistines. It bred many learned men ([e] saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sosus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the historian, and Artemidorus who wrote the story of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod born, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the male-children, of two years old and under, to be slain. In the Christian times it had a bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard king of England, while he made war in the holy land, gave it a new wall, and many buildings. [f] Ejus muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum rex instauravit, saith Adrichomius.

In David's time it was one of the most renowned cities of the Philistines; for he nameth Gath and Ascalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul, and Jonathan; not speaking of the other three. [g] Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon; it is now called Scalone. Gabinius restored it, as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazza; the Syrians, Azon, of Azonus (as they say) the son of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian, because belike he rebuilt it; and Gaza in the Persian tongue, is as much as to say, treasure. This [h] Gaza was the first of the satrapies of the Philistines, and the south bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this city was far more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb; but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as [i] Alexander Macedon invaded the empire of Persia, it received a garrison for Darius: in despight whereof, it was, by the Macedonians, after a long siege, demolished, and was called Gaza of the desart.

[k] Alexander Janneus king of the Jews surprised it, and slew 500 senators in the temple of Apollo, which fled thither for sanctuary; but this Gaza was not set up in the same place again, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat nearer the sea-side; tho' the other was but two miles off. It was a town of great account in the time of the Maccabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was forced by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself; and in his absence, left John his son and successor to be governor. In [l] Brochard's time it was still a goodly city, and known by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the river Bezor, standeth Majoma the port of Gaza: to which the privilege of a city was given by the great Constantine; and the place called Constance after the name of the emperor's son. [m] But Julian the apostate, soon after favouring the Gazeans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza Maritima.

On the other side of [n] Besor, standeth Anthedon, defaced by Alexander Janneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favourite of Augustus.

Then [o] Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose torrent is known in the scriptures by the name [p] of the torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura; to difference it, Isaiah xxvii. 12. giving the name of the city to the torrent that watereth it.

Pliny calls it Rhinocolura; and Josephus, Rhinocorura.

[q] Epiphanius reports it as a tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lots, between the three ſons of Noah.

Within the land, and upon the river of Beſor, they place Gerar; which the ſcripture placeth between Kadeſh and Shur, Gen. xx. 1. That it was near to the wilderneſs of Beerſheba, it appears, Gen. xx. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elſewhere Beerſheba, ſo ſometimes Gerar, be made the ſouth bound of Canaan. It was of old a diſtinct kingdom from the Philiſtine ſatrapies, the kings by one common name were called Abimelechs: St. Jerome ſaith, that afterwards it was called Regio ſalutaris; The health county: ſo that it was no marvel that Abraham and Iſaac lived much in theſe parts. Of king Aſa's conqueſt of the cities about Gerar, ſee 2 Chron. xiv. 14.

More within the land was [a] Siceleg, or Tſiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites; when David, in his flying from Saul to the Philiſtines, had left his carriages there; but David followed them over the river of Beſor, and put them to the ſlaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next [b] Dabir, ſometime Cariath-Sepher, the city of letters, the univerſity, as they ſay, or academy of old Paleſtine. In St. Jerome's time it ſeems it had the name of Daema: Joſhua xv. 49. it is called Urbs Sannæ, from the name, as it ſeems, of ſome of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbahi. For even hence alſo were theſe giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by [c] Othoniel, incouraged by Caleb's promiſe of his daughter in marriage: but that Joſhua and the hoſt of Iſrael were at the ſurpriſe, it appears Joſhua x. 39. This city, Joſh. xxi. 15. is named among thoſe, which out of Simeon and Juda, were given to the Levites. And hence it ſeems they attribute it to this tribe.

Beſides theſe, there are many others in the tribe of Simeon, but of leſs fame; as Haijn, of which Joſhua xix. 7. which alſo Joſhua xxi. 16. is reckoned for one of the cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon (for which Junius thinks Haſham is named 1 Chron. vi. 59. tho' [d] in the place of Joſhua theſe two are diſtinguiſhed) alſo Tholad ſo named, 1 Chron. iv. 29. for which Joſh. xix. 4. we have Eltholad. Chatzar-Suſa, ſo named, Joſh. xix. 5. for which Joſh. xv. we have Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in ſignification; for Gadda, is Turma, and Suſa, Equitatus.

In the ſame places of Joſhua, and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named; which they think to be the ſame with that of which Numb. xiv. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purſued the Iſraelites. But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the mountains of Edumea. For Iſrael fled not that way, but back again to the camp, which lay to the ſouth of [e] Edumea, in the deſart.

The ſame places alſo name Beerſheba in this tribe; ſo called of the oath between [f] Abraham and Abimelech; near unto which Hagar wandred with her ſon Iſhmael.

It was alſo called the city of Iſaac, becauſe he dwelt long there.

While the Chriſtians held the holy land, they laboured much to ſtrengthen this place, ſtanding on the border of the Arabian deſart, and in the ſouth bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin.

The other cities of Simeon, which are named in the places of Joſhua, and of the Chronicles, above noted, becauſe they help us nothing in ſtory, I omit them.

In the time of Ezekiah king of Juda, certain of this tribe being ſtreightned in their own territories, paſſed to [g] Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. iv. 39. (the ſame place which Joſh. xv. 36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the iſſue of Cham; where they ſeated themſelves: as alſo 500 others of this tribe, deſtroyed the reliques of Amalek in the mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The mountains within this tribe are few, and that of Sampſon the chiefeſt; unto which he carried the gate-poſt of Gaza. The rivers are Beſor, and the torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Aſſer.

SECT. III.

The tribe of Juda.

OF Juda, the 4th ſon of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600; all which (Caleb excepted) periſhed in the deſarts. And of their ſons, there entred the land of Canaan 76500 bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatneſs of this number, was the greateſt territory given, called afterwards Judea; within the bounds whereof, were the portions allotted to Dan, and Simeon included.

And many cities named in thoſe tribes, did firſt, as they ſay, belong unto the children of Juda, who had a kind of ſoveraignty over them; as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethſemes, Tſiglag, Beerſheba, and others.

The multitude of people within this ſmall province (if it be meted by that ground given to this tribe only) were incredible, if the witneſs of the ſcriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbred the people, they were found 500000 fighting men.

The cities of Juda were many: but I will remember the chiefeſt of them; beginning with Arad, or Horma, which ſtandeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumea: whoſe king firſt ſurpriſed the Iſraelites, as they paſs'd by the border of [h] Canaan towards Moab; and took from them ſome ſpoils, and many priſoners: who being afterwards overthrown by the Iſraelites, the ſons of Keni, the kinſmen of Moſes, obtained a poſſeſſion in that territory: who before the coming of the Iſraelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Following this frontier towards Idumea and the ſouth, [i] Aſcenſus Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed, the next to Arad; ſo called, becauſe of ſcorpions which are ſaid to be in that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Jerome thinks that the name of the toparchy, called Acrabathena, was denominated; of which we have ſpoken in Manaſſes.

On the ſouth ſide alſo of Judea, they place the cities of Jagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Aſhna, Jethnam, and Aſor, or Chatſor, moſt of them frontier towns.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places ſo called: one beſides this in the body of Juda; of which the deſart and forreſt adjoining took name; where David hid himſelf from Saul.

After theſe are the cities of Eſron, Adar, Karkah, and Aſemona, or Hatſmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumea, towards the north, we find the cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Aſor, or Chatſor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which, ſee Joſh. xv. alſo Carioth, by Joſh. xv. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the traitor was called Iſ-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then [k] Hetham the abode of Sampſon, which Reboboam re-edified. Beyond theſe, towards the north-border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the city of [a] Jethar, or Jatthir, belonging to the Levites. In [b] St. Jerome's time it was called Jethira, and inhabited altogether with Chriſtians: near unto this city was that remarkable battel fought betwixt Aſa king of Juda, and Zara king of the Arabians, who brought into the field a million of fighting men; and was notwithſtanding beaten and put to flight: Aſa following the victory as far as Gerar, which at the ſame time he recovered.

Not far from Jethar, ſtandeth Jarmuth, whoſe king was ſlain by Joſhua, and the city overturned. Next unto it is Mareſa, the native city of the prophet Michæa: between it and Odolla, [c] Judas Macchabæus overthrew Gorgias; and ſent thence 10000 drachmas of ſilver to be offered for ſacrifice.

[d] Odolla, or Hadullam it ſelf, was an ancient and magnificent city, taken by Joſhua, and the king thereof ſlain. Jonathan Macchabæus beatified it greatly. Then [e] Ceila, or Keila, afterwards Echela, where David ſometime hid himſelf, and which afterwards he delivered from the aſſaults of the Philiſtines: near which the prophet Abacuc was buried; whoſe monument remained, and was ſeen by St. Jerome.

Near it is Hebron, ſometime called the city of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharbe: the reaſon of this name they give, as if it ſignified the city of four; becauſe the four patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, were therein buried; but of Adam it is but ſuppoſed; and it is plain by the places, Joſh. xiv. 14. and xv. 13. and xx. 11. that Arbah here doth not ſignify four, but that it was the name of the father of the giants, called Anakim, whoſe ſon, as it ſeems, Anak was: and Achiman, Sheſhai, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled, Joſh. xv.) were the ſons of this Anak, Numb. xiii. 23. The name of Anak ſignifieth torquem, a chain worn for ornament: and it ſeems that this Anak, enriched by the ſpoils which himſelf and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and ſo got this name: and leaving the cuſtom to his poſterity, left alſo the name: ſo that in Latin the name of Anakim, may not amiſs be expounded by Torquati.

The city Hebron was one of the ancienteſt cities of Canaan; built 7 years before Tſoan, or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chief city of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given; to wit, the villages adjoining, and the reſt to the Levites. It had a biſhop in the Chriſtian times, and a magnificent temple built by Helen the mother of Conſtantine.

Not far hence they find Eleutheropolis, or the free city, remembred often by St. Jerome. Then Eglon, whoſe king Dabir aſſociated, with the other four kings of the Amorites, to wit, of [f] Jeruſalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, beſieging the Gibeonites, were by Joſhua utterly overthrown. From hence the next city of fame was Emaus, afterwards Nicopolis, one of the cities of government, or preſidencies of Judea. In the ſight of this city, [g] Judas Macchabæus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Gorgias lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the year 1301, it was overturned by an earthquake, ſaith [h] Euſebius. In the Chriſtian times it had a biſhop's ſeat, of the dioceſe of Cæſaria of Paleſtine.

From Emaus towards the weſt ſea there are the cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which, and of Gederoth, [i] Joſh. xv. 36, 41. Then Azecha, to which Joſhua followed the ſlaughter of the five kings before named, a city of great ſtrength in the valley of [k] Terebinth or Turpentine: as the Vulgar readeth, 1 Sam. xvii. 2. whence (as it ſeems) they ſeat it near unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the ſubjection of the Jews, while Joram the ſon of Joſaphat ruled in Jeruſalem: and next unto this ſtandeth Maceda, which Joſhua utterly diſpeopled.

On the other ſide of Emaus, towards the eaſt, ſtandeth Bethſur, otherwiſe Bethſora, and Bethſor; one of the ſtrongeſt, and moſt ſought for places in all Juda: it it ſeated on a high hill; and therefore called Bethſur (the houſe on the rock, or of ſtrength.) It was fortified by Reboboam, and afterwards by [l] Judas Macchabæus. Lyſias forced it, and Antiochus Eupator by famine: Jonathan regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified againſt the Syrian kings.

[m] Bethlehem is next unto it within ſix miles of Jeruſalem, otherwiſe Lehem, ſometime Ephrata; which name, they ſay, it had of Caleb's wife, when as it is ſo called by Moſes before Caleb was famous in thoſe parts, Gen. xxxviii. 16. Of this city was Abeſſan, or Ibzan, Judge of Iſrael, after Jephthah, famous for the thirty ſons, and thirty daughters, begotten by him. Elimelec was alſo a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi ſojourned in Moab during the famine of Juda, in the time of the Judges, with whom [n] Ruth, the daughter-in-law of Naomi returned to Bethlehem, and married Boaz, of whom Obed, of whom Iſhai, of whom David. It had alſo the honour to be the native city of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt: and therefore ſhall the memory thereof never end.

[o] In Zabulon of Galilee there was alſo a city of the ſame name; and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethlehem Juda.

From Bethlehem, ſome four or five miles, ſtandeth Thecua, the city of [p] Amos the prophet: and to this place adjoining is the city of Bethzacaria, in the way between Bethſura and Jeruſalem; on whoſe hills adjoining the glorious gilt ſhields of Antiochus ſhined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jews. The city of [q] Bezek was alſo near unto Bethlehem, which alſo Adoni-bezec commanded; who had, during his reign, tortured ſeventy kings, by cutting off the joints of their fingers and toes, and made them gather bread under his table: but at length the ſame end befel himſelf by the ſons of [r] Juda, after they had taken him priſoner.

The reſt of the cities in this part (moſt of them of no great eſtimation) we may paſs by, until we come to the magnificent caſtle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a hill, mounting thereunto with 200 marble ſteps, exceeding beautiful and ſtrong. [s] And towards the Dead ſea, and adjoining to the deſart of Jeruel, between it and Tekoa, is that Clivaus floridus, where in the time of [t] Jehoſaphat, the Jews ſtood and looked on the Moabites, Amonites, and Edomites, maſſacring one another, when they had purpoſed to join againſt Juda; near which place is the valley of bleſſing, where the Jews the fourth day after ſolemnly came and bleſſed God for ſo ſtrange deliverance.

Now

Now the cities of [a] Judah which border the Dead ſea, are theſe; Aduran beautified by Reboboam, and Tſohar, which the Vulgar calleth [b] Segor; ſo called, becauſe Lot in his prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one; whence it was called Tſohar, which ſignifieth a little one; when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. xiv. 2. In the Romans time it had a gariſon, and was called, as they ſay, Pannier: In Jerome's time Balexona. The Engaddi, or Hengaddi, firſt Aſaſenthamar; near unto which are the gardens of Balſamum, the beſt that the world had called Opobalſamum: the moſt part of all which trees, Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, ſent for out of Judea; and Herod, who either feared or loved Anthony her husband, cauſed them to be rooted up, and preſented unto her; which ſhe replanted near Heliopolis in Egypt. This city was firſt taken by [c] Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the moſt remarkable cities of Judea, and one of the preſidencies thereof.

The reſt of the cities are many in the in-land, and among them [d] Jezrael; not that which was the city of Naboth, of which already; but another of the ſame name, the city of Achinoan, the wife of David, the mother of that Ammon, whom Abſolom ſlew: alſo, as ſome think, the city of [e] Amaſa, Abſalom's lieutenant, and the commander of his army. But this ſeemeth to be an error, grounded upon the nearneſs of the words, Iſrael and Jezrael: and becauſe 2 Sam. xvii. 25. Amaſa's father is called a Jezraelite, who 1 Chron. ii. 17. is called an Iſhmaelite: indeed the Hebrew orthography ſheweth, that Amaſa's father is not ſaid to be of the city Jezrael, but an Iſraelite in religion, tho' otherwiſe an Iſhmaelite.

In this tribe were many high hills, or mountains, as thoſe of Engaddi upon the Dead ſea, and the mountains of Judah, which begin to riſe by Emaus, and end near Taphna; and theſe part Judah from Dan and Simeon. Of others which ſtand ſingle, there is that of Hebron: at the foot whereof was that oak of Mamre, where the three angels appeared to Abraham, which [f] St. Jerome calleth a fir-tree; and ſaith, that it ſtood till the time of Conſtantine the younger. There is alſo that mountain, called Collis Achillæ, on the ſouth ſide of Ziph; on the top whereof the great Herod, incloſing the old caſtle, erected by Jonathan Maccabeus, and called it Maſſada, garniſhed it with ſeven and twenty high and ſtrong towers; and therein left armour and furniture for an hundred thouſand men, being, as it ſeemeth, a place inacceſſible, and of incomparable ſtrength.

In the valley afterward called the Dead ſea, or the lake Aſphaltitis: this country had four cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrha, deſtroyed with fire from heaven for their unnatural ſins.

SECT. IV.

The Tribe of REUBEN, and his borderers.

† I.

The ſeats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites won from Sehon, king of Hesbon.

ON the other ſide of the Dead ſea, Reuben the eldeſt of Jacob's ſons inhabited, of whoſe children there were numbred at mount Sinai, forty ſix thouſand, who dying with the reſt in the deſarts, there remained to poſſeſs the land forty three thouſand ſeven hundred bearing arms. But before we ſpeak of theſe or the reſt that inhabited the eaſt-ſide of Jordan, ſomething of their borderers, to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whoſe land in our writers are confuſedly deſcribed, and not eaſily diſtinguiſhed. And firſt, we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came many mighty families; as by Iſaac and Jacob, the nation called Iſrael, and afterward Jews: by Eſau or Edom, the Idumeans: by Iſhmael, the eldeſt ſon of Abraham, the Iſhmaelites: and by Keturah, his laſt wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's brother's ſon, thoſe two valiant nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but ſtrangers in the land of Canaan (formerly poſſeſs'd by the Canaanites, and by the families of them deſcended) theſe iſſues and alliances of Abraham, all but Jacob, whoſe children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoining.

Eſau and his ſons held Idumea, which bounded Canaan on the ſouth. Iſhmael took from the ſouth-eaſt part of the Dead ſea: ſtretching his poſſeſſion over all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the deſart, as far as the river Tigris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the reſt of the coaſt of the Dead ſea, leaving a part to Midian; and paſſing over Arnon, inhabited the plains between Jordan, and the hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far north as Eſſebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon ſat down on the north-eaſt ſide of Arnon, and poſſeſs'd the tract from Rabba, afterwards Philadelphia, both within the mountains of [g] Gilead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, tho' in Moſes's time he had nothing left him in all that valley: for the Amorites had thruſt him over the river of [h] Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As theſe nations encompaſſed ſundry parts of Canaan, ſo the border between the river of Jaboc and Damaſcus was held by the Amorites themſelves, with other mix'd nations: all which territory on the eaſt-ſide of Jordan, and on the eaſt-ſide of the Dead ſea, was granted by Moſes to the tribes of [i] Reuben, Gad, and Manaſſeh; whereof that part which Moab had, was firſt poſſeſs'd by the Emims, a nation of giants, weakned and broken by Chedorlaomer, after expulſed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the territory, and ancient poſſeſſion of the Zamzummims, or Zuræi, who were alſo beaten at the ſame time by Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and the reſt; and by them an eaſy way of conqueſt was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the ſame is to be underſtood according to the time when Moſes wrote. For then had Sehon, or his anceſtor, beaten the Moabites out of the plain countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them thence from Hesbon over Arnon; and this happened not long before Moſes's arrival upon that border, when Vaheb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab, when Moſes paſs'd Arnon, was not the ſon of Vaheb; but his name was Balac, the ſon of Zippor. And it may be, that thoſe kings were elective, as the Idumeans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far north as Eſſebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Iſrael arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon, of the race of Canaan, by Amoreus; and therefore did Jephthah, the judge of Iſrael, juſtly defend the regaining of thoſe countries againſt the claim of the Ammonites;

[a] 2 Chron 11. [b] Some call it Balſaliſa, and Vitula conſternans. See in Gad. 10. §. 5. poſt principium in Haroher. Gen. 19. 20. Hieron in Oſe. Heb. Chatſatſon-thamar. 2 Chron. 20. 2. becauſe (as he alledged) Moſes found them in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon, who (ſaith [a]Jephthah) had three hundred years time to recover them, and did not: Whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now.

And leſt any ſhould marvel why the Ammonites in Jephthah's time ſhould make claim to theſe countries; whereas Moſes in the place, Numb. xxi. 26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient poſſeſſion of the Moabites than of the Ammoaites: it is to be noted, that Deut. iii. 11. when it is ſaid, that the iron bed of Og was to be ſeen at Rabbath, the chief city of the Ammonites; it is alſo ſignified, that much of the land of Og, which the Iſraelites poſſeſſed, was by him, or his anceſtors, got from the Ammonites, as much as Sehon's was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite nations were ſeated ſo confuſedly together, that it was hard to diſtinguiſh them; ſo alſo were the ſons of [b]Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Iſhmael. Yet the reaſon ſeemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief in Jephthah's time: for ſometimes the one nation, ſometimes the other of all thoſe borderers acquired the ſoveraignty: and again, that one part of the land which Gad held, namely within the mountains of Galaad or Gilead, and as far ſouth as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then ſought to recover it again. Yet at ſuch time as Moſes overthrew Sehon at Jahaz, the Ammonites had loſt to the Amorites all that part of their poſſeſſion which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc. Sehon and Og, two kings of the Amorites, having diſplanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the mountains. For it is written Numb. xxi. 24. that Iſrael conquered the land of Sehon from Arnon to Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon; ſo as at this time the river of Jaboc was the ſouth bound of Ammon, within the mountains; when as anciently they had alſo poſſeſſions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites poſſeſs'd; as appears in Joſhua xiii. 25.

† II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chief cities belonging to Reuben were theſe, [c]Kademoth, for which the Vulgar, without any ſhew of warrant, readeth Jethſon. The Vulgar, or Jerome followed the Septuagint, thoſe two verſes 36 and 37 of Joſhua xxi. being wanting in the old Hebrew copies, and the Septuagint read Kedſon for Kedmoth, which Kedſon by writing, ſlipt into Jethſon.

This city, which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the deſart adjoining; from whence Moſes ſent his embaſſage to [d]Sehon. In the ſame place of Joſhua, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betſer & villa ejus, reads Boſor in ſolitudine Miſor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a town called [e]Miſor, in the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, near the Dead ſea (for the country between being mountainous, hath few cities) they place two towns of note, Laſa, or Leſhah, of which Geneſis x. 19. the [f]Greeks call it Callirrhoe; near which there is a hill, from whence there floweth ſprings both of hot and cold, bitter and ſweet water, all which, ſoon after their riſing, being joined in one ſtream, do make a very wholeſome bath, eſpecially for all contractions of ſinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was deſperate of all other help, repaired; but in vain. [g]Others ſay, that theſe ſprings ariſe out of the hills of Machærus in this tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenees, and in Peru, called, The baths of the Inga's or kings. The other town is Machærus, the next between Laſa and Jordan, of all that part of the world the ſtrongeſt in-land city and caſtle, ſtanding upon a mountain, every way inacceſſible. It was firſt fortified by Alexander Jannæus, who made it a frontier againſt the Arabians; but it was demoliſhed by Gabinius in the war with Ariſtobulus, ſaith [h]Joſephus. It was thither, ſaith he, that Herod ſent John Baptiſt, and wherein he was ſlain: his army ſoon after being utterly overthrown by Aretas king of Arabia, and himſelf after this murder never proſpering. Not far from Machærus was [i]Boſor, or Bozra, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it [k]Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Ceſar.

To the north of Livias is Setim, or [l]Sittim, where the children of Iſrael embraced the daughters of Midian and Moab; and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi, with his ſpear, bringing due vengeance upon them, when they were in the midſt of their ſin: And from hence Joſhua ſent the diſcoverers to view Jericho, ſtaying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent [m]Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel iii. 18. Irrigabit torrentem Setim. The Vulgar hath torrentem ſpinarum; and Junius vallem cedrorum; expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan, but for the Church, in which the juſt being placed, grow as the cedars, as it is Pſal. xcii. 13.

The plain country hereabout, by [n]Moſes called the plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people, a little before his death, is in the beginning of the ſame book preciſely bounded by Moſes. On the ſouth, it had the great deſart of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the eaſt, it had Chatſeroth, and Dizahab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolemy in Palæſtina; the latter was a tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was [o] Mezahab, of which Gen. xxxvi. 39.) by the geographers, called Medava and Medaba. On the weſt it had Jordan, and on the north it had Laban (in Junius's edition by the fault of the print, Lamban, Deut. i. 1.) the ſame which the geographers call Libias; and ſome confound it with Livias, of which even now we ſpake.

Alſo on the ſame north ſide, towards the confines of Cœleſyria, it had Thophel, whereabout ſometime Pella of Cœleſyria ſtood; which was in the region of Decapolis; and as Stephanus ſaith, was ſometime called Butis. It is alſo noted in Moſes to be over-againſt, or near unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red ſea; as alſo Numb. ii. 14. it tranſlateth the word Suphah in like manner; whereas in this place of Deuteronomy, there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to ſignify the ſea; and yet the ſcripture, when this word is ſo to be taken, uſeth the addition of Mara, thereby to diſtinguiſh it from the region of Saph, or Suphah, which doubtleſs was about theſe plains of Moab, towards the Dead ſea; where the country being full of reeds, was therefore thus called: as alſo the Red ſea was called Mare Suph, for like reaſon.

The place in theſe large plains of Moab, where Moſes made thoſe divine exhortations, ſome ſay, was [a]Bethabara, where John baptized, which in the ſtory of Gideon, is called Beth-bara. [b]Joſephus ſays, it was where after the city Abila ſtood, near Jordan, in a place ſet with palm-trees; which ſure was the ſame with Abel-ſittim, in the plains of Moab, Numb. xxxiii. 49. that ſome call Abel-ſathaim, and Bel-ſathim, which is reckoned by Moſes in that place of Numbers for the 42, and laſt place of the Iſraelites encamping in the time of Moſes. This place is alſo called [c]Sittim; which word, if we ſhould interpret, we ſhould rather bring it from cedars than from thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the ark of the tabernacle was made.

Toward the eaſt of theſe plains of Moab, they place the cities of [d]Nebo, Baal-meon, Sibma, and Heſbon, the chief city of Sehon and Elhael, and Kirjathaima, the ſeat of the giant Emim. Of the two firſt of theſe, Moſes ſeems to give a note, that the names were to be changed, becauſe they taſted of the Moabites [e] idolatry. For Nebo, (inſtead of which Junius, Iſa xlvi. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their idol-oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the ſame idol was the hill Nebo in theſe parts denominated; from whoſe top, which the common tranſlators call Phaſgah, Moſes, before his death, ſaw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which ſtory Junius does not take Phaſgah, or Piſgah, for any proper name; but for an appellative ſignifying a hill: and ſo alſo Vatablus, in ſome places, as Numb. xxi. 20. where he noteth, that ſome call Piſgah that top which looketh to Jericho and Hair, as it looketh to Moab; which opinion may be ſomewhat ſtrengthened by the name of the city of Reuben, mentioned Joſh. xiii. 20. called Aſhdoth-Piſgah, which is as much as Decurſus Piſgæ, to wit, where the waters did run down from Piſgah. In the ſame place of Joſhua, there is alſo named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben: ſo called from the hill Peor, from whence alſo Baal, the idol, was alſo called Baal-peor, which, they ſay, was the ſame as Priapus; the chief place of whoſe worſhip ſeems to have been Bamoth-baal; of which alſo Joſh. xiii. in the cities of Reuben; for which Numb. xxii. 41. they read the high place of Baal (for ſo the word ſignifieth) to which place Balak firſt brought Balaam, to curſe the Iſraelites.

† III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

THERE were beſides theſe divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoined to Reuben; among which they place Gallim, the city of Phalti, to whom [f]Saul gave his daughter Michal from David: but Junius thinks this town to be in Benjamin; gathering ſo much out of Iſaiah x. 29. where it is named among the cities of Benjamin. With better reaſon, perhaps, out of Numb. xxi. 19. we may ſay, that Mathana and Nahaliel were in thoſe confines of Reuben, thro' which places the Iſraelites paſs'd, after they had left the well called Beer. Then Diblathaim, which the prophet [g] Jeremiah threatned with the reſt of the cities of Moab.

Madian alſo is found in theſe parts; the chief of the Madianites in Moab; but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red ſea, wherein Jethro inhabited: for of the Madianites there were two nations, of which theſe of Moab became idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a regiment of twelve thouſand Iſraelites, ſent by Moſes out of the plains of Moab, at ſuch time as Iſrael began to accompany their daughters. Their five kings, with Balaam the ſoothſayer were then ſlain, and their regal city, with the reſt, deſtroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was prince, or prieſt, forgot not the God of Abraham their anceſtor; but relieved and aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their painful travels, thro' the deſarts, and were in all that paſſage their guides. In the ſouth border of [h]Moab, adjoining to Edom, and ſometime reckoned as the chief city of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the ſcriptures is called Selah, which is as much as Rupes or Petra. It was alſo called Joctheel, as appears by the place, 2 Reg. xiv. It was built (ſaith [i]Joſephus) by Recem, one of thoſe five kings of the Madianites, ſlain, as before is ſaid; after whom it was called Recem. Now they ſay, it is called Crac and Mozera.

The ſoldans of Egypt, for the exceeding ſtrength thereof, kept therein all their treaſures of Egypt and Arabia; of which it is the firſt and ſtrongeſt city: the ſame, perhaps, which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathea, whence alſo the province adjoining took name; which name ſeems to have been taken at firſt from Nabaioth, the ſon of Abraham, by Keturah. For Nabathea is no where underſtood for all Arabia Petræa (at leaſt where it is not miſunderſtood) but it is that province which neighboureth Judea. For Pharan inhabited by Iſhmael, whoſe people Ptolemy calleth Pharanites, inſtead of Iſhmaelites, and all thoſe territories of the Cuſites, Madianites, Amalekites, Iſhmaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og king of Baſan, were parts of [k]Arabia Petræa; tho' it be alſo true, that ſome part of Arabia the deſart belonged to the Amalekites and Iſhmaelites: all which nations the ſcriptures in 1 Chron. v. calleth Hagarims of Hagar.

This city Petra, Scaurus beſieged with the Roman army; and finding the place in ſhew impregnable, he was content, by the perſuaſion of Antipater, to take a compoſition of money and to quit it. Yet Amaſias, king of Judah (after he had ſlaughtered ten thouſand of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) won alſo this city. St. Jerome finds Ruth the Modbite to be natural of this city. In the time when the Chriſtians held the kingdom of [l]Jeruſalem, it had a Latin biſhop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is ſeated not far from Hor, where Aaron died; and on the other ſide, towards the north, is the river of [m] Zared, or Zered, by which Moſes encamped in the thirty eighth ſtation. Adrichome deſcribeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon; and ſo he doth the valley of Save: but the waters of [n] Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it ſeems Adri- chomius writ Nemrim) refreſh'd the plains of Moab: and the confluence of thoſe waters of Nimra are in the tribe of Gad. Save alſo cannot be found in this place, that is, to the ſouth of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the purſuit of the Aſſyrian and Perſian princes, the king of Sodom met him in the valley of Save, or Shaveh, which is the king's dale, where Abſalom ſet up his monument, as it ſeems, not far from Jeruſalem. And at the ſame time Melchiſedec, king of Salem, alſo encountred him. But Abraham coming from the north, and [a] Melchiſedec inhabiting, either near Bethſan, otherwiſe Scythopolis, in the half tribe of Manaſſeh, or in Jeruſalem (both places lying to the weſt of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was alſo called the King's Dale, could not be in theſe parts.

Of the Dead ſea.

NOW, becauſe the ſea of Sodom, or the Dead ſea, called alſo the lake of Aſphaltitis, and the ſalt-ſea (in diſtinction from the ſea of Tiberias, which was freſh water) alſo the ſea of the wilderneſs, or rather the ſea [b] of the plains, is often remembred in the ſcriptures, and in this ſtory alſo; therefore I think it not impertinent to ſpeak ſomewhat thereof: for it is like unto the Caſpian ſea, which hath no out-let, or diſburthening. The length of this lake Joſephus makes 180 furlongs (which make 22 miles and a half of ours) and about 150 in breadth, which make 18 of our miles, and ſomewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal leſs. But thoſe that have of late years ſeen this ſea, did account it (ſaith [c] Weiſſenberg) 8 Dutch miles (which is 32 of ours) in length, and 2 and a half of theirs (which is 10 of ours) in breadth. Of this lake, or ſea, Tacitus maketh this report; Lacus eſt immenſo ambitu, ſpecie maris, ſapore corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis peſtifer: neque vento impellitur, neque piſces aut ſuetas aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde ſuperjecta ut ſolido feruntur, periti imperitique nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a ſea of corrupt taſte; of ſmell infectious, and peſtilent to the borderers: It is neither moved, nor raiſed by the wind, nor endureth fiſh to live in it, or fowl to ſwim in it. Thoſe things that are caſt into it, and the unskilful of ſwimming, as well as the skilful, are born up by this water. At one time of the year it caſteth up bitumen; the art of gathering which, experience (the finder of other things) hath alſo taught. It is uſed in the trimming of ſhips, and the like buſineſſes.

And then of the land, he ſpeaketh in this ſort: "The fields not far from this lake, which were "ſometime fruitful, and adorned with great cities, "were burnt with lightning; of which the ruins "remain, the ground looking with a ſad face, as "having loſt her fruitfulneſs: for whatſoever doth "either grow, or is ſet thereon, be it fruits or "flowers, when they come to ripeneſs, have no-"thing within them, but moulder into aſhes:" thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that thoſe pomegranates, and other apples, or oranges, which do ſtill grow on the banks of this curſed lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the out-ſide; but being cut, have nothing but duſt within. Of the bitumen which this lake caſteth up, it was by the Greeks called Aſphaltitis. Veſpaſian, deſirous to be ſatisfied of theſe reports, went on purpoſe to ſee this lake, and cauſed certain captives to be caſt into it, who were not only unſkilful in ſwimming, but had their hands alſo bound behind them; and notwithſtanding, they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not ſink.

† V.

Of the kings of Moab, much of whoſe country within Arnon, Reuben poſſeſs'd.

OF the kings of Moab, whoſe country (within Arnon) Reuben poſſeſs'd (tho' not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in Numb. xxi. 14. nameth Vaheb, which ſeemeth to be the anceſtor, or predeceſſor of Balac, the ſon of Zippor, which Balac ſent for Balaam to curſe Iſrael. For, fearing to contend with Moſes by arms, by the examples of Sehon and Og, he hoped, by the help of Balaam's curſings, or enchantments, to take from them all ſtrength and courage, and to caſt on them ſome peſtilent diſeaſes. And tho' Balaam at the firſt, moved by the ſpirit of God, bleſs'd [d] Iſrael, contrary to the hope and deſire of Moab; yet being deſirous in ſome ſort to ſatisfy him, and to do him ſervice, he adviſed Moab to ſend Midianitiſh women among the Iſraelites; hoping by them, as by fit inſtruments of miſchief, to draw them to the idolatry of the heathen; but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counſel, and was ſlain among the reſt of the princes of Midian.

After theſe times the kings of the Moabites are not named; ſaving that we find in 1 Chron. iv. that Jokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Joaſh, and Sareph, all being of the iſſue of Judah, ſometime had the dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the 22d verſe, Theſe alſo are ancient things, to wit, as ſome expound it, the particulars of theſe mens governments are no where extant, or remaining: or as others, hæc prius fuere; theſe families of Judah were once thus famous: but now their poſterity chuſe rather to abide in Babylon, and be clay-workers to the king there.

Then we find Eglon king of Moab, who with the help of [e] Ammon and Amalek, maſtered Iſrael, and commanded them 18 years; which Eglon, Ehud ſlew in his own houſe, and afterwards 10000 of his nation. What name the king of Moab had, unto whom David fled, fearing [f] Saul, it doth not appear; or whether it were the ſame againſt whom Saul made war, it is not manifeſt; for neither are named. But in reſpect that this Moabite was an enemy to [g] Saul, he received David, and relieved him, knowing that Saul fought his life.

After this, David himſelf entred the region of [h] Moab; but not likely in the ſame king's time: [i] for he ſlaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was ſaid of David, [k] Moab is my waſh-pot, over Edom will I caſt my ſhoo; meaning, that he would reduce them to ſuch an abjection, and appoint them for baſe ſervices: and that he would tread down the Idumeans.

The next king, after David's time, of the Moabites, whoſe name liveth, was Meſha; who falling from Judah (perhaps in remembrance of the ſeverity of David) faſtened himſelf to the kings of Iſrael, and paid tribute to [d] Ahab 100000 lambs, and 200000 rams, with the wooll: who revolted again from Iſrael, after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jehoram; with whom joined the kings of Judah and Idumea; and being by theſe three kings preſs'd and broken, he fled to Kir-hareſeth, as is elſewhere ſhewed. There is alſo mention made of the Moabites without the king's name; when that nation, aſſiſted by the Ammonites and Idumeans invaded Jehoſophat. And by reaſon of ſome private quarrels among themſelves, the Moabites and Ammonites ſet upon the Idumeans, and ſlaughtered them; and then one againſt another, ſo as [b] Jehoſophat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Alſo in the time of [c] Jeremiah the prophet, there was a king of Moab, which is not named, which was after Meſha of Moab many deſcents: for Meſha lived with Jehoram and this Moabite in Zedekiah's time, 14 kings of Judah coming between, who waſted 300 and odd years.

SECT. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad; whereof all that part which joined to the mountains, was ſometime in the poſſeſſion of the Ammonites, as far to the ſouth as Aroer. Of the childen of Gad, the 7th ſon of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of [d] Leah, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the deſarts 45550, and of their ſons, there entred the land promiſed 45000 bearing arms: from the half tribe of Manaſſeh, the river of Jabboc divided them: from Reuben, the cities of Hesbon, Elhela and Aphec.

The chief city of Gad, was Aroer, which they make to be the ſame with Ar, or [e] Rabbath-Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius, attending diligently to thoſe words of Moſes, Deut. ii. 36. Ab Harahero, quæ eſt in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipſa quæ eſt in flumine; Where the city in the river is diſtinguiſhed from the city upon the bank of the river (as alſo in like manner, Joſh. xii. 2. and xiii. 9.) thinketh, that Haroher, which doubtleſs belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. xxxii. 34. it is ſaid, that they built it) was indeed ſeated near Har of the Moabites; but diverſe from it. For that Har was never poſſeſs'd by Moſes, it is plain, Deut. ii. 9. where God, forbidding Moſes to touch it, ſaith, he hath given Har for an inheritance to the ſons of Lot. Now that this city, which in divers places is ſaid to be within and in the middle of the river of Arnon (and ſo diſtinguiſhed from Haroher, which is ſaid in the ſame places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites; the ſame Junius proveth out of Numb. xxi. 15. where Arnon is ſaid to be divided into divers ſtreams, where, or among which, Har is ſeated: and the ſame is confirmed by the place of Joſh. xiii. 25. where Haroher is ſaid to be ſeated before Rabbah; which Rabbah, as it ſeems, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they ſeat not Haroher near it, nor in ſight of it) and therefore by Rabbah, here we muſt underſtand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har; and ſo we muſt needs diſtinguiſh it from Haroher. And as for [f] Har (which alſo gave the name to the coaſt adjoining) it ſeems it continued in the poſſeſſion of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the giant-like people, called Emims, firſt weakened by [g] Chedorlaomer, and his aſſociates: but Haroher, by the interchange of times, ſuffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Iſraelites; and from them, as it ſeems in the ſtory of Jephtha, by the Ammonites; and from the Ammonites again, by the Iſraelites, under the conduct of Jephtha. In St. Jerome's time, the greateſt part of this city periſhed by an earthquake, as alſo Zoar in which Lot ſaved himſelf, in the deſtruction of Sodom, ſeated not far hence: which they ſay was therefore called Vitula conſternans, becauſe as a wanton tumbling heifer, ſhe was thrice overthrown with earthquakes; for which cauſe alſo [h] Jerome ſeems to think that this Zoar was called Saliſſa or Bal-ſaliſſa, as if Bal had been a remainder of the old name Balah or Belah (of which Gen. xiv. 2.) and Saliſha which hath a ſignification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three earthquakes.

Brochard takes Haroher to be Petra, but erroneouſly, as before it is noted; ſeeing that Petra was in the ſouth border of Moab, adjoining to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the north-eaſt border. Between Haroher and Jordan they ſeat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, becauſe they are ſaid to have built it, Numb. xxxii. 34. tho' Joſhua xiii. 17. it is ſaid that Moſes gave it the Reubenites. Of this city among the reſt of Moab, both Iſaiah xv. and Jeremiah xlviii. propheſied, that it ſhould periſh; and the lakes about it run with the blood of the inhabitants. It was a great village near Arnon in St. Jerome's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next cities of fame to Aroer was Beth-nimrah, of which Iſaiah xv. 21. propheſieth, That the waters thereof ſhould be dryed up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Beth-nimrah in this tribe Adrichomius placeth Jogbeha, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which we read in the ſtory of [i] Gideon; and that Jogbeha was in Gad built by the Gadites, it appears Numb. xxxii. 35. and therefore Nobach alſo muſt needs be in theſe parts: but whether in Gad or Manaſſeh, it is not certain; only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moſes witneſſeth; [k] Nobach alſo (ſaith he) went and took Kenath with her towns, and called it Nobach of his own name; where becauſe the verſes precedent ſpeak of the Manaſſites, and becauſe it is not likely that Moſes would have ſevered this ſeat of the Gadites from the reſt, of which he ſpake before, verſes 34, 35, 36, therefore it may ſeem that this [l] Nobach was in that part of Manaſſeh, which was in the eaſt of Jordan: tho' Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he ſuppoſeth it to be the ſame with Nob, which Saul deſtroyed, of this we ſhall ſpeak [m] in the tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karker where Zebach and Zalmunna reſted themſelves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched thro' this Nobach and Jogbeha, tho' ſome place it in Gad, and make it the ſame with Kir-chares, of which Iſaiah xv. and 2 Kings iii. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the ſame with Kir-chares, it is certain that it was a principal city held ſtill by the Moabites, and not in the tribe of Gad.

In the body of this tribe of Gad they place [n] Hataroth: of which name the ſcripture witneſſeth, that two cities were built by the Gadites; the former ſimply called Hataroth, the latter Hatroth-Sophan: for which latter the Vulgar makes two cities Roth and Shophan; the name Hataroth is as much as Coronæ.

In the valley of the kingdom of Sehon, together with Beth-nimrah, of which we have ſpoken, Joſh. xiii. 27. nameth Beth-haram, and Succoth: the former Numb. xxxii. 36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Beth-nimrah, is ſaid to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather becauſe in Joſhua it is called Beth-haram) ſome take to be Betaramptha (of which [b] Joſephus) after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-haram, or from Beth-aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in [c] Joſephus) or from Beth-remphan (of which Remphan, an idol of thoſe countries, we read Acts vii. 43. and to which Junius refers the name of the city Rephan, 1 Macc. xxxvii.) of this queſtion it were hard to reſolve. But touching Julias (according to Joſephus ſometimes Betaramptha) the ſame Joſephus placeth it in the region of Peræa, beyond Jordan; which Regio Peræa, as the Greek word ſignifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the country beyond the river; and therefore they, which labour to ſet down the bounds of this Peræa, take more pains than needs. Fourteen villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to [d] Joſephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias in honour of the adoption of Livia, Auguſtus's wife, into the Julian family: by which adoption ſhe was called Julia. Another Julias, he [d] ſaith, was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which he ſaith is the ſame as Bethſaida.

Upon the ſea of Galilee near to Julias in Peræa (that is, in the region over Jordan) they find Vetezobra, as it is called in [e] Joſephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus hiſſopi. Of a noble woman of this city, which for ſafeguard in the time of war with the Romans, came with many others into Jeruſalem, and was there beſieged, Joſephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable hiſtory; how for hunger ſhe eat her own child, with other tragical accidents hereupon enſuing.

Of Succoth (which we ſaid Joſh. xiii. is placed with Ben-haran, in the valley of the kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the ſtory of [f] Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is ſaid, that as he was paſs'd Jordan, with his 300, weary in the purſuit of Zebah and Zalmunna, he requeſted relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideon's return were by him tortured, as it ſeems under a threſhing-car, or tribulum, between which and their fleſh he put thorns to tear their fleſh as they were preſs'd and trod under the tribulum; and after which ſort alſo David uſed ſome of the [g] Ammonites, tho' not with thorns, but with the iron teeth of the tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which ſignifieth ſuch tabernacles as were made in haſte, either for men or cattle, Moſes Gen. xxxiii. 17. witneſſeth, that the original of the name was from ſuch harbours, which Jacob in his return from Meſopotamia built in that place: as alſo the place beyond the [h] Red ſea, where the children of Iſrael, as they came from Rameſes in Egypt, had their firſt ſtation, was upon like reaſon called Succoth: becauſe there they ſet up their firſt [i] tabernacles or tents: which they uſed after for forty years in the wilderneſs. In remembrance whereof, the feaſt of Succoth, or tabernacles, was inſtituted.

Other four cities of Gad are named Joſh. xxi. 38. Ramoth in Gilehad, Mahanaim, Chesbon, and Jahzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites; of which Jahzer, as Chesbon or Heshbon was a chief city of Sehon, whendce Numb. xxxii. 1. his country is called the land of Jahzer. It was taken by Moſes, having firſt ſent ſpies to view it. In the firſt of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilehad. In the latter times (as it may be gathered by the prophecy of Iſaiah, touching Moab) it was poſſeſſed by the Moabites: to which place of Iſaiah vi. 8. alſo Jeremiah xlviii. 32. in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it ſeems from the Ammonites) by Judas Maccabæus: as it is 1 Macc. v. 8. where Junius out of Joſephus reads Jahzer, tho' the Greeks hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Joſhua xvi. 3, 8. and Judg. i. 29.) was far from theſe countries of Sehon, ſeated in the weſt border of Ephraim, not poſſeſſed by the Iſraelites, until Solomon's time; for whom the king of Egypt won it from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a dowry with his daughter.

Of Chesbon it may be marvelled, that in the place of Joſhua, and 1 Chron. vi. 81. it ſhould be ſaid to have been given to the Levites, by the Gadites, ſeeing Joſhua xiii. 17. it is reckoned for a principal city of the Reubenites. Adrichomius, and ſuch as little trouble themſelves with ſuch ſcruples, finding Casbon, 1 Macc. v. 36. among the cities of Gilehad, taken by Judas Maccabæus, makes two cities of one; as if this Casbon had been the Chesbon of Gad, and that of Reuben diſtinct from it; but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering city, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites: for ſo alſo it ſeemeth, that in like reaſon, Dibon is ſaid in one place built by the Gadites, and in another, given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaiim, which word ſignifieth a double army, we read Geneſis xxxii. 2. that it was therefore ſo called, becauſe the angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another hoſt, or company, to join with his for his defence; as alſo Luke ii. 13. we read of a multitude of the hoſt of heaven, which appeared to the ſhepherds, at the time of our Saviour's birth; and ſo unto the godly king Oſwald of Northumberland, when he was ſoon after to join battel with the Pagan Penda of Middle-England. Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared; whence the field where the battel was fought in the north parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this city of Machanaiim, David abode during the rebellion of Abſalom; and the ſame, for the ſtrength thereof, Abner choſe for the ſeat of Iſhboſeth, during the war between David and the houſe of Saul.

Of the fourth town, which was Ramoth in Gilehad, we read often in the ſcripture; for the recovering of which, king Achab loſt his life. Junius thinks, that Ramatha-mitſpæ, of which Joſhua xiii. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilehad. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob ſware one to the other, as it was called Gilehad, which is as much as a witneſſing heap, becauſe of the heap of ſtones which Laban and his ſons left for a monument; ſo alſo that it was called Mitſpah, which ſignifieth over-looking (becauſe there they called God to overſee, and be witneſs to their covenant) it is plain by the place, Geneſis, xxxi. 49. that in theſe parts

there was not only a town, but likewiſe a region called Mitſpah, it appears Joſh. xi. 3. where we read of the Chivites under Hermon, in the country of Mitſpah [a] the town of Mitſpah, as it ſeems both by this place and in the 8th verſe following, being not in the hill country, but in the valley. But ſeeing that Jephthha the judge of Iſrael, who after he came home from Tob (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in this town of Mitſpah, who doubtleſs was of the tribe of Manaſſeh, and thence at firſt expelled by his brethren; it may ſeem that they do not well which place this town of [b] Mitſpah rather in Gad, than in Manaſſeh. By [c] Judas Macchabæus this town of Mitſpah (whether in Gad or in Manaſſeh) was utterly ſpoiled and burnt, and all the males of it ſlain: for it was then poſſeſs'd of the Ammonites.

Between Succoth (of which we have ſpoken) and the river Jaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name ſignifieth Locum faciei Dei; [d] A place where the face of God was ſeen: ſo called for memory of the angel's appearing to Jacob, and wreſtling with him there: the churliſhneſs of which city, in refuſing to relieve Gideon, was the cauſe that in his return he overthrew their [e] tower, and ſlew the chief aldermen thereof. To theſe places of the Gadites, they add Rogelim, the city of that great and faithful ſubject [f] Barzillai, as it ſeems, not far from Mahanaima, where he ſuſtained king David during Abſalom's rebellion. To theſe they add the towns of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon alſo no where appears to be the name of a town, but ſtill of a river. Alimis Adrichomius frames of ἐν Ἀλέμοις 1 Macc. v. 26. ſo that the name ſhould rather be Alema; but Junius out of Joſephus reads Mallæ, for this in Alimis: and underſtanding [g] Mallæ to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio (as we have ſhewed touching the Millo of the Siehemites), he takes this Mallæ to be Mitſpah Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. xxii. 3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius finds in this tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moſes noteth to be as far as the fartheſt of Manaſſes, out of the bounds this tribe. So alſo Dathema, of which 1 Macc. v. 10. (which Junius takes to be [h] Rithma, of which Numb. xxxiii. 18. a place of ſtrength in the territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith and Abel vinearum, tho' by ſome they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two laſt we read in Jephthha's purſuit of the Ammonites: ſeated as it ſeems by that place of the book of Judges, the former of them in the ſouth-border, and the other in the eaſt-border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief city of the Ammonites was nearer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the ſcriptures ſometime Rabbath, as Deuteronomy iii. 11. but more often Rabba. It is ſuppoſed to be that [i] Philadelphia which Ptolemy finds in Cœleſyria. Jerome and Calliſtus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it ſeems never poſſeſs'd by the Iſraelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites; whereupon at length it became the regal ſeat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the poſſeſſion of the Zamzummims; which is as much as to ſay, men for all manner of craft and wickedneſs infamous. The ſame were alſo called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his anceſtors; who having been firſt beaten by the Aſſyrians, and their aſſiſtants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterward the eaſier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims were by the Idumeans. Yet did the races of Enoreus, of whom theſe giants were deſcended, contend with the conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Heſhon had diſpoſſeſſed Moab, ſo had Og of Baſan the Ammonites, and between them recovered the beſt part of all the valley, between the mountains and Jordan. For this Og was alſo maſter of Rabba or Philadelphia: and in the poſſeſſion of the one or the other of theſe two, Moſes and Iſrael found all thoſe cities and countries, which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manaſſeh. So that tho' it were 450 years ſince that the Zamzummims or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having theſe two kings of one kindred, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon both Amorites, they recovered again much of their loſt poſſeſſions, and thruſt the ſons of Lot over the mountains, and into the deſarts. And as the kings, or captains of Perſia and Aſſyria (remembred Geneſis xiv.) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom; ſo by that great conqueſt which Moſes had over thoſe two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into thoſe plains, and when the Reubenites, Gadites and Manaſſites forſook the worſhip of the living God, and became ſlothful and licentious, they taking the advantage, invaded them, and caſt them out of their poſſeſſions; and were ſometimes their maſters, ſometimes their tributaries, as they pleaſed or diſpleaſed God; and according to the wiſdom and virtue of their commanders.

In this city of Rabba, was the iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth, Deut. iii. The city was taken in David's time, and the inhabitants ſlain with great ſeverity, and by divers torments. At the firſt aſſault thereof Uriah was ſhot to death, having been by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading of an aſſault, where he could not eſcape: wherein alſo many of the beſt of the army periſhed, and wherein David ſo diſpleaſed God, as his affairs had ill ſucceſs afterward even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich crown of gold, which the [k] kings of Ammon wore; or which, as ſome expound it, was uſed to be ſet on the head of their idol, weighing a talent, which is ſixty pound weight after the common talent. In the time of the Chriſtians it had a metropolitan biſhop, and under him twelve others.

The mountains which are deſcribed within this tribe, and that of Manaſſeh, with a part of Reuben, are thoſe which [l] Ptolemy calleth the hills of Hippus, a city of Cœleſyria; and [m] Strabo, Trachones, the ſame which contain from Damaſcus to near the departs of Moab, and receive divers names, as commonly mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers countries: for from the south part, as far northward as Aſteroth, the chief city of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence northward, they are known by the name of Hermon; for ſo Moſes calleth them: the Zidonians name them Shirion; but the Amorites, Shenir, others Seir; of which name all thoſe hills alſo were called, which part Judea and Idumea: and laſtly, they are called Libanus; for ſo the prophet Jer. xxii. makes them all one, calling the high mountains of Galaad the head of Libanus. Theſe mountains are very fruitful, and full of good paſtures, and have many trees, which yield [a] Balſamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The river of this tribe are the waters of Nimrah and Dibon, and the river Jaboc: others do alſo fancy another river, which riſing out of the rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

SECT. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whoſe territories the Gadites won from Og the king of Baſan.

THIS tribe of Gad, poſſeſs'd half the country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabathea, as well within as without the mountains of Gilead: tho' at this time when the Gadites won it, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moſes did not expel the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thruſt the iſſues of Lot over the mountains Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the firſt judge of Iſrael; the Ammonites joined with the Moabites againſt the Hebrews, and ſo continued long. [b] Jephtha judge of Iſrael had a great conqueſt over one of the kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again.

Afterward we find that cruel king of the Ammonites, called Nahas; who beſieging [c] Jabez Gilead, gave them no other conditions than the pulling out of their right eyes. The reaſon why he tender'd ſo hard a compoſition, was (beſides this deſire to bring ſhame upon Iſrael, becauſe thoſe Gileadites uſing to carry a target on their left arms, which could not but ſhadow their left eyes, ſhould by loſing their right, be utterly diſabled to defend themſelves: but Saul came to their reſcue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may ſeem, became the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, tho' [d] Joſephus thinks that this Nahas was ſlain in the battle, when Saul rais'd the ſiege of Jabez, who affirmeth that there were three kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanan ſucceeded Nahas; to whom when David ſent to congratulate his eſtabliſhment, and to confirm the former friendſhip which he had with his father, he moſt contemptuouſly and proudly cut off the ambaſſadors garments to the knees, and ſhaved the half of their beards. But afterwards, notwithſtanding the aids received from the Aramites ſubject to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from [e] Iſtob, yet all thoſe Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were over-turned; their chief city of Rabba, after Philadelphia, taken, the crown, which weighed a talent of gold, was ſet on David's head; all ſuch as were priſoners David executed with ſtrange ſeverity; for with ſaws and harrows, he tare them in pieces, and caſt the reſt into lime-kilns.

Jehoſaphat governing Judah, they aſſiſted the Moabites their neighbours againſt him, and periſhed together. Oſias made them tributaries, and they were again by Jotham inforc'd to continue that tribute, and to increaſe it, to wit, one hundred talents of ſilver, ten thouſand meaſures of wheat, and ten thouſand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

The fifth king of the Ammonites, of whoſe name we read, was Baalis, the confederate of Zedekiah: after whoſe taking by Nabuchodonoſor, Baalis ſent Iſhmael of the blood of the king of Judah, to ſlay Gedaliah, who ſerved Nabuchodonoſor.

SECT. VII.

Of the other half of Manaſſeh.

THE reſt of the land of Gilead, and of the kingdom of Og in Baſan, with the land of Hus, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein alſo were part of the ſmall territories of [f] Batanea, Gaulonitis, Geſſuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the half tribe of Manaſſeh over Jordan, of which thoſe three latter provinces defended themſelves againſt them, for many ages. But Batanea Ptolemy ſetteth farther off, and to the north-eaſt, as a ſkirt of Arabia the deſart: and all thoſe other provinces before named with Peræa and Ituræa, he nameth but as part of Cœleſyria, as far ſouth as Rabba or Philadelphia; likewiſe all the reſt which belonged to Gad and Reuben, ſaving the land near the Dead ſea, he makes part of Arabia Petræa: for many of theſe ſmall kingdoms take not much more ground than the county of Kent.

Baſan, or after the Septuagint, Baſanitis, ſtretcheth it ſelf from the river of Jaboc, to the [g] Machati, and Geſſuri; and from the mountains to Jordan, a region exceeding fertile; by reaſon whereof it abounded in all ſorts of cattle. It had alſo the goodlieſt woods of all that part of the world; eſpecially of oaks, which bear maſt (of which the prophet Zacharias, Howl, O ye oaks of Baſan) and by reaſon hereof they bred ſo many ſwine, as [h] 2000 in one herd were carried head-long into the ſea, by the unclean ſpirits which Chriſt had caſt out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threeſcore cities, walled and defenced: all which, after Og and his ſons were ſlain, Jair, deſcended of Manaſſeh, conquered, and called the country after his own name, Avoth Jair, or the cities of Jair.

The principal cities of this half tribe (for I will omit the reſt) are theſe, Pella, ſometimes [i] Butis, otherwiſe Bernice: by Seleucus, king of Syria, it is ſaid to have been called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon, in which both Philip the father, and his ſon Alexander the Great were born. It was taken, and in part demoliſhed, by Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, becauſe it refuſed to obey the Jews laws; but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the government of Syria. It is now but a village, ſaith Niger. Carnaim by the river Jaboc, taken by [k] Judas Maccabeus, where he ſet on fire the [a] temple of their idols, together with all thoſe that fled thereunto for ſanctuary; and near it they place the caſtle of Carnion, of which 2 Mac. xii. 22. Then the ſtrong city of [b] Ephron near Jordan, which refuſing to yield paſſage to [c] Judas Maccabeus, was forced by him by aſſault, and taken, and burnt with great ſlaughter.

Jabez Gilead, or Jabeſus, was another of the cities of this half tribe, which being beſieged by [d] Nahas, king of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is [e] elſewhere mentioned. In memory whereof, the citizens [f] recovered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his ſons, which hung deſpitefully over the walls of Bethſan, or Scythopolis. [g] Gaddara, or Gadara, is next to be named, ſeat by Pliny on a hill near the river Hieromiace, which river Ortelius ſeems to think to be Jaboc. At the foot of the hill there ſpring forth alſo hot baths, as at Machærus. Alexander Jannæus, after ten months ſiege, won it, and ſubverted it. Pompey reſtored it; and Gabinius [h] made it one of the five courts of juſtice in Paleſtine. Jeruſalem being the firſt, Gadara the ſecond, Emath, or Amathus the third, Jericho and Sephora in Galilee the fourth and fifth. The citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, ſurnamed Aſcalonita, accuſed him to Julius Ceſar of many crimes; but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Ceſar, fearing the terrible [i] revenge of Herod, they ſlew themſelves; ſome by ſtrangling, others by leaping over high towers, others by drowning themſelves.

To the eaſt of Gadara, they place Sebei [k] in which Joſephus, Ant. 5. 13. ſaith Jephtha was buried; whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. xii. 7. Sepultus eſt in Civitate ſua Gilehad (for in una Civitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilead to be the name of a city, and to be the ſame with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Mac. v. 26. where it readeth Caſphor for Chesbon: the ſame Adrichomius imagineth it to be Ampla & firma Gilehaditarum civitas; ſo of one city Hesbon, or Chesbon, which they call Eſſebon, the chief city of Sehon in the tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more. This Caſphor in Manaſſes, and a city in Gad, which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admoniſhed the reader heretofore. Of Gamala (ſo called, becauſe the hill on which it ſtood, was in faſhion like the back of a camel) which Joſephus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis, over-againſt Tarichea, which is on the weſt-ſide of the ſea or lake of Tiberias. See this in Joſephus's fourth book of the Jewiſh war, c. 1. 3. where he deſcribes the place by nature to be almoſt invincible; and in the ſtory of the ſiege, ſhews how Veſpaſian, with much danger of his own perſon, entering it, was at firſt repulſed, with other very memorable accidents; and how at length, after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks, with their wives and children, to the number of five thouſand, thus periſhed; beſides four thouſand ſlain by the Romans; ſo that none eſcaped, ſave only two women that hid themſelves.

About four miles weſt from Gadara, and as much eaſt from Tiberias (which is on the other ſide of the lake) Joſephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence [l] Ptolemy gives the name to the hills that compaſs the plains in which it ſtandeth: ſo that it may ſeem to have been of no ſmall note. It is ſeated far from the hill country: on the eaſt of the lake, as alſo Pliny noteth, lib. 5. cap. 15. it was reſtored by Pompey; after by [m] Auguſtus added to Herod's tetrarchy: it was waſted by the Jews, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many maſſacres of their nation, they were inraged againſt their borderers.

The next city of note, but of more ancient fame, is [n] Edrebi or Edrai, wherein Og king of Baſan chiefly abode, when Moſes and Iſrael invaded him: and near unto this his regal city, it was that he loſt the battle and his life. It ſtood in St. Jerome's time; and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not far from theſe towns near Jordan, in this valley ſtood Geraſſa or Gergeſſa, inhabited by the Gergeſites, deſcended of the fifth ſon of Canaan. Of theſe Gergeſites we read Mat. viii. 28. that Chriſt coming from the other ſide of the lake of Tiberias, landed in their coaſts; where caſting the devils out of the poſſeſſed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of hogs: in which ſtory, for Gergeſites or Gergeſins, [o] St. Luke and St. Mark have Gadarens; not as if theſe were all one (for Gergeſſa or Geraſſa is a diſtinct town in theſe parts from Gadera) but the bounds being confounded, and the cities nieghbours, either might well be named in this ſtory. This city received many changes and calamities, of which Joſephus hath often mention. For beſides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius lieutenant to Veſpaſian; and 1000 of the ableſt young men put to the ſword, and the city burnt. In the year 1120 it was rebuilt by Baldwin king of Damaſcus; and in the ſame year recovered by Baldwin de Burgo king of Jeruſalem, and by him utterly razed. Near unto Geraſa is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriak, Magedu, or after the Greek, Magdala, where the Phariſees and Sadducees, Matt. xv. deſired of our Saviour a ſign from heaven; the ſame place, or ſome adjoining to it, which [p] St. Mark calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumſtances of which ſtory it appears, that this coaſt lay between the lake of Tiberias, and the country of Decapolis. [q] Brochard makes both theſe places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan according to Joſephus: but this Phiale is too far from the ſea of Galilee, and from Bethſaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the ſtory, not far hence towards the north, was the deſart of Bethſaida, [r] where Chriſt filled 5000 people with the five barley loaves and the fiſhes.

On the north of this Bethſaida they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the region Trachonitis toward the ſouth. It was ſometimes a village, and not long after the birth of Chriſt it was compaſſed with a wall by Philip the tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis; and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias called Julias, as hath been farther ſpoken in the tribe of Gad, where it is noted that [s] Joſephus makes this Julias to be the ſame as Bethſaida. Upon the eaſt-ſide of the ſame lake of Tiberias ſtands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Chriſt in Matthew; Wo be unto the Corazim.

But the principal city of all theſe in ancient time was Aſteroth, ſometime peopled with the giants Raphaim; and therefore the country adjoining called the land of giants, of whoſe race was Og king of Baſan. In Geneſis xvi. 5. this city is called Aſteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. v. 26. is is called ſimply Carnaim, as Joſh. xiii. 21. it is called Aſteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word [a]Carnaim ſignifieth a pair of horns, which agree well with the name of their idol Aſtoreth, which was the image of a ſheep, as it is elſewhere noted, that Aſtaroth in Deut. ſignifieth ſheep. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to have been the name of the people which inhabited this city, and expound it Heroes [b]radientes. For of old the Raphæi which inhabited this city, Gen. xiv. 5. were giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. iii. 11. Og ex reſiduo gigantum, with the words Joſh. xiii. 12. Og ex reliquiis Raphaæorum; but if the Karnaim, or Karnaiim, were thoſe Raphæi, the word would not have been in the dual number; neither would Moſes in the place of Geneſis have ſaid the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Karnaim, but rather the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Raphæi, or ſome other way fitteſt for perſpicuity; for this naming of both thus in the ſame clauſe, diſtinguiſheth the one from the other.

Not far from Aſteroth, Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, four miles from Corazin. This city, ſaith he, is remembred in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this city underſtand David in Pſalm 120, and here the ſepulchre of Job is yet to be ſeen, ſaith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the texts which he citeth, it is ſo, that the Greek hath Galaad inſtead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth uſe in that place of Judith, and joineth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles, and the 120th Pſalm do rather prove, that Kedar was not hereabout, than any way help Adrichomius. For that they ſpeak of Scenitæ Cedareni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolores, much more than any under the Climates of the land of Canaan; whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny, placeth them in Arabia Petræa, far from theſe parts. Touching the ſepulchre of Job it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding thoſe places) feign many things to abuſe the Chriſtians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many, if not all, the hiſtorical circumſtances of Job are ſo obſcure, that we ſhould rather by finding his country ſeek to get ſome knowledge of him, than by any preſumptions founded upon him, infer what his country was, and build unto him a city by conjecture.

Of Job himſelf, whether he were the ſame Jobab remembred in Geneſis xxxvi. deſcended from Eſau, and king alſo of Idumea, tho' [c] Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaſter, and Bellarmine are of another opinion, yet St. Ambroſe, Auguſtine, Chryſoſtome, and Gregory, with Athanaſius, Hippolytus, Irenæus, Euſebius Emiſſenus, Apollinaris, Euſtachius and others, cited by St. Jerome in his 126th epiſtle to Evagrius, take him for the ſame.

The land of Huts or Hus wherein Job dwelt is from the Greek [d] ὗς, which the Septuagint uſe for the word Huts, tranſlated by the Vulgar ſometimes Hus, as Job i. 1. ſometimes Auſitis, as Jer. xxv. 20. This land is placed by Junius between Palæſtina and Cœleſyria, beſide Chamatha, or Hamatha, under Palmyrene in the country called by Ptolemy, Trachonitis or Bathanea, the bounds of which countries are confounded with Baſan in this half tribe of Manaſſeh. And that this land of Hus was thus ſeated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jeremiah xxv. 20. where he reckons the Huſbites among the promiſcuous borderers of the Iſraelites, whom he therefore calleth promiſcuous or miſcellaneam turbam, becauſe their bounds were not only joined but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Jeremiah, Lam. iv. 21. ſpeaking of the ſame prophecy, of which he ſpeaketh in the five and twentieth chapter, muſt needs be expounded; as Junius reads them, diſtinguiſhing the land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, ô quæ habitas in terra Hutzi; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwelleſt in the land of Hus. Now becauſe the Vulgar doth not ſo diſtinguiſh, but readeth, Filia Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwelleſt in the land of Hus: Hence, as it ſeems, ſome of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have ſaid, and king of Edom; which if they underſtand by it Idumæa or Edom, ſo called in Moſes's time, they are greatly miſtaken, making this land of Hus to be in Idumea, Deut. iii. 9. For it is very probable, that Eſau, when he firſt parted from Jacob, did not ſeat himſelf in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the ſouth border of Judea, but inhabited Seir far to the eaſt of Jordan, and held a part of thoſe mountains otherwiſe called Galaad and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir for Seir, and from this his habitation did Eſau encounter Jacob, when he returned out of Meſopotamia, who paſſed by the very border of Eſau's abiding. It is true, that at ſuch time as Moſes wandred in the deſarts, that the poſterity of Eſau inhabited Seir to the ſouth of Judea. For it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did alſo drive the Edomites out of thoſe parts, who thenceforward ſeated themſelves to the ſouth of Judea, bordering the deſart Paran, and ſtretched their habitations over the deſarts as far as Hor, where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus, which gave the name to a part of the land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the ſon of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. x. 23. or rather Hus the ſon of Nachor, Abraham's brother, the queſtion is doubtful. For my part I rather incline to think, that it was Hus the ſon of Nahor; partly becauſe theſe families of Aram ſeem long before to have been loſt; and partly becauſe in Job. xxxii. 2. Elihu the fourth of Job's friends, which ſeems to be of Job's own country, is called a [e] Buzite, of Buz, the brother of Hus, the ſon of Nachor; as alſo Jer. xxv. in the ſame continuation (tho' ſome other nations named between) where Hus is ſpoken of, there Buz is alſo named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job xxxii. Elihu the Buzite is ſaid to be of the family of Ram (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the family of Aram:) for that by this Aram we are not to underſtand Aram the ſon of Shem, Junius himſelf maketh it plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he ſaith that one of Job's friends (which muſt needs be this Elihu) was of the poſterity of Nachor (as alſo in this place he confeſſeth ſo much expreſly) and in as much as he readeth not, è familia Aram, or Ram, but è familia Syra; like as elſewhere Laban who ſprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As

As for the [a]other three of Job's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu's being of the Syrian family, or the family of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuagint's addition, that this Elihu was of the land of Hus, or Auſitis, it is implied that they thought only Elihu to have been of Job's own country.

Franciſcus Brochard the monk, in his deſcription of the holy land in the journey from Acon eaſtward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the eaſt of the ſea of Galilee, both very near to the land of Hus; whereof the one may ſeem to have denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite; two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job. ii. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the deſart, deſcended of Shuach the ſon of Abraham and Ketura; of whom Geneſis xxv. 2. perhaps, ſaith he, the ſame whom Pliny calls Sacchæi. So alſo he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Eliphaz was, to have been of Arabia the deſart; and Eliphaz himſelf to have been of the poſterity of Theman the ſon of Eliphaz, which was the ſon of Eſau. And ſo alſo Nahamah whence Tſophar the third of Job's friends (which in this place of Job ii. 11. are mentioned) is by the ſame learned expoſitor thought either to be named of Thimnah by tranſpoſition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. xxxvi. 40. is named among the ſons of Eſau that gave denomination to the places where they are ſeated) or elſe to be the ſame Nahamah, which Joſh. xv. 41. is reckoned for a city of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not, but that near to the land of Hus, in Baſan, as it ſeems, in the tribe of Manaſſes, there is a region which at leaſt in latter times was called Suitis, or of ſome like name. For this is evident by the hiſtory of [b]Gulielmus Tyrius, which reports of a fort in this region of Suita or Suitis (as he calls it diverſly) of exceeding great ſtrength and uſe for the retaining of the whole country: which in the time of Baldwin the 2d king of Jeruſalem, was with great digging thro' rocks recovered by the Chriſtians; having not long before been loſt to the great diſadvantage of the country, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The ſituation of this fort is by Tyrius deſcribed to be 16 miles from the city Tiberias, on the eaſt of Jordan, by Adrichomius 4 miles northward from the place where Jordan enters the lake Tiberias at Corazim.

Other cities of this part of Manaſſes named in the ſcripture are theſe; Golan, Beheſhthera, Mitſpah of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Iſraelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitſpah of [c]Gilehad, we have ſpoken by occaſion among the cities of Gad: the two other were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the cities of refuge; from which Golan we have both Gaulanitis ſuperior & inferior, oft in Joſephus. Beheſhthera is accounted the chief city of Baſan by ſome, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betſer or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a region in this tract, and hence Jerome hath Arga, a name of a city placed by ſome about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Joſhua) which make the lake Samachonitis, as Joſephus calls it. This lake being as it were in the midſt between Cæſaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half tribe on the weſt. When the ſnow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, ſaith Brochard; otherwiſe more contract, leaving the mariſh ground on both ſides, for lions and other wild beaſts, which harbour in the ſhrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adjoining to this lake in this country of Manaſſes, Joſephus names two places of ſtrength fortified by himſelf in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the north ſide of this half tribe of Manaſſeh, and in the north-eaſt, the ſcripture nameth divers bordering places towards Damaſcus, as Tſedad Chauran, and Chatſar Henan, lying in a line drawn from the weſt; of which three cities we read Ezek. xlvii. 16. with which alſo agrees the place Numb. xxxiv. 8. where for Chauran, between Tſedad, and Chatſar-henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis regio, in Joſephus and Tyrius, whoſe bounds (as alſo the bounds of Geſſur and Mahachath or Macati, which were likewiſe borderers to Manaſſes towards the north-eaſt) are unknown; only that Geſſur was of might, it appears in that David married [d]Mahaca the daughter of Tholmay king of Geſſur; by whom he had the moſt beautiful, but wicked, and unfortunate Abſalon.

CHAP. XI.

The hiſtory of the Syrians, the chief borderers of the Iſraelites, that dwelt on the eaſt of Jordan.

SECT. I.

Of the city of Damaſcus, and the divers fortunes thereof.

Damaſcus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the moſt famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the city of joy or gladneſs, and the houſe of pleaſure; and is not only remembred in many places of ſcripture, but by the beſt hiſtorians and coſmographers. The Hebrews, ſaith [e]Joſephus i. 14. think it to have been built by Hus the ſon of Aram; of which opinion St. Jerome upon Iſaiah xvii. ſeemeth to be; tho' in his Hebrew queſtions he affirmeth that it was founded by Damaſcus, the ſon of Eliezer [f]Abraham's ſteward, a thing very unlikely, ſeeing the city was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his ſteward Eliezer of Damaſco. David was the firſt that ſubjected it to the kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadezer their king; but in Solomon's time, Rezon recovered it again, tho' he had no title at all or right to that principality: but David having overthrown Hadadezer king of Sophena (otherwiſe Syria, Soba or Zobah) Razon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken army, invaded [g]Damaſcena, and poſſeſs'd Damaſcus it ſelf, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

The next king of Damaſcus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from [h]David, and Joab, when they ſlew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the king of Egypt's wife's ſiſter, of whom Taphnes in Egypt was ſo called. This Adad returning again became an enemy to Solomon, all his life, and (as ſome writers affirm) invaded Damaſcus, and thruſt Rezon thence out. In the line of Adad that kingdom continued nine deſcents (as hereafter may be ſhewed in the catalogue of thoſe kings of Syria) to whom the Aſſyrians and then the Grecians ſucceeded. This city was exceeding ſtrong, compaſſed with waters from the rivers of [a] Abanah and Parphar; whereof one of thoſe prophane writers call Chryſorrhoas, the golden river. Junius takes it for Adonis. The country adjoining is very fruitful of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very ſtrong caſtle built, as it ſeems, by the [b] Florentines after it became Chriſtian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that citadel. Againſt this city the prophets [c] Amos, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and Zacharias, propheſied that it ſhould be taken, burnt, demoliſhed, and made a heap of ſtones. In the time of the laſt Rezon, and tenth king of the Damaſcenes, Teglatphalaſſar invited by Achaz king of [d] Juda, carried away the naturals of Damaſcus into the eaſt, leaving of his own nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, ſaid Jerome upon Iſaiah xvii. which thing was performed by Salmanaſar according to Junius, in his note upon that place, 5 years after the prophecy. In time it was reſtored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolemies; but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by [e] Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Chriſtians it had an archbiſhop: St. Jerome living, as he affirmeth upon the Acts, it was the metropolis of the Saracens, being taken by Haomar their king from the Romans, in the year of our redemption 636. And in the year [f] 1147, Conrad the third, emperor of Rome, Lewis king of France, Baldwin the third king of Jeruſalem, Henry duke of Auſtria, brother to Conrad, [g] Frederick Barbaroſſa afterwards emperor, Theodorick earl of Flanders, and other princes aſſembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the ſea coaſt, determined to recover Damaſcus; but being betray'd by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the year 1262, Halon the Tartar incompaſs'd it, and having formerly taken the king, brought him under the walls, and threatened extream torture unto him, except the citizens ſurrendred the place; but they refuſing it, the [h] king was torn aſunder before them, and in fine the city taken, Agab the ſon of Halon was by his father made king thereof.

In the year [i] 1400, Tamberlain emperor of the Parthians, invaded that region, and beſieged the city with an army of 1200000 (if the number be not miſtaken.) He entred it and put all to the ſword, filling the ditch with his priſoners, thoſe that retired into the caſtle, which ſeemed a place impregnable, he over-topped with another caſtle adjoining; he forbore the demoliſhing of the city in reſpect of the beauty of the church, garniſhed with 40 gates or ſumptuous porches. It had within it 9000 lanterns of gold and ſilver; but while he invaded Egypt they again ſurprized Damaſcus. Laſtly, in his return after three months ſiege he forc'd it; the Mahometans, proſtrating themſelves with their prieſts, deſired mercy: but Tamberlain commanding them to enter the church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000, and did ſo demoliſh it, as thoſe that came afterwards to ſee their houſes, knew them not by their foundations. And as a trophy of his victory, he raiſed three towers with great art, built with the heads of thoſe whom he had ſlaughtered. After this it was reſtored and repoſſeſſed by the ſoldan of Egypt, with a garriſon of Mammalukes. And in the year 1517, Selimus emperor of the Turks wreſted it out of the hands of the Egyptians; in whoſe poſſeſſion it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Chriſtians, of all neighbouring nations.

SECT. II.

Of the firſt kings of Damaſcus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damaſcus were founded by Hus the ſon of Aram, or by Damaſcus the ſon of Eliezer, Abraham's ſteward, we find no relation of their kings, or common-wealth till David's time. For it ſtood without the bounds of Canaan; and therefore neglected by Moſes, Joſhua, and Judges, as impertinent to that ſtory: but were it ſo that it had ſome reguli, or petty kings over it, as all the cities of thoſe parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till ſuch time as David overthrew Adadezer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba; the ſame nation which [k] Pliny calleth Nubæi, inhabiting between Batania and Euphrates. Now the better to underſtand the ſtory of thoſe Syrian princes, whom ſoon after the kings of Damaſcus made their vaſſals, the reader may inform himſelf, that on the north-eaſt parts of the holy land there were three chief principalities whereof the kings or commanders greatly vexed or diſturbed the ſtate or commonwealth of [l] Iſrael, namely Damaſcus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba, of which theſe were the princes in David's and Solomon's times: Razon or Rezon of Damaſcus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Tohu of Chamath. But it ſeemeth that Damaſcus was one of the cities ſubject to Adadezer when David invaded him, tho' when Saul made war againſt Zoba, Damaſcus was not named. And as Joſephus affirmeth, the leader of thoſe ſuccours, which were levied and ſent to Hadad-Hezer from Damaſcus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battle ſlain with [m] 22000 Aramites of Damaſcus; whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadezer, Rezon the commander of his army, taking advantage, made himſelf king of Damaſcus: Adadezer and [n] Adad of Damaſcus being both ſlain. About the ſame time Tohu king of Chamath or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was utterly overthrown, ſendeth for peace to David, and preſented him with rich gifts, but in dolo, ſaith St. Jerome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the north of the holy land, and to the weſt of Damaſcus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited; but they for the moſt part were in league and peace with the Judeans and Iſraelites. But to return to the kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the ſcriptures, containing Damaſcena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath or Iturea, to which I may add Geſhur, becauſe it is ſo accounted in 2 Sam. xv. as joining in the territory to Damaſcus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Paleſtina it ſelf is but a province, as I have noted in the beginning of this tract. It is not agreed among the hiſtorians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the firſt of thoſe Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damaſcus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumea: of whom it is written in the 1ſt of Kings, that David having invaded that region, and left Joab therein to deſtroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the king's ſeed, fled into Egypt, and was there married to Taphnes the queen's ſiſter as before; who hearing of David's death, and the death of his captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering nations feared) he turned again, and, as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damaſcus, and was the firſt of the Syrian kings. To me it ſeemeth otherwiſe. For as I take it, [a] Adadezer the ſon of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that principality; and the firſt of Adads, who forſaking his father's name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the ſtyle of Adad, the great god of the Aſſyrians, ſaith Macrobius, which ſignifieth oneneſs or unity. I alſo find a city called Adada in the ſame part of Syria: of which whether theſe princes took the name or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, Eliadad were the ſame in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adjoined. And that Adadezer was of greateſt power, it appeareth, firſt becauſe it is againſt him, that David undertook the war; ſecondly, becauſe he levied 22000 Aramites out of the territory of Damaſcus; as out of his proper dominions: for had the Damaſcenes had a king apart, it is probable that the ſcriptures would have given us his name; thirdly, becauſe Syria Zoba, of the moſt of which Adadezer was king, was an exceeding large territory, and contained of Arabia the deſart as far as to Euphrates, according to [b] Pliny, and the greateſt part of Arabia Petræa, according to Niger. Whoſoever was the firſt, whether Adadezer or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the ſecond: [c] Who was an enemy to Iſrael all the days of Solomon. Beſides, the evil that Adad did ſeemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Egypt, to wit, 23 years after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damaſcus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion ſucceeded Tabrimmon, or Tabremmon; to him Benhadad, as is proved in 1 Kings xv. 18. For Aſa king of Juda, the ſon of Abiam, the ſon of Roboam, the ſon of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Baaſha, the ſucceſſor of Nadab, the ſon of Jeroboam, ſent to Benhadad, the ſon of Tabrimmon the ſon of Hezion king of Aram, that dwelt at Damaſcus, to invade Iſrael (while Baaſha ſought to fortify Rama againſt Aſa; thereby to block him up, that he ſhould not enter into any of the territories of Iſrael) who according to the deſire of Aſa, having received his preſents, willingly invaded the country of Nephtalim, and took divers cities, and ſpoils thence: [d] Aſa in the mean while carrying away all the materials, which Baaſha had brought to fortify Rama withal, and converted them to his own uſe.

This Benhadad's father Tabremmon was in league with Aſa: and ſo was his father Hezion; for Aſa requireth the continuance of that friendſhip from Benhadad, his ſon; tho' it ſeemeth that the gold and ſilver ſent him out of the temple, was the moſt forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Iſrael, before the enterpriſe of his ſon Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad, when he was priſoner with Achab, ſpoke as followeth. [e] The cities which my father took from thy father, I will reſtore; and thou ſhalt make ſtreets or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damaſcus; as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariſeth a great doubt (if the argument it ſelf were of much importance) becauſe Tabremmon was father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Baaſha, at the requeſt of Aſa. But this Benhadad that twice entred upon [f] Acab, and was the ſecond time taken priſoner, was rather the ſon of Benhadad, the firſt of that name, the confederate of Aſa and Abiam, as before, than the ſon of Tabremmon. For between the invaſion of Benhadad the firſt, in Baaſha's time, and the ſiege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there paſs'd 49 years, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the kings of Iſrael. So that if we allow 30 years of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baaſha, and after that 49 years, e're he was taken by Achab, which make 79 years, it is unlikely that Benhadad, at ſuch an age, ſhould make war. Beſides all this, the firſt Benhadad came with no ſuch pomp, but the ſecond Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32 kings; and therefore I reſolve that Benhadad the ſon of Tabremmon invaded Baaſha and Omri, and Benhadad the ſecond invaded Achab, at whoſe hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrows; the firſt at Samaria, by a ſally of 700 Iſraelites; the ſecond at Aphec, where with the like number in effect the Iſraelites ſlaughted 100000 of the [g] Aramites, beſides 27000, which were cruſh'd by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad again ſetteth at liberty; to whom he rendreth thoſe towns, that his father had taken from the predeceſſor of Achab; but being returned, he refuſed to ſurrender Ramoth-Gilead, a frontier town, and of great importance. Now three years afters (for ſo long the league laſted) [h] Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invadeth Gilead, and beſiegeth the city, being aſſiſted by Jehoſaphat. The Aramites came to ſuccour and fight, in which Achab is wounded, and died that night. After this, Benhadad ſendeth the commander of his forces [i] Naaman, to Joram the ſon of Achab, to be healed of the leproſy; and tho' Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh quarrel againſt Joram: and when Joram by Elizeus's intelligence, had eſcaped his plot, he ſent men and chariots to take the prophet, as is aforeſaid. After [k] Benhadad beſiegeth Samaria again; and being terrified thence from [l] heaven, he departeth home, and ſickneth, and ſendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his eſtate, if he might live. Azael returning, ſmothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad, Adar, the ſon of Adar: [m] Amos and Jeremiah mention the towers of Benhadad. Joſephus writeth, that Benhadad and his ſucceſſor Azael, were worſhipped for gods, by the Syrians to his time, for the ſumptuous temples which they built in [n] Damaſcus. The Syrians alſo boaſted much of their antiquity, ignorant, ſaith he, that ſcarce yet 1100 years are compleat, ſince their wars with the Iſraelites.

Hazael or Azael, the firſt king of the race of the Adads of Damaſcus, was anointed by Eliſha, or Elizeus, when he was ſent by Benhadad to the prophet, to know whether Benhadad ſhould recover his preſent fit of ſickneſs. He waged war with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead; from whence returning to be cured at Jeſrael, he and the king of Juda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are ſlain by Jehu, as before is ſaid. After the death of Joram, Azael continued the war againſt Jehu, and waſted Gilead, and all thoſe portions of [o] Gad, Reuben, and Manaſſeh, over Jordan. He then invadeth Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Joas, he was averted from attempting Jeruſalem: for he preſented him with all the [p] hallowed things which Jehoſaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah, his fathers, kings of Juda had dedicated, and which he himſelf had dedicated; and all the gold which was found in the treaſuries of the Lord, and in the king's houſe. This was the ſecond time that the temple was ſpoiled, to pleaſe the Adads of Damaſcus: for [a]Aſa did preſent Benhadad with thoſe treaſures, when he invited him to war upon Baaſha, king of Iſrael. And notwithſtanding this compoſition between Joas and Azael, yet a part of his army ſpoiled the other provinces of Judea, and ſlaughtered many principal perſons. Laſtly, [b]Azael vexed Joahas the ſon of Jehu, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty horſemen, ten chariots, and ten thouſand footmen of all his people.

SECT. III.

Of the later kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

AFter Hazael, Benhadad the ſecond, or rather the third of that name, the ſon of Hazael, reigned in Damaſcus, who fought againſt Iſrael with ill ſucceſs: for [c]Joas, king of Iſrael, the ſon of the unhappy Joachaz, as as he was foretold by [d]Eliſha the prophet, beat Benhadad in three ſeveral battles; and he loſt all thoſe cities to Iſrael, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz.

Afterwards this Benhadad, the ſon of Hazael, there ſucceed 3 others of the ſame name, of whom the ſtories are loſt; only Nicholaus Damaſcenus, cited by [e]Joſephus, makes mention of them: and in one of theſe king's times it was, that Jeroboam the 2d, the ſon of [f]Joas, recovered Damaſcus it ſelf, to Judah, ſaith the Geneva; but better in Junius, utque recuperabat Damaſcum, & Camatham Jehudæ, pro Iſraele; that is, And how he recovered for Iſrael, Damaſcus, and Camatha of Judea: for theſe cities, ſometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conqueſt upon the Adads was performed; the firſt of theſe three Adads then living, of whom there is no ſtory. For when as Jehoas the king of the ten tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad, the ſon of Hazael, and had recovered the cities which Hazael had won from Iſrael; and ſo left his kingdom to his ſon Jeroboam the 2d: it ſeemeth, that this Jeroboam, without delay, and having nothing elſe left for him to enterpriſe, inſtantly followed his father's good fortune, and invaded Damaſcus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Joſephus Raſes, after Zonaras Raaſon the 10th, Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacas, king of Iſrael, againſt Achaz, king of Juda: both carry away a great number of priſoners. After this they both beſiege Achaz in Jeruſalem; but in vain. Then [g]Adad alone invadeth Elath; and beating out the Jews, maketh it a colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought [h]Teglatphalaſſar againſt Razin, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damaſcus; with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the kingdom of Damaſcus; the Aſſyrians becoming maſters both of that and Iſrael. Theſe Adads, as they reigned in order, are thus reckoned:

1. Adadezer, the ſon of Rehob.
2. Rezin, the ſon of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hezion.
4. Tabremmon.
5. Benhadad, who invaded Baaſha.
6. Benhadad the ſecond, taken priſoner by Achab.
7. Hazael, whom Eliſha foretold with tears, of his advancement; the ſame who overthrew Joram, king of Iſrael, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a ſecond Hazael, which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, becauſe that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the war with Joas, made the expedition thirty years, and perhaps more, after the firſt Hazael, which ſtifled his maſter Benhadad, and had ſlain Joram the ſon of Achab, king of Iſrael. For Joas began to reign in the ſeventh year of Jehu, king of Iſrael; and after he had reigned twenty three years, the temple was not yet repaired; after which (and how long we know not) it is ſaid, that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Jeruſalem. It is alſo ſome proof, that Hazael which took Geth, was not the ſame with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, becauſe he could not at that time but be of good years, being, as it ſeemeth, the ſecond perſon in the kingdom, and commander of Benhadad's men of war. To this Hazael, be he the firſt or ſecond, ſucceeded,

8. Benhadad the 3d, whom Joaſh, king of Iſrael, thrice overthrew.

9. Reſin, or Rezin the laſt, who joined with Pekah, king of Iſrael, againſt Juda, at which time Achaz, king of Juda, waged for his defence Teglatphalaſſar.

Now between Benhadad the 3d, and Rezin the laſt, Nicholaus Damaſcenus finds 3 other kings of the Adads, which make 12 in all.

For the reſt of the princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as thoſe of [i]Emath, and Geſſur, we find that Tohu was king of Emath, or Chamath in David's time, to whom he ſent his ſon Joram with preſents, after David's victory againſt Adadezer. Alſo [k]Sennacherib ſpeaketh of a king of Emath, but nameth him not.

SECT. IV.

Of other leſſer kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Aſſyrians, never recovered themſelves again.

OF Geſſur we find two kings named, to wit, Talmai, and his father Ammihur. To Talmai, whoſe daughter David married, it was that Abſalom fled, who was his maternal grandfather. Of the kings of Sophena, or Syria, Soba, or Cœleſyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rechob, the father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himſelf; and it is plain, that after his death, the ſeat of the kings of Soba, was transferred to Damaſcus, a city better fitting their greatneſs. After, Rezin became lord of both principalities. And the race of theſe kings of Syria (which became ſo potent, and joined Soba, Damaſcus, Emath, and the deſart of Arabia, with other provinces, into one, under Rezin the ſecond of the Adads) as it began with David, ſo it ended at once with the kingdom of Iſrael. For Ahaz king of Juda, waged the Aſſyrian Teglatphalaſſar againſt Pekah, king of Iſrael, and againſt Rezin, the laſt king of Damaſcus; which Teglath firſt invaded Damaſcena, and the region of Soba, and took Damaſcus it ſelf; and did put to death Rezin the laſt, carrying the inhabitants captive. This was the ſecond time that the Aſſyrians attempted Iſrael: for firſt, Phul Belochus entered the borders thereof (Menahem governing Iſrael) who ſtop'd the enterprize of Phul, with a thouſand talents of ſilver: for this Phul Belochus, whoſe pedigree we will examine hereafter, being ſcarce warm as yet in his ſeat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had wreſted from Sardanapalus; having beſides this king of Syria in his way, who ſeemed to be a great and ſtrong prince, was content to take the compoſition of a thouſand talents of the king of Iſrael, for that preſent time. But his ſon Teglath, following the purpoſe of his father Belochus, and finding ſo excellent an occaſion, as the war begun between Iſrael and Juda, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being alſo wrapt in that war, and waſted in ſtrength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz king of Judah, his impreſt and entertainment. So, firſt attempting Damaſcus, which lay in his path towards Iſrael, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great eaſe poſſeſs'd himſelf of the cities of Nephthalim, leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his ſon Salmanaſſar, whom Ptolemy calleth Nabonaſſar, after the revolt of Hoſea, forced Samaria, and rent that kingdom aſunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus ſupplanted; the race and monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglath ſlaughtered, the kingdom of Iſrael in Hoſea, whom Salmanaſſar overturned, happened near about a time; that of Ninus, in the days of Belochus, and the other two in the days of Teglatphalaſſar, and Salmanaſſar his ſon. For Sardanapalus periſhed, Oſia ruling Judah; and the other two kingdoms were diſſolved, Achaz yet living.

Laſtly, The kingdom of Judah itſelf being attempted by Sennacherib, the ſon of Salmanaſſar, in vain, and preſerved for the time by God, miraculouſly, was at length utterly overturned. Jeruſalem and the temple burnt, an hundred thirty-two years after the captivity of Iſrael and Samaria; the deſtruction of Iſrael being in the ninth year of Hoſea; that of Judah in the 11th of Zedekiah. Now the emperors of Aſſyria and Babylon, held alſo the kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanaſſar, to the laſt of Baltaſſar, whom Herodotus calleth Labynitus; in all about two hundred years. After theſe, the Perſians, from Cyrus to Darius their laſt king, held Syria about two hundred years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other provinces of the Perſian empire; and his ſucceſſors the Seleucidæ reigned therein, till it became ſubject to the power of the Romans, from whom it was wreſted long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in poſſeſſion of the Turk, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering upon the Iſraelites, with whom they had moſt to do, both in war and peace, being the only people, whoſe hiſtory in thoſe antient times carried an aſſured face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the tribe of Benjamin, and of Jeruſalem.

SECT. I.

Of divers memorable places in the tribe of Benjamin, whereof Jericho, Gilgal, Mitſpah, Bethel, Rama, Gobah, and Gibha.

OF the tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngeſt ſon of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were muſtered at mount Sinai, 35000 able bodies; all which periſhing in the deſarts, there entered the Holy Land of their iſſues, 45600 fit to bear arms: and theſe had their territory on this ſide Jordan, between Judah and Ephraim. The cities within this tribe, neareſt Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono; of which Lod and Ono were built by Shemed, a Benjamite, 1 Chron. viii. 12. they were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the return out of captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. xi. 35. and Eſdras ii. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes beſides Hadid in Nehemiah, a city called Lodhadid. This Hadid, or Chadid, was rebuilt by Simon Maccabeus, 1 Mac. xii. 38.

Samarim, or Tſemaraim, named of Tſemary, one of the ſons of Canaan, was another of their cities; and further into the land ſtandeth Jericho, one of the toparchies, and the laſt of Judah; ſeated in a moſt fruitful valley, adorned with many palm-trees, and therefore elſewhere called the city of Palms, 1 Kings xvii. 36. From the time of [a] Joſhua, who utterly deſtroyed it, it lay waſte until the time of Achab; in whoſe days Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it in the loſs of Abiram his eldeſt ſon, and built the gates of it in the loſs of his youngeſt ſon Segub, according to the curſe of Joſhua; in which, and other reſpects, Hoſea xii. 14. calleth Joſhua a prophet. In after-times it was deſtroyed by Veſpaſian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the ſouth-eaſt of Jericho, ſtood [b] Halmon of the Levites, of which Joſh. xxi. 18. to the ſouth, Bethabara, of which Joſh. xv. and xviii. then that Gilgal, of which there is ſo much mention in the ſcripture, where Joſhua firſt eat of the fruits of the land; circumciſed all thoſe born in the deſarts, and celebrated the paſſover.

The reaſon of the name, or rather a memorable application of the etymology of this name (for it ſeems by the place, Deut. xi. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Iſraelites into Canaan) is noted Joſh. v. 9. Ob devolutionem probri Ægyptiaci, becauſe their foreskins (the people being there circumciſed) were tumbled down the hill; which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was alſo called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Joſh. xv. 7. and xviii. 17. For it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Joſh. xxii. 13. and Geliloth ſignifieth borders. It ſtood (tho' in ſome diſtance) directly eaſtward, over-againſt the two hills Garzim and Hebal, Deut. xi. 29. upon the one of which, the bleſſings, and on the other the curſings were to be read to the people, both being the mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the ſituation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it and Mitſpah of Benjamin (of which alſo we read oft in the ſcripture) were ſeated about the midſt of the length of the land of Canaan; for which reaſon [c] Samuel choſe theſe two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgment to the Iſraelites; of which two Gilgal (as is ſaid) was near Jordan on the eaſt-ſide of this tribe, and Mitſpa near the weſt ſea, towards the land of the Philiſtines.

The third place which is named with theſe two, whither alſo Samuel uſed yearly to come, is [d] Bethel; which alſo was ſeated in this tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal which was the firſt place, where the ark reſided, after they paſs'd over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kirjath-jeharim, and at length to Jeruſalem) here in Gilgal it was that Joſhua pitched up the twelve ſtones which were taken out of the channel of Jordan when it was dry, that the Iſraelites might paſs over it; by which ſtory, as it is ſet down Joſh. iv. it appears, that the ſame day that they paſſed over Jordan they lodged at Gilgal. At the ſame Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the king of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitſpah, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgment, there alſo were often the greateſt meetings held, as that for the revenge of the Levite's wife againſt Gibha, and the Benjamites, Judg. xxi. 1. and another againſt the Philiſtines, 1 Sam. vii. 12. Thither alſo Judas Maccabeus gathered the Jews (when Jeruſalem was poſſeſs'd by the heathen) as it is 1 Mac. iii. 47. in which place this reaſon of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationi fuerat Mitſpæ antea Iſraeli. Touching this Mitſpa, to avoid confuſion, it is to be remembred, that the ſcriptures mention four places of this name: Mitſpa of Judah, of which Joſh. xv. 38. [a] Mitſpa of Gilead, of which we have ſpoken already in the tribe of Gad: Mitſpa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himſelf, commending his parents to the king of Moab, 1 Sam. xxii. 3. and laſtly, this chief Mitſpa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held, both before Jeruſalem was recovered from the Jebuſites, and alſo in the time of the Maccabees, as we have ſaid, when Jeruſalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, ſo alſo in the time of Jeremy, after the deſtruction of the temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah, whom Nabuchodonoſor left in Jewry, as governour over thoſe that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place; until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was ſlain by the treaſon of Iſhmael, one of the royal blood of Judah, as it is Jeremiah xli.

Near unto this Mitſpa, the ſcripture mentioneth Beth-car, 1 Sam. vii. 11. after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the ſtone of help: where Samuel pitched up the pillar or ſtone, for a trophy againſt the Philiſtines.

Touching Bethel, which, as it ſeems, was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the miniſtring of juſtice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the iſſue of Joſeph (tho' it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehemiah xi. 31. and Joſhua xviii. 22.) and how another city called Luz, Joſh. xvi. 2. near adjoining to it, was built by the man of the city, which ſhewed the entrance to the ſpies, as it is Judges i. and of the occaſion of the name from Jacob's viſion; and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which ſignifieth the houſe of God) made it [b] Beth-aven, that is, the houſe of vanity, Hoſea iv. 15. and x. 5. as alſo other memorable things of this place; they are ſo well known out of the hiſtories of the ſcripture, that we may well paſs them over.

The territory of Bethel, which at the firſt belonged to the kingdom of the ten tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia againſt Jeroboam (of which 2 Chron. xiii.) was taken from them, and adjoined to the kingdom of Judah; and ſo it continued, as appears by the ſtory of Joſiah, which performed the prophecies againſt the altar of Bethel, 2 Kings xxiii. whence thoſe coaſts, 1 Mac. xi. 34. are called Aphærema, which Greek word ſignifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories, or Prefectures which Demetrius, in his epiſtle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. xiii. 19. was Hephravin, which Joſh. xviii. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this tribe, we find three other cities often mentioned in the ſcriptures, Rama, Gibha, and Gebah. Of the name Rama, [c] it is noted already in the deſcription of Ephraim, that there were many towns ſo high called, becauſe of their high ſituation: but whereas they find out Rama in the tribe of Judah (as it ſeems, becauſe Matthew ii. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and alſo out of Brochard and Breidenbach, make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; theſe three have no warrant in the ſcripture. Of Rama, in the tribe of Aſher, as it ſeems, we have teſtimony, Joſh. xix. 29. and of another in Nephthalim, Joſh. xix. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. which more often is called [d] Ramatha, and 1 Sam. i. 1. Ramathaim Tſophim; for which the Septuagint have Aramathaimſophim, taking the article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Joſeph of Arimathea, Matth. xxvii. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama, we read 2 Kings viii. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The firſt, which is moſt often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, ſeated, as we ſaid, near Bethel, the uttermoſt ſouth border of the kingdom of the ten tribes; for which cauſe Baaſha, in the time of Aſa, king of Judah fortified it, to hinder thoſe that did fly from him to Aſa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I ſhould rather think Joſeph was, that buried Chriſt, becauſe it was nearer to Jeruſalem, and after the captivity belonged to Judah, as it appears, Eſd. ii. 26. wherein that it is joined with Gebah, it is plain, that he ſpeaketh of that Rama, with whoſe ſtones (after Baaſha had ceaſed to build it) Aſa (as it is 1 Kings xxv. 22.) built Gebah adjoining to it, both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the ſouth border of the ten tribes, ſo was Gebah the north border of the kingdom of Judah; whence 2 Kings xxiii. 8. we read, that Joſiah, thro' all his kingdom, even from Gebah, which was the north border to Beerſheba, which was the ſouth border, deſtroyed the places of idolatry.

The third city Gibha, which was the city of Saul (the wickedneſs of which city, in the time of the judges, had almoſt utterly rooted out this tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently diſtinguiſhed, Iſaiah x. 27.) of which word [e] Gibha, in another form Gibbath, he imagineth Gibaath, another city in this tribe, making two of one. The vicinity of this city alſo to Rama of Benjamin, appears, Judg. xix. 13. where the Levite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibha. By that place of 1 Sam. xxii. 6. it ſeems, that there was in this Gibha ſome tower or citadel, called Rama, where Junius reads, in excelſo, for in Rama:

[a] It was no other than this Mitſpa of Gilead, of which Joſh. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, verſus orientem: for Joſhua notes the three quarters, north, weſt, and eaſt, to which he followed the Canaanites; tho' Adrichomius, and others, out of this place, imagine a Mitipa, or Miſpha (as they write it) in the tribe of Aſher. [b] Borrowing the name of a neighbour town in the confines of the kingdoms of Judah and Iſrael, between Hai and Bethel, Joſh. 7. 2. and 18. 12. [c] See c. 9. ſect. 1. [d] Of this Ramatha, I underſtand the place 1 Mac. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the three prefectures, which Demetrius yields to the Jews out of the country of Samaria; this lying toward the eaſt to Jericho, and Lydda toward the weſt; and Aphærema (of which even now we ſpake) lying in the midſt, between the two other. A ſixth Rama it ſeems there was in the tribe of Simeon, toward the ſouth, and which Joſh. 19. 7, 8. called Ramah of the ſouth, and otherwiſe Bahalath-beer. [e] Gibha in conſtruction, that is, governing a genitive caſe, is Gibhath, whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint read Joſh. 24. 33. Gabaath Phinees; for which Junius hath Collis Phineaſi (for this word is oft-times an appellative, ſignifying a hill) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, builds his city Gabaath upon this text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoined note that this hill was in the mountains of Ephraim.

but it may be, that the name of the king's palace in this city was Rama, as it ſeems, that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the college of prophets abode, was Naioth. The great city of Hai, overthrown by Joſhua, which Joſh. vii. 2. is placed near Beth-aven, upon the eaſt of Bethel, was in this tribe, as is proved, Nehemiah vii. x. xxx. tho' it be not named by Joſhua xviii. for it was burned by him, and laid deſolate, as it is, Joſh. viii. 28. In ſolitudinem in tumulum perpetuum. Another city of chief note, reckoned Joſh. xviii. 25. in this tribe, was Gibbon, the chief city of the Hivites, whoſe cunning, to bind the Iſraelites by oath to ſave their lives, is ſet down, Joſh. ix. whence they were reckoned among the [a]Nethinæi, or proſelytes, and were bound to certain publick ſervices in the houſe of God; which oath of ſaving theſe Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God puniſhed by a famine, 2 Sam. xxi. 1. This Gibeon, or Gibbon, which Almon and Jebah (of both which we have ſpoken) and with Hanothoth, the native place of Jeremiah the prophet, were ſaid, Joſh. xxi. 28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjamites. Near to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1 Kings ii. 26. where Abiathar the prieſt, which was of Nob, before it was deſtroyed by Saul, is ſent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned in the tribe of Benjamin, Nehemiah ix. 31. and tho' in the time of Saul, the reſiding place of the ark was in Kirjath-jearim, yet by the the lamentable tragedy of bloodſhed, which Saul raiſed in this place (as it is ſet down, 1 Sam. xxi. and xxii.) in the judgment of Junius, it is proved, that the tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas alſo in this tribe, Nehemiah ix. 31. was a place of fame, of which Iſaiah x. 28. where alſo he nameth Gallim and Migrom in this tribe. In Micmas, Saul had his camp, 1 Sam. xiii. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there alſo was Jonathan Maccabeus's abode, 1 Mac. ix. 73. Of Giſcala in Galilee, Joſephus often maketh mention; but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the native place of St. Paul, whence, they ſay, when it was taken by the Romans, he ſailed with his parents to Tharſis: Of this I find no good warrant. Other places of leſs importance I omit, and come to the city of Jeruſalem, and the princes and governours of this city; a great part whereof was in the tribe of Benjamin, whence Joſh. xviii. 28. it is named among the cities of Benjamin.

SECT. II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Jeruſalem.

AT what time Jeruſalem was built (which afterwards became the princeſs of all cities) it doth not appear. Some there are, who imagine, that Melchiſedec was the founder thereof in Abraham's time. But [b] according to others, that city out of which Melchiſedec encountred Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Aſſyrian and Perſian kings or captains, when Lot was made priſoner) ſtandeth by the river of Jordan, in the half tribe of Manaſſeh, bordering Zabulon, which was alſo called Salem, and by the Greeks, Solima.

Jeruſalem (whenſoever, or by whom built) was a principal city in Joſhua's time; yet not ſo renowned as Hazor the metropolis (in thoſe days and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek, whom Joſhua ſlew, was then king of Jeruſalem. That it was belonging to the Jebuſites it is manifeſt: for how long ſoever they held it before Moſes's time, they were maſters and lords thereof almoſt four hundred years after him, even till David won it; and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebuſæi (the children of Jebuſæus, the ſon of Canaan) built; after whom it was called [c] Jebus. And ſo much did that nation rely on the ſtrength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragg'd, that their lame, and blind, and impotent people ſhould defend it.

David, after he had, by God's aſſiſtance, poſſeſs'd it, and turned out the Jebuſites, gave it an exceeding great increaſe of circuit; ſtrengthned it with a citadel or caſtle, and beautified it with many palaces, and other buildings; changing the name from Jebuſſalem, the city of the Jebuſites, to Jeruſalem, which the Greeks call Hieroſolyma. After David's time, [d] Solomon amplified, beautified, and ſtrengthened it exeeedingly: for, beſides the work of the temple, which was no leſs admirable than renowned among all nations; the palaces, gates and walls, could not any where in the world be exampled: and beſides that, it had an hundred and fifty thouſand inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had ſixty foot of depth, cut out of the very rock, and two hundred fifty foot of breadth, whereof the like hath ſeldom been heard of either ſince or before.

After the death of Solomon, and that the kingdom of the Jews was cut aſunder, [e] Shiſhac king of Egypt, and his predeceſſor, having bred up for that purpoſe Adad the Idumean, and Jeroboam, Solomon's ſervant; and both married to Egyptians; the ſtate by the one diſturbed, by the other broken, [f] Shiſhac firſt invaded the territory of Judah, entred Jeruſalem and ſack'd it; and became maſter, not only of the riches of Solomon, but of all thoſe ſpoils which David had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites and other nations. It was again ſack'd, and a part of the wall thrown down by Joas king of Iſrael, while [g] Amaziah the twelfth king thereof governed Judah.

Not long after, Achaz, the 15th king of Juda, impoveriſhed the temple, and preſented Teglatphalaſſar with the treaſures thereof. And [h] Manaſſeh the ſon of Ezekiah, the ſon of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah to the ambaſſadors of Merodach, loſt the remain, and the very bottom of their treaſures. It was again ſpoiled by the Babylonians, Joakim then reigning. But this ungrateful, idolatrous, and rebellious nation, taking no warning by theſe God's gentle corrections and afflictions, but perſiſting in all kind of impiety, filling the city even to the mouth with innocent blood, God raiſed up that great [i] Babylonian king, Nabuchodonoſor, as his ſcourge and revenger, who making this glorious city and temple, with all the palaces therein, and the walls and towers which embraced them, even and level with the duſt, carried away the ſpoils with the princes and people, and cruſh'd them with the heavy yoke of bondage and ſervitude full ſeventy years; inſomuch, as Zion was not only become as a torn and plowed up field, Jeruſalem a heap of ſtone and rubble, the mountain of the temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars; but (as [k] Jerome ſpeaketh) even the birds of the air ſcorned to fly over it, or the beaſts to tread on that defiled ſoil.

[a] The word Nethinim or Nethinæi, is as much as dati (as it were à Deo dati) or as Junius expounds it, deditii, is uſed, 1 Chron. 9. 2. and in Eſdras and Nehemiah often. [b] See in the hither half of Manaſſeh. [c] 2 Sam. 5. 6. [d] Joſ. cont. App. l. 1, Strabo, Geog. l. 16. [e] 2 Chron. 12. [f] 2 Kings 14. [g] 2 Kings 16. [h] 1 Chron. 5. 16. 2 Kings 25. [i] 2 Kings 19. 2 Par. 18. [k] Mich. 3. Hier. 25. 26. 29.

Then ſeventy years being expired, according to the prophecy of [a] Daniel, and the Jews, by the grace of Cyrus, returned, the temple was again built, tho' with interruption and difficulty enough, and the city meanly inhabited, and without walls, or other defences, for ſome ſixty and odd years, till [b] Nehemiah, by the favour of Artaxerxes, rebuilt them. Then again was the temple and city ſpoiled by Bagoſes, or Vagoſes, lieutenant of Artaxerxes; after, by [c] Ptolomeus I; then by Antiochus Epiphanes; and again by Apollonius his lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not deſtroyed, nor robbed; tho' Craſſus, in his Parthian expedition, took as much as he could of that which Pompey ſpared.

But the damages which it ſuſtained by the violence of ſacrilegious tyrants, were commonly recompenſed by the induſtry or bounty of good princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of ſtrangers. Before the captivity, the people of the land, thro' the exhortation of godly kings, made many and large offerings to repair the temple of Solomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the ſecond temple, was requited by the bounty of his ſon Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The miſchief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes, and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were ſent to Jeruſalem out of other nations. Finally, all the loſſes, which either the city or temple had endured, might well ſeem forgotten in the reign of [d] Herod, that uſurping and wicked, but magnificent king, who amplified the city, new built the temple, and with many ſumptuous works, did ſo adorn them, that he left them far more ſtately and glorious, than they had been in the days of Solomon.

SECT. III.

Of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, by the Romans.

IN this flouriſhing eſtate, it was, at the coming of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus; and after his death and aſcenſion it ſo continued about forty years: but then did Titus the Roman, being ſtirred up by God to be the revenger of Chriſt's death, and to puniſh the Jews ſinful ingratitude, encompaſs it with the Roman army, and became lord thereof. He began the ſiege at ſuch time as the Jews, from all parts, were come up to the celebration of the paſſover; ſo as the city was then filled with many hundred thouſands of all ſorts, and no manner of proviſion or ſtore for any ſuch multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civil diſſenſion, oppreſs'd them within the walls; a forcible enemy aſſailed them without. The Idumeans alſo, who lay in wait for the deſtruction of the Jews kingdom, thruſt themſelves into the city, on purpoſe to betray it, who alſo burnt the temple, when Nabuchodonoſor took it. And to be ſhort, there periſhed of all ſorts, from the firſt beſieging, to the conſummation of the victory, [e] eleven hundred thouſand ſouls; and the city was ſo beaten down, and demoliſhed, as thoſe which came afterwards to ſee the deſolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any ſuch place or habitation: only the three Herodian towers (works moſt magnificent, and overtopping the reſt) were ſpared, as well for lodgings for the Roman gariſons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by thoſe buildings of ſtrength and ſtate remaining, after-ages might judge what the reſt were; and their honour be the greater and more ſhining that there-over became victorious.

After this, ſuch Jews as were ſcattered here and there in Judæa, and other provinces, began again to inhabit ſome part of the city; and by degrees to rebuild it, and to ſtrengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman ſtate; but after ſixty-five years, when they again offered to revolt, and rebel, Ælius Adrianus the emperor, ſlaughtered many thouſands of them, and overturned thoſe three Herodian towers, with all the reſt, making it good which Chriſt himſelf had foretold; That there ſhould not ſtand one ſtone upon another, of that ungrateful city. Afterwards, when his fury was appeaſed, and the prophecy accompliſhed, he took one part without the wall, wherein ſtood Mount Calvary, and the ſepulchre of Chriſt, and excluding of the reſt the greateſt portion, he again made it a city of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he cauſed a ſow to be cut in marble, and ſet in the front thereof, which he did in deſpight of the Jews nation; making an edict, that they ſhould not from thenceforth ever enter into the city, neither ſhould they dare ſo much as to behold it from any other high place overtopping it.

But the Chriſtian religion flouriſhing in [f] Paleſtina, it was inhabited at length by all nations, and eſpecially by Chriſtians; and ſo it continued five hundred years.

It was afterwards in the 636th year after Chriſt, taken by the [g] Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400 and odd years.

In the year 1099, it was regained by Godfrey of Bouillon, by aſſault, with an exceeding ſlaughter of the Saracens, which [h] Godfrey, when he was elected king thereof, refuſed to be crowned with a crown of gold, becauſe Chriſt, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the ſucceſſors of Godfrey eighty eight years: till in the year 1197, it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and laſtly, in the year 1517, in the time of Selim, the Turks caſt out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarec, or the Holy city. Neither was it Jeruſalem alone, that hath ſo oftentimes been beaten down and made deſolate, but all the great ages of the world have with their inhabitants, in ſeveral times and ages, ſuffered the ſame ſhipwreck. And it hath been God's juſt will, to the end others might take warning, if they would; not only to puniſh the impiety of men, by famine, by the ſword, by fire, and by ſlavery; but he hath revenged himſelf of the very places they poſſeſs'd; of the walls and building; yea, of the ſoil, and the beaſts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, ſometime called holy, hath in effect loſt all her fertility, and fruitfulneſs; witneſs the many hundreds of thouſands, which it fed in the days of the kings of Judah and Iſrael; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding ſtony and barren. It alſo pleaſed God, not only to conſume with fire from heaven, the cities of the Sodomites; but the very ſoil itſelf hath felt, and doth feel, the hand of God to this day. God would not ſpare the beaſts that belonged to Amalek, no not any ſmall number of them, to be ſacrificed to himſelf; neither was it enough that Achan himſelf was ſtoned, but that his moveables were alſo conſumed and brought to aſhes.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of heathen writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, prophane writers have conceived diverſly and injuriouſly. Quintilian ſpeaks infamouſly of them, and of their leader; who (ſaith he) gathered together a pernicious nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Iſis governed Egypt, the people were ſo increaſed, as Jeroſolymus and Judas led thence a great multitude of that nation, with whom they planted the neighbour regions; which might be meant by Moſes and Aaron: for the name of Moſes was accidental, becauſe he was taken up and ſaved out of the waters. But [a] Juſtin, of all others moſt malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian kings; of whom Damaſcus, ſaith he, was the firſt; and to him ſucceeded Abraham, Moſes, and Iſrael. He again ſuppoſeth (ſomewhat contrary to himſelf) that Iſrael had 10 ſons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; ſo called of Judas his eldeſt, who had the greateſt portion. The youngeſt of the ſons of Iſrael he calleth Joſeph; who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in magical arts, and in the interpretations of dreams, and ſigns prodigious, and this Joſeph, ſaith he, was father to Moſes: who with the reſt, by reaſon of their foul diſeaſes, and leſt they ſhould infect others, were baniſhed Egypt. Further, he telleth how theſe men thus baniſhed, when in the deſarts they ſuffered extream thirſt and famine, and therein found relief the 7th day, for this cauſe ever after obſerved the 7th day, and kept it holy; making it a law among themſelves, which afterwards became a branch of their religion. He addeth alſo, that they might not marry out of their own tribes, leſt diſcovering their uncleanneſs, they might alſo be expelled by other nations, as they were by the Egyptians. Theſe and ſuch like fables hath Juſtin.

Cornelius Tacitus, doth as groſsly belie them in affirming, that in the inmoſt oratory of their temple, they had the golden head of an aſs, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himſelf, having in the 5th book of his own hiſtory truly confeſſed of the Jews, that they worſhipped one only God: and thought it moſt prophane to repreſent the Deity by any material figure, by the ſhape of a man, or any other creature; and they had therefore in their temples, no image or repreſentation, no not ſo much as in any city by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhiſtor, in Stephanus; who alſo makes Judas with Idumea, the firſt parents of the Jews.

[b] Claudius Iolaus draws them from Judeus, whoſe parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedemonians, challenged kindred of the Hebrews: but they did it as deſcended of Abraham, ſaith Joſephus. Some of theſe reports ſeem to have been gathered out of divine letters; tho' wreſted and perverted according to the cuſtom of the heathen. For ſo they obſcured and altered the ſtory of the creation, of paradiſe, of the flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the firſt age; to Noah and his ſons, in the ſecond; and ſo to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, Moſes, and the reſt of the fathers, and leaders of the Hebrews; all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originals, Joſephus againſt Appion, and [c] Tertullian have ſufficiently anſwered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and ſo Chaldeans originally taking name either of Heber, the ſon of Sale, or elſe, ſaith Montanus, of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek grammarian, derive the Hebrews or Jews, from [d] Arabon; having miſtaken the name of Abraham, who was the ſon of Heber, in the 6th deſcent. Their ancient names were firſt changed by the two grand-children of Abram; for after Jacob, otherwiſe Iſrael, the chief part were called Iſrael, another part after Eſau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being moſt of the tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the ſon of Jacob, and became Judeans or Jews; as alſo for a time in the name of Ephraim the ſon of Joſeph, the chief of the patriarchs of the ten tribes; the reſt of the ten tribes were comprehended, but were firſt rooted out when the kingdom of Iſrael fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they ſuffered the ſame ſervitude not long after, under Nabuchodonoſor.

The government which this nation underwent, was firſt paternal: which continued till they ſerved the Egyptians. They were ſecondly ruled by their captains and leaders, Moſes and Joſhua, by a policy divine. Thirdly, they ſubjected themſelves to judges. Fourthly, they deſired a king, and had Saul for the firſt: of whom and his ſucceſſors, before we intreat, we are firſt to ſpeak of their government under judges, after the death of Joſhua; with ſomewhat of the things of fame in other nations about theſe times.

SECT. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Joſhua's death: and of Othoniel.

WHEN Joſhua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70 elders, and the high prieſt, held authority over the people, and ordered that common-wealth: it pleaſed God to direct the tribe of Juda (in whom the kingdom was afterwards eſtabliſhed) to undertake the war againſt the Canaanites, over whom (with God's favour, and the aſſiſtance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the firſt attempt which they made, they not only ſlew 10000, but made Adonibezek priſoner; the greateſt and cruelleſt commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizzites. This tyrant's cruelty, as elſewhere hath been ſignified, they returned in the ſame kind upon his own head: and ſo by the torments which he now felt in his own perſon (before no otherwiſe known unto him, but by his malicious imagination) made him confeſs and acknowledge God's juſt judgment againſt himſelf.

The tribes of Juda and Simeon did alſo maſter and poſſeſs, during this Inter-regnum (or, as ſome think, before the death of Joſhua) the cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron, and Jeruſalem, which they burnt, and the Jebuſites afterwards re-edified. They took alſo the cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriath-ſepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And altho' it be not ſet down in expreſs words, that any one perſon commanded in chief over the people, as Moſes and Joſhua did; yet it ſeemeth that Caleb was of greateſt authority amongſt them, and that he with the advice of Phinees directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a chief, the good ſucceſs which followed their undertakings witneſſeth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Joſhua governed, as appears Joſh. x. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the reſt of the captains; for the performance of which enterprize, he promiſed his daughter Achaſah: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conqueſt: whoſe behaviour in that ſervice was ſuch, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greateſt reputation among them, and it may be eſteemed the ſecond cauſe of his preferment and election for their firſt Judge ſoon after. But while thoſe of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they only recovered the mountainous countries (for they could not drive out the inhabitants of the vallies, [a] becauſe they had chariots of iron.) The reſt of the tribes ſought alſo to enlarge and eſtabliſh their own territories; in which war they laboured with variable ſucceſs; for as the houſe of Joſeph recovered [b] Bethel or Luz, from the Hittites, ſo did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain countries; and forc'd them to ſave themſelves in the mountains. And now the Iſraelites unmindful of God's benefits, and how often he had miraculouſly afore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the elders being alſo conſumed, who better adviſed them in the Inter-regnum) did not only join themſelves in marriage with the heathen nations; but (that which was more deteſtable) they ſerved the idols of Baal, and Aſteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had provoked with their idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Meſopotamia; whom Chuſhan Riſhathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the ſmart of God's diſpleaſure againſt them 8 years, it pleaſed him to have compaſſion on his people, and to raiſe up [c] Othoniel to be their judge and leader; who by God aſſiſted, delivered his brethren from oppreſſion, and inforc'd the Aramites to return into their own deſarts, and into Meſopotamia adjoining; after which the Iſraelites had peace 40 years, during all the time of Othoniel's government. This Othoniel is thought by Toſtatus to have been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges he is twice called Othoniel the ſon of Cenaz, Caleb's younger brother. Others do rather interpret thoſe words (Caleb's younger brother) as if they ſignified the meaneſt of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely, that Caleb's daughter ſhould marry with her own uncle; yet it follows not therefore, that Othoniel ſhould have been the meaneſt of the kindred. Wherefore we may better think, that he was the nephew of Caleb (as ſome learned men expound it) and as the very words of ſcripture ſeem to inforce. For Caleb was the ſon of Jephunneth, and Othoniel the ſon of Cenaz, Caleb's younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brother's ſon; to whom it was not only lawful, but commendable, to marry with his couſin german Caleb's daughter.

How long it was from the death of Joſhua, to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found; but it ſeems to have been no ſhort time: for many wars were made in that ſpace againſt the people of the land. Laiſh was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the beſt writers are of opinion, that between the times of Joſhua and Othoniel, that civil war broke out between the Benjamites and the reſt of Iſrael, for the forcing to death of the Levite's wife. For it is written, that in thoſe days there was no king in Iſrael, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as [d] Juda led the people againſt the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, ſo was he commanded to do againſt Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whoſe direction they craved, as wanting a judge to appoint what ſhould be done, which ſheweth it to have been when Joſhua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel; eſpecially, conſidering, that all other times wherein they wanted governours, were ſpent under ſuch oppreſſion of ſtrangers, as would have given them no leave to have attended ſuch a civil war; if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they ſo weakned the body of their eſtate, by effuſion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field ſuch numbers, as formerly they had muſtered againſt their bordering enemies.

SECT. II.

Of the memorable things of this age, of other nations; and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

THere lived in this age of Othoniel, Pandion, or Pandareus, according to Homer, the 5th king of Athens; who began to rule in the 20th year of Othoniel, and governed 40 years. He was father to Erictheus: his daughters were Progne and Philomela, ſo greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus alſo about this time obtained Thebes; of whoſe daughter Semele was born, Dionyſius or Liber Pater; under whom Linus the muſician lived. In his time alſo the cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharſus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flouriſhed in this age, who are ſaid to have found out the uſe of iron: but Geneſis hath taught us the contrary, and that [e] Tubal-Cain wrought cunningly both in iron and braſs. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes; whom divers chronologers find in Ehud's time. But St. Auguſtine making a repetition of theſe fables, which were deviſed among the Grecians, and other nations, during the government of the judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whoſe parentage there is as little agreement. Vives, upon the 13th chapter of St. Auguſtine de Civitate Dei, and the 18th book, hath gathered all the opinions of this man's progeny, where he that deſires his pedigree may find it. Lactantius and Euſebius make him native of Attica, and the ſon of Eleuſius king of Eleuſina: which Eleuſius, by careful induſtry, had fed the people of that territory, in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occaſion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by ſea in a kind of galley or long boat, which carried in her prow an engraven or carved ſerpent; who becauſe he made exceeding great ſpeed to return, and to relieve his people with corn, from ſome neighbour nation; it was feigned by the poets, that his coach was carried by ſerpents through the air.

Whether the times of theſe kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him with the reſt of the judges, and kings of Iſrael and Juda, be preciſely ſet down, I cannot avow; for the chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which, would require the whole time of a long life; and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I err with others of better judgment. For whether Eusebius, and all that follow him, or his opposites (who made themselves so conversant with these ancient kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off, and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the authors themselves, from whom the ancientest chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture: secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder days, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any man's understanding, save his own, but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reigns of heathen kings and princes; but even in the computation of those times, which the indisputable authority of holy scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abraham's birth; and after in the times of the judges, and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression, to the building of Solomon's temple, in the Persian empire, the 70 weeks; and in what not? Whereseever the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have sought by so many ways to uncover the sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condens'd than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in these computations; and therefore that such and such kings and kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwise, than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least a private opinion; which I submit to better judgments. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad unguem quærenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, says Diodore.

SECT. III.

Of Ehud's time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that lived about these times.

AFter the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell back to their former idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and suppress them; to perform which, he joined the forces of Ammon, and Amalek unto his own, and so (as all kind of misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time withdrawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his displeasure) these heathen neighbouring nations, had an easy conquest over Israel; whom God himself exposed to those perils; within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen years, under Eglon king of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance; but raised up Ehud the son of Gera to deliver them; by which weak man, tho' maimed in his right-hand, yet confident in the justness of his quarrel, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers, to contend with the head of those valiant nations; he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following victory; especially giving his nation no time to re-establish their government, or to choose a king to command, and direct them in the wars. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an ambassador to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed; he pierced his body with a poniard, made on purpose, with a double edge; and shutting the doors of his closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did repass Jordan, and invading the territory of Moab, overthrew their army consisting of 10000 able and strong men; whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his successor had miraculously slain 600 Philistines with an ox goad; the land and people of Israel lived in peace, unto the end of 80 years, from the death of Othoniel; which term expired in the world's year 2691.

In the days of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sons, travelled into Moab; and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the 80 years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus king of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia; or (according to Pausanias in Att.) by the river Cephisus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two distinct rivers. This stealth being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus joined themselves, they agreed together to recover her; but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had, as they say, a very huge dog, which fastned on Pyrithous, and tore him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him; and by strength took and mastered the dog Cerberus; whereof grew the fable of Hercules's delivering of Theseus out of hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this story, somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith he, attempted to steal Proserpina daughter to Aidonius, king of the Molossians, who had Ceres to wife, the mother of Proserpina. Proserpina being a general name also for all fair women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principal in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of affection or inforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius's great dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner; till Hercules by the instigation of Eurisheus delivered him by a strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting near the mountains of Pindus; of which mountains, Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The river of Acheron (which the poets describe to be in hell) riseth out of the same hills. There is another nation of the Molossi in Thessaly; but these are neighbours to the Cassiopæi, saith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya the daughter of Erictheus, king of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The poets ascribe this rape to the north-wind, because Thrace is situate north from Athens. In his time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forc'd her in the passage, and withal cut out her tongue that she might not complain; persuading Progne's wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way; all which her brother-in-law's mercileſs behaviour towards her, Philomela express'd by her needle upon on cloth, and ſent it to Progne. In revenge whereof Progne cauſed her only ſon Itys to be cut in pieces, and ſet before Tereus her husband, ſo dreſs'd as it appear'd to be ſome other ordinary food; of which when he had eaten his fill, ſhe cauſed his head, hands, and feet, to be preſented unto him; and then fled away with ſuch ſpeed towards Athens, where her father Pandion yet lived, as the poets feigned, that ſhe was turned into a ſwallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis in Phocis; and the tomb of Tereus, [a] Pauſanias hath built near the rocks Mergi, in the territory of Athens. By which, as alſo by the name Daulis, where theſe things are ſuppoſed to have been done (whence alſo Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digreſſion in his [b] Peloponneſian war, that this Tereus was not king in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryſæ (as the poets call him Odryſius) but that Phocis, a country in Greece not far from Attica, a city whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians; of which this Tereus was king: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his ſon-in-law; as it is good to believe, ſaith Thucydides, that Pandion king of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour king from whom he might have ſuccour, rather than with any Tereus, that ſhould have held the kingdom of Odryſæ, which was greatly diſtant from thence. The occaſion that the poets choſe a ſwallow for Progne to be turned into, may ſeem to have been, partly becauſe, as Pauſanias ſays, Daulide nec nidificant, dec habitant in tota circum regione hirundines; As if a ſwallow remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and her ſiſter, did for ever after hate that place.

Near this time Melampus (who is ſaid to have underſtood the voices of birds and beaſts) flouriſhed, being alſo eſteemed for an excellent phyſician. He reſtored to their former health the daughters of [c] Prætus king of the Argives, who (as the poets pleaſe) were made mad by Juno; and thinking themſelves to be kine, fled into the woods, fearing to be conſtrained to the plough; for in thoſe countries, where the ground was light, they did uſe often to plough with kine.

In the 47th year of Ehud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Phemone, the chief prieſt of [d] Apollo in Delphos, deviſed the heroical verſe.

Of the ſame date was Tantalus, king of Lydia; whom Euſebius makes king of Phrygia; and alſo of that part of which the people were anciently Mæones. Of Tantalus was deviſed the fable, that ſome poets have applied to the paſſion of love, and ſome to the covetous that dare not enjoy his riches. [e] Euſebius calls this Tantalus the ſon of Jupiter, by the nymph Pleta; Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, give him another mother. He was ſaid to be the ſon of Jupiter, as ſome will have it; becauſe he had that planet in his aſcendent, betokening wiſdom and riches. It is ſaid that when he made a feaſt to the gods, having nothing more precious, he cauſed his own ſon to be ſlain and dreſs'd for the banquet; of whom Ceres eat part of one of the ſhoulders; whereby was ſignified, that thoſe men which ſeek after divine knowledge, prefer nothing on earth before it; no not the care of their own children, of all elſe the moſt deareſt. And where it was deviſed, that he had always water and fruit offered to his lips, and yet ſuffered the torment of hunger and thirſt, it was meant thereby, that tho' he abounded (by reaſon of his riches) in all delicacy of the world, yet his mind being otherwiſe, and to higher deſires tranſported, he enjoy'd no pleaſure at all by the reſt. Of whom Ovid:

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water ſeeks for water, and doth miſs,
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at, his long tongue brought him this.

This puniſhment, they ſay, was inflicted upon him, for that he diſcovered the ſecrets of the gods: that is, becauſe he taught wiſdom and virtue to mortal men; which ſtory Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expreſs'd in verſe. Others expound this fable otherwiſe, and ſay, that Tantalus, tho' he excelled in riches, yet being thirſty of more abundance, was never ſatisfied. Of whom Horace againſt covetouſneſs:

Tantalus a labiis ſitiens fugientia captat
Flumina. Quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirſting Tantalus doth catch at ſtreams that from him flee.
Why laugheſt thou? the name but chang'd,
the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambroſia of the gods to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that ſort puniſhed. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus.

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Coætaniis convivis
Nectar Ambroſiamque dedit.

Becauſe that ſtealing immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambroſia give
To gueſts of his own age to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the ſecrets of divinity, ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt meats in a foul ſtomach, are therein corrupted; ſo the moſt high and reſerved myſteries are often perverted, by an unclean and defiled mind.

To you it is given (ſaith Chriſt in St. Mark iv. 11.) to know the myſtery of the kingdom of God, but unto them that are without all things be done in parables. So is it ſaid of him in Mark iv. 34. that he expounded all things to his diſciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen infer upon a place of St. Paul; [f] Quod ſi Paulo licuiſſet effari ea, quorum ipſi cognitionem cœlum tertium & uſque ad illud progreſſio ſuppeditavit, fortaſſe de Deo nobis aliquid amplius conſtaret; If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third heavens, and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know ſomewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, ſaith Reuclin, thought it not the part of a wiſe man, Aſino lyram exponere, aut myſteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut ſus tubam, & fidem graculus, & unguenta ſcarabæus; quare ſilentium indixit diſcipulis, ne vulgo divinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius, quam loquendo apprehendantur; To ſet an aſs to a harp, or to learn myſteries, which he would handle as a ſwine doth a trumpet, or a jay a vial, or ſcarabees and unclean flies ſoveraign ointment: wherefore he commanded ſilence to his diſciples, that they ſhould not diſcloſe divine

myſteries to the common ſort, which are eaſier learnt by meditation, than by babling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their myſteries among their prieſts in certain hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their ſecrets might be hidden from the vulgar; and that they might beſtow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the cotemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is alſo ſaid, that Tityus lived whom Apollo ſlew, becauſe he ſought to force his mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the ſon of Elara, the daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where ſhe was delivered of Tityus; whoſe mother dying, and himſelf therein nouriſhed, he was therefore called the ſon of the earth. Pauſanias ſpeaking of the grave of this giant, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his ſtature out of Homer.

[a] Porrectuſque novem Tityus per jugera terræ,
Aſſiduas atro viſcere paſcit aves.

Nine furlongs ſtretch'd lies Tityus, who for his wicked deeds
The hungry birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruel and wicked tyrant of Panopea, a city in Phocis, it was feigned by the poets to the terror of others, that he was ſtill eaten in hell by birds, and yet ſtill lived, and had his fleſh renewed.

Admetus king of Theſſaly lived alſo in this age, whom, it is ſaid, that Apollo firſt ſerved as a herdſman, and afterwards for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but having ſlain Hyacinthus, he croſs'd the Helleſpont, and fled into Phrygia; where, together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in brick, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leap into their places by playing on his harp; according to him in Ovid which ſaith:

Ilion aſpicies, firmataque turribus altis,
Mœnia Apollineæ ſtructa Canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou ſhalt ſee with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wiſe
Apollo's harmony.

Thus the poets; but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work. And that he alſo laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witneſs, ſaith [b] Pauſanias.

In theſe days alſo of Ehud, or (as ſome find it) in the days of Deborah, lived Perſeus the ſon of Jupiter and Danae, by whoſe ſoldiers (as they ſailed out of Peloponneſus to ſeek their adventure on Africa ſide) Meduſa the daughter and ſucceſſor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as ſhe hunted near the lake [c] Triton, was ſurpriz'd and ſlain; whoſe beauty when Perſeus beheld, he cauſed her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was ſuch, and ſo much admired, and the beholders ſo aſtoniſhed which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Meduſa's head, were turned into ſtones.

Cecrops, the ſecond of that name, and 7th king of Athens, and Acriſius the 13th, or after [d] Euſebius the 14th king of the Argives, began alſo their reigns, as it is ſaid, in the time of this judge; of which the firſt ruled 40 years, and the ſecond 31 years. Alſo Bellerophon lived in this age, being the ſon of Glaucus, the ſon of Siſyphus; who inticed by Antea or Sthenobia the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refuſing it, ſhe accuſed him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus ſent Bellerophon into Lycia, about ſome affairs of weight, between him and his ſon-in-law Jobates; giving ſecret order to Jobates to diſpatch him: but Jobates thinking it diſhonourable to lay violent hands on him, employed him againſt Chymæra, a monſter, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, ſent him the wing'd horſe Pegaſus, ſprung up of the blood of Meduſa, formerly ſlain by the ſoldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to tranſport; a horſe that none other could maſter or bridle but Minerva: upon which beaſt Bellerophon overcame Chymæra, and performed the other ſervices given him in charge; which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambuſh to have ſlain him; but being victorious alſo over all thoſe, he arrived to Jobates in ſafety; whom Jobates for his eminent virtues honoured, firſt, with one of his daughters, and afterward with his kingdom: after which he grew ſo inſolent, as he attempted to fly up to heaven upon his Pegaſus; whoſe pride Jupiter diſdaining, cauſed one of his ſtinging flies ſo to vex Pegaſus, as he caſt off Bellerophon from his back, into the valley of Cilicia, where he died blind, of which burthen Pegaſus being diſcharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heaven; and being fed in Jupiter's own ſtable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the ſun. This tale is diverſly expounded, as firſt by ſome, That it pleaſeth God to relieve men in their innocent, and undeſerved adverſity, and to caſt down thoſe which are too high-minded: according to that which is ſaid of Bellerophon; that when he was expoſed to extream hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour; but waxing over-proud and preſumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of ſorrow and ever-during miſery. Secondly, By others, That under the name of [e] Chimæra, was meant a cruel pirate of the Lycians, whoſe ſhip had in her prow a lion, a goat in the mid-ſhip, and a dragon in the ſtern, of which three beaſts this monſter Chymæra was ſaid to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purſued with a kind of galley of ſuch ſwiftneſs, that it was called the flying horſe; to whom the invention of ſails (the wings of a ſhip) are alſo attributed. Many other expoſitions are made of this tale by other authors; but it is not unlikely, that Chymæra was the name of a ſhip, for ſo [f] Virgil calleth one of the greateſt ſhips of Æneas.

Ion alſo, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their parent Javan) derive their name from Ions, is ſaid to have been about Ehud's time: [g] Homer calls them Iaones, which hath a near reſemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be ſo, that Ion himſelf took name from Javan; it being a cuſtom obſervable in the hiſtories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a forefather, in ſome of the prinipal of his iſſue.

The invaſion of India by Liber Pater, is by ſome reported as done in this age: But St. Auguſtine makes him far more ancient; placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Joſhua.

About the end of the 80 years, aſcribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flouriſhed: who gave name to Peloponneſus in Greece, now called Morea.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

Of Deborah, and her cotemporaries.

AFTER Iſrael had lived in peace and plenty to the end of theſe 80 years, they again began to forget the Giver of all goodneſs, and many of thoſe being worn out, which were witneſſes of the former miſery, and of God's deliverance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the reſt began to return to their former neglect of God's commandments. For as plenty and peace are the parents of idle ſecurity; ſo is ſecurity as fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both danger and ſubverſion; of which all eſtates in the world have taſted by interchange of times. Therefore, when their ſins were again ripe for puniſhment, Jabin king of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the territory of Iſrael, and having in his ſervice 900 iron chariots, beſides the reſt of his forces, he held them in ſubjection twenty years, till it pleaſed God to raiſe up Deborah, the propheteſs, who encouraged Barac to levy a force out of Nephthalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephthalim were more forward than the reſt in this action, it may ſeem to have proceeded, partly from the authority that Barac had among them, being of the ſame tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievances, which in them was more ſenſible, than in others, becauſe Hazor and Haroſeth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nephthalim. So in the days of Jephtha, the Gileadites took the greateſt care, becauſe the Ammonites, with whom the war was, preſs'd moſt upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleaſed God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Iſrael from the Moabites; and by the counſel and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Siſera by Jael the Kenite's wife: ſo was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakeſt means. For the mighty Aſſyrian Nabuchodonoſor, who was a king of kings, and reſiſtleſs, he overthrew by his own imaginations the cauſers of his brutiſh melancholy; and changed his matchleſs pride into the baſe humility of a beaſt. And to prove that he is the Lord of all power, he ſometimes puniſheth by inviſible ſtrength, as when he ſlaughtered the army of Sennacherib by his angel; or as he did the Egyptians in Moſes's time: ſometimes by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the ſea, and the Canaanites by hail-ſtones in the time of Joſhua: ſometimes by the miniſtry of men, as when he overthrew the four kings of the eaſt, Chedorlaomer and his companions, by the houſhold ſervants of Abraham. He cauſed the Moabites and Ammonites to ſet upon their own confederates the army of the Edomites; and having ſlain them to kill one another in the ſight of [a] Jehoſaphat; and of the like to theſe a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the propheteſs ſpeak unto Barac in theſe words: [b] But this journey that thou takeſt, ſhall not be for thine honour, for the Lord ſhall ſell Siſera into the hand of a woman. In which victory all the ſtrength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the laſt man: in the end of which war, it ſeemeth that Jabin himſelf alſo periſhed, as appeareth by Judges iv. 24.

After all which Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgment of all his powerfulneſs, and great mercies, ſhe ſheweth the weak eſtate whereunto Iſrael was brought for their idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering nations in theſe words: [c] Was there a ſhield or ſpear ſeen among forty thouſand in Iſrael? She alſo ſheweth how the Iſraelites were ſevered and amazed, ſome of them confined over Jordan, and durſt not join themſelves to the reſt; as thoſe of Reuben in Gilead; that the Aſherites kept the ſea-coaſt, and forſook their habitations towards the land; and the children of Dan who neighboured the ſea, crept into their ſhips for ſafety, ſhewing thereby that all were diſperſed, and all in effect loſt. She then curſeth the inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling near the place of the battle (belike fearing the ſucceſs) came not out to aſſiſt Iſrael, and then bleſſeth Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Siſera in her tent; ſhewing the ancient affection of that race to the Iſraelites. For tho' the family of Heber were enforc'd in that miſerable time of ſubjection, to hold correſpondence with Jabin the Canaanite; yet when occaſion offered them means, they witneſſed their love and faith to their ancient friends. Laſtly, She derideth the mother of Siſera, who promiſed her ſon the victory in her own hopes; and fancied to herſelf, and deſcribed the ſpoils both of garments and maidens by him gotten. For concluſion, ſhe directeth her praiſes and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppreſſion, to the end of that peace which Deborah and Barak purchaſed unto Iſrael, there paſſed 40 years. In which time the kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544 years was tranſlated to Mycænæ. The tranſlation of this kingdom, Vives, out of Pauſanias, writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus ſucceeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the ſon of Lynceus divided the kingdom; of which Acriſius, being eldeſt, held Argos itſelf: Prætus his brother poſſeſs'd Ephyra or Corinth, and Tyrinthos, and other cities, with all the territory towards the ſea, there being many monuments in Tyrinthos which witneſs Prætus's poſſeſſion, ſaith [d] Pauſanias.

Now Acriſius was foretold by an oracle, that he ſhould be ſlain by the ſon of his daughter Danae; whereupon he cauſed her to be incloſed in a tower, to the end that no man might accompany her. But the lady being exceeding fair, it is feigned that Jupiter turned himſelf into a golden ſhower, which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that ſome king's ſon, or other worthy man, corrupted her keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perſeus was born; who, when he grew to man's eſtate, either by chance (ſaith Cteſias) or in ſhewing his grandfather the invention of the Diſcus, or leaden ball, ſlew him unwillingly. After this, Perſeus, to avoid the infamy of parricide in Argos, changed kingdoms with his uncle Prætus; and built Mycænæ. This impriſonment of Danae Sophocles reporteth otherwiſe; and ſays, that ſhe was encloſed in a brazen vault, under the king's hall, with her nurſe and keepers. Upon this cloſe cuſtody Horace hath this witty obſervation.

Incluſam Danaen, turris ahenea,
Robuſtæque fores, & vigilum Canum
Triſtes excubiæ, munierant ſatis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:
Si non Acriſium virginis abditæ

Converſo in pretium Deo.

Inachus the firſt king, who began to reign in the firſt year of Jacob, and the ſixty-firſt of Iſaac; from which time, to the end of Sthenelus, Caſtor miſ-reckoneth 400 years. This kingdom before the tranſlation, Euſebius accounteth to have ſtood 544 years, others but at 417. Io was the daughter of this Inachus, whom the Egyptians called Iſis.

Of theſe kings Mercator and Bunting leave out the two firſt, and the laſt; beginning with Euriſtheus; and ending with Penthilus. In Tiſamenus's time the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponneſus, of which hereafter.

The cotemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas, who reigned in Phrygia; and Ilus, who built Ilium; with others mentioned in our chronological table, as cotemporaries with Debora.

SECT. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this age.

DEBORA and Barac being dead; the Midianites aſſiſted by the Amalekites infeſted Iſrael. For when under a judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had injoyed any quiet or proſperity; the judge was no ſooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring nations did ſo maſter them in a ſhort time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to ſave themſelves, they [a] crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardeſt acceſs: their enemies poſſeſſing all the plains and fruitful vallies; and in harveſt time by themſelves, and the multitude of their cattle, deſtroying all that grew up, covering the fields as thick as graſhoppers; which ſervitude laſted ſeven years.

Then the Lord by his angel ſtirred up [b] Gideon the ſon of Joaſh, afterwards called Jerubaal; whoſe fear and unwillingneſs, and how it pleaſed God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and preciſely ſet down in the holy ſcriptures: as alſo how it pleaſed God by a few ſelect perſons, [c] namely 300 out of 32000 men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of hoſts: each of theſe 300, by Gideon's appointment, carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, inſtruments of more terror than force, with which he gave the great army of their enemies an alarm; who hearing ſo loud a noiſe, and ſeeing (at the crack of ſo many pitchers broken) ſo many lights about them, eſteeming the army of Iſrael to be infinite, and ſtricken with a ſudden fear, they all fled without a ſtroke ſtricken; and were ſlaughtered in great numbers, two of their princes being made priſoners and ſlain. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrel with Gideon, becauſe he made war without their aſſiſtance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten; who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt have held themſelves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeaſing them with a mild anſwer, followed after the enemy, in which purſuit being tired with travel, and weary even with the ſlaughtering of his enemies, he deſired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end that (his men being refreſhed) he might overtake the other two kings of the Midianites, which had ſaved themſelves by flight. For they were four princes of the nations which had invaded and waſted Iſrael; to wit, Oreb and Zeeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, ſought the like relief from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like ſort refuſed to ſuccour him. To both of theſe places he threatned therefore the revenge, which in his return from the proſecution of the other two princes he performed; to wit, that he would tear the fleſh of thoſe of Succoth with thorns and briars, and deſtroy the inhabitants and city of Penuel. Now why the people of theſe two cities ſhould refuſe relief to their brethren the Iſraelites, eſpecially after ſo great a victory, if I may preſume to make conjecture; it ſeems likely, firſt, that thoſe cities ſet over Jordan, and in the way of all invaſions to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites, and Midianites into Iſrael, had either made their own peace with thoſe nations, and were not ſpoiled by them: or elſe they knowing that Zeba and Zalmunna were eſcaped with a great part of their army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, It may be laid to the condition and diſpoſitions of theſe men, as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all ages. For their are multitudes of men, eſpecially of thoſe which follow the wars, that both envy and malign others, if they perform any praiſe-worthy actions, for the honour and ſafety of their own country, tho' themſelves may be aſſured to bear a part of the ſmart of contrary ſucceſs. And ſuch malicious hearts can rather be contented that their prince and country ſhould ſuffer hazard and want, than that ſuch men as the miſlike, ſhould be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or whereſoever it were that he refreſhed himſelf, and his weary and hungry ſoldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and purſued his former victory to the utmoſt: and finding Zeba and Zalmunna in [b] Karkor (ſuſpecting no farther attempt upon them) he again ſurprized them, and ſlaughtered thoſe 15000 remaining; having put to the ſword in the former attempt 120000, and withal he took Zeba and Zalmunna priſoners; whom, becauſe themſelves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he cauſed to be ſlain: or (as it is written) at their own requeſt ſlew them with his own hands: his ſon, whom he firſt commanded to do it, refuſing it; and in his return from the conſummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the elders of Succoth, and of the citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed againſt him, either by ſtrangers or by his brethren the Iſraelites. But ſuch mercy as he ſhewed to others, his own children found ſoon after his death, according to that which hath hath been ſaid before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unſatisfied; for as he ſlew the ſeventy elders of Succoth, with great and unuſual torments, ſo were his own ſeventy ſons, all but one, murdered by his own baſtard Abimelech. The like analogy is obſerved by the Rabines, in the greateſt of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having cauſed the male children of the Hebrews to be ſlain, others of them to be caſt into the river and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like meaſure, deſtroying their own firſtborn by his angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his army in the Red ſea. And hereof a world of examples might be given, both out of the ſcriptures, and other hiſtories.

In the end ſo much did the people reverence Gideon in the preſent for this victory, and their own deliverance, as they offered him the ſoveraignty over them, and to eſtabliſh him in the government; which he refuſed, anſwering; I will not reign over you, neither ſhall my child reign over you, but the Lord ſhall, &c. But he deſired the people, that they would beſtow on him the golden ear-rings, which every man had gotten. For the Iſhmaelites, neighbours, and mix'd with the Midianites, uſed to wear them: the weight of all which was a thouſand and ſeven hundred ſheckles of gold, which makes of ours, 2380 pounds, if we follow the account of the ſheckle vulgar. And becauſe he converted that gold into an [c] ephod, a garment of gold, blew ſilk, purple, ſcarlet, and fine linen, belonging to the high prieſt only, and ſet up the ſame in his own city of Ophra, or Ephra, which drew Iſrael to idolatry, the ſame was the deſtruction of Gideon and his houſe.

There was another kind of ephod beſides this of the high prieſts which the Levites uſed, and ſo did David when he danced before the ark; and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linen only.

Now if any man demand, how it was poſſible for Gidon with 300 men to deſtroy 120000 of their enemies; and afterwarp 15000 which remained, we may remember, that altho' Gideon with 300 gave the firſt alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and diſorder: yet all the reſt of the army came into the ſlaughter, and purſuit; for it is written; [d] That the men of Iſrael being gathered together out of Nephtali, and out of Aſher, and out of Manaſſeh, purſued after the Midianites: for this army Gideon left in the tents behind him, when he went down to view the army of his enemies, who with the noiſe of his 300 trumpets came after him to the execution.

There lived with Gideon, Ægeus the ſon of Pandion, who reigned in Athens; Euriſtheus king of Mycenæ, Atreus and Thyeſtes the ſons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponneſus, and after the death of Euriſtheus the kingdom of Mycænæ fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus who holding his brother in jealouſy, as an attempter both of his wife and crown, ſlew the children of Thyeſtes, and cauſing their fleſh to be dreſs'd did therewith feaſt their father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his ſon Agamemnon were ſlain by a baſe ſon of Thyeſtes, yea the grand-children, and all the lineage of Atreus died by the ſame ſword.

In Gideon's time alſo thoſe things were ſuppoſed to have been done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus, they ſay, having ſlain his nephew Attalus, fled to Minos king of Crete for ſuccour, where for his excellent workmanſhip he was greatly eſteemed, having made for Minos a labyrinth like unto that of Egypt. Afterwards he was ſaid to have framed an artificial cow for Paſiphaë the queen, that ſhe, being in love with a fair bull, might, by putting herſelf into the cow, ſatisfy her luſt, a thing no leſs unnatural than incredible, had not that ſhameleſs emperor Domitian, exhibited the like beaſtly ſpectacle openly before the people of Rome in his amphitheatre; on purpoſe as may ſeem to verify the old fable. For ſo it appears by thoſe verſes of Martial, wherein the flattering poet magnifieth the abominable ſhew as a goodly pageant in thoſe vicious times.

Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Paſiphae, Servius makes a leſs unhoneſt conſtruction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counſel, and her pandar for the enticing of a ſecretary of Minos called Taurus, which ſignifieth a bull, who begat her with child, and that ſhe being delivered of two ſons, the one reſembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was feigned that ſhe was delivered of the monſter Minotaur half a man, and half a bull. But this practice being diſcovered, and Dædalus appointed to be ſlain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus king of Sicily; in which paſſage he made ſuch expedition, as it was feigned that he faſhioned wings for himſelf, and his ſon to tranſport them. For whereas Minos purſued him with boats, which had oars only, Dædalus framed ſails both for his own boat, and for his ſons, by which he out-went thoſe that had him in chaſe. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himſelf overbold, was over-borne and drowned.

It is alſo written of Dædalus, that he made images that could move themſelves, and go, becauſe he carved them with legs, arms, and hands; whereas thoſe that preceded him, could only preſent the body and head of thoſe men, whom they carved to counterfeit, and yet the workmanſhip was eſteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had ſeen ſome of thoſe that were called the images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

With [a] Gideon alſo flouriſhed Linus the Theban, the ſon of Apollo, and Terpſichore, who inſtructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the creation, of the ſun and moon's courſe, and of the generation of living creatures, but in the end he was ſlain by Hercules his ſcholar with his own harp.

Again, in this age thoſe things ſpoken of [b] Sphinx and Oedipus are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by ſea and land, was by the Corinthian army, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles to thoſe whom ſhe maſtered, was meant by the rocky and inacceſſible mountain near Thebes which ſhe defended, and by Oedipus diſſolving her problem, his victory over her. She was painted with wings, becauſe exceeding ſwift, and with the body of a lion for her cruelty. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx were more probable, did not the time diſprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus; who when by her help he had caſt Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the ſiſter of Draco, which Sphinx taking in deſpightful part, with her own troop ſhe held the mountain by Thebes, from whence ſhe continued a ſharp war upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrown. About this time did Minos thruſt his brother out of Crete, and held ſharp war with the Megarians and Athenians, becauſe his ſon Androgeus was ſlain by them. He poſſeſs'd himſelf of Megara by the treaſon of Scylla, daughter of Niſus the king. He was long maſter of the ſea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every year ſeven of their ſons; which tribute Theſeus releaſed, as ſhall be ſhewed when I come to the time of the next judge Thola. In the end he was ſlain at [c] Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia by Cocalus the king, while he purſued Dædalus; and was eſteemed by ſome to be the firſt law-giver to thoſe iſlands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the giant, who was ſaid to have 60 and odd cubits of length, which tho' Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was ſuch a body found by Sertorius the Roman in Libya, where Hercules ſlew Antæus; yet for my ſelf I think it but a loud lye. That Antæus was of great ſtrength, and a cunning wreſtler, [d] Euſebius affirmeth; and becauſe he caſt ſo many men to the ground, he was feigned to be the ſon of the earth. Pliny ſaith, that he inhabited near the gardens Heſperides in Mauritania. [e] St. Auguſtine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece; but of Libya; and the [f] Hydra alſo which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a ſubtil ſophiſter.

SECT. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonauts.

ABout the 11th year of Gideon, was that famous expedition of the Argonauts; of which many fabulous diſcourſes have been written, the ſum of which is this.

Pelias the ſon of Neptune, brother by the mother's ſide to Æſon, who was Jaſon's father, reigning in Iolcus, a town of Theſſaly, was warned by the oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one ſhoo. This Pelias afterwards ſacrificing to Neptune, invited Jaſon to him, who coming haſtily, loſt one ſhoo in paſſing over a brook: Whereupon Pelias demanded of him what courſe he would take (ſuppoſing he was able) againſt one of whom an oracle ſhould adviſe him to take heed? To which queſtion when Jaſon had briefly anſwered, that he would ſend him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece: Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that ſervice. Therefore Jaſon prepared for the voyage, having a ſhip built by Argus, the ſon of Phryxus, by the counſel of Pallas: wherein he procured all the braveſt men of Greece to ſail with him: as Typhis the maſter of the ſhip, Orpheus the famous poet, Caſtor and Pollux the ſons of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus ſons of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules Theſeus, Zetes and Calais the two-winged ſons of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great ſooth-ſayer, Meleager of Calidon that ſlew the great wild boar, Aſcalaphus and Jalmenus or Almenus the ſons of Mars, who were afterwards at the laſt war of Troy, Laertes the father of Ulyſſes, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lynceus the ſons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Caſtor and Pollux ſlew Caſtor and wounded Pollux, but were ſlain themſelves, Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

Theſe and many other went with Jaſon in the ſhip Argo; in whoſe prow was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could ſpeak. They arrived firſt at Lemnos; the women of which iſland, having ſlain all the males, purpoſing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheleſs contented to take their pleaſure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the country about Cyzicus, where dwelt a people called Doliones, over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it ſo fell out, that looſing thence by night, they were driven by contrary winds back into his port, neither knowing that it was the ſame haven, nor being known by the Doliones, to be the ſame men; but rather taken for ſome of their bordering enemies, by which means they fell to blows, inſomuch that the Argonauts ſlew the moſt part of the Doliones, together with their king Cyzicus; which when by day-light they perceived, with many tears they ſolemnized his funeral. Then departed they again, and arrived ſhortly in Myſia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the ſon of Elates, who went to ſeek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was raviſhed by the nymphs.

Polyphemus built a town in Myſia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos: from Myſia the Argonauts ſailed into Bithynia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces the ancient inhabitants of the country, over whom Amycus the ſon of Neptune was then king. He being a ſtrong man, compelled all ſtrangers to fight with him, at whorl-batts, in which kind of fight he had ſlain many, and was now himſelf ſlain by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death flew all upon Pollux, but his companions reſcued him, with great ſlaughter of the people. They ſailed from hence to Salmydeſſus, a town in Thrace (ſomewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a ſooth-ſayer dwelt, who was blind and vexed with the harpyes. The harpyes were ſaid to be a kind of birds, which had the faces of women and foul long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furniſhed for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greateſt part of the victuals, did ſo defile the reſt, that they could not be endured.

When therefore the Argonauts craved his advice and direction for their voyage: you ſhall do well (quoth he) firſt of all to deliver me from the harpyes, and then afterwards to ask my counſel. Whereupon they cauſed the table to be covered, and meat ſet on; which was no ſooner ſet down, than that preſently in came the harpyes, and played their accuſtomed pranks; when Zetes and Calais the winged young men ſaw this, they drew their ſwords, and purſued them thro' the air; ſome ſay, that both the harpyes and the young men died of wearineſs in the fight, and purſuit. But Apollonius ſaith, that the harpyes did covenant with the youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon diſmiſſed. For this good turn Phineus gave them informations of the way, and advertiſed them withal of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did ſhut up the paſſage; wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them in the paſſage; and if that paſſed ſafe, then to adventure after her; if not, then by no means to hazard themſelves in vain. They did ſo, and perceiving that the pigeon had only loſt a piece of her tail, they obſerved the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, paſſed thro' ſafe, only the end of the poop was bruiſed.

From thenceforward (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have ſtood ſtill; for the Gods, ſay they, had decreed that after the paſſage of a ſhip, they ſhould be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the river Parthenius, where Lycus the king entertained them courteouſly. Here Idmon a ſooth-ſayer of their company was ſlain by a wild boar; alſo here Typhis died, and Ancæus undertook to ſtear the ſhip. So they paſſed by the river Thermodon, and mount Caucaſus, and came to the river Phaſis, which runs thro' the land of Colchos. When they were entred the haven, Jaſon went to Æetes the king of Colchos, and told him the commandment of Pelias, and cauſe of his coming; deſiring him to deliver the golden fleece, which Æetes, as the fable goeth, promiſed to do, if he alone would yolk together two brazen-hoof'd bulls, and ploughing the ground with them, ſow dragons teeth, which Minerva had given to him, being part of thoſe which Cadmus did ſow at Thebes. Theſe bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire; Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whilſt Jaſon was in a great perplexity about this task, Medæa, the daughter of Æetes, fell into a moſt vehement love of him, ſo far forth, that being excellent in magic, ſhe came privily to him, promiſing her help, if he would aſſure her of his marriage. To this Jaſon agreed, and confirmed his promiſe by oath. Then gave ſhe to him a medicine, wherewith ſhe bad him to anoint both his body and his armour, which would preſerve him from their violence; further ſhe told him, that armed men would ariſe out of the ground, from the teeth which he ſhould ſow, and ſet upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, ſhe bid him throw ſtones amongſt them, as ſoon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blows, in ſuch wiſe that he might eaſily ſlay them. Jaſon followed her counſel; whereto when the event had anſwered, he again demanded the fleece. But Æetes was ſo far from approving ſuch his deſire, that he deviſed how to deſtroy the Argonauts, and burn their ſhip; which Medæa perceiving, went to Jaſon, and brought him by night to the fleece, which hung upon an oak in the grove of Mars, where they ſay it was kept by a dragon, that never ſlept. This dragon was by the magic of Medæa caſt into a ſleep: ſo taking away the golden fleece, ſhe went with Jaſon into the ſhip Argo: having with her, her brother Abſyrtus.

Æetes underſtanding the practices of Medæa, provided to purſue the ſhip; whom when Medæa perceived to be at hand, ſhe ſlew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, ſhe ſcattered his limbs in divers places; of which Æetes finding ſome, was fain to ſeek out the reſt, and ſuffer his daughter to paſs: the parts of his ſon he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word ſignifieth diviſion. Afterwards he ſent many of his ſubjects to ſeek the ſhip Argo, threatning that if they brought not back Medæa, they ſhould ſuffer in her ſtead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the ſeas, and were come to the river Eridanus, which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter offended with the ſlaughter of Abſyrtus, vexed them with a great tempeſt, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the iſlands Abſyrtides, there the ſhip Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this fable) ſpake to them, and ſaid, that the anger of Jupiter ſhould not ceaſe, till they came to Auſonia, and were cleanſed by Circe from the murther of Abſyrtus. Now they thereupon ſailing between the coaſts of Libya, and Gallia, and paſſing thro' the ſea of Sardinia, and along the coaſt of Hetruria, came to the iſle of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleanſed them. Thence they ſailed by the coaſt of the Syrens, who ſung to allure them into danger; but Orpheus on the other ſide ſung ſo well that he ſtay'd them. Only Butes ſwam out unto them, whom Venus raviſhed, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having paſs'd the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Charybdis, and the ſtragling rocks which ſeemed to caſt out great ſtore of flames and ſmoak. But Thetis and the Nereides, convey'd them ſafe thro' at the appointment of Juno. So they coaſted Sicily where the beeves of the ſun were, and touched at Corcyra the iſland of the Phæaces, where king Alcinous reigned. Mean while the men of Colchos, that had been ſent by Æetes in queſt of the ſhip Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger if they fulfilled not his will, betook themſelves to new habitations; ſome of them dwelt in the mountains of Corcyra, others in the iſlands Abſyrtides, and ſome coming to the Phæaces, there found the ſhip Argo, and demanded Medæa of Alcinous, whereunto Alcinous made anſwer, that if ſhe were not Jaſon's wife they ſhould have her, but if ſhe were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos not daring to return home, ſtay'd with the Phæaces; ſo the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this iſland Minos reigned, who had a man of braſs given to him (as ſome of the fablers ſay) by Vulcan. This man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was cloſed up with a braſen nail, his name was Talus, his cuſtom was to run thrice a day about the iſland for the defence of it. When he ſaw the ſhip Argo paſs by, he threw ſtones at it; but Medæa with her magic deſtroy'd him. Some ſay, that ſhe ſlew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promiſing to make him immortal, ſhe drew out the nail that ſtop'd his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died; others there are that ſay, he was ſlain by Pæan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts ſailed to Ægina, where they were fain to fight for freſh water. And laſtly from Ægina they ſailed by Eubæa and Lecris cris home to Iolcos, where they arrived, having ſpent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are, that by this journey of Jaſon, underſtand the myſtery of the philoſopher's ſtone, called the golden fleece; to which alſo other ſuperfine chymiſts draw the 12 labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks, that by the golden fleece, was meant a golden book of parchment, which is of ſheep's-skin, and therefore called golden, becauſe it was taught therein how other metals might be tranſmuted. Others would ſignify by Jaſon, wiſdom, and moderation, which overcometh all perils; but that which is moſt probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the ſtory of ſuch a paſſage was true, and that Jaſon with the reſt went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by boat. For not far from Caucaſus there are certain ſteep falling torrents, which waſh down many grains of gold, as in many other parts of the world, and the people there inhabiting uſe to ſet many fleeces of wool in thoſe deſcents of waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water paſſeth thro'; which Strabo witneſſeth to be true. The many rocks, ſtraits, ſands, and currents, in the paſſage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are poetically converted into thoſe fiery bulls, the armed men riſing out of the ground, the dragon caſt aſleep, and the like. The man of braſs, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterranean ſea, diſguiſed, as the reſt, by Orpheus, under poetical morals; all which Homer afterwards uſed (the man of braſs excepted) in the deſcription of Ulyſſes's travels on the ſame inland ſeas.

SECT. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and the Lapythæ, and of Theſeus, Hippolytus, &c.

AFter the death of Gideon, Abimelech's baſe ſon, begotten on a concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had been made to his father by the people, who deſired to make him and his their perpetual princes; and, as it ſeemeth, ſuppoſing (notwithſtanding his father's religious modeſty) that ſome of his brethren might take on them the ſoveraignty, practiſed with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himſelf, who being eaſily moved with the glory, to have a king of their own, readily condeſcended; and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed [a] 70 pieces of ſilver of their idol Baalberith, with which treaſure he hired a company of looſe and deſperate vagabonds, to aſſiſt his firſt deteſtable enterpriſe, to wit, the ſlaughter of his 70 brethren the ſons of Gideon, begotten on his wives, of which he had many, of all which none eſcaped but [b] Jotham the youngeſt, who hid himſelf from his preſent fury; all which he executed on one ſtone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is human ambition, a monſter that neither feareth God (tho' all-powerful, and whoſe revenges are without date and for everlaſting) neither hath it reſpect to nature, which laboureth the preſervation of every being; but it rageth alſo againſt her, tho' garniſhed with beauty which never dieth, and with love that hath no end. All other paſſions and affections, by which the ſouls of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes reſiſted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it ſelf the child and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it ſelf ſet down, forgetting nothing (how fearful and inhuman ſoever) which may ſerve it; remembring nothing, whatſoever juſtice, piety, right or religion, can offer and alledge on the contrary. It aſcribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weakneſs of the undertakers, and rather praiſeth the adventure than feareth the like ſucceſs. It was the firſt ſin that the world had, and began in angels, for which they were caſt into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The puniſhment alſo preceded his creation, yet hath the devil, which felt the ſmart thereof, taught him to forget the one, as out of date, and to practiſe the other, as befitting every age and condition.

Jotham, the youngeſt of Gideon's ſons, having eſcaped the preſent peril, ſought by his beſt perſuaſions to alienate the Sechemites, from the aſſiſting of this mercileſs tyrant, letting them know, that thoſe which were virtuous, and whom reaſon and religion had taught the ſafe and happy eſtate of moderate ſubjection, had refuſed to receive as unlawful, what others had not power to give, without direction from the King of kings; who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the olive, which contented it ſelf with its fatneſs, the fig-tree with ſweetneſs, and the vine with the good juice it had; the bramble only, who was moſt baſe, cut down all the reſt, and accepted the ſoveraignty. He alſo foretold them by a prophetical ſpirit, what ſhould befal them in the end, and how a fire ſhould come out of the bramble, and conſume the cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an eaſy matter to call thoſe men back, whom rage without right led on) Gaal the ſon of Ebed withdrew the citizens of Sechem, from the ſervice of Abimelech; who therefore after ſome aſſaults entred the place, and maſtered it; and in concluſion fired the town, wherein their idol Baalberith was worſhipped, and put all the people of all ſorts to the ſlaughter. Laſtly, in the aſſault of the caſtle or tower of Tebez, himſelf was wounded in the head with a ſtone thrown over the wall by a woman, and finding himſelf mortally bruiſed, he commanded his own page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the diſhonour of being ſlain by ſo feeble a hand.

While Abimelech uſurped the government, the Lapithæ and Centaurs made war againſt the Thebans. Theſe nations were deſcended of Apollo, and were the firſt in thoſe parts that deviſed to manage horſes, to bridle and to ſit them: inſomuch as when they firſt came down from the mountains of Pindus, into the plains, thoſe which had never ſeen horſemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horſes; ſo did the [c] Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard firſt invaded that empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Iſſachar governed Iſrael 23 years, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22 years, who ſeemeth to be deſcended of Jair, the ſon of Manaſſeh, who in Moſes's time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the ſame after his own name, [d] Haboth Jair. For to this Jair there remained [e] thirty of thoſe cities, which his anceſtor had recovered from the Amorites. Of theſe judges, becauſe there is nothing elſe written, it is an argument, that during all their their times, Iſrael lived without diſturbance and in peace.

When Jair judged Iſrael, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at ſuch time as Hercules ſack'd Ilium, was carried away captive with his ſiſter Heſione into Greece, and being afterwards redeemed for ranſom, he rebuilt and greatly ſtrengthened, and adorned Troy; and ſo far inlarged his dominions, as he became the ſupream lord in effect of all Aſia the leſs. He married Hecuba the daughter of Ciſſeus king of Thrace, and had in all (ſaith [a] Cicero) fifty ſons, whereof ſeventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his aunt Heſione, took Helena the wife of Menelaus, the cauſe of the war which followed.

Theſeus, the 10th king of Athens, began likewiſe to reign in the beginning of Jair: ſome writers call him the ſon of Neptune and Æthra; but Plutarch, in the ſtory of his life, finds him begotten of Ægeus, of whom the Grecian ſea between it and Aſia the leſs took name. For when Minos had maſtered the Athenians, ſo far as he forced them to pay him ſeven of their ſons every year for tribute, whom he incloſed within a labyrinth, to be devoured by the monſter Minotaur; becauſe belike the ſons of Taurus, which he begat on Paſiphae the queen, had the charge of them: among theſe ſeven Theſeus thruſt himſelf, not doubting by his valour to deliver the reſt, and to free his country of that ſlavery, occaſioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos's ſon.

And having poſſeſs'd himſelf of Ariadne's affection, who was Minos's daughter, he received from her a bottom of thread, by which he conducted himſelf through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the labyrinth, made in all like that of the city of crocodiles in Egypt; by means whereof having ſlain the Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Ægeus had given order, that if he came back with victory and in ſafety, he ſhould uſe a white ſail in ſign thereof, and not that mournful black ſail, under which they left the port of Athens. This inſtruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus deſcrying the ſhip of Theſeus with a black ſail, caſt himſelf over the rocks down into the ſea, afterwards called of his name Ægeum.

One of the firſt famous acts of Theſeus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a paſſage between Megara and the Peloponneſian Iſthmus, and threw all whom he maſtered into the ſea, from the high rocks. Afterwards he did the like to Cercyon, by wreſtling, who uſed by that art to kill others. He alſo rid the country of Procruſtos, who uſed to bend down the ſtrong limbs of two trees, and faſtened by cords ſuch as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by their ſpringing up tore them aſunder. So did he root out Periphetes, and other miſchievous thieves and murderers. He overthrew the army of the Amazons, who after many victories and vaſtations, entred the territory of Athens. Theſeus having taken their queen Hippolyta priſoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterwards his mother-in-law Phædra falling in love, and he refuſing to abuſe his father's bed, Phædra perſuaded Theſeus that his ſon offered to force her; after which it is feigned, that Theſeus beſought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his ſon's, by ſome violent death. Neptune, taking a time of advantage, ſent out his ſea-calves, as Hippolytus paſſed by the ſea-ſhore, and ſo affrighted his horſes, as caſting the coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces; which miſerable and undeſerved deſtiny, when Phædra had heard of, ſhe ſtrangled her ſelf. After which it is feigned, that Diana entreated Æſculapius to ſet Hippolytus's pieces together, and to reſtore him to life; which done, becauſe he was chaſt, ſhe led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting and field ſports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his father ſought his life, thinking to eſcape by ſea, was affronted thereat, and received many wounds in forcing his paſſage and eſcape, which wounds Æſculapius, to wit, ſome skilful phyſician or chirurgeon, healed again; after which he paſs'd into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which he moſt delighted. But of thoſe ancient profane ſtories, Plutarch ſaith well, that as coſmographers in their deſcriptions of the world, where they find many vaſt places, whereof they knew nothing, fill the ſame with ſtrange beaſts, birds, and fiſhes, and with mathematical lines; ſo do the Grecian hiſtorians and poets imbroider and intermix the tales of ancient times with a world of fictions and fabulous diſcourſes. True it is, that Theſeus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made his pattern, and was the firſt that gathered the Athenians from being diſperſed in thin and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deviſing them laws to live under, and in order, he was, by the beggarly, mutable, and ungrateful multitude, in the end baniſhed. Some ſay per oſtraciſmum, by the law of lots, or names written on ſhells, which was a device of his own.

He ſtole Helen (as they ſay) when ſhe was 15 years old, from Aphidna, which city Caſtor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Theſeus, to recover their ſiſter. [b] Eraſiſtratus and Pauſanias write, that Theſeus begat her with child at Argos, where ſhe erected a temple to Lucina; but her age makes the tale unlikely to be true, and ſo doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape [c] Euſebius finds in the firſt of [d] Jair, who governed Iſrael 22 years, to whom ſucceeded Jephta or Jepte 6 years, to whom Ibzan, who ruled 7 years, and then Habdon 8 years; in whoſe time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theſeus had a child by her in the 1ſt of Jair (at which time we muſt count her no leſs than 15 years old; for the women did not commonly begin ſo young as they do now) ſhe was then at leaſt 52 years old, at the deſtruction of Troy; and when ſhe was ſtolen by Paris 38; but herein the chronologers do not agree. Yet [e] Euſebius and Bunting, with Halicarnaſſeus do in effect conſent, that the city was entred, and burnt in the firſt year of Demophoon king of Athens, the ſucceſſor of Mneſtheus, the ſucceſſor of Theſeus, 17 days before the ſummer tropick; and that about the 11th of September following, the Trojans croſs'd the Helleſpont into Thrace, and wintered there; and in the next ſpring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the ſecond year, the next ſummer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But [f] St. Auguſtine hath it otherwiſe, that when Polyphides governed Sicyon, Mneſtheus Athens, Tautanes Aſſyria, Habdon Iſrael, then Æneas arrived in Italy, tranſporting with him in 20 ſhips the remainder of the Trojans; but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the ſtory of Troy at hand.

In Sicyona Phæſtus the two and twentieth king, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His ſucceſſors, Adraſtus, who reigned four years, and Polyphides, who

In Aſſyria, during the government of theſe two peaceable judges, Mitreus, and after him Tautanes, reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the ſon of Ramſes, and afterwards Annemenes.

SECT. VIII.

Of the war of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the war of Thebes, the moſt ancient that ever Greek poet or hiſtorian wrote of. Wherefore the Roman poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly againſt the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection.

——— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & mundi, ſemperque æterna fuere;
Cur ſupra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojæ,
Non alias alii quoque res cecinere poetæ.

If all this world had no original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the ſiege of Thebes or Troy's laſt fall,
Why did no poet ſing ſome elder war.

It is true, that in theſe times Greece was very ſavage, the inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the captains of greater tribes; and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt, his own, longer than he could hold it by ſtrong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourſe they uſed little, neither did they plant many trees, or ſow more corn than was neceſſary for their ſuſtenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who meaſures the value of gold and braſs by the worth in cattle; ſaying, that the golden armour of Glaucus, was worth 100 beeves, and the copper armour of Dicmedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and ſea were common and without ſhame, and to ſteal horſes or kine was the uſual exerciſe of their great men. Their towns were not many, whereof thoſe that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenæ the principal city in Peloponneſus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought, that the reſt were proportionable; briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and tho' in ſome ſmall towns of that half iſle of Peloponneſus, the inhabitants might have enjoyed quietneſs within their narrow bounds; as likewiſe did the Athenians, becauſe their country was ſo barren, that none did care to take it from them; yet that the land in general was very rude, it will eaſily appear to ſuch as conſider what Thucydides the greateſt of their hiſtorians hath written to this effect, in the preface to his hiſtory. Wherefore, as in theſe latter times, idle chroniclers uſe, when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great froſts, or dry ſummers, and other ſuch things which no man cares to read; ſo did they, who ſpake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion; or elſe rehearſe fables of men changed into birds, of ſtrange monſters, of adultery committed by their Gods, and the mighty men which they begat; without writing ought that ſavoured of humanity, before the time of the war of Thebes; the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the ſon of Laius king of Thebes, having been caſt forth when he was an infant, becauſe an oracle foretold what evil ſhould come to paſs by him, did afterwards in a narrow paſſage contending for the way, ſlay his own father, not knowing either then, nor long after, who he was. Afterwards he became king of Thebes, by marriage of the queen Jocaſta, called by Homer, Od. 11. Epicaſte; on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two ſons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceſs of time, finding out by good circumſtances, who were his parents, he underſtood the grievous murder and inceſt he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the city. His wife and mother did hang herſelf. Some ſay, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly curſing his ſons, becauſe they ſuffered their father to be caſt out of the town, and aided him not. Howſoever it were, his two ſons made this agreement, that the one of them ſhould reign one year, and the other another year, and ſo by courſe reign interchangeably; but this appointment was ill obſerved. For when Polynices had, after a year's government, reſigned the kingdom to his brother; or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the firſt year, he refuſed to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adraſtus the ſon of Talaas then reigned, unto whoſe palace coming by night, he was driven to ſeek lodging in an out-houſe on the back-ſide.

There he met with Tydeus the ſon of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon; with whom ſtriving about their lodging, he fell to blows. Adraſtus hearing the noiſe, came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time perceiving in the ſhield of Tydeus a boar, in that of Polynices a lion, he remembred an old oracle, by which he was adviſed to give his two daughters in marriage to a lion and a boar; and accordingly he did beſtow his daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their countries. To this purpoſe levying an army, and aſſembling as many valiant captains as he could draw to follow him, he was deſirous, among others, to carry Amphiaraus, the ſon of Oicleus, a great ſoothſayer and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is ſaid to have foreſeen all things, knowing well that none of the captains ſhould eſcape, ſave only Adraſtus, did both utterly refuſe to be one in that expedition, and perſuaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the wife of Amphiaraus, offering unto her a very fair bracelet, upon condition that ſhe ſhould cauſe her husband to aſſiſt him. The ſoothſayer knowing what ſhould work his deſtiny, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eyes ſo precious a jewel, that ſhe could not refuſe it. Therefore, whereas a great controverſy, between Amphiaraus and Adraſtus, was by way of compromiſe put unto the deciſion of Eryphile, either of them being bound by ſolemn oath to ſtand to her appointment: ſhe ordered the matter ſo, as a woman ſhould, that loved a bracelet better than her husband. He now finding that it was more eaſy to foreſee than avoid deſtiny, ſought for ſuch comfort as revenge might afford; giving in charge to his ſons; that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their mother, and make ſtrong war upon the Thebans.

Now had Adraſtus aſſembled all his forces, of which the ſeven chief leaders were, himſelf, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (inſtead of whom ſome name Meciſteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopæus the Arcadian, ſon of Meleager and Atalanta. When the army came to the Nemæan wood, they met a woman, whom they deſired to help them to ſome water, ſhe having a child in her arms, laid laid it down, and led the Argives to a ſpring; but ere ſhe returned, a ſerpent had ſlain the child. This woman was Hypſipyle the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom ſhe would have ſaved when the women of the iſle ſlew all the males by conſpiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For ſuch her piety, the Lemnian wives did ſell her to pirates, and the pirates to Lycurgus lord of the country about Nemæa, whoſe young ſon Opheltes, or Archemorus, ſhe did nurſe, and loſt, as is ſhewed before. When upon the child's death ſhe hid herſelf for fear of her maſter, Amphiaraus told her ſons where they ſhould find her; and the Argives did both kill the ſerpent which had ſlain the child, and in memory of the chance, did inſtitute ſolemn funeral games called Nemæan, wherein Adraſtus won the prize with his ſwift horſe Arion, Tydeus with whorlbats, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreſtling, Parthenopæus at ſhooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the firſt inſtitution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are who think, that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus, a Lacedemonian. Some ſay by Hercules, when he had ſlain the Nemæan lion: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here ſet down.

From Nemæa, the Argives marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent ambaſſador to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of covenants between him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly reſolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envy and malice of the people, who laid fifty men in ambuſh, to intercept him at his return to the army, of which fifty he ſlew all but one, whom he ſent back to the city, as a reporter and witneſs of his valour. When the Argives underſtood how reſolved Eteocles was, they preſented themſelves before the city, and encamped round about it. Thebes is ſaid to have had at that time ſeven gates, which belike ſtood not far aſunder, ſeeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far ſtronger could ſcarce muſter up more thouſands than Thebes had gates) did compaſs the town. Adraſtus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proetis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopæus at Electra, and Polynices at Hypſiſta. In the mean ſeaſon, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed commanders unto them, took advice of Tireſias the ſoothſayer, who promiſed victory to the Thebans, if Menœcius the ſon of Creon, a principal man of the city, would vow himſelf to be ſlain in honour of Mars the God of war. So full of malice and pride is the devil, and ſo envious at his Creator's glory, that he not only challengeth honours due to God alone, as oblations and ſacrifices, with all divine worſhip, but commandeth us to offer our ſelves, and our children unto him, when he hath ſufficiently clouded mens underſtandings, and bewitched their wills with ignorance and blind devotion. And ſuch abominable ſacrifice of men, maids, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all nations, when thro' ignorance or fear they were moſt filled with ſuperſtition. But as they grew more wiſe, ſo did he wax leſs impudent in cunning, tho' not leſs malicious in deſiring the continuance of ſuch barbarous inhumanity. For king Diphilus in Cyprus, without advice of any oracle, made the idol of that country reſt contented with an ox inſtead of a man. Tiberius forbad human ſacrifices in Africk; and crucified the prieſts in the groves where they had practiſed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay inſtead of the living, yet among the ſavages in the Weſt-Indies, theſe cruel offerings have been practiſed of late ages; which as it is a ſufficient argument, that Satan's malice is only covered and hidden by this ſubtilty among civil people: ſo may it ſerve as a probable conjecture of the barbariſms then reigning in Greece. For Menœcius, as ſoon as he underſtood that his death might purchaſe victory to his people, beſtowed himſelf (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himſelf before the gates of the city. Then was a battle fought, wherein the Argives prevailed ſo far at the firſt, that Capaneus advancing ladders to the walls, got up upon the rampart; whence, when he fell, or was caſt down, or (as writers have it) was ſtricken down by Jupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were ſlain in this battle, which cauſed both ſides to deſire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrel in ſingle fight; where the two brethren accordingly ſlew each other.

Another battle was fought after their deaths, wherein the ſons of Aſtæcus behaved themſelves very valiantly: Iſmarus, one of the ſons, ſlew Hippomedon, which was one of the ſeven princes; Parthenopæus being another of the ſeven (who was ſaid to have been ſo fair, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was ſlain by Amphidicus, or, as ſome ſay, by Periclymenus the ſon of Neptune; and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus; yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiaraus, which he cruelly tore open, and ſwallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is ſaid, that Pallas who had brought from Jupiter ſuch remedy for his wounds, as ſhould have made him immortal, refuſed to beſtow it upon him; whereby, perhaps, was meant, that his honour, which might have continued immortal, did periſh through the beaſtly rage that he ſhewed at his death.

The hoſt of the Argives being wholly diſcomfited, Adraſtus and Amphiaraus fled; of whom Amphiaraus is ſaid to have been ſwallowed quick into the earth, near to the river Iſmenus, together with his chariot, and ſo loſt out of mens ſight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carcaſes or drowned in the river; and his body never found, nor greatly ſought for. Adraſtus eſcaped on his good horſe Arion, and came to Athens; where ſitting at an altar, called the altar of mercy, he made ſupplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes, after the death of Eteocles, would not ſuffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried; but cauſed Antigone, the only daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, becauſe ſhe had ſought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's edict. The Athenians condeſcending to the requeſt of Adraſtus, did ſend forth an army under the conduct of Theſeus, which took Thebes, and reſtored the bodies of the Argives to ſepulchre; at which time Evadne the wife of Capaneus, threw herſelf into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the ſons of thoſe captains which were ſlain at Thebes, that any leſs revenge ſhould be taken of their fathers death, than the ruin of the city; wherefore ten years after having levied forces, Ægialeus the ſon of Adraſtus, Diomedes of Tydeus,

Pre-

Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Therſander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Meciſteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmæon the ſon of Amphiaraus; with whom alſo went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promiſed victory if Alcmæon were their captain, whom afterwards by another oracle he commanded to kill his own mother.

When they came to the city, they were incountred by Laodamas the ſon of Eteocles, then king of the Thebans (for Creon was only tutor to Laodamas) who tho' he did valiantly in the battel, and ſlew Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worſt, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) ſlain by Alcmæon. After this diſaſter the citizens began to deſire compoſition; but in the mean time they convey'd themſelves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and ſo began to wander up and down, till at length they built the town called Eſtiæa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the town, entring into it, ſacked it, threw down the walls, and laid it waſte; howbeit it is reported by ſome, that the town was ſaved by Therſander, the ſon of Polynices, who cauſing the citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he ſaved the city from utter deſtruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the war of Troy, which very ſhortly after enſued.

SECT. IX.

Of Jephta, and how the three hundred years which he ſpeaketh of, Judg. xi. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts xiii. 20. 1 Kings vi. 1. together with ſome other things touching chronology about theſe times.

AFter the death of Jair (near about whoſe times theſe things happened in Greece, and during whoſe government, and that of Thola, Iſrael lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the law and ſervice of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worſhipped [a] Baal and Aſteroth, they now became followers of all the heathen nations adjoining, and imbraced the idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites; with thoſe of the Philiſtines. And as it before pleaſed God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites; ſo now he ſcourged them by the [b] Ammonites, and afterwards by the Philiſtines.

Now among the Iſraelites, thoſe of Gilead being moſt oppreſs'd, becauſe they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforc'd to ſeek Jeptha, whom they had formerly deſpiſed and caſt from them, becauſe he was baſe born; but he (notwithſtanding thoſe former injuries) participating more of godly compaſſion, than of deviliſh hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the war, upon condition that they ſhould eſtabliſh him their governour after victory. And when he had diſputed with Ammon for the land, diſproved Ammon's right, and fortified the title of Iſrael by many arguments, the ſame prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being ſtrengthened by God, overthrew them; and did not only beat them out of the plains, but forc'd them over the mountains of Arabia, even to [c] Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, cities expreſs'd heretofore in the deſcription of the holy land. After which victory it is ſaid, that he performed the vain vow, which he made, to ſacrifice the firſt living creature he incountred, coming out of his houſe to meet him; which happened to be his own daughter, and only child, who with all patience ſubmitted herſelf, and only deſired two months time to bewail her virginity on the mountains of Gilead; becauſe in her the iſſues of her father ended; but the other opinion that ſhe was not offered, is more probable; which [d] Borræus and others prove ſufficiently.

After theſe things the children of Iſrael, of the tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephta's victory, otherwiſe making way to their future calamity, and to the moſt grievous ſlavery that ever Iſrael ſuffered, quarrelled with Jephta, that they were not called to the war, as before-time they had conteſted with Gideon. Jephta hereupon inforc'd to defend himſelf againſt their fury, in the incounter ſlew of them [e] 42000, which ſo weaken'd the body of the land, as the Philiſtines had an eaſy conqueſt of them all not long after: Jephta, after he had judged Iſrael 6 years died; to whom ſucceeded Ibzan, who ruled 7 years: after him Elon was their judge 10 years: in all which time Iſrael had peace. Euſebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the reſt, it ſhall be neceſſary upon the occaſion of Jephta's account of the times Judg. xi. 28. (where he ſays that Iſrael had then poſſeſs'd the eaſt ſide of Jordan 300 years) to ſpeak ſomewhat of the times of the judges, and of the differing opinions among the divines and chronologers: there being found three places of ſcripture, touching this point, ſeeming repugnant, or diſagreeing: the firſt is in this diſpute between Jephta and Ammon, for the right and poſſeſſion of Gilead: the ſecond is that of St. Paul, Acts xiii. the third is that which is in the 1ſt of Kings. Jephta here challengeth the poſſeſſion of Gilead for 300 years: St. Paul giveth to the judges, as it ſeems, from the end of Joſhua, to the laſt of Heli, 450 years. In the 1ſt of kings it is taught, that from the departing of Iſrael out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's temple, there were conſumed 480 years. To the firſt, Beroaldus findeth Jephta's 300 years to be but 266 years, to wit, 18 of Joſhua, 40 of Othoniel, 80 of Aod and Samgar, 40 of Deborah, 40 of Gideon, 3 of Abimelech, 23 of Thola, and 22 of Jair: but Jephta (ſaith Beroaldus) [f] putteth or propoſeth a certain number, for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecenteſimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re moverit Iſraeli; So he ſpeaketh (ſaith he) as meaning, that then it was about or well nigh the three hundredth year, ſince Iſrael poſſeſſed thoſe countries, no man making queſtion of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more years than Jephta named by 65, to wit, 365, whereof 71 were ſpent in Iſrael's captivity, at ſeveral times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephta forbare to repeat the whole ſum, or any great part, leſt the Ammonite ſhould have juſtly objected, that 71 of thoſe years, the Iſraelites were in captivity and vaſſals to their neighbour princes, and therefore knowing that to name 300 years, it was enough for preſcription, he omitted the reſt.

To juſtify this account of 365 years, beſides the 71 years of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus's 266, he addeth alſo 28 years more, and ſo maketh up the ſum of 365. Theſe 28 years he findeth out thus; 20 years he gives to the ſeniors between Joſhua and Othoniel; and where [a] Judg. 10. [b] The perſecution of the Ammonites laſted 18 years, and ended in the year of the world 2820, in which year Jephta began. Judg. 11. [c] Judg. 11. 33. [d] Bor. in Judg. [e] Judg. 12. [f] Id facit numero certo pro incerto propoſito.

Beroaldus alloweth but 18 years to Joſhua's government, Codoman accounts that his rule laſted 26 according to Joſephus; whereas St. Auguſtine and Euſebius give him 27, Melanchthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28 years is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But tho' we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of ſome part of the years of affliction (to wit, 34 years of the 71) if we add them to the 266 years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of theſe, we have the juſt number of 300 years. Neither is it ſtrange, that Jephta ſhould leave out more than half of theſe years of affliction: ſeeing, as it is already ſaid, the Ammonites might except againſt theſe 71 years, and ſay, that during theſe years, or at leaſt a good part of them, the Iſraelites had no quiet poſſeſſion of the countries in queſtion. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making thoſe 300 years remembred by Jephta, to be 306, which odd years, faith he, Jephta omitteth. But becauſe the years of every judge as they reigned, cannot make up this number of 306, but do only compound 266, therefore doth Luther add to this number, the whole time which Moſes ſpent in the deſerts of Arabia Petræa; which 40 years of Moſes, added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266, make indeed 306.

But I ſee nothing in the text to warrant Luther's judgment herein; for in the diſpute between Jephta and Ammon for the land of Gilead, it is written in the perſon of Ammon in theſe words: [a] Becauſe Iſrael took my land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore reſtore thoſe lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moſes's departure out of Egypt; but from the time that the land was poſſeſs'd. For it is ſaid, Quia cepit Iſrael terram meam; Becauſe Iſrael took my land; and therefore the beginning of this account, is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephta's anſwer alſo confirmeth in theſe words; [a] When Iſrael dwelt in Heſhbon and in her towns, and in Aroer and in her towns, and in all the cities that are by the coaſt of Arnon, 300 years: why did ye not then recover them in that ſpace? So as this place ſpeaks it directly, that Iſrael had inhabited and dwelt in the cities of Gilead 300 years; and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Iſrael had to poſſeſs it, it ſeemeth ſomewhat ſtrained to me; for we do not uſe to reckon the time of our conqueſts in France, from our princes intents or purpoſes, but from their victories and poſſeſſions.

Junius nevertheleſs likes the opinion of Luther, and ſays, that this time of 300 years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the firſt of Jephta's narration; when he makes a brief repetition of Moſes's whole journey; to wit, at the 16th verſe of the xith chapter of Judges in our tranſlation in theſe words; [b] But when Iſrael came up from Egypt, &c. And therefore Moſes's 40 years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305 years; and not only the time in which Iſrael poſſeſs'd Gilead, according to the text, and Jephta's own words; of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom alſo I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480 years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the temple, even from the firſt departure out of Egypt, and yet find a more probable reconciliation of St. Paul's and Jephta's account with this reckoning, than any of thoſe that as yet have been ſignified. For firſt, touching Jephta's 300 years of poſſeſſion of the eaſt ſide of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Iſraelites poſſeſſed it, Sehon and Og had diſpoſſeſſed Moab and Ammon thereof; ſo that when the Iſraelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of poſſeſſion, which they had, paſſed to Iſrael; and ſo Jephta might ſay, that they had poſſeſſed thoſe countries 300 years, reckoning 266 years of their own poſſeſſion, and the reſt of the poſſeſſion of the two kings Sehon and Og, whoſe right the Iſraelites had by the law of conqueſt.

The ſecond place diſputed is this of St. Paul, Acts xiii. that from the end of [c] Joſhua, to the beginning of Samuel, there paſs'd 450 years. And this place Luther underſtandeth alſo beſides the letter, as I find his opinion cited by Functius Krentſemius, and Beza, for I have not read his commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moſes, to the laſt year of Heli, but 357 years; and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egreſſion out of Egypt to the building of the temple, which in 1 Kings vi. is ſaid to be 480 years.

Now for as much as St. Paul (as it ſeems) finds 450 years from the death of Joſhua, to the laſt of Heli, and leaves but 30 years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40, for David who ruled 40, and for Solomon who wore the crown three whole years ere the foundation of the temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was an error in the ſcribe, who wrote out this piece of ſcripture of St. Paul, to wit, [d] Then afterwards he gave unto them judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the prophet; the words then afterward, being clearly referred to the death or after the death of Joſhua, as ſhall be hereafter proved. But where St. Luke, rehearſing the words of St. Paul, wrote 350 years (ſaith Luther) the ſcribe in the tranſcription being deceived, by the affinity of thoſe two Greek words, whereof the one ſignifieth 300, and the other 400, wrote Tetracoſiois for Triacoſiois 400 years for 300 years, and 450 for 350. This he ſeeketh to ſtrengthen by many arguments; to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman; where Luther and Beza begin at Moſes's death, he takes his account from the death of Joſhua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430 years, to wit, of the judges (not reckoning Sampſon's years) 319, and of years of ſervitude and affliction under ſtrangers 111. The reaſon why he doth not reckon Sampſon's 20 years, is, becauſe he thinks that they were part of the 40 years, in which the Philiſtines are ſaid to have oppreſſed Iſrael. For it is plain, that during all [e] Sampſon's time, they were lords over Iſrael. So then of the judges, beſides the 111 years of ſervitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have ſaid) 319 years, which two ſums put together make 430 years, and whereas St. Paul nameth 450 years, he finds 20 years to make up St. Paul's number, to have been ſpent after the death of Joſhua by the ſeniors, before the captivity of Chuſhan, or the election of Othoniel; which 20 years added to 430, make 450, according to St. Paul. To approve this time of elders, he citeth two places of ſcripture, namely, the xxivth of Joſhua, and the 2d of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Iſrael ſerved the Lord all the days of Joſhua, and all the days of the elders that over-lived Joſhua, ſo as to theſe times of the elders, Codoman giveth 20 years, which make as before 450, according to St. Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty in this opinion, if here alſo the 20 years of the ſeniors, between Joſhua and Othoniel, ſhould be deny'd. For they which deny theſe years, and make Othoniel's 40 to begin preſently upon the death of Joſhua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they have 20 years leſs than Codoman, ſo towards the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction, apart from the years of the judges) in the number of Sampſon's years, and of the 40 years of the Philiſtines oppreſſing the Iſraelites, they have 20 years more than Codoman. For they reckon theſe 40 years of oppreſſion, all of them apart from Sampſon's 20, but Codoman as is ſaid makes Sampſon's 20 to be the one half of the 40 of the Philiſtines oppreſſions; ſo that if the 20 years of the ſeniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the text ſeems to inforce) that the Philiſtines in an Inter-regnum, before Sampſon judged Iſrael, vexed the Iſraelites 40 years, beſides the 20 while Sampſon was their judge, and ſo the reckoning will come to 450 years between the end of Joſhua, and the beginning of Samuel, tho' we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the ſeniors, between Joſhua and Othoniel: for if the times of their affliction be ſum'd, they make 111 years, to which if we add the years of the judges, which are 339, we have the juſt ſum of 450. And this computation, either one way or other, may ſeem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the text, altho' we ſhould admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350 for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350 years, is to begin immediately, or ſoon after the death of Moſes; certainly the place of St. Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, tho' it be received for true, that there was vitium ſcriptoris in the reſt. For theſe be St. Paul's words; And about the time of 40 years, God ſuffered their manners in the wilderneſs; and he deſtroyed ſeven nations in the land of Canaan, and divided their land to them by lot. Then afterwards he gave unto them judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the prophet. So as firſt in the 18th verſe he ſpeaketh of Moſes, and of his years ſpent in the wilderneſs, then in the 19th verſe he cometh to the acts of Joſhua; which were that he deſtroy'd 7 nations in the land of [a] Canaan, and divided their land to them by lot. In the 20th verſe it followeth; Then afterwards he gave them judges about 450 years, &c. And therefore to reckon from the death of Moſes, is wide of St. Paul's meaning, ſo far as my weak underſtanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any weight in the opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is that it ſeems irreconcileable with the account 1 Kings vi. 11. For if indeed there were ſpent 450 years between the end of Joſhua, and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there muſt needs be much more than 480 years between the beginning of the Iſraelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the temple by Solomon. To this difficulty Codoman anſwereth, that theſe 480 years 1 Kings vi. 1. muſt begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25 years after the beginning of Othoniel's government; from whence if we caſt the years of the judges, with the years of ſervitude (which ſums according to his account, of which we have already ſpoken, make 397 years) and ſo to theſe years add the 40 of Samuel and Saul, and the 40 of David, and the 3 of Solomon, we ſhall have the juſt ſum of 480 years. Neither is it hard, ſaith he, that the Annus egreſſionis, 1 Reg. vi. 1. ſhould be underſtood Egreſſionis non incipientis ſed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for ſo it is in the original) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be underſtood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For ſo we find that things, which were done 40 years after they had ſet foot out of Egypt, are ſaid to have been done in their going out of Egypt, as Pſalm cxiv. When Iſrael came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Deut. iv. 45. Theſe are the teſtimonies which Moſes ſpake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it ſeems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the words ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiviſſent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius, Deut. iv. 45. do well read quum exiviſſent, for in exitu, as it ſeems that herein he doth well, why may not we alſo, to avoid contradiction in the ſcripture, expound ab exitu to be poſtquam exiviſſent?

The next point to be cleared is, how their journeying ſhould be ſaid, not to have had end until the 25th year after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman anſwereth, that then it had no end till when all the tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time; at which time the Danites at length ſeated themſelves, as it is declared, Judg. xviii. For doubtleſs to this time the expedition may moſt conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephtha, Judg. xviii. 1. and St. Paul, with that in 1 Kings vi. Now whereas it is ſaid, that the expedition of the Danites was, when there was no king in Iſrael: To this Codoman anſwereth, that it is not neceſſary that we ſhould ſuppoſe that Othoniel lived all thoſe 40 years of reſt, of which Judg. iii. 11. So that by the 25 years after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at leaſt, as Gideon did, he might have refuſed all ſoveraignty; and ſo either way it might truly be ſaid, that at this time (to wit, the 25th year after Othoniel's victory) there was no king in Iſrael. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as conſonant to other chronologers grounding their opinions on the plain text, where it is indiſputable, as it is in it ſelf round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good; eſpecially conſidering that the ſpeeches of St. Paul have not otherwiſe found any interpretation, maintaining them as abſolutely true, in ſuch manner as they ſound and are ſet down. But ſeeing that he wanteth all help of authority, we may juſtly ſuſpect the ſuppoſition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being ſuch as the conſent of many authors would hardly ſuffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conqueſt of Laiſh, by the tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to ſhew that Othoniel did ſo renounce the office of a judge after five and twenty years, that it might then he truly ſaid there was no king in Iſrael, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes.

Now concerning the rehearſal of the law by Moſes, and the ſtopping of Jordan, they might

indeed be properly ſaid to have been, when Iſrael came out of Egypt; like as we ſay, that king Edward I. was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land; for ſo all journies with their accidents commonly take name from the place, either whence or whither they tend. But I think he can find no ſuch phraſe of ſpeech in ſcripture, as limiteth a journey by an accident, or ſaith, by converting the propoſition, when Jordan was turning back, Iſrael came out of Egypt. Indeed moſt improper it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finiſhed long before; namely to ſay, that king Edward, at his arrival out of Palæſtina, did win Scotland, or died at Carliſle. How may we then believe, that enterprize performed ſo many years after the diviſion of the land (which followed the conqueſt at the journey's end) ſhould be ſaid to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it moſt ſtrange, that the moſt notable account of time, ſerving as the only guide for certain ages in ſacred chronology, ſhould not take name and beginning, from that illuſtrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearſed often by God himſelf among the principal of his benefits to Iſrael, whereof the very day and month are recorded in ſcripture (as likewiſe are the year and month wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occaſion changed; but ſhould have reference to the ſurprizing of a town by 600 men, that robb'd a chappel by the way, and ſtole from thence idols to be their guides, as not going to work in God's name? For this accident, whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he ſuppoſeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in ſuch a year, becauſe it beſt ſtood with his interpretation ſo to have it, than for any certainty or likelihoood of the thing itſelf.

Wherefore we may beſt agree with ſuch as affirm, that the apoſtle St. Paul did not herein labour to ſet down the courſe of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpoſe) but only to ſhew that God, who had choſen Iſrael to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by judges and prophets, unto the time of Saul; did raiſe up our Lord Jeſus Chriſt out of the ſeed of David the king, in whoſe ſucceſſion the crown was eſtabliſhed, and promiſe made of a kingdom that ſhould have no end. Now in rehearſing briefly thus much, which tended as a preface to the declaration following (wherein he ſheweth Chriſt to have been the true Meſſias) the apoſtle was ſo far from labouring to make an exact calculation of time (the hiſtory being ſo well known, and believed of the Jews to whom he preached) that he ſpake as it were at large of the 40 years conſumed in the wilderneſs, whereof no man doubted; ſaying, that God ſuffered their manners in the wilderneſs about 40 years. In like manner he proceeded, ſaying, that from the diviſion of the land unto the days of Samuel the prophet, in whoſe time they required to have a king, there paſſed about 450 years. Neither did he ſtand to tell them, that 111 years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339 years of the Judges; for this had been an impertinent digreſſion from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is a work not ſo needful as laborious, to ſearch out of this place, that which the apoſtle did not here intend to teach, when the ſum of 480 years is ſo expreſly and purpoſely ſet down.

Now that the words of St. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy thro' error of ſome ſcribe) are not ſo curiouſly to be examined in matter of chronology, but muſt be taken as having reference to the memory and apprehenſion of the vulgar, it is evident by his aſcribing in the ſame place 40 years to the reign of Saul; whereas it is manifeſt, that thoſe years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were ſpent under the government of the prophet, howſoever they are here included in the reign of the king. As for thoſe, that with ſo much cunning forſake the general opinion, when it favoureth not ſuch expoſition, as they bring out of a good mind, to help where the need is not over great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of St. Paul were ſufficiently juſtified by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common opinion among the ſcribes in thoſe days, that the 111 years of ſervitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339 years aſcribed to the judges; which account the apoſtle would not in this place ſtand to contradict, but rather choſe to ſpeak as the vulgar, qualifying it with a Quaſi, where he ſaith, Quaſi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it to be ſo indeed; and therefore disjoins the members to make the account even. In ſo doing he daſheth himſelf againſt a notable text; whereupon all authors have builded (as well they might and ought) that purpoſely and preciſely doth caſt up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomon's temple, not omitting the very month itſelf.

Now (as commonly the firſt apprehenſions are ſtrongeſt) having already given faith to his own interpretation of St. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find ſome new expoſition for that, which is of itſelf moſt plain, than to examine his own conjecture, upon a place that is full of controverſy. Thus by expounding, after a ſtrange method, that which is manifeſt by that which is obſcure, he loſeth himſelf in thoſe ways, wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one ſhould urge him to give reaſon of theſe new opinions, he muſt needs anſwer, that Othoniel could not govern above 25 years, becauſe then was the taking of Laiſh, at which time there was no king in Iſrael: that the Danites muſt needs have taken Laiſh at that time, becauſe elſe we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the temple, to any action that might be termed the coming of Iſrael out of Egypt, without excluding the years of ſervitude; and that the years of ſervitude muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe he himſelf ſhould have ſpent his time vainly, in ſeeking to pleaſure St. Paul with an expoſition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to uphold a paradox, I leave it to the deciſion of the judicious reader.

And now to proceed in our ſtory. To the time of Jephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the proviſions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon king of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ibzan; from which time, if the war of Troy (as they ſuppoſe) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had ſix years to prepare themſelves; the rule holding not true in this war, Longa præparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a ſpeedy victory; for the Greeks conſumed 10 years in the the attempt; and Troy as it ſeems was entred, ſack'd and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy was taken, which was in the ſixth year of Habdon, Æneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule died, after he had been the father of 40 ſons and 30 grand-children. And whereas it is ſuppoſed, that the 40 years of Iſrael's oppreſſion by the Philiſtines (of which Judg. xiii. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year of Jair, and ended with the laſt of Habdon; I ſee no great reaſon for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cauſe of quarrel againſt Jephta, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philiſtines had held them in ſervitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000 armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppreſs'd; and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought againſt the Philiſtines, with ſo powerful an army, for their own deliverance, than againſt their own brethren the Iſraelites? But Ammon being overthrown, it ſeemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore theſe 40 years muſt either be ſupplied elſewhere, as in the time of Sampſon, and afterwards; or elſe they muſt be referred to the Inter-regnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Iſrael by Sampſon, ſuch as it was.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the war of Troy.

SECT. I.

Of the genealogy of the kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient poets how they have obſerved hiſtorical truth.

THE war at Troy, with other ſtories hereupon depending (becauſe the ruin of this city, by moſt chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, judge of Iſrael, whom in the laſt place I have mentioned) I rather chooſe here to intreat of in one intire narration, beginning with the lineal deſcent of their princes, than to break the ſtory into pieces, by rehearſing a-part in divers years the diverſity of occurrents.

The hiſtory of the ancient kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that kingdom. This is the opinion of Virgil; which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Beroſus, it is the more probable; if Annius borrowed it of him, then it reſts upon the authority of Virgil, who ſaith thus:

[a] Creta Jovis magni medio jacet inſula ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula noſtræ.
Centum urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde pater (ſi rite audita recordor)
Teucrus Rhœteas primum eſt advectus ad oras:
Optavitque locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces
Pergameæ ſteterant; habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiaque æra, Idæumque nemus.

In the main ſea the iſle of Crete doth lie:
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.
There is mount Ida; there in fruitful land
An hundred great and goodly cities ſtand.
Thence (if I follow not miſtaken fame)
Teucer the eldeſt of our grand-ſires came
To the Rhœtean ſhores; and reigned there
Ere yet fair Ilion was built, and ere
The towers of Troy; their dwelling-place they fought In loweſt vales. Hence Cybel's rights were brought:
Hence Corybantian cymbales did remove:
And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it ſeems by Virgil, who followed ſurely good authority, that Teucer firſt gave name to that country, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus; of which Dardanus in the ſame book he ſpeaks thus:

Eſt locus Heſperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere glebæ.
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixiſſe, ducis de nomine, gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ ſedes, hinc Dardanus ortus:
Jaſiuſque pater, genus a quo principe noſtrum.

Heſperia the Grecians call the place;
An ancient fruitful land, a warlike race.
Oenotrians held it, now the latter progeny
Gives it their captain's name, and calls it Italy.
This ſeat belongs to us, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the author of our ſtock, Jaſius.

---

[b] Atque equidem memini (fama eſt obſcurior annis)
Auruncos ita ferre ſenes, his ortus ut agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes,
Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhenâ ab ſede profectum
Aurea nunc ſolio ſtellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Auruncans, I remember well
(Though time have made the fame obſcure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how born in Italy;
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leaving Tuſcaine (where he earſt had place)
With Corytus did ſail to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he ſits on high,
In golden palace of the ſtarry skie.

But contrary to this, and to ſo many authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that theſe names, Troes, Teucri, and Thraces, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the ſon of Japhet; and that the Dardanians, Myſians, and Aſcanians, mix'd with the Trojans, were German nations, deſcended from Aſhkenaz, the ſon of Gomer: of whom the country, lake, and river of Aſcanius in Aſia took name. That Aſhkenaz gave name to thoſe places and people, it is not unlikely; neither is it unlikely that the Aſcanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times paſs into Europe; that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the conjecture is ſomewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnaſſeus makes him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the ſame opinion. Virgil (as is before ſhewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whoſe authority is the more to be regarded, becauſe he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully ſought, and in this did follow; ſeeing it no way concerned Auguſtus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus and others, that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the ſon of Scamander and Ida, lord of the country, not founder of the city; and his daughter or niece Batia, was the ſecond wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks, that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus; and that theſe were parents to Chryſe, firſt wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwiſe, and the common tradition of poets makes Dardanus the ſon of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus king of Hetruria, to whom ſhe bare Jaſius. Annius out of his Beroſus finds the name of Camboblaſcon, to whom he gives the addition of Coritus, as a title of dignity, making him father of Dardanus and Jaſius; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between theſe brethren, which grew to ſuch heat, that finally Dardanus killed his brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obſcurity of the hiſtory gives leave to Annius of ſaying what he liſt. I that love not to uſe ſuch liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the ſon of Jupiter, it muſt have been of ſome elder Jupiter, than the father of thoſe that lived about the war of Troy. So it is likewiſe probable, that Atlas the father of Electra, was rather an Italian than an African, which alſo is the opinion of [a] Boccace. For (as hath often been ſaid) there were many Jupiters, and many of almoſt every name of the gods; but it was the cuſtom to aſcribe to ſome one the acts of the reſt, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my ſelf, with making any narrow ſearch into theſe fabulous antiquities, but ſet down the pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Teucer ſuch parents as Diodorus gives, becauſe others give him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

[a] Æneid. 3.

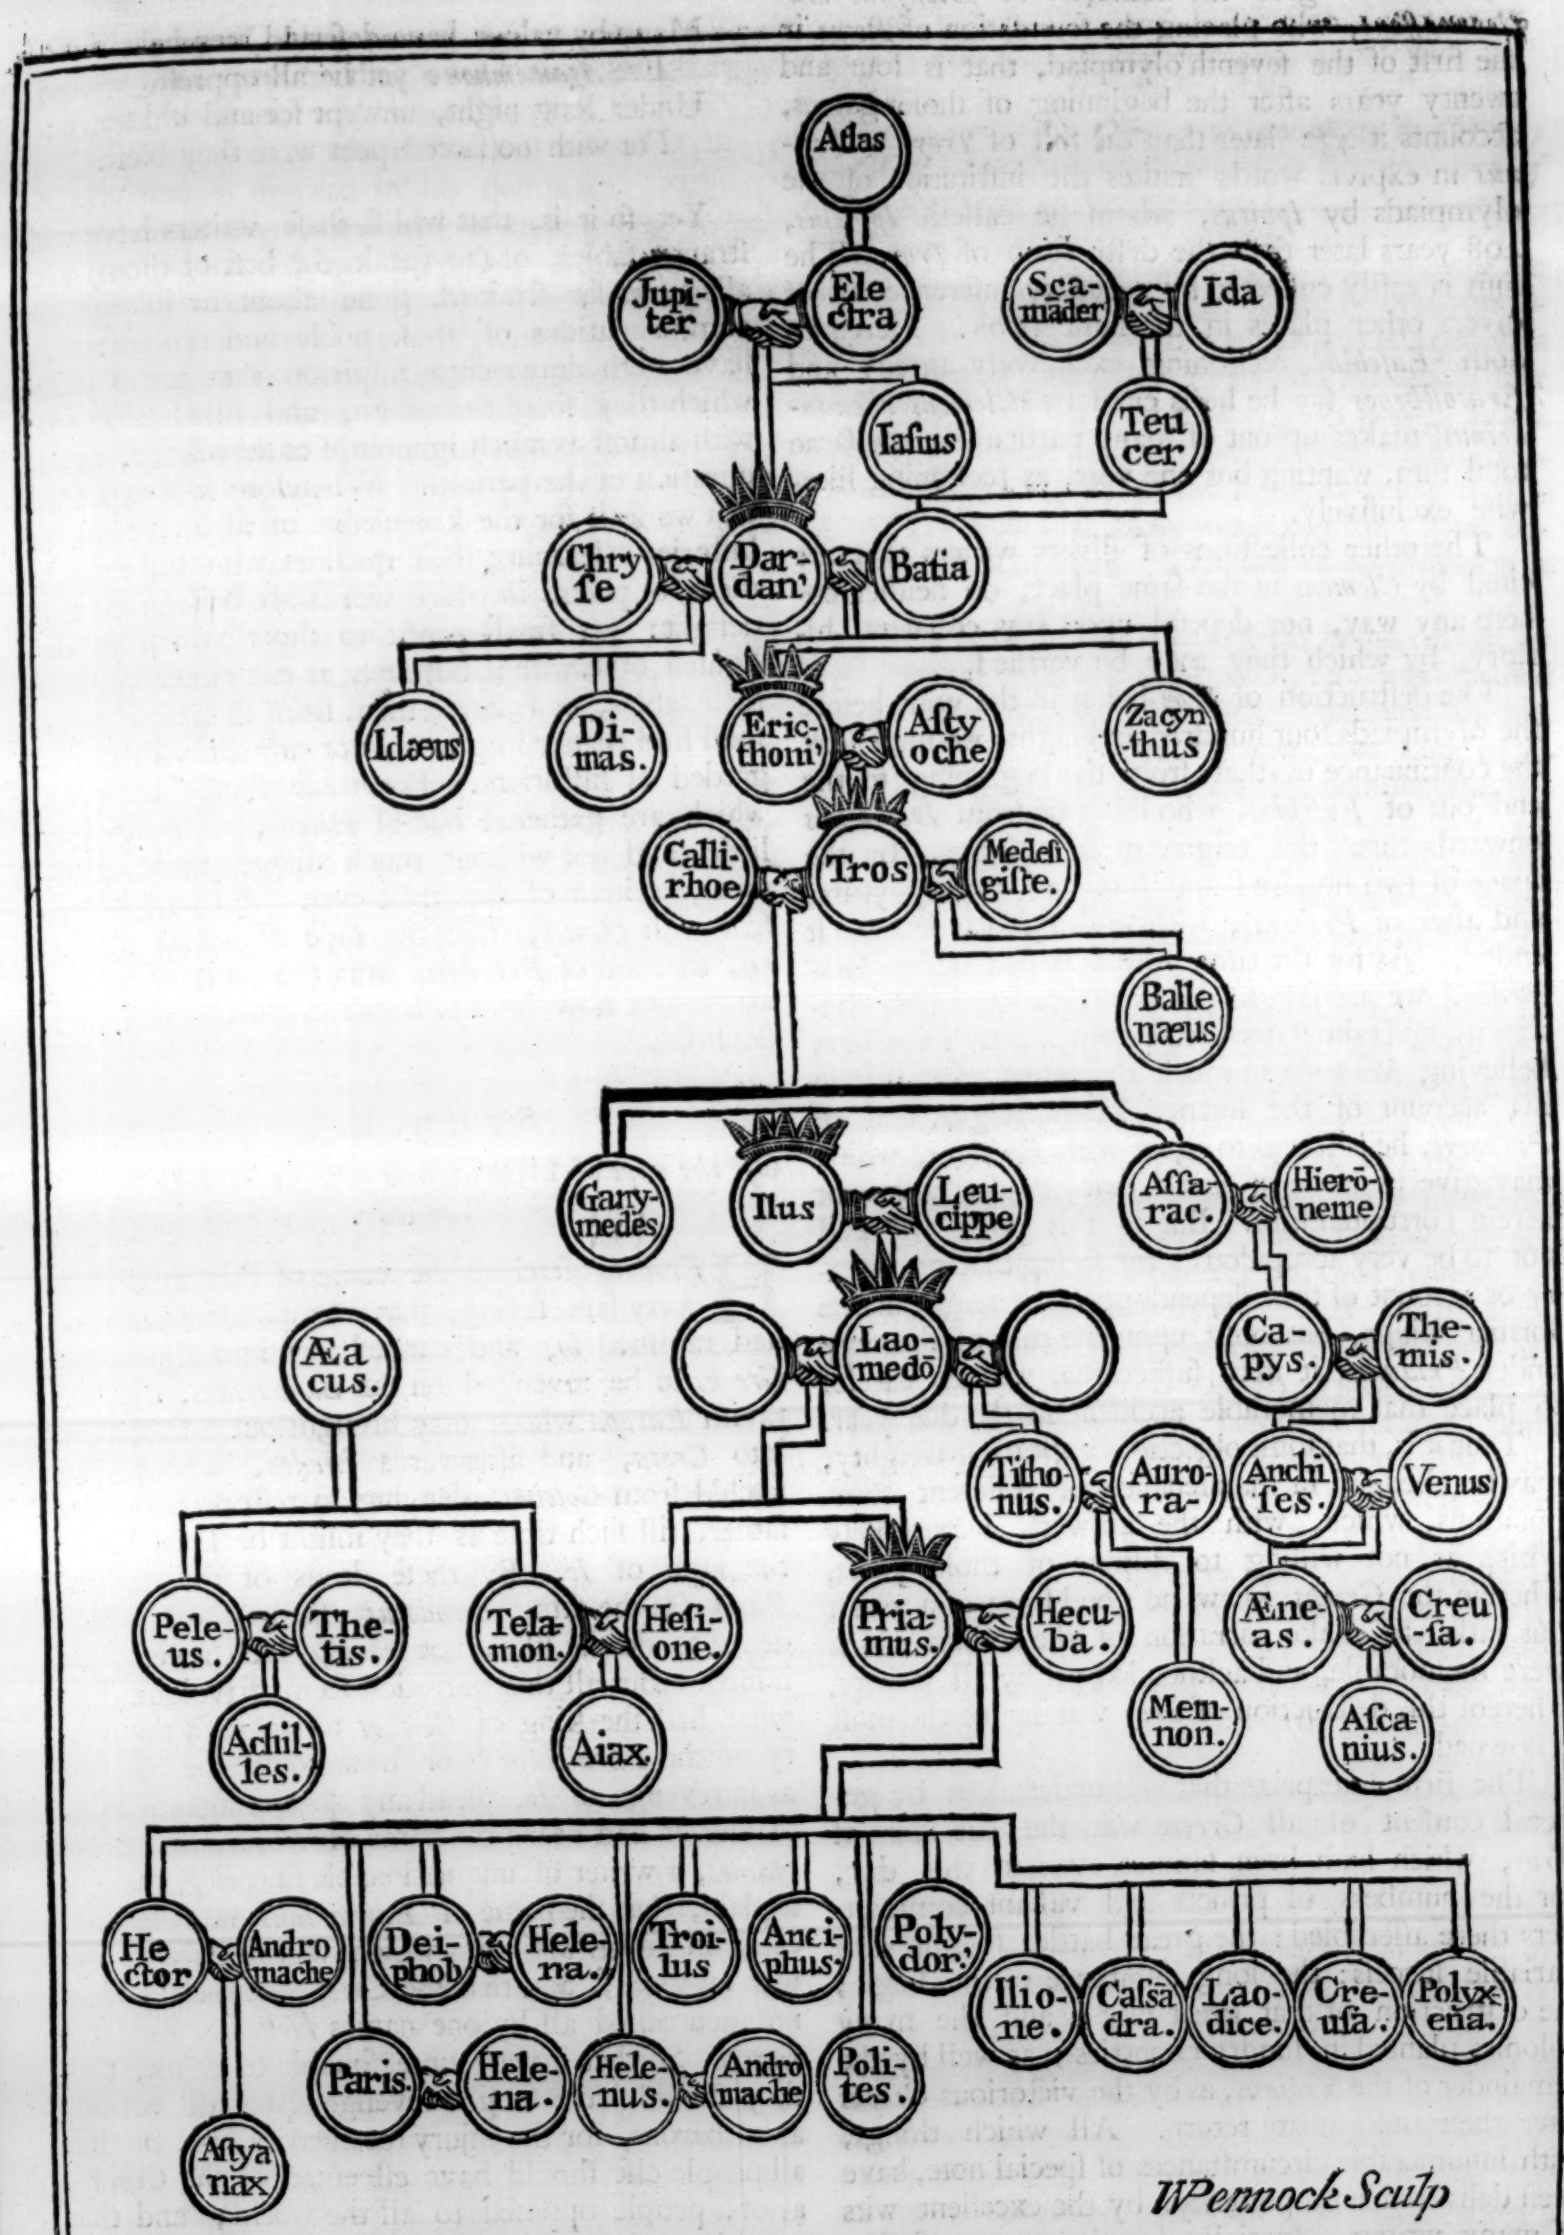
Atlas



Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Trojan kingdom, with the length of every king's reign, I have chosen good authors to be my guides, that in a history, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow uncertainties, ill cohering with the consent of writers, and general passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that city whilst it stood, it is reckoned by [a] Diodorus to be 780 years more ancient than the beginning of the 94th olympiad. Whereas therefore 372 did pass between the beginning of the olympiads, the first year of the 94th, it is is manifest, that the remainder of 780, that is 408 years went between the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authority of [b] Diodorus be good proof, who elsewhere tells us, that the return of the Heraclidæ, which was eighty years after the fall of Troy, was 328 years before the first olympiad.

Here-

Hereunto agrees the authority of [a]Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, who placing the foundation of Rome in the firſt of the ſeventh olympiad, that is four and twenty years after the beginning of thoſe games, accounts it 432 later than the full of Troy. [b]Solinus in expreſs words makes the inſtitution of the olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 408 years later than the deſtruction of Troy. The ſum is eaſily collected by neceſſary inference out of divers other places in the ſame book. Hereunto doth [c]Euſebius, reckoning excluſively agree: and Eratoſthenes (as he he is cited by [d]Clemens Alexandrinus(makes up out of many particulars, the ſame total ſum, wanting but one year, as reckoning likewiſe excluſively.

The other collections of divers writers that are cited by Clemens in the ſame place, do neither cohere any way, nor depend upon any collateral hiſtory, by which they may be verified.

The deſtruction of Troy being in the year before the olympiads four hundred and eight, we muſt ſeek the continuance of that from the beginning to the end out of Euſebius, who leads us from Dardanus onwards thro' the reigns of four kings, by the ſpace of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom alſo at length it ended. As for the time which paſſed under Laomedon, we are fain to do as others have done before us, and take it upon truſt from Annius's authors; believing Manetho ſo much the rather, for that in his account of the former kings reigns, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Euſebius, which may give us leave to think that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very ſcrupulous: for ſeeing that no hiſtory or account of time depends upon the reigns of the former kings, but only upon the ruin of the city under Priamus, it may ſuffice that we are careful to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is, that ſome objections appearing weighty, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which, with the anſwers, I purpoſely omit, as not willing to diſpute of thoſe years, wherein the Greeks knew no good form of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all writers, whereof this deſtruction of Troy was one of the moſt renowned.

The firſt enterprize that was undertaken by general conſent of all Greece was the laſt war of Troy, which hath been famous even to this day, for the numbers of princes and valiant commanders there aſſembled: the great battles fought with variable ſucceſs: the long indurance of the ſiege; the deſtruction of that great city; and the many colonies planted in ſundry countries; as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things, with innumerable circumſtances of ſpecial note, have been delivered unto poſterity, by the excellent wits of many writers, eſpecially by the poems of that great Homer, whoſe verſes have given immortality to the action, which might elſe perhaps have been buried in oblivion, among other worthy deeds done both before and ſince that time. For it is true which Horace ſaith:

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, ſed omnes illachrimabiles
Urgentur, ignotique longa
Nocte: carent quia vate ſacro.

Many by valour have deſerv'd renown
Ere Agamemnon: yet lie all oppreſt
Under long night, unwept for and unknown:
For with no ſacred poet were they bleſt.

Yet ſo it is, that whilſt theſe writers have with ſtrange fables, or (to ſpeak the beſt of them) with allegories far ſtrained, gone about to inlarge the commendations of thoſe noble undertakers: they have both drawn into ſuſpicion that great virtue which they ſought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almoſt as much ignorance of the hiſtory, as admiration of the perſons. Wherefore it is expedient that we ſeek for the knowledge of ſuch actions, in hiſtories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of poets, in whoſe works are both profit and delight: yet ſmall profit to thoſe which are delighted otherwiſe; but ſuch as can either interpret their fables, or ſeparate them from the naked truth, ſhall find matter in poems, not unworthy to be regarded of hiſtorians. For thoſe things excepted, which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much diſagreement of authors, written of this great war. All writers conſent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris, the ſon of Priamus, was the cauſe of taking arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtful.

SECT. II.

Of the rape of Helen: and ſtrength of both ſides for the war.

Herodotus fetcheth the cauſe of this rape from very far: ſaying, that whereas the Phenicians had raviſhed Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks to be revenged on the Barbarians, did firſt raviſh Europa whom they brought out of Phenicia into Creta, and afterwards Medea, whom they fetch'd from Colchos, denying to reſtore her to her father, till ſuch time as they might be ſatisfy'd for the rape of Io. By theſe deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the ſame Herodotus affirms) was imboldened to do the like; not fearing ſuch revenge as inſued. But all this narration ſeems frivolous. For what had the king of Colchos to do with the injury of the Phenicians? or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel againſt him, that never had heard the name of Phenicians? Thucydides, a writer of unqueſtionable ſincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not uſed at all in Homer's time, which was long after the war of Troy; and that the Greeks themſelves were not then called all by one names Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreaſonable to think, that they ſhould have ſought revenge upon all nations as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people elſe ſhould have eſteemed of the Greeks, as of a people oppoſed to all the world; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themſelves. Others with more probability ſay, that the rape of Helen was to procure the re-delivery of Heſione, king Priamus's ſiſter, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true. For Telamon (as it ſeems) was a cruel man, ſeeing his own ſon Teucer durſt not come in his ſight, after the war of Troy, but fled into Cypris, only becauſe his brother (Ajax which Teucer could not remedy) had ſlain himſelf. Yet, were it ſo that Heſione was ill intreated intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would ſeek to take her from her husband, with whom ſhe had lived about thirty years, and to whom ſhe had born children, which were to ſucceed in his dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Heſione: but was meerly incited by Venus, that is, by his luſt, to do that which in thoſe days was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus diſcourſeth, but all people were accuſtomed to ſteal women and cattel, if they could by ſtrong hand or power get them; and having ſtollen them, either to ſell them away in ſome far country, or keep them to their own uſe. So did Theſeus and Pirithous attempt Proſerpina; and ſo did Theſeus (long before Paris) raviſh Helen. And theſe practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were ſo common, that none durſt inhabit near unto the ſea, for fear of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no leſs lawful than merchandiſe: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, conſidering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theſeus had made, cauſed all her wooers, who were moſt of the principal men in Greece, to bind themſelves by ſolemn oath, that if ſhe were taken from her husband, they ſhould with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who choſe Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon: So the cauſe which drew the Greeks unto Troy, in revenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which ſo many princes had made unto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, beſides his great dominions in Peloponneſus, was lord of many iſlands: he was alſo rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he imbarked for Troy in his own ſhips, which were more than any other of the Greek princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or deſirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterpriſe; take arms againſt the Trojans. The Greeks fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200 ſail, or thereabouts: but the veſſels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ſhips with decks; only they uſed (as Thucydides ſaith) ſmall ſhips, meet for robbing on the ſea; the leaſt of which carried fifty men, the greateſt 120, every man (except the captains) being both a mariner and a ſoldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian army conſiſted of 100000 men, or thereabouts. This was the greateſt army that ever was raiſed out of Greece: and the greatneſs of this army, doth well declare the ſtrength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did ſtand out againſt ſuch forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the city not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon ſaid in the 2d of Homer's Iliads; but their followers and aids were very many and ſtrong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Myſia, and the greateſt part of Aſia the leſs, took part with the Trojans, the Amazons alſo brought them ſuccour. And Rheſus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Aſſyria (tho' ſome think out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

SECT. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and embaſſage to Troy; and of Helena's being detained in Egypt; and of the ſacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHerefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to trial of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty, ſent Menelaus and Ulyſſes embaſſadors to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods that were taken with her out of Menelaus's houſe. What anſwer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian prieſts makes it very probable that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The ſum of his diſcourſe is this:

Paris, in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather upon the coaſt of Egypt, was accuſed for the rape of Helen by ſome bondmen of his, that had taken ſanctuary. Proteus, then king of Egypt, finding the accuſation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband ſhould require them: diſmiſſing Paris without further puniſhment, becauſe he was a ſtranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen had anſwer, that ſhe was in Egypt: they thought themſelves deluded, and thereupon made the war, which ended in the ruin of Troy. But when after the city taken, they perceived indeed ſhe had not been there, they returned home, ſending Menelaus to ask his wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole nation of poets (except Euripides) vary from this hiſtory, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more graceful to their poems, for their retaining of a fair lady, than that they endured all by force, becauſe it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odyſſes, Homer ſpeaks of Menelaus's being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not eaſily believed, that he made for pleaſure: and if he were driven thither by contrary winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul weather. For Paris, immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking ſuch winds as he could get, and rather enduring any ſtorm, than to commit himſelf to any haven in the Greek ſeas; whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until ſuch time as the wind had come about, and ſerved for his navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the ſaying of the Egytian prieſts, which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madneſs for Priamus to ſee ſo many miſeries befal him during the war, and ſo many of his ſons ſlain for the pleaſure of one, who neither was heir to the kingdom (for Hector was elder) nor equal in virtue to many of the reſt. Beſides, it may ſeem that Lucian ſpake not more pleaſantly than truly, when he ſaid that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almoſt as old as queen Hecuba, conſidering that ſhe had been raviſhed by Theſeus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and conſidering further, that ſhe was ſiſter to Caſtor and Pollux (ſhe and Pollux being ſaid by ſome to have been twins) who ſailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company before the time that Heſione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principal commander in the Trojan war. But whether it were ſo, that the Trojans could not, or would not, reſtore Helen, ſo it was that the embaſſadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not ſome that adviſed to have them ſlain. The Greeks hereupon hereupon incenſed, made all haſte towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom ſome ſay to have been a runagate Trojan, tho' no ſuch thing be found in Homer) filled the captains and all the hoſt with many troubleſome anſwers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnon's daughter ſacrificed to appeaſe Diana, whoſe anger he ſaid withſtood their paſſage. Whether the young lady was ſacrificed, or whether (as ſome write) the goddeſs was contented with a hind, it is not needful here to be diſputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the devil which awaits for all opportunities, is never more importunate than where mens ignorance is moſt. Calchas alſo told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impoſſible till ſome fatal impediments were removed: and that till ten years were paſs'd, the town ſhould hold out againſt them. All which notwithſtanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterpriſe, under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus, Achilles the moſt valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his tutor Phœnix; Ajax and Teucer the ſons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Neſtor, and his ſons Antilochus, and Thraſymedes; Ulyſſes; Mneſtheus, the ſon of Petreus, captain of the Athenians; Diomedes the ſon of Tydeus, a man of ſingular courage; the wiſe and learned Palamedes; Aſcalaphus, and Ialmenus, the ſons of Mars, who had ſailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes alſo, the ſon of Pæan, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Calchas ſaid that the city could not be taken; Ajax the ſon of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tiſandrus, Eurypilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus, the ſon of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machaon, the ſons of Eſculapius: Epeus, who is ſaid to have made the wooden horſe, by which the town was taken; and Proteſilaus, who firſt leap'd on ſhore, neglecting the oracle that threatned death to him that landed firſt.

SECT. IV.

Of the acts of the Grecians at the ſiege.

THESE and many other of leſs note, arriving at Troy, found ſuch ſharp entertainment, as might eaſily perſuade them to think that the war would be more than one year's work. For in the firſt encounter they loſt Proteſilaus, whom Hector ſlew, and many others, without any great harm done to the Trojans; ſave only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incamp themſelves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reaſon of their multitude, and the ſmallneſs of their veſſels, wherein they could not carry neceſſaries for ſuch an army. Hereupon they were compelled to ſend ſome part of their men, to labour the ground in Cheroneſſe: others to rob upon the ſea for the relief of the camp. Thus was the war protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any ſkirmiſhes were, yet could the town receive little loſs by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field againſt ſuch Greeks as continued the ſiege, and a more ſafe retreat, if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid ſaith, that from the firſt year till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commends as very credible the report of Herodotus: That the Greeks did not lie before Troy the firſt nine years; but only did beat up and down the ſeas, exerciſing their men, and inriching themſelves, and ſo by waſting the enemy's country, did block up the town, unto which they returned not until the fatal time drew near, when t ſhould be ſubverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which Priamus made, when the Greek princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them, and therefore ſitting upon an high tower (as Homer, Iliad. 3. tells) he learned their names of Helen: which tho' it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been ſuppoſed that he ſhould be ignorant of them, if they had ſhewed themſelves before the town ſo many years together. Between theſe relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one ſaying that a few of the Greeks remained in the camp before Troy, whilſt the reſt made purveyance by land and ſea: the other, that the whole army did ſpend the time in waſting the ſea-coaſts. Neither do the poets greatly diſagree from theſe authors: for they make report of many towns and iſlands waſted, and the people carried into captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the army could not well, nor would have ſpared, if any ſervice of importance had been to be performed before the city. Howſoever it was, this is agreed by general conſent, that in the beginning of that ſummer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the camp, and a great peſtilence aroſe among the Greeks: which Homer ſaith, that Apollo ſent in revenge of his prieſt's daughter, whom Agamemnon had refuſed to let go for any ranſom: but Heraclides, interpreting the place, ſaith, that by Apollo was meant the the ſun: who raiſed peſtilent fogs, by which the army was infected, being lodged in a mooriſh piece of ground. And it might well be that the camp was over-peſtered with thoſe who had been abroad, and now were lodged all cloſe together: having alſo grounded their ſhips within the fortifications.

About the ſame time much contention aroſe between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as general, having firſt choſen for his part, a captive woman, and Achilles, in the ſecond place, choſen for himſelf another, then Ajax, Ulyſſes, and ſo the reſt of the chief captains in order. When the ſoothſayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnon's woman ſhould be reſtored to her father, Apollo's prieſt, that ſo the peſtilence might ceaſe, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and ſay, that he alone would not loſe his part of the ſpoil, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulyſſes. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to ſuffer all patiently, as not able to hold his concubine by ſtrong hand, nor to revenge her loſs, otherwiſe than by refuſing to fight, or to ſend forth his companies. But the Greeks, incouraged by their captains, preſented themſelves before the city without him and his troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great ſuccours, all the neighbour countries having ſent them aid: partly drawn to that war by their commanders, who aſſiſted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the war began (as appears by his words in Homer) or for love of himſelf and his ſons, or hope of marriage with ſome of his many and fair daughters; partly alſo (as we may well gueſs) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks, when they waſted the countries adjoining unto Troy: ſo that when Hector iſſued out of the town, he was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or quality of their leaders. The principal captains in the Trojan army, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other ſons of Priamus:

Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his ſons Polydamus, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Aſius, and the ſons of Panthus, beſides Rheſus, who was ſlain the firſt night of his arrival, Memnon, queen Pentheſilea, and others who came towards the end of the war. Between theſe and the Greeks were many battles fought: the greateſt of which were, that at the tomb of king Ilus upon the plain; and another at the very trenches of the camp, wherein Hector brake thro' the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ſhips; at which time Ajax, the ſon of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the only men of note, that remaining unwounded, made head againſt Hector when the ſtate of the Greeks was almoſt deſperate.

Another battle (for ſo antiquity calls it) or rather the ſame renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles's troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a freſh ſupply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulyſſes, and the reſt of the princes, tho' ſore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loſt, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the camp; the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of thoſe wars, having ſlain a man, to ſtrip him and hale away his body, not reſtoring it without ranſom, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, ſlightly armed, and commonly followed the ſucceſs of their captains; who rode not upon horſes, but in chariots, drawn by two or three horſes, which were guided by ſome truſty followers of theirs, which drave up and down the field, as they were directed by the captains, who by the ſwiftneſs of their horſes preſenting themſelves where need required, threw firſt their javelins, and then alighting fought on foot, with ſwords and battle-axes, retiring into the ranks of the footmen, or elſe returning to their chariots when they found cauſe, and ſo began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were loſt or broken. Their arms defenſive were helmets, breaſt-plates, boots of braſs or other metal, and ſhields commonly of leather, plated over. The offenſive were ſwords and battle-axes at hand; and ſtones, arrows or darts when they fought at any diſtance. The uſe of their chariots (beſides the ſwiftneſs) was to keep them from wearineſs, whereto the leaders were much ſubject, becauſe of their armour, which the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt wore heavieſt: alſo that from them they might throw their javelins downwards with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewiſe of armours they had little change or none; every man (ſpeaking of the chief) carried his own compleat, of which if any piece were loſt or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from ſome captain whom he had ſlain and ſtripped: or elſe to borrow of them that had by ſuch means gotten ſome to ſpare. Whereas therefore Achilles had loſt his armour which Hector (as is ſaid before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very deſirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himſelf unto Achilles, not only reſtoring his concubine Briſeis, but giving him very great gifts, and excuſing former matters as well as he might. In the next battle Achilles did ſo behave himſelf, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worſt, but alſo ſlew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be believed) he chaced three times about the walls of Troy. But great queſtion may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would ſtay alone without the city (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he muſt have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans perceiving Hector in ſuch an extremity, would have forborn to open ſome of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means ſoever) ſlain the noble Hector, did not only carry away his dead body, as the cuſtom then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thruſting leathern thongs into them, tied him to his chariot, and dragg'd him ſhamefully about the field, ſelling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranſom. But his cruelty and covetouſneſs were not long unrevenged; for he was ſhortly after ſlain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer ſays, in the Scæan gate, or as others in the temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having ſlain ſo many of her brethren, and his body was ranſomed (as Lycophron ſaith) at the ſelf-ſame rate that Hector's was by him ſold for. Not long after this, Pentheſilea queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who, after ſome proof given of her valour, was ſlain by Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles.

SECT. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden horſe, the book of Dares and Dictys, the colonies of the relicks of Troy.

FInally, after the death of many worthy perſons, on each ſide, the city was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treaſon of Æneas and Antenor; or by a wooden horſe as the poets, and common fame (which followed the poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write, that upon one of the gates of Troy called Scæa, was the image of a horſe, and that the Greeks entring by that gate, gave occaſion to the report, that the city was taken by an artificial horſe. It may well be, that with ſome wooden engine which they called an horſe, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times uſed to do with the ram: or ſcaled the walls upon the ſudden, and ſo took the city. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horſe, it had been a deſperate adventure, and ſerving to no purpoſe. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and ſlain all thoſe princes of Greece, that were incloſed in it (which alſo by ſuch as maintain this report they are ſaid to have thought upon) or they might have left it a few days without (for it was unlikely that they ſhould the very firſt day both conclude upon the bringing it into the town, and break down their walls upon the ſudden to do it) by which means they who were ſhut into it, muſt have periſhed for hunger, if they had not by iſſuing forth unſeaſonably diſcovered the invention. Whereas further it is ſaid, that this horſe was ſo high and great, that it could not be brought into the town thro' any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their wall, to make way for it, thro' which breach the Greek did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifeſt, that the incloſing of ſo many principal men was altogether together needleſs, conſidering that without their help there was way ſufficient for the army, ſo that the ſurprizing of any gate by them was now to no purpoſe.

John Baptiſta Gramay, in his hiſtory of Aſia, diſcourſing of this war, ſaith, that the Greeks did both batter the wall with a wooden engine, and were alſo let into the city by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townſmen ſleeping and drinking without fear or care, becauſe the fleet of the Grecians had hoiſted ſail, and was gone the day before to the iſle of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into ſecurity. That the city was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dictys muſt prove, which whether we now have the ſame that were by them written, it may be ſuſpected; for ſurely they, who have made mention of theſe writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in moſt points to theſe two authors, without once taking notice of the oppoſition, which they, having ſerved in that war, made againſt the common report: had it not been that either thoſe books were even in thoſe times thought frivolous; or elſe contained no ſuch repugnancy to the other authors as now is found in them.

Alſo concerning the number of men ſlain in this war which Dares and Dictys ſay to have been above 600000 on the Trojan ſide, and more than 800000 of the Greeks, it is a report merely fabulous; foraſmuch as the whole fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their army and deeds as much as he could, to be ſomewhat leſs than 1200 ſail, and the army therein tranſported over the Greek ſeas, not much above 100000 men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common faſhion of men to extol the deeds of their ancients: for which cauſe both Homer magnified the captains of the Greeks, that ſerved in the war; and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their city, from which the Romans deſcended. Yea, the Athenians long after, in the war which Xerxes the Perſian king made againſt all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mneſteus the ſon of Peteus had ſhewed, in marſhalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much conſequence, they were ſo proud, that they refuſed to yield unto Gelon, king of almoſt all Sicily, the admiralty of their ſeas, notwithſtanding that he promiſed to bring 200 good fighting ſhips, and 30000 men for their defence.

The like vanity poſſeſſed many other cities of Greece, and many nations in theſe parts of the world, which have ſtriven to bring their deſcent from ſome of the princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in ſuch their pedigree notwithſtanding. But thoſe nations which indeed, or in moſt probability came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that country by Æneas: the Venetians firſt ſeated in Padua, and the country adjoining by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the ſon of king Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth that the poſterity of Hector did reſemble ſuch of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

SECT. VI.

Of the diſtreſſes and diſperſions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

CONcerning the Greeks, they taſted as much miſery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reaſon of their long abode the the ſiege, they found many alterations when they returned: ſo that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient ſeats: many were expelled their countries by faction: ſome were ſlain anon after their arrival: others were debarred from the ſoveraignty among their people, by ſuch as had ſtaid at home. The cauſe of all which may ſeem to have been the diſperſion of the army which weakned much by the calamities of that long war, was of little force to repel injuries, being divided into ſo many pieces under ſeveral commanders, not very well agreeing. For (beſides other quarrels ariſing upon the diviſion of the booty, and the like occaſions) at the time when they ſhould have ſet ſail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being deſirous to depart immediately, the other to ſtay and perform ſome ſacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the reſt of them ſailing to the iſle of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themſelves, but ſome returned back to Agamemnon; others were diſperſed, each holding his own courſe. But the whole fleet was ſore vexed with tempeſts: for Pallas (as Homer ſaith) would not be perſuaded in haſte.

They who returned ſafe were Neſtor, and Pyrrhus, whom Oreſtes afterwards ſlew: alſo Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheleſs, as Virgil tells, were driven ſoon after to ſeek new ſeats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewiſe returned home, but was forthwith ſlain by his wife, and by the adulterer Ægyſthus, who for a while after uſurped his kingdom. Menelaus wandring long upon the ſeas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather ſeem) to fetch her. Ulyſſes, after ten years, having loſt all his company, got home in poor eſtate, with much ado recovering the maſterſhip of his own houſe. All the reſt either periſhed by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to ſeek out new habitations.

Ajax, the ſon of Oileus, was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to king Daunus, who was lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; ſome of the Locrians were driven into Africk, others into Italy, all the eaſt part whereof was called Magna Grecia, by reaſon of ſo many towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that coaſt. Finally it appears in Homer, that the Grecian ladies, whoſe husbands had been at the war of Troy, were wont to call it, the place where the Greeks ſuffered miſery, and the unlucky city not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and thoſe that warred there: the overthrow of which city, as hath been ſaid, happened in the time of Habdon judge of Iſrael, whom Samſon after a vacancy or Inter-regnum for certain years ſucceeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samſon, Eli and Samuel.

SECT. I.

Of SAMSON.

THE birth and acts of Samſon are written at large in the 13, 14, 15, and 16th of Judges; and therefore I ſhall not need to make a repetition thereof. But theſe things I gather out of that ſtory. Firſt, That the angel of God forbad the wife of Manoah the mother of Samſon, to drink wine or ſtrong drink, or to eat any unclean meat, after ſhe was conceived with child, becauſe becauſe thoſe ſtrong liquors hinder the ſtrength, and as it were wither and ſhrink the child in the mother's womb. Tho' this were even the counſel of God himſelf, and delivered by his angel, yet it ſeemeth that many women of this age have not read, or at leaſt will not believe this precept; the moſt part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how ſtrong or unclean ſoever, filling themſelves with all ſorts of wines, and with artificial drinks far more forcible: by reaſon whereof, ſo many wretched feeble bodies are born into the world, and the races of the able and ſtrong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, It is to be noted, that the angel of God refuſed the ſacrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to preſent it unto the Lord: and therefore thoſe that profeſs divination by the help of angels, to whom alſo they ſacrifice, may aſſuredly know that they are devils who accept thereof, and not good angels, who receive no worſhip that is proper to God.

Thirdly, This Samſon was twice betrayed by his wives, to wit, by their importunity and deceitful tears: by the firſt he loſt but a part of his goods: by the ſecond his life. Quem nulla vis ſuperare potuit, voluptas evertit; Whom no force could overmaſter, voluptuouſneſs overturned.

Fourthly, We may note, that he did not in all deliver Iſrael from the oppreſſion of the Philiſtines; tho' in ſome ſort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithſtanding that he had ſlain 30 of them in his firſt attempt, burnt their corn in harveſt time, and given them a great overthrow inſtantly upon it: yet ſo much did Iſrael fear the Philiſtines, as they aſſembled 3000 men out of Judah to beſiege Samſon in the rock or mountain of Etam, uſing theſe words: Knoweſt thou not that the Philiſtines are rulers over us? After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philiſtines, for fear of their revenge; tho' he was no ſooner looſened, but he gave them another overthrow, and ſlew 1000 with the jaw-bone of an aſs.

Laſtly, Being made blind, and a priſoner by the treaſon of his wife, he was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the houſe at the feaſt whereto they ſent for Samſon, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly ſaid of Seneca; Patientia ſæpe læſa vertitur in furorem; Patience often wounded is converted into fury: neither is it at any time ſo much wounded by pain and loſs, as by deriſion and contumely.

SECT. II.

Of Eli, and of the ark taken, and of Dagon's fall, and the ſending back of the ark.

THE ſtory of Eli the prieſt, who ſucceeded Samſon, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the deſtruction of his houſe, for the wickedneſs of his ſons, which he ſuppreſſed not, neither did he puniſh them according to their deſerts: [a] whoſe ſins were horrible, both in abuſing the ſacrifice, and profaning and polluting the holy places: tho' Levi Ben Gerſon, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the ſons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleaſed God to caſt the Iſrelites under the ſwords of the Philiſtines; of whom there periſhed in the firſt encounter 4000, and in the ſecond battle 30000 footmen; among whom the ſons of Eli being ſlain, their father (hearing the lamentable ſucceſs) by falling from his chair, brake his neck. He was the firſt that obtained the high-prieſthood of the ſtock of Ithamar the ſon of Aaron, before whoſe time it continued ſucceſſively in the race of Eleazer the eldeſt brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the firſt, Eleazer the ſecond, Phinees the ſon of Eleazar the third, Abiſue the ſon of Phinees the fourth, his ſon Bocci the fifth, Ozi the ſon of Bocci the ſixth, and then Eli, as Joſephus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the prieſthood continued after Eli to the time of Solomon who caſt out [b] Abiathar, and eſtabliſhed Zadok and Ahimaaz and their ſucceſſors. The ark of God which Iſrael brought into the field, was in this battle taken by the Philiſtines. For as David witneſſeth, Pſal. lxxviii. God greatly abhored Iſrael, ſo that he forſook the habitation of Shilo; even the tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

Now as it pleaſed God at this time, that the ark whereby himſelf was repreſented, ſhould fall into the hands of the heathen, for the offences of the prieſts and people: ſo did he permit the Chaldeans to deſtroy the temple built by Solomon; the Romans to overthrow the ſecond temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Chriſtian churches in Aſia and Europe. And had not the Iſraelites put more confidence in the ſacrament, or repreſentation, which was the ark, than in God himſelf, they would have obſerved his laws, and ſerved him only: which whenſoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivity they had no ark at all, nor in the times of the Maccabees; and yet for their piety it pleaſed God to make that family as victorious, as any that guarded themſelves by the ſign inſtead of the ſubſtance. And that the ark was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an enſign, David witneſſed when he fled from Abſalom. For when the prieſts would have carried the ark with him; he forbad it, and cauſed it to be returned into the city, uſing theſe words. [d] If I ſhall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him do to me as ſeemeth good in his eyes.

The Trojans believed, that while their Palladium, or the image of Minerva, was kept in Troy, the city ſhould never be overturned: ſo did the Chriſtians in the laſt fatal battle againſt Saladine, carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very croſs whereon Chriſt died, and yet they loſt the battle, their bodies and the wood. But Chryſoſtom upon St. Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgment, ſpeaking of thoſe that wore a part of St. John's goſpel about their necks, for an amulet or preſervative. Si tibi ea non proſunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in collo? If thoſe words do not profit men in their ears (to wit, the hearing of the goſpel preached) how ſhould it profit them by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the ark, nor the wood of the croſs, but the reverence of the father, that gave the one for a memory of his covenant: and the faith in his ſon, which ſhed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philiſtines returning with the greateſt victory and glory which ever they obtained, carried the ark of God with them to Azotus, and ſet it up in the houſe of Dagon their idol: but that night the idol fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the ark. The morning following they took it up, and ſet it again in his place, and it fell the ſecond time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the arms, ſhewing that it had nor power nor underſtanding in the preſence of God; for the head fell off, which is the ſeat of reaſon and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute ſtrength) were ſundred from the arms. For God and the devil inhabit not in one houſe, nor in one heart. And if this idol could not endure the repreſentation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at ſuch time as it pleaſed him to cover his only begotten with fleſh, and ſent him into the world, that all the oracles wherein the devil derided and betrayed mortal men, loſt power, ſpeech, and operation at the inſtant. For when that true light, which had never beginning of brightneſs, brake thro' the clouds of a virgin's body, ſhining upon the earth, which had been long obſcured by idolatry, all thoſe foul and ſtinking vapours vaniſhed. Plutarch rehearſeth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he ſtileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cauſe) he ſearcheth his brains for many reaſons of ſo great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not only this old devil did then die as he ſuppoſed, but all the reſt, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became ſpeechleſs.

Now while the Philiſtines triumphed after this victory, God ſtruck them with the grievous diſeaſe of the Hemorrhoides of which they periſhed in great numbers: for it is written the Lord deſtroyed them. It was therefore by general conſent ordered, that the ark ſhould be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth, another of the five great cities of the Philiſtines; to prove, as it ſeemeth, whether this diſeaſe were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath, and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortal. [a] For the hand of the Lord was againſt the city with a very great deſtruction, and he ſmote the men of the city both ſmall and great, &c. And being not yet ſatisfied, they of Gath ſent the ark to Ekron or Accaron, a third city of the Philiſtines: but they alſo felt the ſame ſmart, and cried out that themſelves and their people ſhould be ſlain thereby; For there was a deſtruction and death throughout all the city. In the end, by the advice of their prieſts, the princes of the Philiſtines did not only reſolve to return the ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Iſrael, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his ſervice by ſtrong hand. Wherefore confeſſing the power of the God of Iſrael to be almighty, and that their own idols were ſubject thereunto, they agreed to offer a ſin-offering, uſing theſe words; So ye ſhall give glory to the God of Iſrael, that he may take hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land, 1 Sam. vi. 5. And what can be a more excellent witneſſing, than where an enemy doth approve our cauſe? according to Ariſtotle; Pulchrum eſt teſtimonium, quo noſtra probantur ab hoſtibus. So did Pharaoh confeſs the living God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonoſor, and Darius, when they had ſeen his miracles by Daniel.

This counſel therefore of the prieſts being imbraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden mice prepared, they cauſed two milch kine to be choſen, ſuch as had not been yoked, and a new cart or carriage to be framed: but they durſt not drive or direct it to any place certain, thereby to make trial whether it were indeed the hand of God that had ſtricken them. For if the ark of God were carried towards Bethſhemeſh, and into the territory of Iſrael: then they ſhould reſolve that from God only came their late deſtruction. For the Philiſtines knew that the milch kine which drew the ark could not be forced from their calves, but that they would have followed them whereſoever; much leſs when they were left to themſelves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkeſt night in the world, if calves be removed from their dams, the kine will follow them thro' woods and deſarts by the foot, till they find them. But the kine travelled directly towards Bethſhemeſh; and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Joſhua of the ſame city, they ſtood ſtill there; which when the princes of the Philiſtines perceived, they returned to Ekron: after which, God ſpared not his own people the Bethſhemites, in that they preſumed to look into the ark. And becauſe they knew God and his commandments, and had been taught accordingly, he ſtruck them more grievouſly than he did the heathen, for there periſhed of them fifty thouſand and ſeventy. From hence the ark was carried to Kirjath-jearim, and placed in the houſe of Abinadab; where it is written, that it remained twenty years in the charge of Eleazar his ſon, until David brought it to Jeruſalem.

Now whereas it is ſaid, that in the mean while the [b] ark was in Nob, Miſpah, and Galgala, it was the tabernacle, which was at this time ſevered from the ark: or at leaſt, it was for the [c] preſent occaſion brought to theſe places, and anon returned to Kirjath-jearim.

SECT. III.

Of Samuel, and of his government.

THESE tragedies overpaſt and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a child, became now judge and governour of Iſrael. He was deſcended of the family of [d] Chore or Korach. For Levi had three ſons; Gerſon, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Izaar: of Amram came Moſes and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the family of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Levite, was called an Ephratean, not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but becauſe he was of mount [e] Ephraim, like as Jeſſe, David's father was called an Ephratean, becauſe born at Ephrata, or Bethlehem. Hannah his mother being long fruitleſs, obtained him of God by prayers and tears: it being an exceeding ſhame to the Jewiſh women to be called barren, in reſpect of the bleſſing of God both to Abraham, that his ſeed ſhould multiply as the ſtars of heaven, and the ſands of the ſea, as in the beginning to Adam, Increaſe and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomy vii. There ſhall be neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no ſooner born, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his ſervice, to which ſhe delivered him even from the dug. For as the firſt-born of all

all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were 5 years old for 5 ſheckles, between 5 years and 20 for 20 ſheckles: ſo was it not required by the law that any of the race of the Levites ſhould be called to ſerve about the tabernacle, till they were 25 years old.

St. Peter reckons in the Acts the prophets from Samuel, who was the firſt of the writers of holy ſcriptures, to whom uſually this name of a prophet was given, and yet did Moſes account himſelf ſuch a one, as in Deuteronomy xviii. 15. The Lord thy God will raiſe up unto thee a prophet like unto me, &c. But he is diſtinguiſhed from thoſe that preceded him, who were called ſeers; as 1 Sam. ix. Before time in Iſrael, when a man went to ſeek an anſwer of God, thus he ſpake; come and let us go to the ſeer: for he that is now called a prophet, was in old time called a ſeer. And altho' it pleaſed God to appear by his angels to Moſes, as before to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob: yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifeſt viſion; not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Iſrael: but as the Chaldean paraphraſt hath it, thoſe revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obſcure. The places wherein [a] Samuel judged were Maſpha or Mitſpa, ſeated on a hill in Benjamin near Juda: alſo Gilgal, and Bethel, of which we have ſpoken elſewhere.

The Philiſtines taking knowledge of the aſſembly and preparation for war at Miſpa in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their army and marched towards the city: at whoſe approach the Iſraelites ſtrucken with fear, and with the memory of their former ſlaughters and ſervitude, beſought Samuel to pray to God for them: who was [b] then performing his ſacrifice when the Philiſtines were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by thoſe of Moſes, when Iſrael fought againſt the Amalekites at their firſt entrance into Arabia) it pleaſed him with thunder and tempeſt to diſperſe and beat down the army of the Philiſtines, according to the prophecy of Hanna, Samuel's mother. [c] The Lord's adverſaries ſhall be deſtröyed, and out of heaven ſhall he thunder upon them, &c. Joſephus affirms, that a part of the Philiſtines were ſwallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himſelf led the Iſraelites in the proſecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a monument in memory of this happy ſucceſs obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Joſephus called lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the ſtone of aſſiſtance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the victory, the Iſraelites recovered divers cities of their own formerly loſt, and held long in poſſeſſion of the Philiſtines, who for a long time after did not offer any invaſion or revenge. And the better to attend their purpoſes, and to withſtand any of their attempts, the Iſraelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the north of them, that they might not be aſſaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philiſtines towards the weſt and ſea-coaſt, the Canaanite towards the north and eaſt, and the Idumite on the ſouth. The eſtate being thus ſettled, Samuel for the eaſe of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath been elſewhere ſaid.

CHAP. XVI.

Of SAUL.

SECT. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a kingdom.

BUT when age now began to overtake Samuel, and that he was not able to undergo the burthen of ſo careful a government, he put off from himſelf the weight of the affairs on his ſons, Joel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beerſheba, a city, the very utmoſt towards the ſouth of Judea. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, ſo were themſelves no leſs removed from the juſtice and virtue of their father. For the thirſt of covetouſneſs the more it ſwalloweth, the more it drieth, and deſireth, finding taſte in nothing but gain; to recover which they ſet the law at a price, and ſold juſtice and judgment to the beſt chapmen. Which when the elders of Iſrael obſerved, and ſaw that Samuel as a natural man (tho' a prophet) could not ſo well diſcern the errors of his own, they pray'd him to conſent to their change of government, and to make them a king, by whom they might be judged as other nations were; who might alſo lead them to the war, and defend them againſt their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable ſucceſs which followed the rule of Eli his ſons, when thoſe of Samuel by their firſt bloſſoms promiſed to yield fruit no leſs bitter, they ſaw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they ſo much reverenced, but by the choice of a king.

In a cauſe of ſo great conſequence and alteration, Samuel fought counſel from God: which ſurely he did not for the eſtabliſhing of his own ſons; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the text, this ſpeech or motion diſpleaſing him, he uſed his beſt arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from God's revelation, the inconveniencies and miſeries which ſhould befal them. And yet all which he foreſhew'd was not intolerable, but ſuch as hath been borne, and is ſo ſtill by free conſent of the ſubjects towards their princes. For firſt he makes them know that the king will uſe their ſons in his own ſervice to make them his horſe-men, charioteers, and footmen; which is not only not grievous, but by the vaſſals of all kings according to their birth and condition deſired: it being very agreeable to ſubjects of the beſt quality to command for the king in his wars; and to till the ground no leſs proper and appertaining to thoſe that are thereto bred and brought up: ſo are likewiſe the offices of women-ſervants to dreſs meat, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned: He will take up your fields, and your vineyards, and your beſt olive trees, and give them to his ſervants, with other oppreſſions; this hath given, and gives daily occaſion to ſuch as would be ruled by their own diſcretion, to affirm that Samuel deſcribeth here unto them the power of a king, governed by his own affections, and not a king that feareth God. But others upon further examination conſtrue this text far otherwiſe, as teaching us what ſubjects ought with patience to bear at their ſoveraign's hand. The former opinion is grounded firſt upon that place of Deuteronomy xvii. where God foreſheweth this change of government from judges to kings, and after he had forbidden many things unto the kings, as many wives, covetouſneſs, and the like, he commandeth that the kings, which were to reign over Iſrael, ſhould write the law of Deuteronomy, or cauſe it to be written: and to ſhew how greatly the king ſhould honour the law, he addeth, It ſhall be with him, and he ſhall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this law and theſe ordinances for to do them: that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he and his ſons. But to take away any other man's field, ſay they, is contrary to the laws of God, in the ſame book written. For it is ſaid, Deut. vi. That which is juſt and right ſhalt thou follow, that thou mayſt live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away [a] grapes more than thou canſt eat out of another man's vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much leſs lawful to take the vineyard it ſelf from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the text [b] (ſay they) ſuch as do warrant the kings of Iſrael, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vaſſals. For it is not ſaid that it ſhall be lawful for the king, or the king may do this or that: but it is written, that the king will take your ſons: and again, this ſhall be the manner of the king that ſhall reign over you. God thereby foreſhewing what power, ſevered from piety (becauſe it is accountable to God only) will do in the future. And hereof we find the firſt example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his vineyard and his life, contrary to the truſt which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, Deut. xvi. That his people ſhall be judged with righteous judgment. Wherefore tho' the king had offer'd unto Naboth compoſition, as a vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refuſed: yet becauſe he was falſly accuſed and unjuſtly condemned (tho' by colour of law) how grievouſly Achab was puniſhed by God, the ſcriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea ſufficient for Achab againſt the all-righteous God, to ſay that it was done without his conſent, and by the elders of Iſrael. For God had not then left his people to the elders, but to the king, who is called a living law, even as David teſtifieth of himſelf. Poſuiſti me in caput gentium: for this of St. Auguſtine is very true; Simulata innocentia non eſt innocentia: ſimulata æquitas non eſt æquitas: ſed duplicatur peccatum in quo eſt iniquitas & ſimulatio; Feigned innocence, and feigned equity are neither the one or the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity and diſſimulation. Such in effect is their diſputation who think this place to contain the deſcription of a tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary ſide, as they are many and forcible, ſo are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that princely diſcourſe of The true law of free monarchies, which treatiſe I may not preſume to abridge, much leſs here to inſert. Only thus much I will ſay, that if practice do ſhew the greatneſs of authority, even the beſt kings of Juda and Iſrael were not ſo tied by any laws, but that they did whatſoever they pleaſed in the greateſt things; and commanded ſome of their own princes, and of their own brethren to be ſlain without any trial of law, being ſometimes by prophets reprehended, ſometimes not. For tho' David confeſs'd his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Solomon killing his elder brother, and others, the ſame was not imputed unto him as any offence.

That the ſtate of Iſrael ſhould receive this change of government, it was not only foretold by Moſes in Deuteronomy, but propheſy'd of by Jacob in this ſcripture: [c] The ſceptre ſhall not depart from Juda, &c. It was alſo promiſed by God to Abraham for a bleſſing. For it was not only aſſured that his iſſues ſhould in number equal the ſtars in heaven, but that [d] kings ſhould proceed of him. Which ſtate ſeeing it is framed from the pattern of his ſole rule, who is Lord of the univerſal: and the excellency thereof in reſpect of all other governments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proved, I ſhall not need to over-paint that which is garniſhed with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the judges every man hath obſerved what civil war Iſrael had: what outragious ſlaughters they committed upon each other: in what miſerable ſervitude they lived for many years: and when it fared beſt with them, they did but defend their own territories, or recover ſome parts thereof formerly loſt. The Canaanites dwelt in the beſt vallies of the country. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan: the Philiſtines the ſea-coaſts: and the Jebuſites Jeruſalem it ſelf, till David's time: all which that king did not only conquer and eſtabliſh, but he maſtered and ſubjected all the neighbour nations, and kings, and made them his tributaries and vaſſals. But whether it were for that the Iſraelites were moved by thoſe reaſons, which allure the moſt of all nations to live under a monarch, or whether by this means they ſought to be cleared from the ſons of [e] Samuel, they became deaf to all the perſuaſions and threats which Samuel uſed, inſiſting upon this point, that they would have a king, both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to conſent, he ſent every man to his own city and abiding.

SECT. II.

Of the election of Saul.

AFTER that Samuel had diſmiſſed the aſſembly at Mizpah, he forbare the election of a king, till ſuch time as he was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would preſent unto him a man of the land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Sophim, to make a feaſt for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of God's promiſes) and Saul alſo having wandred divers days to ſeek his father's aſſes, at length by the advice of his ſervant travelled towards Ramath, to find out a ſeer or a prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his beaſts. In which journey it pleaſed God (who doth many times order the greateſt things by the ſimpleſt paſſages and perſons) to elect Saul, who ſought an aſs, and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleaſed him to call Moſes, while he fed the ſheep of Jethro; and after to make choice of [f] David the youngeſt of eight ſons, and by the ſcriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beaſts, and changed his ſheep-hook into a ſceptre, making him of all other the moſt victorious king of Juda and Iſrael. So John and Jacob were taken from caſting their nets, to become fiſhers of men, and honoured with the titles of apoſtles, a dignity that died not in the grave; as all worldly honours do: but permanent and everlasting in God's endless kingdom.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the king, whom he expected, and staid his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, tho' a prophet and judge of Israel, much less knowing the honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the city the seer dwelt; Samuel answered, that himself was the man he sought, and pray'd Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affairs of the kingdom, and of God's graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him king of Israel.

After this, he told him all that should happen to him in the way homeward; that two men should encounter him, by Rahel's sepulchre, who should tell him that his asses were found; and that his father's cares were changed from the fear of losing his beasts, to doubt the loss of his son: that he should then meet three other men in the plain of Tabor; then a company of prophets; and that he should be partaker of God's spirit and prophesy with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar into that which became a king elected and favoured by God.

But the prophets here spoken of, men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the first and most reverenced number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Elisæas, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the rest; for these prophets, saith [a] St. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, præterita, præsentia & futura: but they were of those of whom St. Paul speaketh, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. who, inriched with spiritual gifts, expounded the scriptures and the law.

At Mispeth Samuel assembled the people that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own uncle therewith, when he asked him what had pass'd between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveal it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the tribes were assembled at Mispeth, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinks by the answer of [b] Urim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the priest, wearing that mystery upon his breast when he asked counsel of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jews, but by many others, if not by all nations. The land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christ's suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jews also cast lots. [c] Cicero, Plautus, [d] Pausanias, and others, have remembred divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Grecians, and other nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called diversory; the third divinatory; and unto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds howsoever they may seem chanceful, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs; The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by God's ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modesty, as both Josephus construe it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himself the least of the least tribe. But Samuel, enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen king of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him king, and pray'd for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him [e] presents as the manner was: of whom Saul, to avoid sedition, took no notice.

SECT. III.

Of the establishing Saul by his first victories.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the kingdom, but that he received knowledge that Nahas king of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephta, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul's rule. And altho' the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those territories which first the Amorite, and then Israel dispossess'd them of, which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephta's time; yet they never persuaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new king: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistines had not long before slain 34000 of their men of war: and besides had used great care and policy that they should have no smiths to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before that of the Bethshemesites and places adjoining, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000, and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to inlarge their dominions upon their borderers: Jabes Gilead being one of the neareſt. Besides, it may further be conjectured that the Ammonites were imboldened against Jabes Gilead, in respect of their weakness, since the [f] Israelites destroy'd a great part of them, for not joining with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increas'd to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamity, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that Israel having for long time been disarmed by the Philistines, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroy'd. But contrariwise when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be utterly disabled for the war, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first year's reign, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400 maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to assemble the forces of Iſrael: hewing a yoke of oxen into pieces, and ſending them by meſſengers over all the coaſts, proteſting thus, That whoſoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, ſo ſhould his oxen be ſerved: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the firſt. Seven days had Saul to aſſemble an army, by reaſon that the Gileadites had obtained the reſpite of theſe 7 days to give Nahas the Ammonite an anſwer: who, could they have obtained any reaſonable condition, were contented to have ſevered themſelves from Iſrael, and to become vaſſals and tributaries to the heathen. In the mean while Saul aſſembled the forces, which repaired unto him at Bezec, near Jordan, that he might readily paſs the river; which done, he might in one day with a ſpeedy march arrive at Jabes, under the hills of Gilead.

[a] Chrys. in Psal. 43. [b] The Urim and Thummim in the ornaments of the high priest were inserted within the pectoral, which therefore was duplicatum, they were placed in the pectoral over against the heart of the high priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones nor any thing made by the artificers. See Exod. 38. [c] Cic. de divin. [d] Paus. in Mes. [e] 1 Sam. 10. [f] Judg. 21.

The army by [a] Saul led, conſiſting of 330000: he returned an anſwer to thoſe of Jabes, that they ſhould aſſure themſelves of ſuccour by the next day at noon. For as it ſeemeth Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning-watch he ſurpriſed the army of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might ſet on them on all ſides, he divided his forces into 3 parts, putting them to the ſword, until the heat of the day, and the wearineſs of Saul's troops, inforc'd them to give over the purſuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careleſs and ſecure, in that thoſe of Jabes promiſed the next morning to render themſelves and their city to their mercy. After this happy ſucceſs, the people were ſo far in love with their new king, that they would have ſlain all thoſe Iſraelites that murmured againſt his election, had not himſelf forbidden and reſiſted their reſolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the proſperous, and baſe vaſſals of the time that flouriſheth: and as deſpightful and cruel without cauſe againſt thoſe, whom any miſadventure, or other worldly accident, hath thrown down.

After the army removed, [b] Samuel ſummoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and, as ſome commentators affirm, anointed king: and here Samuel uſed an exhortation to all the aſſembly, containing precepts, and a rehearſal of his own juſtice during the beginning of his government to that day. After [c] Saul had now reigned one year before he was eſtabliſhed in Gilgal or Galgala, he ſtrengthened himſelf with a good guard of 3000 choſen men, of which he aſſigned 1000 to attend on Jonathan his ſon at Gibeah, the city of his nativity: the reſt he kept about his own perſon in Macmas, and in the hill of Bethel.

SECT. IV.

Of Saul's diſobedience in his proceedings in the wars with the Philiſtines and Amalekites, which cauſed his final rejection.

JOnathan, with his ſmall army or regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, ſurpriſed a garriſon of Philiſtines: the ſame, as ſome think, which Saul paſs'd by, when he came from Rama, where he was firſt anointed by Samuel, which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: becauſe a place where the Philiſtines had a garriſon, 1 Sam. x. is called the hill of God, which they underſtand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius underſtands this garriſon to have been at Gebah, in Benjamin near Gibha, where Jonathan abode with his thouſand followers. Howſoever, by this it appeareth, that the Philiſtines held ſome ſtrong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the territory of Iſrael: and now being greatly inraged by this ſurprize they aſſembled [d] 30000 armed chariots, and 6000 horſe, wherewith they invaded Judea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a city of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Jeruſalem, and in the midſt of the land between the ſea and Jordan. With this ſudden invaſion the Iſraelites were ſtrucken in ſo great a fear, as ſome of them hid themſelves in the caves of the mountains, others fled over Jordan in Gad and Gilead: Saul himſelf, with ſome 2000 men of ordinary, and many other people, ſtaid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the paſſage of Joſhua when he led Iſrael over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuel's appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel ſeven days: but when the laſt day was in part ſpent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminiſh greatly, he preſumed (as ſome expound the place, 1 Sam. xiii. 9.) to exerciſe the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt-offering and a peace-offering unto God, contrary to the eccleſiaſtical laws of the Hebrews, and God's commandments: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per ſacerdotem, and ſo make the ſin of Saul not to have been any intruſion into the prieſts office, but firſt a diſobedience to God's commandment, in not ſtaying according to the appointment, 1 Sam. x. 8. ſecondly, a diffidence or miſtruſt in God's help, and too great relying upon the ſtrength of the people, whoſe departing from him he could not bear patiently; and laſtly, a contempt of the holy prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of ſo godly a man might procure him. But whatſoever was his ſin, notwithſtanding his excuſes, he was by [e] Samuel reprehended moſt ſharply, in terms unfitting his eſtate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel ſo to do, from God himſelf, at which time alſo Samuel feared not to let him know, that the kingdom ſhould be conferred to another (a man after God's own heart) both from [f] Saul and his poſterity.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his army, found it to conſiſt of 600 men: for the moſt were fled from him and ſcattered, yea, among thoſe that ſtaid, there was not any that had either ſword or ſpear, but Saul and his ſon Jonathan only. For the Philiſtines had not left them any ſmith in all Iſrael, that made weapons; beſides, they that came to [g] Saul came haſtily, and left ſuch weapons and armour as they had, behind them in the garriſons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul ſhould be able the year before, or in ſome part of this very year, to ſuccour Jabes Gilead with 330000 men, if there had not now been any iron weapon to defend themſelves withal, ſave only in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his ſon. But howſoever all the reſt of the people were formerly diſarmed by the Philiſtines, and all thoſe craftſmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Iſraelites only files to ſharpen and amend ſuch ſtuff as ſerved for the plough, and for nought elſe: yet that they had ſome kind of arms it is manifeſt, or elſe they durſt not have attempted upon the Philiſtines as they did. And it is not ſaid in the text, that there was not any ſword in all Iſrael, but only that there was not any found amongſt thoſe 600 ſoldiers which ſtay'd with [h] Saul after Samuel's departure: and it ſeemeth that when Samuel had ſharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forſook him, having but 600 remaining of his 3000 ordinary ſoldiers, and of all the reſt that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

With this ſmall troop he held himſelf to his own city of Gibeah, as a place of more ſtrength and better aſſured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obſcure how it ſhould come to paſs that the Philiſtines ſhould thus diſarm the moſt part of the Iſraelites, howſoever in the time of Samuel much had been done againſt them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by ſword or ſpear, but by thunder from heaven: and when theſe craftſmen were once rooted out of the cities of Iſrael, no marvel if they could not in a ſhort peace under Samuel, be replanted again. For this tyranny of the Philiſtines is to be underſtood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not ſuffering their artificers to teach the Iſraelites, and ſo even to the times of Saul kept them from having any ſtore of armour. The ſame policy did Nabuchodonoſor uſe after his conqueſt in Judea: Dionyſius in Sicily; and many other princes elſewhere in all ages. But theſe loſt weapons in part the Iſraelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philiſtines had not invaded. The reſt of their defences were ſuch as antiquity uſed, and their preſent neceſſity miniſtred unto them; to wit, clubs, bows, and ſlings. For the Benjamites exceeded in caſting ſtones in ſlings: and that theſe were the natural weapons, and the firſt of all nations, it is manifeſt; and ſo in Chronicles i. 12. it is written of thoſe that came to ſuccour David againſt Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bows, and could uſe the right and the left hand with ſtones; and with a ſling it was, that David himſelf ſlew the giant Goliah.

While the ſtate of Iſrael ſtood in theſe hard terms, the Philiſtines having parted their army into three troops, that they might ſpoil and deſtroy many parts at once; Jonathan, ſtrengthned by God, and followed with his eſquire only, ſcaled a mountain, whereon a [a] company of Philiſtines were lodged: the reſt of their army (as may be gathered by the ſucceſs) being incamped in the plain adjoining. And tho' he were diſcovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of deriſion called up by his enemies: yet he ſo behaved himſelf, as with the aſſiſtance of God, he ſlew 20 of the firſt Philiſtines that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cauſe, fled away amazed altogether. In which confuſion, fear, and jealouſy, they ſlaughtered one another inſtead of enemies: whereupon thoſe Hebrews which became of their party, becauſe they feared to be ſpoiled by them, took the advantage of their deſtruction, and ſlew of them in great numbers. And laſtly, Saul himſelf taking knowledge of the rout and diſorder, together with thoſe Iſraelites that ſhrouded themſelves in mount [b] Ephraim, ſet upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a moſt happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that prophecy in Deuteronomy fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of thoſe which feared God, ſhould kill a thouſand, and two of them ten thouſand.

This done, the ſmall army of Iſrael made retreat from the purſuit. And tho' Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the evening, yet his ſon Jonathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptineſs, taſted a drop of honey in his paſſage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victory of Saul and Jonathan ſeems to have reduced unto the Philiſtines remembrance of their former overthrow likewiſe miraculous in the days of Samuel; ſo that for ſome ſpace of time they held themſelves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns all his bordering enemies; namely the [c] Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, againſt all which he prevailed. He then aſſembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000 men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, waſting and deſtroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the deſart, belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which war he took Agag their king priſoner. But whereas he was inſtructed by Samuel to follow this nation without compaſſion, becauſe they firſt of all attempted [d] Iſrael, when they left Egypt in Moſes's time: he notwithſtanding did not only ſpare the life of Agag, but reſerved the beſt of the beaſts and ſpoil of the country, with pretence to offer them in ſacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a ſecond time make him know, that God would caſt him from his royal eſtate to which he was raiſed, when he was of baſe condition, and as the text hath it, little in his own eyes. And tho' the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet ſeeing Saul could not be ignorant how ſeverely it pleaſed God to injoin the Iſraelites to revenge themſelves upon that nation, he was in all inexcuſable. For God had commanded that the [e] Iſraelites ſhould put out the remembrance of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predeceſſors of this Agag uſed againſt the Iſraelites, eſpecially on thoſe which were overwearied, ſick, faint and aged people, was now to be revenged on him and his nation above 400 years afterwards; and now he was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himſelf having alſo ſinned in the ſame kind, as theſe words of Samuel witneſs: [f] As thy ſword hath made other women childleſs, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſs among other women; at which time Samuel himſelf (after he had been by many bootleſs intreaties perſuaded to ſtay awhile with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and ſoon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to ſee Saul, until the day of his death.

SECT. V.

Of the occurrents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to chooſe a king for Iſrael, among the ſons of Iſhai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a ſort to perform, till it pleaſed God to direct him how he might avoid both the ſuſpicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wiſdom he ſought to avoid the inconvenience or dangers of this life, then do thoſe men miſtake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reaſon that God hath given them, do no otherwiſe avoid the perils and dangers thereof, than as men ſtupified in the opinion of fate or deſtiny, neglecting either to beg counſel at God's hand, by prayer, or to exerciſe that wiſdom or foreſight, wherewith God had inriched the mind of man, for his preſervation. Neither did the all-powerful God (who made, and could deſtroy the world in an inſtant) diſdain here to inſtruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul by the accuſtomed cautious ways of the world.

Of the ſons of Iſhai, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David the youngeſt, having refuſed Eliab the firſt-born; who, tho' he were a man of a comely perſon and great ſtrength, yet unto ſuch outward appearance the Lord had no reſpect. For, as it is written, [a] God ſeeth not as man ſeeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He alſo refuſing the other ſix brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock, for of him the Lord ſaid to Samuel, ariſe and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to ſeek the life of David: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, overcome in battel by the Philiſtines.

The Philiſtines having well conſidered (as it ſeems) the increaſe of Saul's power through many victories by him obtained, while they had ſitten ſtill and forborn to give impediment to his proſperous courſes, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as juſtly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Iſrael, might be repay'd with advantage, if ever opportunity ſhould ſerve their often injured neighbours againſt them, as lately it had done againſt Moab, Ammon, and the reſt of their ancient enemies. Now for the quality of their ſoldiers, and all warlike proviſions, the Philiſtines had reaſon to think themſelves equal, if not ſuperior, to Iſrael. The ſucceſs of their former wars had for the moſt part been agreeable to their own wiſhes; as for late diſaſters, they might, according to human wiſdom, impute them to ſecond cauſes, as to a tempeſt happening by chance, and to a miſtaken alarm, whereby their army poſſeſſed with a needleſs fear had fallen to rout. Having therefore muſtered their forces and taken the field, encamping ſo near to the army which king Saul drew forth againſt them, that they could not eaſily depart without the trial of a battel, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joining in groſs, but maintaining ſome skirmiſhes, as refuſing both of them to paſs the valley that lay between their camps. Juſt cauſes of fear they had on both ſides; eſpecially the Philiſtines, whoſe late attempts had been confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occaſion perhaps it was, that they ſought to decide the matter by ſingle combat, as willing to try in one man's perſon, whether any ſtroak from heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath a ſtrong giant, fearing neither God nor man, undertook to defie the whole hoſt of Iſrael, provoking them with deſpightful words, to appoint a champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the party vanquiſhed in champion, ſhould hold it ſelf as overcome in groſs, and become vaſſal to the other. This gave occaſion to young David, whom Samuel by God's appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publick notice of the people. For no man durſt expoſe himſelf to encounter the great ſtrength of Goliah, until David (ſent by his father on an errand to the camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victory, without other arms offenſive or defenſive than a ſling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty giant, and after with his own ſword ſtruck off his head. Hereupon the Philiſtines, who ſhould have yielded themſelves as ſubjects to the conqueror, according to the covenant on their own ſide propounded, fled without ſtay; and were purſued and ſlaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philiſtines were not ſo broken, that either any of their towns were loſt, or their people diſcouraged from infeſting the territories of Iſrael. But David, by whom God had wrought this victory, fell into the grievous indignation of his maſter Saul, through the honour purchaſed by his well deſerving. For after ſuch time as the Spirit of God departed from Saul and came upon David, he then became a cruel tyrant, faithleſs and irreligious [b]. Becauſe the high-prieſt Abimelech fed David in his neceſſity with hallowed bread, and armed him with the ſword of his own conqueſt taken from Goliah; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech, and 85 prieſts of Nob, but alſo he deſtroyed the city, [c] and ſmote with the edge of the ſword both man and woman, both child and ſuckling, both ox and aſs, and ſheep. And he that had compaſſion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and alſo ſpared and preſerved the beſt of his cattel, contrary to the commandment and ordinance of God, both by Moſes and Samuel, had not now any mercy in ſtore, for the innocent, for the Lord's ſervants the prieſts of Iſrael. Yea, he would have ſlain his own ſon [d] Jonathan, for pitying and pleading David's innocency, as alſo once before for taſting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his father's unreaſonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former he ſhewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promiſed him: and again in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; alſo in that when as David had twice ſpared his life in the territory of Ziph, and Saul twice ſworn to do him no hurt, and confeſſed his errors, yet he ſought ſtill to deſtroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he ſhewed, in that he ſought counſel of the witch of Endor, which was the laſt preparative for his deſtruction. For whereas when he ſought counſel from God he had been always victorious: from the oracle of the devil this ſucceſs followed, that both himſelf, and his three ſons, with his neareſt and faithfulleſt ſervants, were all ſlaughter'd by the Philiſtines: his body with the bodies of his ſons (as a ſpectacle of ſhame and diſhonour) were hung over the walls of Bethſan: and there had remained till they had found burial in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the grateful Gileadites of Jabes ſtoln their carcaſes thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Iſrael, together with Samuel, 40 years, and by himſelf after Samuel 20 years, according to [e] Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Joſephus. But yet it ſeemeth to me that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25th chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the reſt of the ſame chapter the paſſages are written of David, Nabal and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly enſued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all thoſe victories which David afterwards obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring nations; cruſh'd the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the ſtrength of the Amalekites; and greatly waſted the power and pride of the Philiſtines.

SECT. VI.

Of ſuch as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their iſſues: upon occaſion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, entring Peloponneſus about this time.

IN the ſecond year of Samuel, according to Euſebius, was David born; after Codoman later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, ſaith he, was thirty years old when he began to reign: whence it followeth, that he was born in the tenth of the 40 years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh of Samuel, Æneas Silvius the ſon of Poſthumus began his reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that ſtate 31 years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Poſthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and the fourth king of Alba, whereof I will not ſtand to diſpute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus ſat in the throne of Aſſyria, being the one and thirtieth king; he ruled that empire 40 years. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponneſus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the nation, poſſeſs'd a great part thereof 328 years before the firſt Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratoſthenes. For all Greece was anciently poſſeſſed by 3 tribes or kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the ſon of Deucalion, lord of the country Phthiotis in Theſſaly. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till ſuch time as partly by trading in all parts of the land, partly by the plantation of many colonies, and ſundry great victories obtained, the iſſues of Hellen had reduced much of the country under their obedience, calling themſelves generally by one name, and yet every ſeveral nation after ſome one of the poſterity of Hellen, who had reigned over it. And becauſe this is the furtheſt antiquity of Greece, it will not be amiſs to recount the pedigree of her firſt planters.

Iapetus (as the poets fable) was the ſon of heaven and earth, ſo accounted, either becauſe the names of his parents, had in the Greek tongue ſuch ſignification: or perhaps for his knowledge in aſtronomy and philoſophy.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha reigned in Theſſaly, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretenſis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the queen. In Deucalion's time was that great flood, of which we have ſpoken elſewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whoſe ſons were Xuthus, Dorus and Æolus, of Dorus and Æolus, the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores having firſt inhabited ſundry parts of Theſſaly, did afterwards ſeat themſelves about Parnaſſus: and finally became lords of the countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldeſt ſon of Hellen, being baniſh by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his own uſe ſome part of their father's goods, came to Athens: where marrying the daughter of king Erictheus, he begat on her two ſons, Achæus and Ion. Of theſe two Achæus, for a ſlaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponneſus: and ſeating himſelf in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as ſome write) he afterwards departed; and levying an army recovered the kingdom of his grandfather in Theſſaly.

Ion being general for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great victory, and thereby ſuch love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their ſtate into his hands. He divided the citizens into tribes, appointing every one to ſome occupation, or good courſe of life. When the people multiplied he planted colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which country Solinus then reigning, thought it ſafer to give his daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a town called by his wife's name in Ægialia, where he and his poſterity reigned long, and (tho' not obliterating the old name) gave to that land denomination. But in after-times the Dores aſſiſting the nephews of Hercules, invaded Peloponneſus, and overcoming the Achæans poſſeſſed Laconia, and all thoſe parts which the Achæi had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driven to ſeek a new ſeat, came unto the Iones, deſiring to inhabit the Ægialia with them, and alledging in vain, that Ion and Achæus had been brethren. When this requeſt could not be obtained, they ſought by force to expel the Ionians, which they performed; but they loſt their king Tiſamenes, the ſon of Oreſtes, in that war.

Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponneſus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they ſailed into Aſia, and peopled the weſtern coaſt thereof, on which they built 12 cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the leaſt without any univerſal or memorable tranſmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Aſia hath been mentioned by all which have written of that age, and is commonly placed 140 years after the war of Troy, and 60 years after the deſcent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus. Theſe Heraclidæ were they of whom the kings of Sparta iſſued; which race held that kingdom about 700 years. Of their father Hercules many ſtrange things are delivered unto us by the poets, of which ſome are like to have been true, others perhaps muſt be allegorically underſtood. But the moſt approved writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whoſe exploits were by the Greeks aſcribed to the ſon of Alcmena, who is ſaid to have performed theſe twelve great labours.

Firſt, he ſlew the Nemæan lyon: ſecondly, he ſlew the ſerpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very ſwift hart: the fourth was the taking of a wild boar alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcady: the fifth was the cleanſing of Augeas's ox-ſtall in one day, which he performed by turning the river Alpheus into it: the ſixth was the chaſing away of the birds from the lake Stymphalis: the ſeventh was the fetching a bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the mares which Diomedes king of Thrace fed with human fleſh: the ninth was to fetch a girdle of the queen of the Amazons: the three laſt were, to fetch Geryon's beeves from Gades; the golden apples of the Heſperides; and Cerberus from hell. The mythological interpretation of theſe I purpoſely omit, as both over-long to be here ſet down, and no leſs perplexed than the labours themſelves. For ſome by Hercules underſtand fortitude, prudence, and conſtancy, interpreting the monſters, vices. Others make Hercules the ſun, and his travels to be the twelve ſigns of the zodiac. There are others who apply his works hiſtorically to their own conceits; as well aſſured, that the expoſition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables: that he took Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other towns, being aſſiſted by ſuch as either admired his virtues, or were beholden unto him. Alſo that he ſlew many thieves and tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of poetical vanity. His travels through moſt parts of the world are, or may ſeem, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But ſure it is that many cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his endeavours to the common good) delivered the land from much oppreſſion. But after his death no city of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the virtue and deſerts of Hercules, with conſtant protection of his children, perſecuted by the king Euryſtheus. This Euryſtheus was ſon of Sthenelus, and grandchild of Perſeus; he reigned in Mycenæ, the mightieſt city then in Greece. He it was that impoſed thoſe hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as poets report) for the expiation of that murther, which in his madneſs he had committed upon his own children; but as others ſay, becauſe he was his ſubject and ſervant: wherefore there are who commend Euryſtheus for imploying the ſtrength of Hercules to ſo good a purpoſe. But it is generally agreed by the beſt writers, that Hercules was alſo of the ſtock of Perſeus, and holden in great jealouſy by Euryſtheus, becauſe of his virtue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous ſervices wherein he was imployed, ſo that he grew great in reputation through all Greece, and had by many wives and concubines above 60 children. Theſe children Euryſtheus would fain have got in his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Ceyx king of Thracinia, and from him (for he durſt not withſtand Euryſtheus) to Athens. The Athenians not only gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountred Euryſtheus. Iolaus the brother's ſon of Hercules, who had aſſiſted him in many of his travels, was captain of the Heraclidæ. It is ſaid of him, that being dead, he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Euryſtheus: whom he when had ſlain in battel, he died again. It ſeems to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to aſſiſt his couſins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponneſians underſtood that Euryſtheus was ſlain, they took Atreus the ſon of Pelops to their king: for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the people. Againſt him the Heraclidæ marched under Hyllus the ſon of Hercules. But to avoid effuſion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus ſhould fight with Echenus king of the Tegeatæ a people of Arcadia, who aſſiſted Atreus, with condition that if Hyllus were victor, he ſhould peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwiſe the Heraclidæ ſhould not enter Peloponneſus in 100 years. in that combat Hyllus was ſlain, and the Heraclidæ compelled to forbear their country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Ariſtodemus (as the beſt authority ſhews, tho' ſome have ſaid, that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before ſhewed, having expelled the Achai, over whom the iſſue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Euryſtheus four generations.

SECT. VII.

Of Homer and Heſiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

ABOUT this time that excellent learned poet Homer lived, as many of the beſt chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Mæones, deſcended (as [a] Functius imagineth) of Beroſus's Anamæon, who gave name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the poet to have been long after theſe times, raſhly framing his Æra according to [b] Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes ſeven more of this name to have flouriſhed in divers cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, ſprang the diverſity of opinions, both of the time and of the native city of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manaſſeh king of Judah, and Numa of Rome. He was called Meleſigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, becauſe blind men follow a guide, which ſignification among others, is in the verb ὁμηρεῖν: for this Homer in his latter time was blind. [c] Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the queſtion of the time when Homer lived. So alſo [d] Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Aſſyrius, in his oration Ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flouriſhed 950 years before the conſulſhip of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator caſteth up in the world's year 3046, and after Troy taken, about 260 years: and about 250 years before the building of Rome, making him to have flouriſhed about the time of Jehoſaphat king of Judah. But Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tatianus above-named, mention authors that make him much ancienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthy the readers conſideration, that by this one inſtance he may gueſs of the difficulty, and ſo pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: ſeeing in ſuch diverſity of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80 years after Troy taken, near the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponneſus: and [e] Eratoſthenes after Troy 100 years. Theopompus 500 years after the army of Greece ſailed into Phrygia for the war of Troy. Euphorion makes him cotemporary with Gyges, who began to reign in the 18th olympiad (which was 45 years after Rome was built) and Soſibius ſaith, that he was 90 years before the firſt olympiad: which he ſeeks to prove by the times of Charillus, and his ſon Nicander; Philocorus placeth him 180 after Troy: Ariſtarchus 140, in the time of the ſeating of the colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Ageſilaus governed Lacedæmon; and that Lycurgus in his young years, about 100 years after the Ionian plantations, came to viſit him, near 240 years after Troy taken. [f] Herodotus finds Homer flouriſhing 622 years before Xerxes's enterprize againſt the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168 years after the Trojan war. Euſebius ſeems to make him to have been about the time of Joaſh king of Judah, 124 years before Rome was built: tho' elſewhere in his chronology he notes, that ſome place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his evangelical preparation, where out of Tatianus Aſſyrius he citeth ſundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Ariſtæus, Orpheus, Muſæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Heſiodus were the elder, it is alſo much diſputed. [a] Aulus Gellius reports, that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Heſiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the poet, and Ephorus the hiſtorian, make Heſiod of an elder time than Homer. [b] Varro leaves it uncertain which of theſe learned fablers was firſt born: but he finds that they lived together ſome certain years, wherein he confirms himſelf by an epigram written upon a trevit, and left by Heſiod in Helicon.

[c] Cornelius Nepos reports, that they both lived 160 years before was Rome built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about [d] 140 years after the fall of Troy. [e] Euthymenes finds them both 200 years after Troy taken, in the time of Acaſtus the ſon of Pelias, king of Theſſaly. For my ſelf, I am not much troubled when this poet lived; neither would I offend the reader with theſe opinions, but only to ſhew the uncertainty and diſagreement of hiſtorians, as well in this particular, as in all other queſtions and diſputes of time. For the curioſity of this man's age is no leſs ridiculous, than the inquiſition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing ſome great myſtery. In deriſion whereof Lucian feigning himſelf to have been in hell, to have ſpoken with Homer, there asked him the cauſe why he began his book with that word? who anſwered, that he began in that ſort, becauſe it came in his head ſo to do.

It ſeemeth that Senyes, or, after Macrobius, Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepherſobris was his ſucceſſor, who preceded Vaphres, father-in-law to Solomon.

About the end of Saul's government, or in the beginning of David's time according to [f] Caſſiodorus, the Amazons with the Cymmerians invaded Aſia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And beſides the overthrow of that famous ſtate of Troy (which fell 103 years before David's time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not only by reaſon of thoſe northern nations: but there ſprung up, ſomewhat nearly together, ſix kingdoms into greatneſs not before erected. In Italy, that of the Latins: in the ſouth part of Greece, thoſe Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achæi. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damaſcus, the Adads made themſelves princes, of which there were ten kings, which began and ended with the kings of Iſrael in effect: and ſomewhat before theſe, the ſtate of the Iſraelites having now altered their form of government, began to flouriſh under kings, of which David, in a few years, became maſter of all thoſe neighbouring nations, who by interchange of times had ſubjected the Judeans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a moſt abject, and grievous ſlavery; to wit, the Edumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Mideanites, Ituræans, and the reſt of the Arabians, with the Philiſtines, Jebuſites, Geſhurites, Machathites, all which acknowledged David for their ſoveraign lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of DAVID.

Of David's eſtate in the time of Saul.

THE hazards which David ran into while he was yet only deſigned king, and living as a private man, expected the empire, were very many. The firſt perſonal act of fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and ſo highly affected of Jonathan the ſon of Saul, that he loved him as his own ſoul: inſomuch, as when Saul ſought to perſuade his ſon, that David would aſſuredly be the ruin of his houſe, and eſtate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cauſe, Jonathan could never be perſuaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of David's life, and well doing. It was not long after this ſignal act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, tho' he were become as his houſhold ſervant, and his eſquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil ſpirit, was adviſed to procure ſome cunning muſician to play before him upon the harp; whereby it was thought that he might find eaſe, which came to paſs accordingly. He entertained David, for this purpoſe, and began to favour him, giving him a place of command among the men of war. But the jealous tyrant ſoon waxed weary of his good affections; and ſought to kill David, being thereunto moved only thro' envy of his virtue. This paſſion firſt brake forth in the midſt of his raving fit, at which time he threw a ſpear at David, that was then playing on his harp, to do him eaſe.

[g] Cenſorinus remembreth one Aſclepius a phyſician, who practiſed the curing of the frenzy, by the like muſick: and tempted thereby thoſe diſeaſes which grew from paſſion. That Pythagoras did alſo the like by ſuch a kind of harmony, Seneca in his third book of anger witneſſeth. But the madneſs of Saul came from the cauſe of cauſes, and was thereby incurable, howſoever it ſometimes left him, and yielded unto that muſick, which God had ordained to be a means of more good to the muſician than to the king.

Saul having failed in ſuch open attempts, gave unto David the command over 1000 ſoldiers, to confront the Philiſtines withal. For he durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, he promiſed him his daughter Merab to wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to preſent him with an hundred foreſkins of the Philiſtines: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that nation) that the Philiſtines would take David's head, than he their foreſkins. This hope failing, when as now David's victories begat new fears and jealouſies in Saul, he practiſed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purpoſes were ſtill fruſtrated. After all this he ſought to murther him in his own houſe, but Michol his wife delivered him. So David ſought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to

[a] Abimilech, then to [b] Achis the Philiſtine, prince of Gath: where to obſcure himſelf, he was forc'd to counterfeit both ſimplicity and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiſtines, he covered himſelf in the cave of Adullam: and after conveying ſuch of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelf in the deſarts of [c] Ziph, Maon, and the hills of Engedi, where he cut off the lap of Saul's garments, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſart of [d] Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Gath the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his maſter Saul was known to proſecute him.

Of Achis, David obtained [e] Siklag in Simeon, pretending to invade Judea: but he bent his forces another way and ſtruck the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none live to complain of him. Achis ſuppoſing that David had drawn blood of his own nation, thought himſelf aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Iſrael, ſummoneth David to aſſiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiſtine princes knowing his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelf to Siklag. At his return he found the town burnt, his two wives, with the wives and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: hereupon his fellows mutinied, but God gave him comfort, and aſſurance to recover all again: which he did.

This army of the Philiſtines commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three ſons were ſlain. The news with Saul's crown and bracelets were brought to David, at Siklag, in his return from being victorious over Amalek, by a man of the ſame nation, who [f] avow'd (tho' falſely) that himſelf at Saul's requeſt had ſlain him. David, becauſe he had accuſed himſelf, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to be ſlain at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gave ſtrong evidence withal. Otherwiſe it followeth not that every man ought to be believed of himſelf to his own prejudice. For it is held in the law; [g] Confeſſio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorato crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognoſcentis; The priſoner's confeſſion muſt not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unleſs ſome other proof inform the conſcience of the judge. For a man may confeſs thoſe things of himſelf, that the judge by examination may know to be impoſſible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi confeſſus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui ſententiam, therefore doth the gloſs reconcile theſe two places in this ſort. Si quis in judicio ſponte de ſeipſo confiteatur, & poſtea maneat in confeſſione, id eſt ſatis; If any man in judgment do confeſs of himſelf, of his own accord, and after doth perſevere in his confeſſion, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befel him, being a king, with whom, in effect, the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtir up ſorrow and move compaſſion in the heart of David.

The victory which the Philiſtines had gotten was ſo great, that ſome towns of the Iſraelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left unto the enemy, who took poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeem ſtrange, that a nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiſtines, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the conqueſt entire. Moſt like it ſeems, that the civil war immediately breaking out between David and the houſe of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the reſt of Iſrael, gave them hope of an eaſy victory over both; and thereby cauſed them to attempt nothing at the preſent, leſt by ſo doing they ſhould inforce their diſagreeing enemies to a neceſſary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part ſhould conſume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquiſhed, would become a prey to the violence of ſuch as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

SECT. II.

Of the beginning of David's reign, and the war made by Abner for Iſhboſheth.

AFTER the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the War, ſought to advance Iſhboſheth (or Jeboſtus according to Joſephus) tho' he had no right to the kingdom of Iſrael: for Mephiboſheth the firſt ſon of Jonathan lived. Againſt this Abner, and Iſhboſheth, David made a defenſive war, till Abner paſs'd Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he ſent Joab with ſuch forces as he had, to reſiſt Abner: Iſhboſheth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountred each other near Gibeon, where it ſeemeth, that Abner made the offer to try the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that combat between the Lacedemonians, and the Argives, remembred by Herodotus, 300 being choſen of each nation, of which number three perſons were only left unſlain. The like trial by a far leſs number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii for the Romans and Latines. The ſame challenge Goliah the Philiſtine made, whom David ſlew: a cuſtom very ancient. Edward the third offered the like trial in his own perſon to the French king; and Francis the French king to Charles the emperor. There were 12 choſen of each part, in this war of David with the houſe of Saul, to wit, ſo many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whoſe force and valour was ſo equal, as there ſurvived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrel ſtaid not here: for the army of Juda preſs'd Abner in groſs, and brake him. 360 Men of Abner's companions were ſlain, and but 20 of Juda; whereof Aſahel the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs purſue [h] Abner, and by Abner's perſuaſions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounding him to death, with the ſtroke of his ſpear. For tho' Aſahel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the text, as light as a wild roe, and as Joſephus reporteth, contended not only with men, but with horſes; and hoped to have gotten great fame, if he could have maſtered Abner (who as Aſahel perſuaded himſelf, had by being overthrown and flying away loſt his courage) yet here it fell out true; [i] That the race is not to the ſwift.

That this civil war laſted two years, we find it written in the 2 Sam. ii. 10. tho' in the beginning of the iiid it is again made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter reſteth ſtill in diſpute, and ſome of the Rabbins conceive, that Iſhboſheth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the war as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Iſhboſheth after this, and till ſuch time as there grew jealouſy between him and Iſhboſheth for Saul's concubine: neither did the death of Iſhboſheth inſtantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the ſame doth not certainly appear.

SECT. III.

Of the death of Abner ſlain by Joab, and of Iſhboſheth by Rechab and Baanah.

ABNER, reconciled to David, was anon by [a] Joab murthered; for Joab could not endure a companion in David's favour, and in the commandment of his forces, by which he was grown ſo powerful, as David forbare to call him to account; for thus much he confeſſeth of himſelf: [b] I am this day weak, and theſe men the ſons of Zeruiah be too hard for me. In this ſort David complained after Abner's death, and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publick imprecation; [c] Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers houſe: and let them be ſubject to ulcers, to the leproſy, to lameneſs, to the ſword, and to poverty, &c. For could any thing have withſtood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Joab might greatly have endangered David's eſtate, Abner being the mouth and truſt of all the reſt of the tribes, not yet reconciled. This miſchance therefore David openly bewailed, ſo that all Iſrael perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held being general of the men of war, was of ſuch importance, that the kings themſelves were fain to give them great reſpect, as hath been already ſhewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himſelf worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole kingdom. For he was near to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adverſity, wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy ſhould in reward of new benefits be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature ſo jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterwards ſlew Amaſa his own kinſman, and the king's, upon the ſame quarrel, taking it in high diſdain to ſee him joined with himſelf, as captain of the hoſt of Juda; much leſs could he brook a ſuperior, and ſuch a one as had ſlain his brother, and been beaten himſelf in battel. But howſoever Joab did hate or deſpiſe Abner, David eſteemed highly of him as of a prince, and a great man in Iſrael, excuſing the overſight by which he might ſeem to have periſhed, by affirming, that he died not like a fool, nor a man vanquiſhed, [d] But as a man falleth before wicked men, ſo (ſaid he) didſt thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit nor want of valour and virtue in him, whom a ſtronger hand deſtroyeth unawares, or whom ſubtilty in free truſt bringeth to confuſion. For all under the ſun are ſubject to worldly miſeries and miſadventures. Howſoever Iſhboſheth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he deſpaired greatly of his eſtate, and with him all Iſrael were poſſeſs'd with great fear: inſomuch as two of Iſhboſheth's own captains, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Iſhboſheth, and preſenting his head to [e] David, received the ſame reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have ſlain Saul. Iſhboſheth being dead, all the elders of Iſrael repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and laſt time anointed by general conſent.

SECT. IV.

Of the flouriſhing time of David's kingdom, the taking of Jeruſalem, with two overthrows given to the Philiſtines, and the conduction of the ark to the city of David.

WHEN David was now eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, his firſt enterpriſe was upon the Jebuſites, who, in deriſion of his force, and confident in the ſtrength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blind and lame of their City [f]; which David ſoon after entered: all their other forces notwithſtanding. For having maſtered the fort of Zion (which was afterwards the city of David) he became lord of Jeruſalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebuſites, who had held it from the foundation to the times of Moſes and Joſhua, and after them almoſt 400 years: there are who expound this place otherwiſe. Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou ſhalt not come in hither. For ſome think that it was meant by the idols of the Jebuſites: others, that it had reference to the covenant made long before with Iſaac and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wreſtling with the angel, and that therefore till thoſe (that is, till that covenant) be broken, David ought not to moleſt them. But for my ſelf I take it with Joſephus, that they armed their walls with certain impotent people at firſt, in ſcorn of David's attempt. For they, that had held their city about four hundred years againſt all the children of Iſrael, Joſhua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it alſo againſt David.

When he had now poſſeſs'd himſelf of the very heart and centre of the kingdom, and received congratulatory embaſſadors and preſents from Hiram king of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines and married more wives, by whom he had ten ſons in Jeruſalem, and by his former wives he had 6 in Hebron where he reigned 7 years.

The Philiſtines hearing that David was now anointed king, as well of Juda as of Iſrael, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his ſeat. And being encountred by David at two ſeveral times in the [g] Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then David aſſembled 30000 choice Iſraelites to conduct the ark of God from the houſe of Abinadab in Gibea, to the city of David, which buſineſs was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the ſon of Abinadab, whom the Lord ſlew for preſuming to touch the ark, tho' it were with intent to ſtay it from taking harm when it was ſhaken. But after three years it was with great ſolemnity brought into the city with ſacrifices, muſick, dances, and all ſigns of joyfulneſs, in which David himſelf gladly bore a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the ark, and afterwards told him in ſcorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his ſervants; namely, that he gat his regal dignity both in apparel and behaviour; and mixed himſelf among the baſe multitude, dancing as fools do in the ways and ſtreets: not that ſhe diſliked David's behaviour (as I take it) tho' ſhe made it the colour of her deriſion. But rather the abundant grief, which this ſpectacle ſtirred up, beholding the glory of her husband to whom ſhe was delivered laſtly by force, and remembring the miſerable end of her father and brethren, out of whoſe ruins ſhe conceived that the ſon of Iſhai had built this his greatneſs, together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced ſince his poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, made her break out in thoſe deſpiteful terms, for which ſhe remained barren to her death.

This done, [a] David conſulted with the prophet Nathan for the building of the temple or houſe of God: but was forbidden it, becauſe he was a man of war, and had ſhed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all deteſt homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beaſt. The wars which David had made were juſt, and the blood therein ſhed was of the enemies of God, and his church: yet for this cauſe it was not permitted that his hands ſhould lay the foundation of that holy temple. Hereby it appears how greatly thoſe princes deceive themſelves, who think by bloodſhed and terror of their wars, to make themſelves in greatneſs like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodneſs, or ſeek the bleſſedneſs promiſed by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now altho' it was not pleaſing to the Lord to accept a temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent ſo well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happy promiſe of the everlaſting throne, that ſhould be eſtabliſhed in his ſeed.

SECT. V.

The overthrow of the Philiſtines and Moabites.

SOON after this David overthrew the Philiſtines, which made them altogether powerleſs, and unable to make any invaſion upon Iſrael in haſte. For it is written, accepit frænum Amgaris e manu Philiſtæorum; which place our Engliſh Geneva converts in theſe words, And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philiſtines. The Latin of [c] Junius giveth another and a better ſenſe; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the ſtrong city of Gath, or Geth, and ſo the Geneva hath it in the marginal note. This city of Gath was the ſame which was afterwards Dio-Cæſaria, ſet on the frontier of Paleſtina at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incurſions, and thereinto their retreat in all their invaſions, which being taken by David and demoliſhed, there was left no ſuch frontier town of equal ſtrength to the Philiſtines on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath ſtood the Hebrews call Ammæ, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his 1ſt book and 13th chapter. This expoſition is made plain and confirmed in the 1ſt of Chron. chap. xviii.

There was no nation bordering the Jews that ſo greatly afflicted them as the Philiſtines did, who before the time of Saul (to the end they might not ſharpen any weapon againſt them) did not leave one ſmith in all their cities and villages of that kind, but inforc'd them to come down into their territory, [d] for all iron work whatſoever they needed; ſo as the Iſraelites till this time of David were ſeldom free from paying tribute to the Philiſtines.

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the firſt of which he was indangered by Iſhbi-benob, the head of whoſe ſpear weighed 300 ſheckles of braſs, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time [e] Abiſhai ſuccoured David, and ſlew the Philiſtines, whereupon the counſellors and captains of David (leſt the light of Iſrael might by his loſs be quench'd) vowed that he ſhould not thenceforth hazard himſelf in any battel. The ſecond and third encounter and overthrow of the Philiſtines was at Gob, a place near Geſar, and the laſt at Gath or Geth. And being now better aſſured of the Philiſtines by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithſtanding in his adverſity he ſought ſuccour, and left his parents with him in truſt. But whether it were the ſame king or no it is not known.

The Rabins feign that Moab ſlew thoſe kinsfolks of David, which lived under his protection in Saul's time, but queſtionleſs David well knew how that nation had been always enemies to Iſrael, and took all the occaſions to vex them that were offered. And he alſo remembred that in the xxiiid of Deuter. God commanded Iſrael not to ſeek the peace or proſperity of the Moabites, which David well obſerved, for he deſtroy'd two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the ſon of Rehob king thereof. The place is ſet down in the deſcription of the holy land: to which I refer the reader.

SECT. VI.

The war which David made upon the Syrians.

IT is written in the text; David ſmote alſo Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words [as he went to recover his border] be referred to David or Hadadezer it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article [he] hath relation to David, who finding Tohu oppreſs'd by Hadadezer, overthrew the one and ſuccoured the other. But the ancient and moſt received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any ſuch enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in far better caſe to have proceeded after his victory than before: ſeeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back, either to purſue him, to take victuals and ſupplies from him, or to ſtop the paſſages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, ſeeing David was either to paſs through a part of Arabia the deſart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army conſiſting of footmen, for the moſt, if not all: he had now both horſe and chariots good ſtore to carry his proviſions thro' thoſe uncultivated places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jeruſalem, after he had twice overthrown the Syrian army, not bending his courſe towards the river Euphrates, but ſeeking to eſtabliſh his purchaſes already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not king David, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is ſaid.

The king of Syria Damaſcena, and of Damaſcus, whereof that region is ſo called, hearing that Adadezer was overthrown by the Iſraelites, fearing his own eſtate, and the loſs of his own country which adjoined to Syria Zobah of Hadadezer, ſent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his ſuccour: but theſe, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too ſoon for themſelves: for there periſhed of thoſe ſupplies 22000. This king of Damaſcus, Joſephus (out of Nicolaus an ancient hiſtorian) calleth Adad, who was alſo of the ſame name and family as all thoſe other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatneſs, and ſo continued for ten deſcents, till they were extinguiſhed by the Aſſyrians, as is ſhewed heretofore. David, having now reduced Damaſcus under his obedience, left a garriſon therein as he did in Edom: having alſo ſack'd the adjoining cities of Betah, and Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which cities Ptolemy calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. [a] Tohu, or Thoi, whoſe country of Hamath joined to Adadezer (as in the deſcription of the holy land the reader may perceive) ſent his ſon Joram to congratulate this ſucceſs of David: partly becauſe he had war with Adadezer, and partly becauſe he feared David now victorious. He alſo preſented David with veſſels of gold, ſilver, and braſs, all which together with the golden ſhield of the Aramites, and the beſt of all the ſpoils of other nations David dedicated unto God at his return. Junius tranſlated the words [clypeos aureos] by umbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the boſſes only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But becauſe Roboam made ſhields of braſs in place of theſe of Adadezer, at ſuch time as Shicah the Egyptian ſack'd the temple of Jeruſalem, it may be gathered thereby, that thoſe of Adadezer were golden ſhields.

This done, David ſent embaſſadors to Hanum king of the Ammonites to congratulate his eſtabliſhment in his father's kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahaſh, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill adviſed, and over-jealous of his eſtate, uſed David's meſſengers ſo barbarouſly and contemptuouſly (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as he thereby drew a war upon himſelf, which neither his own ſtrength, nor all the aids purchaſed could put off, or ſuſtain. For notwithſtanding that he had waged 33000 ſoldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vaſſals of Adadezer 20000, and of [c] Maachah and Iſhtob 13000 (for which he diſburſed a thouſand talents of ſilver) yet all theſe great armies together, with the ſtrength of the Ammonites, were by [d] Joab and his brother Abiſhai eaſily broken and put to ruin: and that without any great loſs or ſlaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites alſo retreated into their cities, the one holding themſelves within the walls, the other in their deſarts adjoining, till Joab was returned to Jeruſalem.

Hadadezer, hearing that Joab had diſmiſſed his army, aſſembled his forces again, and ſent all the companies that he could levy out of Meſopotamia, who under the command of Shobach paſſed Euphrates, and incamp'd at [e] Helam, on the ſouth ſide thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, aſſembled all the ableſt men of Iſrael, and marched towards the Syrian army in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia: to wit, at Helam, a place no leſs diſtant from Damaſcus, towards the north-eaſt, than Jeruſalem was towards the ſouth-weſt. Now David (ſpeaking humanly) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the fartheſt-off journey that ever he made) becauſe he was now lord of Damaſcus, which lay in the mid-way. He alſo poſſeſs'd himſelf of [f] Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Solomon afterwards ſtrongly fortified, and this city was but one day's journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had he two ſafe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damaſcus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they loſt 40000 horſemen, and 700 chariots, together with Shobach general of their army. The Chronicles call theſe 40000 ſoldiers footmen, and ſo Junius converts it, and ſo is it very probable. For the army of Iſrael conſiſting of footmen, could hardly have ſlaughtered 40000 horſe-men, except they quitted their horſes and fought on foot. So are the chariots taken in this battel, numbred at 7000, in the 1ſt of Chronicles chap. ix. in which number, as I conceive, all the ſoldiers that ſerved in them, with their conductors, are included; ſo as there died of the Syrians in this war againſt David, before he forced them to tribute, 100000 footmen, beſides all their horſemen and waggoners, and beſides all thoſe that Joab ſlew, when they fled at the firſt encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithſtanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered ſtrength again, and afflicted the kings of Juda often: but the kings of Iſrael they impoveriſhed, even to the laſt end of that ſtate.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Meſopotamians from the party and confederacy of Ammon: he ſent out Joab the lieutenant of his armies to forrage and deſtroy their territory, and to beſiege Rabbah, afterwards Philadelphia, which after a while the Iſraelites maſtered and poſſeſs'd. The king's crown, which weighed a talent of gold, garniſhed with precious ſtones, David ſet on his own head, and carried away with him the reſt of the riches and ſpoil of the city. And tho' David ſtay'd at Jeruſalem, following the war of Uriah his wife, till ſuch time as the city was brought to extremity, and ready to be entred: yet Joab, in honour of David, forbore the laſt aſſault, and entrance thereof, till his maſter's arrival. To the people he uſed extream rigour (if we may ſo call it, being exerciſed againſt heathen idolaters) for ſome of them he tore with harrows, ſome he ſawed aſunder, others he caſt into burning kilns, in which he bak'd tile and brick.

Of David's troubles in his reign, and of his forces.

BUT as victory begetteth ſecurity, and our preſent worldly felicity a forgetfulneſs of our former miſeries, and many times of God himſelf the giver of all goodneſs: ſo did theſe changes, in the fortune and ſtate of this good king, change alſo the zealous care which formerly he had to pleaſe God in the preciſe obſervation of his laws and commandments. For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (againſt whom he was wont to ask counſel from the Lord) he began to be adviſed by his own human affections, and vain deſires. For he was not only ſatisfied to take Uriah's wife from him, and to uſe her by ſtealth; but he imbroidered his adultery with Uriah's ſlaughter, giving order to his truſty ſervant [g] Joab to marſhal him in the front or point of thoſe Iſraelites, which gave an aſſault upon the ſuburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any poſſibility of prevailing. And, that which could no leſs diſpleaſe God than the reſt, he was content that many others of his beſt ſervants and ſoldiers ſhould periſh together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent againſt him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the higheſt of happineſs; and his days then to come were filled with joys and woes interchangeable, his trodden down ſorrows began again to ſpring; and thoſe perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harveſt of many cares and diſcontentments. And if it had pleaſed God to take the witneſs of David's own mouth againſt him, as David himſelf did againſt the Amalekite, which pretended to have ſlain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehenſion as the other was of the death he ſuffered. For when Nathan the prophet propounded unto him his own error, in the perſon of another, to wit, of him that took the poor man's ſheep that had none elſe, the bereaver being lord of many: he then vowed it to the living Lord, that ſuch a one ſhould die the death. And hereof, altho' it pleaſed God to pardon David for his life, which remiſſion the prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he delivered him God's juſtice, together with his mercy in the tenor following; [a] Now therefore the ſword ſhall never depart from thy houſe, &c. becauſe thou haſt taken his wife to be thy wife, and haſt ſlain Uriah with the ſword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David loſt the child of adultery which he begot on Berſheba. Secondly, His own ſon Amnon being in love with his half-ſiſter Tamar, by the advice of his couſin-german the ſon of Shimeah, David's brother, poſſeſs'd her by force: which when he had performed, he thruſt her from him in a careleſs and deſpightful manner. Two years after which foul and inceſtuous act, Abſalom cauſed him to be murdered, at the feaſt of his ſheep-ſhearing; not perchance in revenge of Tamar's raviſhment alone: but having it in his heart to uſurp the kingdom; in which, becauſe he could not in any ſort be aſſured of Amnon, he thought his affair greatly advanced by his deſtruction. So the one brother having raviſhed his own ſiſter, and then deſpiſed her; the other after a long diſſembled malice, firſt made his own brother drunken, and then ſlaughtered him; which done, he fled away, and lived under the ſafeguard of [b] Talmai king of Geſhur, near Damaſcus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen king. Thirdly, When Abſalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly becauſe of the great affection of David towards his ſon) was brought again; firſt to the king's favour, and then to his preſence. He began inſtantly to practiſe againſt [c] David his father, ſeeking by the pretence of common juſtice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his father's equity, to win unto himſelf a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a puniſhment of David's ſin.

The company which [d] Abſalom gathered at the firſt were but 200 men: which he carried with him from Jeruſalem to Hebron; pretending, tho' impiouſly, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired unto him, and many troops of people from all places, he proclaimed himſelf king, and was by the people (whoſe hearts God had turned from their lawful prince) accepted ſo readily, that David doubting to be ſet upon on the ſudden, durſt not truſt himſelf in his own city of Jeruſalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of ſurprize: but encamped in the fields and deſarts, with ſome 600 of his guards, and few elſe. The prieſts he left in Jeruſalem, with the ark of God, from whom he deſired to be advertiſed of thoſe things that chanced, to whom he directed [e] Huſhai his truſty friend and ſervant, praying him to make himſelf in all his outward actions and counſels of Abſalom's party and confederacy, thereby the better to diſcover unto him the purpoſes of Achitophel, a revolted counſellor, whoſe practices he greatly doubted. And now when treaſon was in faſhion, Ziba alſo ſought to betray his maſter Mephiboſheth the ſon of Jonathan: and Shimei of the houſe of Saul (the fire of whoſe hatred David's proſperity had ſmothered, but his adverſity illightened) holding himſelf upon the advantage of a mountain ſide, [f] caſt ſtones at David, and moſt deſpitefully curſed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbad Abiſhai to purſue him for the preſent, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his ſon Solomon. Abſalom being now poſſeſs'd of Jeruſalem, was adviſ'd by Achitophel to uſe his [g] father's concubines in ſome ſuch publick place, as all Iſrael might aſſure themſelves, that he was irreconcileable to his father: whereof being perſuaded they would then reſolvedly adhere to Abſalom and his cauſe, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This ſavage and impious (tho' crafty counſel) Achitophel indeed urged for his own reſpect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his deſtruction; who moſt of all others inflamed Abſalom againſt his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raiſe up evil againſt thee out of thine own houſe, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he ſhall lie with thy wives in the ſight of the ſun: for thou didſt it ſecretly, but I will do this thing before all Iſrael, and before the ſun, 2 Sam. xii. 11. He alſo gave advice to Abſalom, that himſelf with an army of 12000 men might be employed at the inſtant for the ſurprizing of David, which had willingly been imbraced by Abſalom, had not [h] Huſhai David's faithful ſervant, given counter advice, and ſway'd it: perſuading Abſalom, that it was fitter and more ſafe for him with all the ſtrength of Iſrael, to purſue his father; than by ſuch a troop, which David's valour, and thoſe of his attendants, might either endanger or reſiſt. This delay in Abſalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loſs of the one and delivery of the other. whereupon [i] Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occaſion fore-ſhewed) the ſucceſs which followed, diſpoſed of his own eſtate, and then forſook both the party and the care of Abſalom, and of his own life.

David being advertiſed of this enterprize againſt him, march'd away all night, and paſs'd Jordan, poſſeſſing himſelf of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the ſame wherein Iſhboſheth himſelf, in the war againſt David after Saul's death ſeated himſelf. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi, the ſon of Nahaſh the Ammonite, whom David loved, the ſame which Joſephus calleth Shiphar. And tho' it be greatly diſputed what this Shobi was, yet the moſt general and probable opinion makes him a ſecond brother to Hanum, whom David for his father's ſake eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, after Hanum's overthrow. In thankfulneſs whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came alſo to David's aſſiſtance Machir of Lodabar, guardian in former times to Mephiboſheth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the king and Abſalom prepared to fight; Abſalom made Amaſa commander of the army of Iſrael, the ſame place which Joab held with David; an office next the king himſelf, like unto that of the majors of the palace anciently in France. David, perſuaded by his company, ſtay'd in Mahanaim, and diſpoſed the forces he had to Joab, Abiſhai and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that iſſued out at the port of Mahanaim, that they ſhould ſpare the life of Abſalom. But Joab, beſides that he was very cruel by nature, remembred that Abſalom had lately diſpoſed of his government to Amaſa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Abſalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not perſuade the meſſenger to return and kill him, [a]he himſelf with his own ſervants diſpatch'd him. It appeared alſo by the ſequel, that Joab affected Adonijah, whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the diſpoſition of Abſalom, he embraced the preſent advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and ſorrowed, not only as a man that had loſt a ſon, but as one that had outlived all his worldly joys, and ſeen every delight of life interred. For he ſo hid himſelf from his people, as thoſe, which hoped for honour and reward after ſo great a victory, covered themſelves alſo in the city, as if they had committed the greateſt offences, and had rather deſerved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab preſenting himſelf before David, perſuaded him to diſſemble his ſorrow for the preſent, and to ſhew himſelf to the army. For firſt he told him that he had diſcountenanced his faithful ſervants, who had that day preſerved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a king, than not only not to acknowledge ſo great a love and conſtancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet reſolvedly expoſe themſelves to great perils for his ſake: but on the contrary grieve and lament at their good ſucceſs. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Abſalom at an eaſy rate. Secondly, He urged, that it was generally believ'd, that he lov'd his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witneſſed by this his mourning, that he had not any reſpect of his princes, and others his faithful ſervants, but would more have joyed if they had all periſhed, and Abſalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulneſs and approved valour gotten.

Laſtly, He uſed this prevalent argument, that if the king came not out and ſhewed himſelf publickly to his men of war, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return; concluding with this fearful threatning: [b]And that will be worſe unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By theſe overbold and arrogant ſpeeches (tho' perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab rais'd David from his bed of ſorrow, and brought him to the gates of the city among the people, whom he aſſured of his love and affection, eſpecially Amaſa who commanded the army of Abſalom, to whom he promiſed the office of lieutenantſhip; the ſame which Abſalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amaſa were not ſatisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the ſtrength of Iſrael, now under his commandment.

This done, the king marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his paſſage he pardoned [c]Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face; but this remiſſion was but external, as appeared afterward. He alſo accepted of Mephiboſheth's excuſe, whom Ziba had formerly falſly accuſed and betrayed.

He alſo intreated [d]Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberal hoſt, to follow him to Jeruſalem, that he might reward his ſervice done him; who excuſing himſelf by his age, appointed his ſon Chimham to attend the king.

At Gilgal on this ſide Jordan, all the tribes aſſembled, and after ſome contention which of them ought to have moſt intereſt in David, the army brake, and David returned to Jeruſalem. But Sheba, the ſon of Bichri, a Benjamite, of the faction of the houſe of Saul, finding ſome diſcontentment among the Iſraelites, withdrew them from David, as from a ſtranger in whom they had no intereſt; and it ſeemeth that many of the people of the outtribes, and in effect of all but Judah, bare ſtill a good affection to the iſſues of their firſt king. David employed his reconciled captain Amaſa, to give him contentment, and to witneſs his truſt, as alſo becauſe he conceived that Amaſa had intereſt in thoſe revolts of Iſrael more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to aſſemble the army within three days, which he foreſlowed; but being onward on his way, Abiſhai, Joab's brother, was ſent after him, with David's guard and beſt ſoldiers, whom alſo Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amaſa near Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, [e]gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no leſs jealous of Amaſa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the ſame manner, and out of the ſame impatient ambition. This done, he purſued [f]Sheba, and finding him enclos'd in Abel, aſſaulted the city with that fury, that the citizens by the perſuaſions of a wiſe woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba's head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, he retreated his army to Jeruſalem, and commanded as before all the hoſt of Iſrael.

The next act of David's, was the delivery of Saul's ſons or kinſmen to the Gibeonites, whom thoſe citizens hung up in revenge of their father's cruelty. David had knowledge from the oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three years, came by reaſon of Saul and his houſe; to wit, for the ſlaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this ſatisfaction, both becauſe he had warrant from God himſelf, as alſo, if we may judge humanly, to rid himſelf of Saul's line, by whom he and his might, as well in the preſent as in the future, be greatly moleſted and endangered; only he ſpared Mephiboſheth the ſon of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the text; The king took the two ſons of Riſpah whom ſhe bare unto Saul, and the five ſons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom ſhe bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites, 2 Sam. xxi.

Junius calls this Michol the ſiſter of her that was David's wife, ſhe whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her huſband: the ſame which is named Merab in 1 Sam. xviii, who was firſt promiſed to David, when he ſlew Goliah in the valley of Raphaim: and becauſe it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any human reſpect in the delivery of her children, it is only known to God.

[a] 2 Sam. 18. [b] 2 Sam. 19. [c] 2 Sam. 19. 23. [d] 2 Sam. 19. 38. [e] 2 Sam. 20. 10. [f] 2 Sam. 20. 22.

Now whereas the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better tranſlation were out of the Hebrew word here uſed, having an eclipſis or defect, and ſignifieth, as I am informed, one of the ſame kindred, as in the 19th verſe of the ſame xxiſt chapter it is ſaid of Goliah, whoſe ſpear was as weighty as a weaver's beam, when as by the ſame eclipſis it muſt be underſtood by the brother of Goliah: Goliah himſelf being formerly ſlain.

As by the death of Saul's children God ſecured the houſe of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: ſo did he ſtrengthen both the king and nation againſt foreign enemies, by the valour of many brave commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Iſrael is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty captains of thouſands there were, all men of mark, and great reputation in war. Over theſe were ſix colonels, whoſe valour was ſo extraordinary, that it might well be held as miraculous. Theſe colonels had ſome difference of place and honour, which ſeemeth to have been given upon meer conſideration of their virtue. For Abiſhai the brother of Joab, who in the war againſt the Ammonites and Aramites was lieutenant, and commanded half the army, could not attain to the honour of the firſt rank, but was fain to reſt contented with being principal of the three colonels of the ſecond order, notwithſtanding his nearneſs in blood unto the king, the flouriſhing eſtate of his own houſe, and his well approved ſervices. All theſe colonels and captains, with the companies belonging to them, may ſeem to have been ſuch as were continually retained, or at the leaſt kept in readineſs for any occaſion, conſidering that the numbers which were muſtered and drawn out, if need required, into the field, very far exceeded thirty thouſand, yea or thirty times as many. They were moſt of them ſuch as had followed the king in Saul's time, and been hardened with his adverſities. Others there were very many, and principal men in their ſeveral tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but theſe captains and colonels (who with Joab, that was general of all the king's forces, make up the number of 37) were the eſpecial men of war, and reckoned as David's worthies [a]. The long reign of David, as it is known to have conſumed many of theſe excellent men of war, ſo may it probably be gueſſed to have waſted the moſt of thoſe whoſe deaths we find no where mentioned. For the ſons of Zeruia, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Solomon, who wanted his brother Abiſhai to ſtand by his ſide in his laſt extremity.

By the actions fore-paſſed in the time of David, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33 years, or thereabout, when the poſterity of Saul was rooted out, ſo that he enjoyed about ſeven years of entire quiet and ſecurity, wherein it pleaſed God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the ſucceſſion of Solomon in his father's throne. In this time alſo David having eſtabliſhed all things in Juda and Iſrael, and the borders thereof, he again diſpleaſed God by [b] numbring the people, as in oſtentation of his power: in which he imployed Joab with other captains of his army, who after 9 months and 20 days travel, returned with the account and regiſter of all the people, able and fit to bear arms, and they amounted to the number of 1300000, beſides Levi and Benjamin; whereof in Juda and the cities thereof 500000, and in Iſrael 800000.

For this, when by the prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three puniſhments, whereof he might ſubmit himſelf to which he pleaſed; to wit, ſeven years famine; three months war, wherein he ſhould be unproſperous in all attempts, and be chaſed by his enemies; or a general peſtilence to laſt three days: David made choice to bow himſelf under the hand of God only, and left himſelf ſubject to that cruel diſeaſe, which hath no compaſſion or reſpect of perſons, of which there periſhed 70000. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth us this divine reaſon, [c] For his mercies are great.

SECT. VIII.

Of the laſt acts of David: Adonijah's faction: the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

LASTLY, when he grew weak and feeble, and paſt the acts and knowledge of women, he was yet adviſed to lie in the arms of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak eſtate of body, when he was in a manner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldeſt ſon (Amnon and Abſalom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the prieſt, began manifeſtly to prepare for his eſtabliſhment in the kingdom after his father. For being the eldeſt now living of David's ſons, and a man of goodly perſonage, Solomon yet young and born of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by St. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others ſuppoſe) he preſumed to carry the matter without reſiſtance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bathſheba the mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promiſe, that Solomon her ſon ſhould reign after him (Nathan the prophet affirming the ſame thing unto the king, and ſeconding her report of Adonijah's preſumption) the king calling unto him Zadoc the prieſt, Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the captain of his guard, gave charge and commiſſion to anoint Solomon, and to ſet him on the mule whereon himſelf uſed to ride in his greateſt ſtate: which done, Solomon attended and ſtrongly guarded by the ordinary and choice men of war, the Cherethites and Pelethites, ſhewed himſelf to the people. Thoſe tidings being reported to Adonijah, he preſently abandoned his aſſiſtants, and for the ſafety of his life he held by the horns of the altar, whom for the preſent Solomon pardoned. After this, [d] David had remaining two eſpecial cares, whereof he was deſirous to diſcharge his thoughts; the one, concerning the peace of the land, which might be diſturbed by ſome rebellion againſt Solomon; the other, concerning the building of the temple, which he ſought by all means to advance, and make the buſineſs publick. [e] To bring theſe intentions to good effect he ſummoned a parliament, conſiſting of all the princes of Iſrael, the princes of the ſeveral tribes, all the captains and officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who repaired unto Jeruſalem.

In this aſſembly the king ſtood up, and ſignified his purpoſe of building the temple, ſhewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occaſion to lay open his own title to the crown, ſhewing that the kingdom was by God's ordinance due to the tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his bleſſing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himſelf was pleaſed to make choice of him among all his father's ſons. In like manner he ſaid that God himſelf had appointed Solomon by name to be his ſucceſſor: whereupon he earneſtly charged both the people and his ſon, to conform themſelves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this work of the Lord's houſe which Solomon was choſen to build [a]. Then produced he the pattern of the work according to the form which God himſelf had appointed; and ſo laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The king's propoſition was ſo well approved by the princes and people, that whereas he himſelf had given 3000 talents of gold, and 7000 of ſilver, they added unto it 7000 of gold, and 10000 of ſilver, beſides braſs, iron and jewels, heartily rejoycing in the advancement of ſo religious a work. This buſineſs being well diſpatched, a ſolemn feaſt with great ſacrifice was made, at which time Solomon was again anointed king, and received fealty of all the princes and people of the land, and of all the princes his brethren the ſons of king David. Solomon being thus eſtabliſhed king, his father David finding himſelf even in the hands of death, firſt exhorted his ſon to exerciſe the ſame courage and ſtrength of mind, which himſelf had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterpriſes, he uttered theſe mighty words; [b] Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and keep his ſtatutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his teſtimonies, as it is written in the law of Moſes, &c. to the performance of which God faſtened the ſucceſſion, and proſperity of his iſſues. For this done (ſaith God himſelf) [c] Thou ſhalt not want one of thy poſterity to ſit upon the throne of Iſrael.

Secondly, He adviſed him concerning Joab, who out of doubt had ſerved David from the firſt aſſault of Jeruſalem to the laſt of his wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, ſaving that he faſtened himſelf to Adonijah (his maſter yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenged, ſo was it his will that Joab ſhould drink of the ſame cup, whereof he had enforced other men to taſte, and ſuffer the ſame violence which himſelf had unjuſtly ſtrucken others withal, qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner and Amaſa of their lives, having againſt the one the pretence only of his brother's ſlaughter, whom Abner had ſlain in the time of war, and could not avoid him: againſt the other but a meer jealouſy of his growing great in the favour of David. And tho' Joab aſſured himſelf that Abner and Amaſa being dead, there was none left either to equal him or ſupplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raiſed up Benaiah the ſon of Jehoiadah, to puſh him from the ſanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For David giveth this cauſe to Solomon againſt Joab, that he ſlew the captains of the hoſt of Iſrael, [d] and ſhed blood of battel in peace; and to this apparent and juſt cauſe, it is not improbable but that David remembred the ill affection of Joab towards Solomon, which Joab made manifeſt by the untimely ſetting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed againſt David, of which in theſe words he put his ſon Solomon in mind; [e] Thou knoweſt alſo what Joab the ſon of Zeruiah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abſalom, contrary to the king's deſire, or by the proud words uſed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abſalom; or whether it were the publiſhing of David's letter unto him for the killing of Uriah: thereby to diſgrace Solomon as deſcended of ſuch a mother, the ſcriptures are ſilent. True it is, that thoſe great men of war do oftentimes behave themſelves exceeding inſolently towards their princes, both in reſpect of their ſervice done, as alſo becauſe they flatter themſelves with an opinion, that either their maſters cannot miſs them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrown many a worthy man otherwiſe deſerving of great honour and reſpect.

He alſo gave order to Solomon, to rid himſelf of Shimei, who not long before had caſt ſtones at David, and curſed him to his face. And albeit by reaſon of his oath and promiſe David ſpared Shimei all the time himſelf lived, yet being duſt and in the grave he ſlew him, by the hand of Solomon his ſon [f]. Hence it ſeemeth that king Henry the ſeventh of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the eighth to execute Pool as ſoon as himſelf was buried, having made promiſe to the king of Spain, when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor ſuffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yield unto Solomon any ſuch great profit or aſſurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumæa, and Rezin of Damaſcus to vex him: who, as the ſcriptures witneſs [g], were emboldened to enterprize upon Solomon, hearing that David ſlept with his fathers, and that Joab the captain of the hoſt was dead. Now when David had reigned in all 40 years, to wit, in Hebron 7 years, and in Jeruſalem 33, he died.

For his perſon, he was of ſmall ſtature, but exceeding ſtrong. For his internal gifts and graces he ſo far exceeded all other men, as, putting his human frailty apart, he was ſaid by God himſelf to be a man according to his own heart. The Pſalms which he wrote witneſs his piety, and his excellent learning: of whom Jerome to Paulinus. David Simonides noſter, Pindarus & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Chriſtum lyra perſonat, & in decachordo Pſalterio ab inferis ſuſcitat reſurgentem. David (ſaith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, he playeth Chriſt on his harp, and on a ten-ſtringed pſalter he raiſeth him up riſing from the dead. And being both a king and a prophet, he foretelleth Chriſt more lightſomely and lively than all the reſt.

The book of the Pſalms, ſaith Glycas, was divided, ordered and diſtinguiſhed, by Ezekias: but whether all the pſalms were written by David it is diverſly diſputed. For [h] Athanaſius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers authors, anſwering the titles of the ſeveral Pſalms, as Moſes, Solomon, and the reſt hereafter named, and that only 73 Pſalms were compoſed by David himſelf, namely thoſe which are intitled ipſius David. For the 50th and the 72d, with the 10 that follow, are beſtowed on Aſaph the ſon of Barachia, 11 others on the ſons of Korah, and 11 are aſcribed to Moſes, to wit, the 89th and the 10 following, and ſo they are intitled in the old Hebrew copies, tho' the Vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) ſtyle them otherwiſe. The ſuppoſed nine authors of theſe Pſalms which David wrote not, [a] Sixtus Senensis nameth as followeth; Solomon, Moses, (whom Aben-Ezra, contrary to Jerome, maketh one of David's singers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziaira, Idithum, and the three sons of Chore. But St. Chrysostome makes David the sole author of all the Psalms, and so doth [b] St. Augustine, reasoning in this manner. Altho' (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms only unto David, which are over-written ipsius David, and the rest intitled ipsi David to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce evangelica Salvatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109 sic incipit: Dixit Dominus Domino meo, sede a dextris meis, &c. The voice of the gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himself in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the cixth Psalm begins thus, The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are used both by Christ and the apostles, and he was as a pattern to all the kings and princes that succeeded him.

His story, and all his particular actions, were written by the prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in 1 Chron. xxix. 19. For the several parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were as it seems written by these three holy men.

[c] Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans, during the time of the siege, sought for succour from David, and that he stay'd neuter in that war. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time betwixt David and the Trojan war. For it is generally received, that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samson, judges of Israel, about the world's year 2848, and David died in the year 2991.

SECT. IX.

Of the treasures of David and Solomon.

HIS treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 1st of Chronicles, chap. xxii. ver. 14. that he left Solomon for the building of the temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brass and iron passing all weight, which is more than any king of the world possess'd besides himself, and his son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty and three cartload and a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver, or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides threescore and seventeen millions of French crowns, or of our money, twenty three millions and one thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear; seeing that the judges had not any treasure, nor any soveraign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars, they were followed by such voluntiers as the several tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possess'd by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiss to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amass up such mighty treasures. For tho' parsimony be it self a great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius, in his 9th book and last chapter de præparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the temple, built a navy in Melanis (or, as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a city of Arabia, and from thence sent men to dig for gold in the island Urphe, which Ortelius thinks, was Ophir, tho' Eupolemus in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this island is in the Red sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury. Pineda, l. 4. de rebus Salomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather riches. Much land doubtless he gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitful vallies near Jordan in Traconitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israelites. These demesns belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his wars, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1 Chron. xvii. that Jehonathan was over his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the towns; that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei over the vineyards; and Sabdi over the store of the wine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oil, also that he had herdsmen that had charge over his cattel, both in the high lands, and in the plains, over his sheep, camels and asses. And this custom of enriching themselves by husbandry and cattle the ancient kings every where held, both before and after David's time. For we read of [d] Pharoah, that he spoke to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren, or of their servants, to be rulers over his cattle. We read of [e] Uzzia, that he loved husbandry, had much cattle, and ploughmen, and dressers of vines: likewise we read it in all Greeks poets, that the wealth of the ancient kings did especially consist in their herds and flocks, whereof it were needless to cite Augeas and Admetus, or any other, for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David, it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not imploy'd in husbandry, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainful professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtless were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tohu, and others) we may add the great spoils which he found in the cities and countries which he conquered: also the head-money which was gathered per legem capitationis; by the law of capitation or head-money, every man, rich or poor, paying half a sickle of the sanctuary, which is about as much as 14 pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous sum in that kingdom: wherein 1570000 fighting men were numbred by [f] Joab. Now altho' this law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confess is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practice. And by these means might he be able to leave those huge treasures to Solomon. Yet it may seem that this great mass of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his own in private, and so will it appear the less wonderful that he left so much. Of his own liberality we find, that he gave to the building of the temple 3000 talents of gold, and 7000 talents of silver, a great sum: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continual encrease, without any loss or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Joshua. The revenues of the sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defray'd the daily expences, and maintained the priest and Levites) were partly raised out of the head-money beforementioned; partly out of the spoils gotten in war. For all the booty was divided into two [a] parts, whereof the soldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the country received benefit of the victory, yet so that the soldiers had a far greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lord's tribute, which was one in fifty of that which the people received, and one in five hundred of that which was given to the soldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousandth part of the whole booty. So in the spoil of Midian, 32000 women being taken, the army had 16000 of them for [b] slaves, and the congregation the other 16000; but out of the 16000 given to the army were exempted 32 for the Lord's tribute. Out of the people's number were taken 320. By this means the lesser that the army was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every soldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergo more than ordinary travel in domestic affairs, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lord's tribute was always certain, yea, many times it was increased, either by some especial commandment, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metals found in Jericho, were [c] consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the rulers and people, as when after the victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one man, all jewels, bracelets, ear-rings, and the like, were [d] offered up, as voluntary presents.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppress'd, and trodden down by other nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never got possession of the tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole land of [e] Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering nations. For that this treasury was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David and his lieutenant Joab, it is recorded, that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in war, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former judges and captains in other ages. Certain it is, that the conquest of David brought into the land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted; but these vast sums of an 100000 talents of silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in many former ages, than to have been the mere fruits of his own industry.

Now concerning the riches of [g] Solomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues, with his tributes, 666 [f] talents of gold, besides the customs of spices. He had also six rich returns from the East-Indies, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the 22d year of his reign, and ruled 40 years. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Iturea; all of [g] Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Hevites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, tho' subjected.

Into this flourishing estate was the kingdom of Israel reduced by David, who after 40 years reign, and 70 years of life, [h] died in a good age, full of days, riches, and honour, and was buried in the city of David. It is written by [i] Josephus, that there was hid in David's tomb, a marvelous quantity of treasures, insomuch as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanæi, or race of the Maccabees, called himself king) 1300 years after, drew thence 3000 talents, to rid himself of Antiochus, then besieging Jerusalem, and afterwards Herod opening another cell, had also an exceeding mass of gold and silver therein. And it was an ancient custom to bury treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselves by nothing so much in their first conquest. That Solomon did bury so much treasure in his father's grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was fain to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it not withal considered that his want of money grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the sepulchre of David, the scriptures have no mention, but only the sepulchres of the kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of burial. Yet the monuments of those kings, as (by relation of the duke of [k] Ulika) they remained within these 30 years, and are like to remain still, are able to make any report credible, of cost bestowed upon them.

SECT. X.

Of the Philistines, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistines, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time, somewhat here may be spoken.

They descended of Casloim, who according to Isidore, l. 9. 19. and Jos. l. 1. Ant. 17. was one of the sons of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five cities of petty principalities; namely, [l] Azotus or Asdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The firſt king of theſe Philiſtines, which the ſcriptures have named, was that [a] Abimelech which loved Sara, Abraham's wife.

The ſecond Abimelech lived at once with Iſaac, to whom Iſaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then reſiding at Gerar in the border of Idumea, which Abimelech fancied [b] Iſaac's wife: as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the 2d, the Philiſtine kings are not remembred in the ſcriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Ariſtocratical. For they are afterwards named princes of the Philiſtines, howſoever [c] Achis be named king of Gath, the ſame to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Solomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive ſervant, which time the ſeeking of his ſervant was the loſs of his life. Jeremiah the prophet ſpeaketh of the kings of Paleſtine or Philiſtine. Amos nameth the king of Aſcalon: Zacharias, a king of Gaza. The reſt of the wars of the Philiſtines are remembred in the catalogue of the judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I ſhall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii king of Alba called Latinus Silvius, who is ſaid to have ruled that part of Italy 50 years. And about his 14th year Codrus the laſt king of the Athenians died, to whom ſucceeded the firſt prince of thoſe, who being called after Medon, Medontidæ, without regal name governed Athens during their life.

The reaſons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of ſoveraignty, but in honour of Codrus only. For when the Grecians of Doris, a region between Phocis and the mountain Oeta, ſought counſel from the oracle, for their ſucceſs in their wars againſt the Athenians, it was anſwered, that then undoubtedly they ſhould prevail, and become lords of that ſtate, when they could obtain any victory againſt the nation, and yet preſerve the Athenian king living. Codrus, by ſome intelligence being informed of this anſwer, withdrew himſelf from his own forces, and putting on the habit of a common ſoldier, entred the camp of the Dorians, and killing the firſt he encountred, was himſelf forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31ſt king of Aſſyria, which others account but the 30th, began to rule that empire, about the 13th year of David, and held it 38 years.

Near the ſame time began Ixion the 2d king of the Heraclidæ, the ſon of Euryſthenes in Corinth; and Agis the 2d of the Heraclidæ in Lacedæmon: in honour of which Agis, his ſucceſſors were called Agidæ, for many years after. He reſtored the Laconians to their former liberty: he overcame the citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refuſed to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetual ſlavery; whereof it came, that all the Meſſenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like ſort from the Sclavi came the word ſlave. For when that nation iſſuing out of Sarmatia, now called Ruſſia, had ſeiſed upon the country of Illyria, and made it their own by conqueſt, their victory pleaſed them ſo highly, that thereupon they called themſelves by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language Glorious. But in after-times (that warmer climate having thawed their northern hardineſs, and not ripened their wits) when they were trodden down, and made ſervants to their neighbours; the Italians, which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen ſlaves, uſing the word as a name of reproach: in which ſenſe it is now current thro' many countries.

Other chronologers make this Agis, the third king of Sparta, and ſomewhat later, about the 23d year of David, and ſay that Acheſtratus was the fourth king of this race, the ſame whom [d] Euſebius calls Labotes, and ſets him in the thirteenth year of Solomon.

In the tenth year of Acheſtratus, Androclus, the 3d ſon of Codrus, aſſiſted by the Iones, built Epheſus in Caria, who, after the adjoining of the iſle of Samos to his territory, was ſlain by the Carians, whoſe country he uſurped. He was buried (ſaith Pauſanias) in one of the gates of [e] Epheſus, called Magnetes, his armed ſtatua being ſet over him. Strabo reports, that after Androclus had ſubdued the Ionians (the next province to Epheſus, on the ſea coaſt of Aſia the leſs) he inlarged his dominions upon the Æoles, which joineth to Ionia: and that his poſterity governed the cities of [f] Epheſus and Erythræ, by the name of Baſilidæ in Strabo's own time. Of the expedition of the Iones, how they came hither out of Peloponneſus, I have [g] ſpoken already upon occaſion of the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achæi, and inhabited their places in that land: tho' this of the Iones ſucceeded that of the Heraclidæ 100 years.

The city of Epheſus became exceeding famous: firſt, for the temple of [h] Diana therein built: which had in length 425 foot, and 220 in breadth, ſuſtained with 127 pillars of marble, of 70 foot high: whereof 27 were moſt curiouſly graven, and all the reſt of choice marble poliſh'd, the work being firſt ſet out by Cteſiphon of Gnoſſos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the firſt that received the Chriſtian faith, of which Timothy was biſhop; to whom, and to the Epheſians, St. Paul wrote his epiſtles ſo intituled. The other city poſſeſs'd by Androclus in Æolis was alſo univerſally ſpoken of by reaſon of Sibylla, ſurnamed Erythræa: who lived 740 years before Chriſt was born. St. Auguſtine avoweth that a Roman proconſul ſhewed him in an ancient Greek copy certain verſes of this propheteſs: which began (as St. Auguſtine changed them into Latin) in theſe words: Jeſus Chriſtus Dei Filius Salvator. Jeſus Chriſt Son of God the Saviour.

About the time that Joab beſieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Egypt, the ſame that was father-in-law to Solomon, whoſe epiſtles to Solomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Euſebius out of Polemon. In the 21ſt of David, was the city of Magneſia in Aſia the leſs founded; the ſame which is ſeated upon the river Mæander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this territory are the beſt horſes of the leſſer Aſia bred, whereof Lucan.

About

About the ſame time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Eubœa, according to [a] Servius, with whom Strabo joineth the Cumæans of Æolis, ſaying that to the one of theſe people the government was given, with condition that the other ſhould give name to the city. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous ſcholar of Iſocrates.

Euſebius and Caſſiodore find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31ſt year of David, but much miſtaken. For the father of Dido was Metinus the ſon of Badezor brother to Jezabel, who married Achab king of Iſrael; and between the death of David, and the firſt of Achab, there were waſted about 95 years.

In this time alſo Acaſtus lived, the ſecond of the Athenian princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in deſcent before the ſtate changed into a magiſtracy of ten years. Some [b] writers make it probable, that the Æolians led by Graus, the grand nephew of Oreſtes, who poſſeſs'd the city and iſland of Lesbos about this time. In the 32d year of David, Hiram began to reign in Tyre, according to [c] Joſephus, who ſaith that in his twelfth year Solomon began the work of the temple. But it is a familiar error in Joſephus, to miſreckon times, which in this point he doth ſo ſtrangely, as if he knew not how at all to caſt any account. For it is manifeſt that Hiram ſent meſſengers, and cedars to David, ſoon after his taking of Jeruſalem, which was in the very beginning of David's reign over Iſrael, when as yet he had reigned only ſeven years in [d] Hebron, over the houſe of Judah. Wherefore it muſt needs be that Hiram had reigned above thirty years before Solomon; unleſs more credit ſhould be given to thoſe Tyrian records which are cited by Joſephus, than to the plain words of ſcripture contradicting them. For that it was the ſame Hiram which lived both with David and with Solomon, the ſcriptures make plainly manifeſt.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of SOLOMON.

SECT. I.

Of the eſtabliſhing of Solomon: of birthright, and of the cauſe of Adonijah's death, and of Solomon's wiſdom.

SOlomon, who was brought up under the prophet Nathan, began to reign over Judah and Iſrael, in the year of the world 2991. He was called Solomon by the appointment of God. He was alſo called Jedidiah, or Theophilus, by Nathan, becauſe the Lord loved him.

Hiram king of Tyre, after Solomon's anointing, diſpatched embaſſadors towards him, congratulating his eſtabliſhment: a cuſtom between princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like ſort ſalute [e] Hanum king of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the kingdom.

The beginning of Solomon was in blood, tho' his reign were peaceable. For ſoon after David's death he cauſed his brother Adonijah to be ſlain by Benaiah the ſon of Jehoiada, taking occaſion from Adonijah his deſiring by Bathſheba, that the young maid Abiſhag, which lay in David's boſom in his latter days, to keep him warm, might be given to him. Whatſoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and fought the kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Solomon. And yet it is ſaid, that a word is enough to the wiſe, and he that ſees but the claw, may know whether it be a lion or no ſo it may ſeem that to the quick-ſighted wiſdom of Solomon, this motion of Adonijah's, was a demonſtration of a new treaſon. For they which had been concubines to a king, might not after be touched but by a king: whence [f] Achitophel wiſhed Abſalom to take his father's concubines as a part of the royalty. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but ſhut them up, and they remained widowed until their death [g]. And this it ſeems was the depth of Iſhboſheth's quarrel againſt Abner, for having his father's concubine. And ſome ſignification of this cuſtom may ſeem too in the words of God by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy maſter's houſe and thy maſter's wives. And in the words of Saul, upbraiding Jonathan, that he had choſen David to the ſhame of the [h] nakedneſs of his mother. Hereunto perhaps was ſome reference to this purpoſe of Adonijah, to marry with her that was always preſent with David in his latter days, and who belike knew all that was paſt, for the conveying of the kingdom to Solomon. There might be divers farther occaſions, as either that he would learn ſuch things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perſuade her to forge ſome ſtrange tale about David's laſt teſtament, or any thing elſe that might prejudice the title of Solomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which [i] Adonijah pretended, tho' generally it agreed both with the law of nations, and with the cuſtoms of the Jews: yet the kings of the Jews were ſo abſolute, as they did therein, and in all elſe, what they pleaſed. Some [k] examples alſo they had (tho' not of kings) which taught them to uſe this paternal authority in transferring the birthright to a younger ſon: namely of Jacob's diſinheriting Reuben, and giving the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Joſeph: of whom he made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appears by the words of Bathſheba and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was neceſſary to confirm, or that the refuſal of the people had authority to fruſtrate the elder brother's right to the kingdom, it no where appears in the ſtories of the Jews. It is ſaid indeed that the people made Saul king at [l] Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and eſtabliſhed him. For that he was king long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elſewhere the phraſe of chuſing or making their king is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they ſhould not make themſelves a king, it is ſaid, [m] Thou ſhalt make him king whom the Lord ſhall chuſe.

But to proceed with the acts of Solomon: at the ſame time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himſelf alſo of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had adviſed him: he diſplaced alſo the prieſt [n] Abiathar, who took part with Adonijah againſt him: but in reſpect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and becauſe he had borne the ark of God before his father, he ſpared his life. And thus being eſtabliſhed in his kingdom, he took the daughter of Vaphres king of Egypt to wife: for ſo Euſebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thouſand ſacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bad him ask what he would at his hands; Solomon chuſeth wiſdom, which pleaſed God. And God ſaid unto him, Becauſe thou haſt asked this thing, and haſt not asked for thy ſelf long life, neither haſt thou asked riches for thy ſelf, neither haſt asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which we may inform ourſelves what deſires are moſt pleaſing to God, and what not. For the coveting after long life, in reſpect of ourſelves, cannot but proceed of ſelf-love, which is the root of all impiety: the deſire of private riches is an affection of covetouſneſs which God abhorreth; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the ſword out of God's hand, and to diſtruſt his juſtice. And in that it pleaſed God to make Solomon know that it liked him, that he had not aſked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brother's ſlaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the law of God. But becauſe Solomon deſired wiſdom only, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleaſed God to give him withal that which he deſired not. And I have alſo given thee, ſaith God, that which thou haſt not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wiſdom our commentators ſtretch to almoſt all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures, the ſcriptures teſtify, tho' no doubt the chief excellency of [a]Solomon's wiſdom, was in the knowledge of governing his kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wiſdom, the ſcripture telleth how ſoon he judged the controverſy between the two harlots.

SECT. II.

Of Solomon's buildings and glory.

HE then entered into league with Hiram king of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials, for the king's palace and the temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, 1 Chron. xxii. 6. That he called Solomon his ſon, and charged him to build a houſe for the Lord God of Iſrael: ſo doth [b]Toſtatus give the force of a divine precept to theſe words, Behold, a ſon is born unto thee, &c. He ſhall build an houſe for my name.

[c] He began the work of the temple, in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, at which time alſo he prepared his fleet at Ezion-gaber, to trade for gold in the Eaſt-Indies, that nothing might be wanting to ſupply the charge of ſo great a work. For that the temple was in building, while his fleets were paſſing to and fro, it is manifeſt: for the pillars of the temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this moſt glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the [d] form and example was given by God himſelf) many learned men have written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I refer the reader.

For the cutting and ſquaring of the cedars which ſerved that building, Solomon employed thirty thouſand carpenters, ten thouſand every month by courſe: he alſo uſed [e] eighty thouſand maſons in the mountain, and ſeventy thouſand labourers that bore burdens, which, it is conceived, he ſelected out of the proſelytes, beſides three thouſand three hundred maſters of his work, ſo as he paid and employed in all one hundred eighty three thouſand and three hundred men, in which number the Zidonians, which were far more ſkilful in hewing timber than the Iſraelites, may, as I think, be included. For [f] Hiram cauſed his ſervants to bring down the cedars and firs from Lebanon to the ſea, and thence ſent them in raffs to Joppe, or the next port to Jeruſalem. For in 2 Chron. ii. it is plain that all but the thirty thouſand carpenters, and the overſeers, were ſtrangers, and, as it ſeemeth, the vaſſals of [g] Hiram, and of Vaphres king of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and ſtone, Solomon gave Hiram twenty thouſand meaſures of wheat, and twenty meaſures of pure oil yearly. Euſebius out of Eupolemus, in the ninth book of his preparation, the laſt chapter, hath left us a copy of Solomon's letter to Suron (which was the ſame as Huram or Hiram) king of Tyre, in theſe words.

REX Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœniciæ regi, amico paterno ſalutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepiſſe, cumque mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram credvit, condere, ut etiam ad te ſcriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atque fabros ad ædificandum templum Dei mittere velis.

KING Solomon to king Suron, of Tyre, Sidon and Phœnicia, king, and my father's friend, ſendeth greeting. You may underſtand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the kingdom: and when my father commanded me to build a temple to God which created heaven and earth, he commanded alſo that I ſhould write to you. I write therefore to you, and beſeech you, that you would be pleaſed to ſend me artificers and carpenters to build the temple of God.

To which the king Suron made this anſwer.

SURON, Tyri, Sidonis, & Phœniciæ rex, Salomoni regi ſalutem. Lectis litteris gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam ſcribis fabros miniſtroſque ad condendum templum eſſe tibi mittendos, miſi ad te millia hominum octoginta, & architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Judæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut neceſſariis non egeant, & templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SURON of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia king, to king Solomon greeting. When I read your letters, I gave God thanks, who hath inſtalled you in your father's kingdom. And becauſe you write, that carpenters and workmen may be ſent to build God's temple, I have ſent unto you fourſcore thouſand men, and a maſter-builder a Tyrian, born of a Jewiſh woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all neceſſaries be provided for them, and when the temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

The copies of theſe letters were extant in [h] Joſephus's time, as himſelf affirmeth, and to be ſeen, ſaith he, Tam in noſtris quam in Tyriorum annalibus; As well in our own as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them ſomewhat in different terms, as the reader may find in his antiquities. But were this intercourſe between Solomon and Hiram either by meſſage or by writing, it is ſomewhat otherwiſe delivered in the [a] ſcriptures, than either Eupolemus, or Joſephus ſet it down; but ſo, that in ſubſtance there is little difference between the one and the other.

well

The like letter in effect Solomon is ſaid to have written to Vaphres king of Egypt, and was anſwered as from Hiram.

But whereas ſome commentators upon Solomon find, that Hiram king of Tyre, and Vaphres king of Egypt, gave Solomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Euſebius; I do not find any ſuch addition of magnus in Euſebius in the laſt chapter of that ninth book; neither is it in Joſephus in the eighth book and ſecond chapter of the Jews antiquities: it being a vain title uſed by ſome of the Aſſyrian and Perſian kings, and uſed likewiſe by the Parthians, and many others after them, inſomuch as in later times it grew common, and was uſurped by mean perſons in reſpect of the great Hermes the firſt, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightineſs.

After the finiſhing and dedication of the temple and houſe of the Lord, Solomon fortified Jeruſalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient metropolis of the Canaanites before Joſhua's time: ſo did he Gaza of the Philiſtines: he built [b] Bethoron, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Jeruſalem. For Pharaoh (as it ſeemeth in favour of Solomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the ſword and burnt their city. The place and territory he gave Solomon's wife for a dowry. And it is probable, that becauſe Solomon was then buſied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entreated his father-in-law to rid him of theſe neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to viſit thoſe parts again before they were ſent for; and in his ſon Rehoboam's time Sheſhack this man's ſucceſſor did ſack Jeruſalem itſelf.

Solomon alſo built Megiddo in Manaſſe, on this ſide Jordan; and Balah in Dan: alſo Thadmor, which may be either Ptolemy's Thamoron in the deſart of Judah (or as [c] Joſephus thinks Palmyra in the deſart of Syria) which Palmyra becauſe it ſtood on the utmoſt border of Solomon's dominion, to the north-eaſt of Libanus, and was of David's conqueſt when he won Damaſcus, it may ſeem that Solomon therefore beſtowed thereon the moſt coſt, and fortified it with the beſt art, that that age had. [d] Joſephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name, ſaith he, given by Solomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Jerome in his book of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the emperor, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In reſpect of this great charge of building, Solomon raiſed tribute throughout all his dominions, beſides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hiram's ſervants, Solomon offered Hiram twenty towns in or near the the upper Galilee, but becauſe they ſtood in an unfruitful and mariſh ground, Hiram refuſed them, and thereof was the territory called Chabul.

Theſe towns, as it is ſuppoſed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: ſed quia ſub ditione regis gentilis erat; Not that it was poſſeſs'd by the Gentiles, ſaith Nauclerus, but becauſe it was under the rule of a king that was a Gentile. Howſoever it were, it is true that Solomon in his twenty firſt year fortified thoſe places, which Hiram refuſed. Further, he made a journey into Syria-Zobah, and eſtabliſhed his tributes; the firſt and laſt war (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in perſon in all his life. He then viſited the border of all his dominions paſſing from Thadmor to the the north of Palmyrena, and ſo to the deſarts of Idumea, from whence he viſited Eziongaber and Eloth, the uttermoſt place of the ſouth of all his territories, bordering to the Red ſea: which cities I have deſcribed in the ſtory of Moſes.

SECT. III.

Of Solomon's ſending to Ophir, and of ſome ſeeming contradictions about Solomon's riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two ſtrange paſſages about Africk.

HERE Solomon prepared his fleet of ſhips for India, with whom Hiram joined in that voyage, and furniſhed him with mariners and pilots, the Tyrians being of all others the moſt expert ſeamen. From this part of Arabia which at this time belong'd to Edom and was conquered by David, did the fleet paſs to the Eaſt-Indies, which was not far off, namely to Ophir, one of the iſlands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witneſs the Spaniards, who notwithſtanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, do yet plant in thoſe iſlands of the eaſt at Manilia, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with leſs labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or New Spain.

The return which was made by theſe ſhips amounted to four hundred and twenty talents, but in 2 Chron. viii. it is written four hundred and fifty talents: whereof thirty went in expence for the charge of the fleet and wages of men, and four hundred and twenty talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thouſand crowns, came clear. And thus muſt thoſe two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Kings x. 14. which ſpeaketh of ſix hundred ſixty and ſix talents of gold, that ſum, as I take it, is of other receipts of Solomon's which were yearly, and which came to him beſides theſe profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought, but a country in the Eaſt-Indies; with ſome reaſon why at thoſe times they could not make more ſpeedy return to Jeruſalem from the Eaſt-Indies than in three years; and that Tharſis in ſcripture is divers times taken for the ocean; hath been already declared in the firſt book [e].

Only it remaineth, that I ſhould ſpeak ſomewhat of Pineda's ſtrange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica would fain have Gades or Calismalis, in old times called Tarteſſus, which is the ſouth-weſt corner of that province, to be the Tharſis from whence Solomon fetch'd his gold; for no other reaſon, as it ſeems, but for love of his own country, and becauſe of ſome affinity of ſound between Tharſis and Tarteſſus. For whereas it may ſeem ſtrange that it ſhould be three years ere they that took ſhip in the Red ſea, ſhould return from the Eaſt-Indies to Jeruſalem, this hath been in part anſwered already. And further, the intelligent may conceive of ſundry letts, in the digging and refining of the metal, and in their other traffick, and in their land-carriages between Jeruſalem and the Red ſea, and perhaps alſo elſewhere: ſo that we have no need to make Solomon's men to go many thouſand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that ſo they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Solomon and the Iſraelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterranean ſea, and ſo (beſides many wonderful inconveniencies and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they ſhould have eſcaped the troubleſome land-carriage between Jeruſalem and the Red ſea, thro' dry, deſart, and thieviſh countries: and within thirty miles of Jeruſalem at Joppe, or ſome other haven in Solomon's own country, have laden and unladen their ſhips.

But this direct courſe they could not hold, ſaith Pineda, becauſe the huge iſland of Atlantis in largeneſs greater than all Africk and Aſia being ſwallowed up in the Atlantick ocean hindred Solomon's ſhips from paſſing thro' the ſtraits of Gibraltar: for this he alledgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamity happened about Solomon's, or that thereby the ſtraits of Gades were filled with mud and made unpaſſable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Meditteranean ſea: or that this indraught, where the ſea runneth moſt violently, and moſt eaſily ſcoureth his channel, ſhould be filled with mud, and not alſo the great ocean in like manner, where this huge iſland is ſuppoſed to have ſtood: or that Solomon's ſhips being in the Red ſea, ſhould neglect the golden mines of the Eaſt-Indies (which were infinitely better, and nearer to the Red ſea, than any in Spain) to ſeek gold at Cadiz by the way of compaſſing Africa, it is moſt ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himſelf, that hath alſo the rich Peru in the weſt, fortifieth in the Eaſt-Indies, and inhabits ſome part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in thoſe parts no leſs quantity of gold (the ſmall territory which he there poſſeſſeth conſidered) than in Peru.

The ſame [a] Pineda hath another ſtrange paſſage round about all Africa, which elſewhere he dreams of: ſuppoſing whereas Jonas ſailing to Tharſis the city of Cilicia was caſt out in the Mediterranean ſea, and taken up there by a whale, that this whale in three days ſwimming above twelve thouſand Engliſh miles, along the Mediterranean ſea, and ſo thro' the ſtraits of Gades, and along the huge ſeas round about Africa, caſt up Jonas upon the ſhore of the Red ſea, that ſo he might have perhaps ſome ſix miles the ſhorter (tho' much the worſe) way to Nineveh. This conceit he grounds only upon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an epithet of the Red ſea (as if we ſhould call it mare algoſum, the ſea full of weeds) for the Red ſea. But in Jonas ii. 5. it is generally taken in the proper ſignification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have have it, who in this place againſt his own rule (which elſewhere he giveth us) ſuppoſeth ſtrange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the whale finiſh'd in three days, is a greater miracle, than the very preſervation of Jonas in the belly of the whale: and therefore ſeeing there is no neceſſity of this miracle, we ſend it back unto him, keeping his own rule, which in this place he forgets; Miracula non ſunt multiplicanda. And again, [b] Non ſunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda; Miracles are not to be multiplied without neceſſity, nor delivered without cauſe, nor feigned at pleaſure. Therefore we leave this man in his dreams, which (were he not otherwiſe very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our ſtory of Solomon.

The queen of Sheba's coming from far to Solomon (as it ſeems from Arabia Fœlix, and not as ſome think from Ethiopia) and her rich preſents, and Solomon's reciprocal magnificence, and his reſolving of her difficult queſtions, thoſe are ſet down at large in the text. But herein [c] Joſephus is greatly miſtaken, who calls this queen of Sheba Nicaules, the ſucceſſor (ſaith he out of Herodotus) of thoſe thirty and eight Egyptian kings which ſucceeded Mineus the founder of Memphis; adding that after this Egyptian, and the father-in-law of Solomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elſewhere proved, that the queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; ſo were there other Pharaohs after the father-in-law of Solomon. Yea, above three hundred years after Solomon, [d] Pharaoh-Necho ſlew Joſias king of Judah.

It is alſo written of Solomon, that he kept in garriſons fourteen thouſand chariots and twelve thouſand horſemen; that he ſpent in court every day thirty meaſures of fine flour, threeſcore meaſures of wheat, one hundred ſheep, beſides ſtags and fallow deer, bugles and fowl; four thouſand ſtalls of horſes he had for his chariots and other uſes, and for the twelve thouſand horſemen of his guard. For the forty thouſand ſtalls in 1 Kings iv. are to be taken but for ſo many horſes, whence in 2 Chron. ix. it is written but four thouſand ſtalls or teams, and in every team ten horſes, as Junius and the Geneva underſtand it. He was ſaid to be wiſer than any man, yea, than were [e] Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Junius addeth a fifth, to wit, Ezrack. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by nation. Joſephus writes them Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Donan, the ſons of Hemon. He ſpake three thouſand proverbs, and his ſongs were one thouſand and five, whereof either the moſt part periſhed in the captivity of Babylon, or elſe becauſe many acts of Solomon's were written and kept among the publick records of civil cauſes and not eccleſiaſtical, therefore they were not thought neceſſary to be inſerted into God's book.

SECT. IV.

Of the fall of Solomon, and how long he lived.

NOW as he had plenty of all other things, ſo had he no ſcarcity of women. For beſides his ſeven hundred wives, he kept three hundred concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people ſhould accompany the daughters of idolaters) he took wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when he fell a doating, his wives turned his heart after other Gods, as Aſhtaroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemoſh of Moab.

Theſe things God puniſhed by Adad of Idumea, Rezin of Damaſcus, and by Jeroboam his own ſervant, and one of the maſters of his works, who by the ordinance of God tare from his ſon Rehoboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territory he had. [f] Deus dum in peccatores animadvertit, aliorum peccatis utitur, quæ ipſe non fecit; God in puniſhing ſinners, uſeth the ſins of others, which he himſelf wrought not.

In the reign of Solomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings, with other works of magnificence and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Forty years he reigned: how many he lived it is not written, and muſt therefore be found only by conjecture. The moſt likely way to gueſs at the truth in this caſe, is by conſidering the actions of David before and after Solomon's birth, whereby we may beſt make eſtimation of the years which they conſumed, and conſequently learn the true, or moſt likely year of his nativity. Seven years David reigned in Hebron: in his 8th year he took Jeruſalem, and warred with the Philiſtines, who alſo troubled him in the year following. The bringing home of the ark ſeems to have been in the 10th year of David, and his intention to build the temple in the [a] year enſuing, at which time he had ſufficient leiſure, living in reſt. After this he had wars with the Philiſtines, Moabites, Aramites, and Edomites, which muſt needs have held him 5 years, conſidering that the Aramites of Damaſco raiſed war againſt him, after ſuch time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in every of theſe wars, he had the entire [b] victory. Neither is it likely that theſe ſervices occupied any longer time, becauſe in thoſe days and places there were no wintering camps in uſe, but at convenient ſeaſons of the year, kings went forth to war, diſpatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly upon the ſpoil of the enemies country, partly upon the [c] private proviſion which every ſoldier made for himſelf. The 17th year of David, in which he took Mephiboſheth the ſon of Jonathan into his court, appeareth to have paſſed away in quiet; and the year following to have begun the war with Ammon; but ſomewhat late in the end of ſummer perhaps, it came to trial of a battel (for Joab after the victory, returned immediately to Jeruſalem) the cauſes and preparations for that war having taken up all the ſummer. David's perſonal expedition againſt the Aramites wherein he brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer under his own allegiance, appears manifeſtly to have been the next year's work, wherein he did cut off all means of ſuccour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab, and Idumæa, being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it muſt have been the 20th year of David's reign, and about the 50th of his life, in which he ſent forth Joab to beſiege Rabba, and finiſhed the war of Ammon: wherein alſo fell out the matter of Uriah's wife. So one half of David's reign was very proſperous: in the other half he felt great ſorrow by the expectation, execution, and ſad remembrance of that heavy judgment laid upon him by God, for his foul and bloody offence.

Now very manifeſt it is, that in the year after the death of that child, which was begotten in adultery, Solomon was born, who muſt needs therefore have been 19 years old or thereabouts, when he began to reign at the deceaſe of his father, as being begotten in the 21ſt year of his father's reign, who reigned in all 40.

This account hath alſo good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of enſuing actions: for 2 years paſſed, ere Abſalom ſlew his brother Ammon; 3 years ere his father pardoned him; and 2 years more ere he came into the king's preſence. After this he prepared horſes and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which ſeems to have been 1 year's work. So the rebellion it ſelf, with all that happened thereupon, as the commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amaſa, and the reſt, may well ſeem to have been in the 30th year of David's reign.

Whether the 3 years of famine ſhould be reckoned apart from the laſt years of war with the Philiſtines, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needful to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the 10 remaining years of David, there was time ſufficient, and to ſpare, both for the 3 years of famine, for 4 years of war, and for numbring the people, with the peſtilence enſuing; as alſo for his own laſt infirmity, and diſpoſing of the kingdom. Yet indeed it ſeems that the war with the Philiſtines was but one year's work, and ended in three or four fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob near unto Gezer, and the laſt at Gath. This war the Philiſtines undertook, as it ſeemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Iſrael, and perhaps emboldened by David's old age, for he fainted now in the battel, and was afterwards hindered by his men from expoſing himſelf unto danger any more. So David had 6 or 7 years of reſt, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of war died (being of his own age) whereby the ſtirring ſpirit of Adonijah found little ſuccour in the broken party of Joab the ſon of Zeruiah.

At this time it might both truly be ſaid by [d] David to Solomon, Thou art a wiſe man, and by Solomon to God, I am but a young child; for 19 years of age might well agree with either of theſe two ſpeeches.

Nevertheleſs there are ſome that gather out of Solomon's profeſſing himſelf a child, that he was but 11 years old when he began to reign. Of theſe Rabbi Solomon ſeems the firſt author, whom others of great learning and judgment have herein followed: grounding themſelves perhaps upon that which is ſaid of [e] Abſalom's rebellion, that it was after 40 years, which they underſtood as years of David's reign. But whereas Rehoboam the ſon of Solomon was 41 years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himſelf but a child of 9 or 10 years old; the difference between their ages being no greater (if Solomon who reigned 40 years) were but 11 years old when his reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Joſephus allows 80 years of reign to Solomon; a report ſo diſagreeing with the ſcriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion conſtrued the words of Joſephus, as if they included all the years of Solomon's life. But by ſuch reckoning he ſhould have been 40 years old at his father's death; and conſequently ſhould have been born long before his father had won Jeruſalem; which is a manifeſt untruth. Wherefore the 40 years remembred in Abſalom's rebellion, may either ſeem to have reference to the ſpace between David's firſt anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickedneſs, or perhaps be read (according to Joſephus, Theodoret, and the Latin tranſlation) 4 years; which paſſed between the return of Abſalom to Jeruſalem, and his breaking out.

SECT. V.

Of Solomon's writings.

THERE remain of Solomon's works, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Solomon. In the firſt he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the ſecond, the vanity of human nature; in the third, he ſingeth as it were the Epithalamion of Chriſt and his church. For the book intitled the wiſdom of Solomon (which ſome give unto Solomon, and ſome make the elder Philo the author thereof:) Jerome, and many others of the beſt learned, make us think it was not Solomon that wrote it. Stylus libri ſapientiæ (ſaith [a] Jerome) qui Salomonis inſcribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The ſtyle of the book of wiſdom, which is aſcribed to Solomon, ſavoureth of the Grecian eloquence; and of the ſame opinion was St. Auguſtine, and yet he confeſſeth in the 19th book and 20th chapter of the city of God, that the author of that book hath a direct foretelling of the paſſion of Chriſt in theſe words: [b] Circumveniamus juſtum, quoniam inſuavis eſt nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous, for he is unpleaſing to us, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh us for offending againſt the law, he makes his boaſt to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himſelf the ſon of the Lord, &c. and ſo doth the courſe of all the following words point directly at Chriſt. The books of Eccleſiaſtes, Proverbs, and [c] Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moſes Kimchi aſcribeth to Iſaiah the prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report that Solomon wrote of the remedies of all diſeaſes, and graved the ſame on the ſides of the porch of the temple, which they ſay [d] Ezechias pulled down, becauſe the people neglecting help from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Solomon's books of invocations and inchantments to cure diſeaſes, and expel evil ſpirits, Joſephus hath written at large, tho' as I conceive, rather out of his own invention, or from ſome uncertain report, than truly.

He alſo ſpeaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the root in Solomon's ring, diſpoſſeſs'd divers perſons of evil ſpirits in the preſence of Veſpaſian, and many others, which I will not ſtand to examine.

Certainly, ſo ſtrange an example of human frailty hath never been read of as this king: who having received wiſdom from God himſelf, in honour of whom, and for his only ſervice, he built the firſt and moſt glorious temple of the world: he that was made king of Iſrael and Judea, not by the law of nature, but by the love of God, and became the wiſeſt, richeſt, and happieſt of all kings, did in the end, by the perſuaſion of a few weak and wretched idolatrous women, forget and forſake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodneſs, of which he was more liberal to this king, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner; Solomon reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a houſe in his name, and prepare the ſanctuary for ever; how wiſe waſt thou in thy youth, and waſt filled with underſtanding, as with a flood! thy mind covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark ſentences. Thy name went abroad in the iſles, and for thy peace thou waſt beloved, &c. but thus he concludeth, Thou didſt bow thy loins to women, and waſt overcome by thy body; thou didſt ſtain thine honour, and haſt defiled thy poſterity, and haſt brought wrath upon thy children, and felt ſorrow for thy folly, chap. xxvii.

SECT. IV.

Of the contemporaries of Solomon.

NEAR the beginning of Solomon's reign, Agelaus the 3d of the Heraclidæ in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedemon; and ſoon after Sylvius Alba the 4th of the Sylvii, ſway'd thoſe kingdoms: Laoſthenes then governing Aſſyria: Agaſtus and Archippus the 2d and 3d princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the 26th of Solomon's reign Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baliaſtrus ſucceeded, and reigned 17 years, after Mercator's accompt, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his ſons. [e] Joſephus gives him fewer years. Theophilus Antiochenus againſt Autolicus finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not ſome kings omitted between the death of Hiram, and the reign of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the 20th of Solomon, Seſac or Shiſak (as our Engliſh Geneva terms him) began to govern in Egypt, being the ſame with him whom Diodorus calleth Soſachis; Joſephus, Suſac; Cedrenus, Suſeſinus; Euſebius in the column of the Egyptian kings Smendes, and in that of the Hebrews Suſac. Joſephus, in the 8th of his antiquities, reproveth it as an error in Herodotus, that he aſcribeth the acts of Suſac to Seſoſtris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by compariſon, accounting Seſac another Seſoſtris; for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and virtues of king Seſoſtris I have ſpoken already in the ſtory of the Egyptian princes: only in this he was reproved that he cauſed four of his captive kings to draw his chariot, when he was diſpoſed to be ſeen, and to ride in triumph: one of which four, ſaith Eutropius, at ſuch time as Seſoſtris was carried out to take the air, caſt his head continually back upon the two foremoſt wheels next him; which Seſoſtris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion; to whom the captive king anſwered, that in thoſe he beheld the inſtability of all worldly things; for that both the loweſt part of the wheel was ſuddenly carried about, and became the higheſt, and the upmoſt part was as ſuddenly turned downward and under all: which when [f] Seſoſtris had judiciouſly weighed, he diſmiſſed thoſe princes, and all others, from the like ſervitude for the future. Of this Seſoſtris, and that he could not be taken for Seſac, I have ſpoken at large in that part of the Egyptian kings preceding.

Of Solomon's ſucceſſors until the end of Jehoſaphat.

SECT. I.

Of Rehoboam's beginnings: the defection of the ten tribes, and Jeroboam's idolatry.

REhoboam, the ſon of Solomon by Nahama an Ammoniteſſe, now 40 years old, ſucceeded his father Solomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the 10 tribes of Iſrael were aſſembled: who attended awhile the return of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, ſince he fled thither, fearing Solomon. After his arrival, the people preſented a petition to Rehoboam, to be eaſed of thoſe great tributes laid on them by his father. [g] Sic enim firmius ei fore imperium, ſi amari mallet quam metui; So ſhould his empire (ſaith Joſephus) be more aſſured if he deſired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof he took 3 days to deliberate before his anſwer, of whom therefore it could not be ſaid as of David, that he was wiſer than all his teachers. For as of himſelf he knew not how to reſolve, ſo had he not the judgment to diſcern of counſels, which is the very teſt of wiſdom in princes, and in all men elſe. But notwithſtanding that he had conſulted with thoſe grave and adviſed men, that ſerved his father, who perſuaded him by all meahs to ſatisfy the multitude: he was tranſported by his familiars and favorites, not only to continue on the backs of his ſubjects thoſe burdens which greatly cruſh'd them; but (vaunting falſly of greatneſs exceeding his father's) he threatned in ſharp, or rather in terrible terms, to lay yet heavier, and more unſupportable loads on them. But as it appeared by the ſucceſs, thoſe younger adviſers greatly miſtook the nature of ſeverity, which without the temper of clemency, is no other than cruelty it ſelf: they alſo were ignorant that it ought to be uſed for the help, and not for the harm of ſubjects. For what is the ſtrength of a king left by his people; and what cords or fetters have ever laſted long, by thoſe which have been twiſted and forged by love only; his witleſs paraſites could well judge of the king's diſpoſition: and being well learned therein, tho' ignorant in all things elſe, it ſufficed and enabled them ſufficiently for the places they held. But this anſwer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Jeroboam's deſigns. For being foretold by the prophet Achiah of his future advancement, theſe the king's threats (changing the people's love into fury) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes. For he was no ſooner arrived, than elected king of Iſrael: the people crying out, What portion have we in David? we have no inheritance in the ſon of Iſhai. Now tho' themſelves, even [a] all the tribes of Iſrael, had conſented to David's anointing at Hebron the 2d time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his fleſh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bonds of nature, and their duty to God, and, as all alienated reſolved hearts do, they ſerved themſelves for the preſent with impudent excuſes. And now over-late, and after time, Rehoboam ſent Adoram, one of the taxers of the people, a man moſt hateful to all his ſubjects, to pacify them: whom they inſtantly beat to death with ſtones. Whereupon the king affrighted, got him from [b] Sichem with all ſpeed, and recover'd Jeruſalem, where preparing to invade Iſrael with an hundred and fourſcore thouſand choſen men, Shemai in the perſon of God commanding to the contrary, all was ſtay'd for the preſent. In the mean time Jeroboam the new king fortified Sechem on this ſide, and Penuel on the other ſide of Jordan; and fearing that the union and exerciſe of one religion would alſo join the people's hearts again to the houſe of David; and having in all likelihood alſo promiſed the Egyptians to follow their idolatry: he ſet up two calves of gold for the children of Iſrael to worſhip, impiouſly perſuading them that thoſe were the gods, or at leaſt by theſe he repreſented thoſe gods, which delivered them out of Egypt: and refuſing the ſervice of the Levites, he made prieſts fit for ſuch gods. It muſt needs be that by baniſhing the Levites, which ſerv'd David and Solomon thro' all Iſrael, Jeroboam greatly inrich'd himſelf: as taking into his hands all thoſe cities which were given them by Moſes and Joſhua; for, as it is written, The Levites left their ſuburbs, and their poſſeſſion, and came to Juda, &c. This irreligious policy of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of an idolatry that never could be rooted out, until Iſrael for it was rooted out of the land) was by prophecy and miracles impugned ſufficiently when it firſt began; but the affections maintaining it, were ſo ſtrong, that neither [c] prophecy nor miracle could make them yield. Jeroboam could not be moved now by the authority of Ahia, who from the Lord had firſt promiſed unto him the kingdom; nor by the [c] withering of his own hand as he ſtretched it over the altar, which alſo clave aſunder, according to the ſign, which the man of God had given by the commandment of God, who again recover'd and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obſtinate an idolater as before, for he held it the ſafeſt courſe in policy to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forſook God, and the religion of his forefathers, by God and his miniſters taught them, was by a modern hiſtorian compared with the policies of late ages, obſerving well the practice of his nation, being an Italian born; Sic qui hodie (ſaith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, præſenteſque utilitates ſibi tanquam ultimum finem conſtituunt, cauſam quam vocant ſtatus in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipſa tuenda, promovenda, conſervanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si injuria proximo irroganda, ſi juſtitiæ honeſtatiſque leges ſubvertendæ, ſi religio ipſa peſſundanda, ſi denique omnia jura divina & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nihil per fas nefaſque relinquendum cenſent, cuncta ruant, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipſos, modo id, quod e re ſua eſſe ſibi perſuadent, obtineant, ac ſi nullus ſit qui talia curet, caſtigareve poſſit Deus; So they who are now called politicians, propounding to themſelves, as their utmoſt end and ſcope, their own commodity and preſent profit, are wont to alledge the caſe of ſtate forſooth, as the principal point to be regarded: for the good of the ſtate, for advancing, preſerving, or encreaſing of the ſtate, they think they may do any thing. If they mean to oppreſs their neighbour, to overturn all laws of juſtice and honeſty, if religion it ſelf muſt go to wrack, yea if all rights of God and man muſt be violated, they will try all courſes, be it right, be it wrong, they will do any thing; let all go to ruin, what care they, ſo long as they may have what they would; as who ſhould ſay, there were no God that would offer to meddle in ſuch matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of Raggione del ſtato, did ſerve as well to uphold, as at the firſt it had done to bring in this vile idolatry of the ten tribes. Upon this ground Amazia the prieſt of Bethel, counſelled the prophet [d] Amos, not to propheſy at Bethel; For (ſaith he) it is the king's court. Upon this ground even [e] Jehu that had maſſacred the prieſts of Baal, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any wiſe depart from that politick ſin of Jeroboam the ſon of [f] Nebat, which made Iſrael to ſin. It was reaſon of ſtate that perſuaded the laſt famous French king Henry the fourth to change his religion; yet the proteſtants whom he forſook obey'd him, but ſome of the papiſts whom he followed murder'd him. So ſtrongly doth the painted vizzor of wiſe proceeding delude even thoſe that know the foul face of impiety lurking under it, and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it; whereof Jehu and all the kings of Iſrael had, and were themſelves, very great examples.

SECT. II.

Of Rehoboam's impiety; for which he was puniſhed by Seſac: of his end and contemporaries.

WHILE Jeroboam was occupied in ſetting up his new religion, Rehoboam on the other ſide having now little hope to recover the provinces loſt, ſtrengthened the principal places remaining with all endeavour: for he fortified and victualled fifteen cities of [a]Judah and Benjamin: not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Jeroboam had not only faſtned himſelf, but withal invited them to invade Judea: laying perchance before them the unaccountable riches of David and Solomon, which might now eaſily be had, ſeeing ten of the twelve tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judeans. So as by thoſe two ways (of late years often trodden) to wit, change of religion, and invitation of foreign force, Jeroboam hoped to ſettle himſelf in the ſeat of Iſrael, whom yet the powerful God for his idolatry in a few years after rooted out with all his. Rehoboam alſo having, as he thought, by [b] fortifying divers places, aſſured his eſtate, forſook the law of the living God, and made high places, and images, and groves, on every high hill, and under every green tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his reign, Seſac, or Shiſhac before ſpoken of, being now king of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumea, as Jeroboam, were familiar, and his inſtruments, entred [c]Judea with twelve thouſand chariots, and threeſcore thouſand horſe, beſides footmen, which [d]Joſephus numbers at four hundred thouſand. This army was compounded of four nations; Egyptians, Lubæans, Succæans, and Cuſites. The Lubæans were Lybæans, the next bordering region to Egypt, on the weſt-ſide. The Cuſites were of Petræa, and of the deſart Arabia, which afterwards followed Zerah againſt [e]Aſa king of Judah. The Succæans, according to Junius's opinion, were of Succoth, which ſignifieth tents: he doth ſuppoſe, that they were the Troglodítæ, often mentioned in [f]Pliny, Ptolemy, and other authors. The Troglodites inhabited not far from the banks of the Red ſea, in 22 degrees from the line northward about ſix hundred Engliſh miles from the beſt and maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I do not think that the Succims or Succæi were thoſe Troglodítæ, but rather thoſe Arabians which Ptolemy calls Arabes Ægyptii or Ichthyophagi, which poſſeſs that part of Egypt between the mountains called [g]Alabaſtrini, and the Red ſea, far nearer Egypt, and readier to be levied, than thoſe removed ſavages of the Troglodítæ.

With this great and powerful army, Seſac invaded Judea, and (beſides many other ſtrong cities) won Jeruſalem itſelf, of which, and of the temple, and king's houſe he took the ſpoil, carrying away (beſides other treaſures) the golden ſhields which Solomon had made, in imitation of thoſe which David recovered from Adadezer, in the Syrian war: theſe Rehoboam ſupplied with targets of braſs, which were fit enough to guard a king of his quality: whom Siracides calleth the fooliſhneſs of the people.

From this time forward the kings of Egypt claimed the ſoveraignty of Judea, and held the Jews as their tributaries: Seſac, as it ſeems, rendring up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the words of God, where promiſing the deliverance of Judah after their humiliation, he doth notwithſtanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt in theſe words. Nevertheleſs they (to wit, the Judeans) ſhall be his ſervants, that is, the ſervants of Seſac.

After this overthrow and diſhonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and, his loſſes received by Seſac notwithſtanding, he continued the war againſt Jeroboam all his life-time. After his death Jeroboam governed Iſrael four years.

Rehoboam lived fifty-eight years, and reigned ſeventeen. His ſtory was written at large by Shemeiah and Hiddon the prophets, but the ſame periſhed with that of Nathan and the reſt.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Terſippus, the third and fourth Archontes or governours for life after Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdaſtrartus or Abſtrartus, in Tyre. Doriſthus the fifth of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to [h]Euſebius (others make him the ſixth) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latins reigned Sylvius Alba, add Sylvius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Sylvii.

About the 12th of Rehoboam, Abdaſtrartus king of Tyre, was murdered by his nurſe's ſons, or foſter-brethren, the elder of which uſurped the kingdom twelve years.

Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to govern Aſſyria, the 34th king thereof: and not long after Aſtartus the ſon of Baleaſtartus recovered the kingdom of Tyre from the uſurpers.

SECT. III.

Of the great battle between Jeroboam and Abijah, with a corollary of the examples of God's judgments.

ABIJAH the ſon of Rehoboam inherited his father's kingdom, and his vices. He raiſed an army of four hundred thouſand, with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountred him with a double number of eight hundred thouſand; both armies joined near to the mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrown, and the ſtrength of Iſrael broken; for there fell of that ſide five hundred thouſand, the greateſt overthrow that ever was given or received of thoſe nations. Abijah being now maſter of the field, recovered Bethel, Jeſhanah and Ephron, ſoon after which diſcomfiture, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22 years. Abijah, the better to ſtrengthen himſelf, entred into league with Heſion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of 2 Chron. xvi. 23. He reigned but three years and then died. The particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the prophet, as ſome part of his father's were.

Here we ſee how it pleaſed God to puniſh the ſins of Solomon in his ſon Rehoboam: firſt, by an idolater and a traitor: and then by the ſucceſſor of that Egyptian, whoſe daughter Solomon had married, thereby the better to aſſure his eſtate, which, while he ſerved God, was by God aſſured againſt all and the greateſt neighbouring kings, and when he forſook him, it was torn aſunder by his meaneſt vaſſals; not that the father wanted ſtrength to defend him from the Egyptian Seſac. For the ſon Abijah was able to levy four hundred thouſand men, and with the ſame number he overthrew eight hundred thouſand Iſraelites, and ſlew of them five hundred thouſand, God giving ſpirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleaſeth him. And as in thoſe times the cauſes were expreſs'd, why it pleaſed God to puniſh both kings and their people: the ſame being both before and at the inſtant ſtant delivered by prophets; ſo the ſame juſt God, who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in theſe our times give victory, courage, and diſcourage, raiſe, and throw down kings, eſtates, cities, and nations, for the ſame offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the preſent: for which reaſon, in theſe and other afflictions of Iſrael, always the cauſes are ſet down, that they might be as precedents to ſucceeding ages. They were puniſhed with famine in David's time for three years, [a] for Saul and his bloody houſe, &c. And David, towards his latter end, ſuffered all ſorts of afflictions, and ſorrows in effect, for Uriah. Solomon had ten tribes of twelve torn from his ſon for his idolatry. Rehoboam was ſpoiled of his riches and honour by Seſac of Egypt, becauſe the people of Judah made images, high places and groves, &c. and becauſe they ſuffered Sodomites in the land. Jeroboam was puniſhed in himſelf and his poſterity for the golden calves that he erected. Joram had all his ſons ſlain by the Philiſtines, and his very bowels torn out of his body by an excoriating flux, for murdering his brethren. Ahab and Jezabel were ſlain, the blood of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogs, for the falſe accuſing and killing of Naboth. So alſo hath God puniſhed the ſame and the like ſins in all after-times, and in theſe our days by the ſame famine, plagues, war, loſs, vexation, death, ſickneſs, and calamities, howſoever the wiſe men of the world raiſe theſe effects no higher than to ſecond cauſes, and ſuch other accidents; which, as being next their eyes and ears, ſeem to them to work every alteration that happeneth.

SECT. IV.

Of Aſa and his contemporaries.

TO Abijah ſucceeded Aſa, who enjoyed peace for his firſt ten years, in which time he eſtabliſhed the Church of God, [b] breaking down the altars dedicated to ſtrange Gods, with their images, cutting down their groves, and taking away their high places. He alſo ſpared not his own [c] mother who was an idolatreſs, but depoſing her from her regency, brake her idol, ſtampt it, and burnt it.

He alſo fortified many cities and other places, providing (as provident kings do) for the troubles of war in the leiſure of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judea, and with ſuch a multitude entred the territory of Aſa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never aſſembled of that nation either before or ſince. For it is written, that there came againſt the Judeans, [d] Zerah of Ethiopia with an hoſt of ten hundred thouſand, and three hundred chariots, which Aſa encountred with an army of five hundred and fourſcore thouſand, levied out of thoſe two tribes of Judah and Benjamin which obeyed him, and with which he overthrew this fearful multitude, and had the ſpoil both of their cities and camps.

That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian I have [e] proved already, and were it but the length between Ethiopia and Judea, and the ſtrong flouriſhing regions of Egypt interjacent (who would not ſuffer a million of ſtrangers to paſs thro' them) it were ſufficient to make it appear how fooliſh the opinion is, that theſe invaders were Ethiopians. But in that the ſcriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the cities thereabouts were ſpoiled by the Judeans in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar ſtandeth upon the torrent of Beſor, which David paſs'd over when he ſurprized the Amalekites or Arabians, this proveth ſufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that [f] Gerar was a frontier town ſtanding on the uttermoſt ſouth-border of all Judea, from all parts of Ethiopia ſix hundred miles. Alſo the ſpoils which Aſa took, as the cattle, camels, and ſheep, whereof he ſacrificed five thouſand, ſhew them to be Arabians adjoining, and not far off, and not unknown to the Ethiopians. And if it be objected, that theſe deſart countries can hardly yield a million of men fit for the wars, I anſwer, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa, and the deſart which compaſs two parts of the Holy Land, ſhould yield ten hundred thouſand, as that two tribes of the twelve ſhould arm five hundred and fourſcore thouſand. Beſides, it anſwereth to the promiſe of God to Abraham, that theſe nations ſhould exceed in number; for God ſpake it of Iſmael, that he would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that he ſhould beget twelve princes, &c.

[g] Baaſha, a king of Iſrael, began to reign in the third of Aſa, and fearing the greatneſs of Aſa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad king of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, to join with him againſt Aſa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama which lieth in the way from Jeruſalem towards Samaria.

This war began according to the letter of the ſcriptures in the 36th year of Aſa's reign: but becauſe in 1 Kings xvi. it is ſaid that Baaſha died in the 26th year of Aſa, therefore could not Baaſha begin this war in the 35th of Aſa's reign, but in the 35th year of the diviſion of Judah and Iſrael: for ſo many years it was from the firſt of Rehoboam, who reigned 17 years, to the 16th of Aſa. It may ſeem ſtrange, that Aſa being able to bring into the field an army of five hundred and fourſcore thouſand good ſoldiers, did not eaſily drive away Baaſha, and defeat him of his purpoſes, the victories of Abia againſt Jeroboam, and of Aſa himſelf againſt Zerah being yet freſh in mind, which might well have emboldned the men of Judah, and as much diſheartned the enemies. Queſtionleſs there were ſome important circumſtances omitted in the text, which cauſed Aſa to fight at this time with money. It may be, that the employment of ſo many hundred thouſand of hands in the late ſervice againſt Zerah, had cauſed many mens private buſineſs to lie undiſpatched, whereby the people being now intentive to the culture of their lands, and other trades, might be unwilling to ſtir againſt the Iſraelites, chuſing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardneſs of the people might have deterred Aſa from adventuring himſelf with the leaſt part of his forces, and committing the ſucceſs into the hands of God. Howſoever it were, he took the treaſures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian againſt Baaſha, whoſe employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baaſha. For the Iſraelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himſelf (after his invaſion) nor his ſucceſſors after him, ever gave over till they had made themſelves maſters of that kingdom. So [h] Benhadad being now entered into Nephthalim without reſiſtance, he ſpoiled divers principal cities thereof, and enforced [a]Baaſha to quit Ramah, and to leave the ſame to Aſa with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortify the ſame: which done Benhadad, who loved neither party, being loaden with the ſpoils of Iſrael, and the treaſures of Judah, returned to Damaſcus. After this, when Hanani the prophet reprehended Aſa in that he now relied on the ſtrength of Syria, and did not reſt himſelf on the favour and aſſiſtance of God, he not only cauſed Hanani to be impriſoned, but he began to burden and oppreſs his people, and was therefore ſtricken with the grievous pains of the gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two years [b]continually tormented, he gave up the ghoſt when he had reigned 41 years.

There lived with Aſa, Ageſilaus the ſixth of the Heraclidæ, and Bacis the fifth king of the ſame race in Corinth, of whom his ſucceſſors were afterwards called Bacidæ. Aſtartus and Aſtarimus were kings in Tyre. [c]Aſtarimus took revenge on his brother Phelletes, for the murder of Ithobalus prieſt of the goddeſs Aſtarta, whom Solomon in dotage worſhipped. Atys and Capys ruled the Latins. Pyrithiades and Ophrateus the Aſſyrians: Terſippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36th year of Aſa, left Cheops his ſucceſſor that reigned fifty-ſix years, even to the 16th of Joas.

SECT. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten tribes during the reign of Aſa.

IN the reign of Aſa, the kingdom of Iſrael felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten tribes unto their former allegiance to the houſe of David, if the wiſdom of God had not otherwiſe determined. The wickedneſs of Jeroboam had, in his latter days, the ſentence of heavy vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the ſame prophet which had foretold the diviſion of Iſrael; for the ſin of Solomon, and his reign over the ten tribes. One ſon Jeroboam had, among others, in whom only God found ſo much piety, as (tho' it ſufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable teſtimony of the people's love, by their general mourning and lamentation at his death; and (wherein he was moſt happy) the favourable approbation of God himſelf.

After the loſs of this good ſon, the ungodly father was ſoon taken away: a miſerable creature, ſo conſcious of his vile unthankfulneſs to God, that he durſt not ſuffer his own name to be uſed in conſulting with an holy prophet, aſſured of the ruin hanging over him and his, yea, of God's extreme hatred; yet forbearing to deſtroy thoſe accurſed idols that wrought his confuſion. So loth he was to forſake his worldly wiſdom, when the world was ready to forſake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam, reigned in the ſecond and third years of Aſa, which are reckoned as two years, tho' indeed his father's laſt year of two and twenty did run along (how far is uncertain) with the ſecond of [d]Aſa, whoſe third year was the firſt of Baaſha; ſo that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his kingdom one whole year. He did not alter his father's courſes, neither did God alter his ſentence. It ſeems that he little feared the judgments denounced againſt his father's houſe: for as a prince that was ſecure of his own eſtate, he armed all Iſrael againſt the Philiſtines, and beſieged one of their towns. There (whether it were ſo, that the people were offended with his ill ſucceſs, and recalled to mind their grievous loſs of five hundred thouſand under Jeroboam, counting it an unlucky family to the nation; or (whether by ſome particular indiſcretion, he exaſperated them) ſlain he was by Baaſha, whom the army did willingly accept for king in his ſtead. Baaſha was no ſooner proclaimed king, than he began to take order with the houſe of Jeroboam, that none of them might moleſt him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the ſword. That he did this for private reſpects, and not in regard of God's will to have it ſo, it is evident, by his continuing in the ſame form of idolatry which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the ſame ſentence from God that had been laid upon Jeroboam, which was executed upon him alſo in the ſame ſort. He began to infeſt Aſa, by fortifying Rama; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waſte his country, deſtroying all the land of Nephthalim. Four and twenty years he reigned: and then dying, left the crown to Elah his; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam had done, two years current, perhaps not one compleat.

Elah was as much an idolater as his father: and withal a riotous perſon. He ſent an army againſt Gebbethon, the ſame town of the Philiſtines before which Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam periſhed; but he ſat at home the while, feaſting and drinking with his minions, whereby he gave ſuch advantage againſt himſelf, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the king at Tirzah, finding his maſter ſo diſſolute, and his behaviour ſo contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baaſha had found, by doing as Baaſha had done. Wherefore he did ſet upon Elah in his drunkenneſs, and ſlew him. Preſently upon which fact, he ſtyled himſelf king of Iſrael; and began his reign with maſſacring all the houſe of Baaſha; extending his cruelty not only to his children and kinsfolks, but unto all his friends in Tirzah. Theſe news were quickly blown to the camp at Gebbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri's expectation. For the ſoldiers, inſtead of proclaiming him king, proclaimed him traitor: and being led by Omri whom they ſaluted king, they (quitting the ſiege of Gebbethon) preſented themſelves before Tirzah; which in ſhort ſpace they may ſeem to have forced. Zimri wanting ſtrength to defend the city, not courage to keep himſelf from falling alive into his enemies hands, did ſet fire on the palace, conſuming it and himſelf together to aſhes. Seven days he is ſaid to have reigned: accounting (as is moſt likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the camp. For Zimri was alſo an idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam, 1 Kings xvi. 19. and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himſelf, than the reign of ſeven days, and thoſe conſumed partly in murdering the friends of Baaſha, partly in ſeeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Elah, there aroſe another king to oppoſe the faction of Omri; whereby it may ſeem, that Zimri had made his party ſtrong, as being able to ſet up a new head, who doubtleſs would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, ſome ſtrength, not unlikely to reſiſt and vanquiſh the army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new competitor of Omri, held out, I do not find; only it appears that his ſide was decay'd, and ſo he died, leaving no other ſucceſſor than his concurrent.

SECT. VI.

A conjecture of the cauſes hindring the re-union of Iſrael with Juda, which might have been effected by theſe troubles.

ANY man that ſhall conſider the ſtate of Iſrael, in thoſe times, may juſtly wonder how it came to paſs, that either the whole nation, wearied with the calamities already ſuffered under theſe unfortunate princes, and with the preſent civil wars, did not return to their ancient kings, and re-unite themſelves with the mighty tribes of Juda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppreſs'd factions, did not call in Aſa, but rather choſe, the one to endure a deſperate neceſſity of yielding, or burning himſelf, the other to languiſh away, a man forſaken: than to have recourſe unto a remedy, ſo ſure, ſo ready, and ſo honourable. To ſay that God was peaſed to have it ſo, were a true, but an idle anſwer (for his ſecret will is the cauſe of all things) unleſs it could be prov'd, that he had forbidden Aſa to deal in that buſineſs, as he forbad Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the reſtraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only bind his hands from attempting the ſuppreſſion of that preſent inſurrection, it appears by the war continu'd between Iſrael and Juda, ſo many years following: wherein Abia ſo far prevailed, that he won a great battel, and recovered ſome towns belonging to the other tribes, which he annexed to his own dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the ſecond cauſes, moving the people and leaders of the ten tribes, to ſuffer any thing under new upſtarts, rather than to caſt their eyes upon that royal houſe of David, from which the ſucceſſion of five kings in lineal deſcent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omri had prevented his competitors, in making peace with Aſa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an idolater, [a] but did worſe than all that were before him, which as it might ſerve alone to prove, that Aſa, being a godly king, would not adhere to him, ſo the courſe which he profeſs'd to take at the very firſt, of revenging the maſſacre committed upon the family and friends of Baaſha (Aſa his mortal enemy) gives manifeſt reaſon, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, ſhould more juſtly than he have expected the friendſhip of Juda in that quarrel. Wherefore, in ſearching out the reaſon of this backwardneſs in the ten tribes (which was ſuch that they may ſeem to have never thought upon the matter) to ſubmit themſelves to their true princes; it were not amiſs to examine the cauſes, moving the people to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam, who follow'd the wars in perſon, as a man of ſpirit and courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very firſt defection of the ten tribes, was (if we look upon human reaſon) occaſioned by deſire of breaking that heavy yoke of bondage wherewith Solomon had galled their necks. Their deſire was to have a king that ſhould not oppreſs them; not to have no king at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had cauſed them to renounce him, they did immediately chooſe Jeroboam in his ſtead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them, for which he had contended in their behalf. Neither were they (as it ſeems) herein altogether deceived. For his affection of popularity appears in his building of decay'd towns, and in the inſtitution of his new deviſed idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them, to travel ſo far as Jeruſalem. But whether it were ſo, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to ceaſe, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reign of his ſon, when long time of poſſeſſion had confirm'd his title, which at the firſt was only good by courteſy of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in ſuch caſes) were more offended by ſome prerogatives of a king that he ſtill retained in his own hands, than pleaſed with his remiſſion of other burdens: it is clearly apparent, that the whole army of all Iſrael joined with Baaſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Jeroboam's houſe.

Now the reign of Baaſha himſelf, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and coſt at Rama was caſt away; the other ſide of his kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one town of Gibbethon from the Iſraelites; but left that buſineſs to his ſon, who likewiſe appears an unprofitable ſluggard. Wherefore it muſt needs be, that the favour of the people towards the houſe of Baaſha grew from his good form of civil government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to do. And ſurely he that ſhall take pains to look into thoſe examples, which are extant of the different courſes, held by the kings of Iſrael and Juda, in adminiſtration of juſtice, will find it moſt probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten tribes continu'd ſo averſe from the line of David; as to think all adverſity more tolerable than the weighty ſcepter of that houſe. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them deſerved; yet in that they ſuffered it without form of judgment, they ſuffered like unto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgment, and without any crime objected, other than the king's jealouſy: out of which, by the ſame rule of arbitrary juſtice (under which it may be ſuppoſed that many were caſt away) he would have ſlain Jeroboam (if he could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence, as appears by his confident return out of Egypt, like one that was known to have endured wrong, having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Jehoram did upon his brethren, and upon ſundry of his greateſt men; as alſo Joaſh did ſo put to death Zachariah the ſon of Jehoiada, who had made him king, [b] Even in the court of the houſe of the Lord: [c] and Manaſſes did ſhed innocent blood exceeding much, till he repleniſhed Jeruſalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beſides his ſin wherewith he made Juda to ſin. Contrariwiſe, among the kings of Iſrael we find no monument of ſuch arbitrary proceeding, unleſs perhaps the words of Jehoram the ſon of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an inſtance, when he ſaid [d] God do ſo to me, and more alſo, if the head of Eliſha the ſon of Shaphat ſhall ſtand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemn'd as a falſe prophet, that had made them hold out againſt the Aramites, till they were fain to eat their own children; which he thought a ſufficient argument to prove, that it was not God's purpoſe to deliver them. The death of Naboth ſheweth rather the liberty which the Iſraelites enjoy'd, than any peremptory execution of the king's will. For Naboth did not fear to ſtand upon his own right, tho' Ahab were even ſick for anger, neither was he for that cauſe put to death, as upon commandment, but made away by conſpiracy, the matter being handled after a judicial form, which might give ſatisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, tho' to God it could not.

The murther of the prophets is continually aſcribed to Jezebel, an impudent woman, and not unto the king her husband. Neither is it certain, that there was no law made, whereby their lives were taken from them; but certain it is, that the people, being [a] idolaters, were both pleaſed with their death, and labour'd in the execution. So that the doings of the kings of Juda (ſuch as are regiſtred) prove them to have uſed a more abſolute manner of command, than the kings of the ten tribes. Neither do their ſufferings witneſs the contrary. For of thoſe which reigned over Juda, from the diviſion of the kingdom, to the captivity of the ten tribes, three were ſlain by the people, and two were denied a place of burial amongſt their anceſtors. Yea, the death of Ahaziah and his brethren, ſlain by Jehu, with the deſtruction of all the royal ſeed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) ſtir up in the people any ſuch thirſt of revenge, as might by the ſuddenneſs and uniformity teſtify the affection to be general, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their princes; unleſs we ſhould think that the death of Athalia, after 7 years reign, were occaſioned rather by the memory of her ill purchaſing, than by the preſent ſenſe of her tyrannical abuſing the government, whereon ſhe had ſeized. On the other ſide, ſuch of the kings of Iſrael as periſhed by treaſon (which were ſeven of the twenty) were all ſlain by conſpiracy of the great men, who aſpired by treaſon to the crown: the people being ſo far from embruing their hands in the blood of their ſoveraigns, that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their kings, when it lay in their power, nor approve the good ſucceſs of treaſon, unleſs fear compelled them. So that the death of two kings, being thoroughly revenged upon other two, namely, the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterouſly got and uſurp'd, for a little while, their places; only three of the ſeven remain, whoſe ends how the people took, it may be doubtful. Tho' indeed it is preciſely ſaid of the ſlaughter, committed on Ahab's children by Jehu, that the people durſt not fight with him that did it, becauſe [b] they were exceedingly afraid: and the ſame fear might be in them at the death of Peka, whoſe hiſtory (as others of that time) is curſorily paſſed over. The like may be pronounced, and more abſolutely, of the kings of England, that never any of them periſhed by fury of the people, but by treaſon of ſuch as did ſucceed them, neither was there any motive urging ſo forcibly the death of king Edward and king Richard, when they were in priſon, as fear leſt the people ſhould ſtir in their quarrel. And certainly (howſoever all that the law calls treaſon, be interpreted as tending finally to the king's deſtruction) in thoſe treaſonable inſurrections of the vulgar, which have here moſt prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quench'd it ſelf, with the blood of ſome great officers; no ſuch rebellions, howſoever wicked and barbarous otherwiſe, thirſting after the ruin of their natural ſoveraign, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his royal perſon: which if any man impute unto groſs ignorance, another may more charitably, and, I think, more truly, aſcribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, being looſened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands give aſſiſtance to Jupiter, when all the reſt of the gods conſpired again him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as ſignifying, that monarchs need not to fear any curbing of their abſoluteneſs by mighty ſubjects, as long as by wiſdom they keep the hearts of the people, who will be ſure to come in on their ſide. Tho' indeed the ſtory might very well have borne the ſame interpretation, as it is rehearſed by Homer, who tells us that Pallas was one of the conſpiracy, and that Thetis alone did mar all their practice, by looſening Briareus. For a good form of government ſufficeth by it ſelf to retain the people, not only without aſſiſtance of a laborious wit, but even againſt all devices of the greateſt and ſhrewdeſt politicians: every ſheriff and conſtable, being ſooner able to arm the multitude, in the king's behalf, than any over-weening rebel, how mighty ſoever, can againſt him.

This declaration of the people's love, being ſeldom found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it ſelf of government there was ſuch, as neither gave occaſion of contentment unto the ſubjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the kings. Upon which reaſons it may ſeem that the multitude was kept uſually diſarmed. For otherwiſe it would have been almoſt impoſſible, that Athalia the ſiſter of Ahab, a ſtranger to the royal blood of Juda, ſhould by the only authority of a queen-mother have deſtroy'd all the ſeed of David, and uſurped the kingdom very near ſeven years, without finding any reſiſtance. Yea, when Jehoiada the high prieſt had agreed with the captains and principal men of the land to ſet up Joaſh their lawful king, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; he was fain to give to theſe captains and their men, the ſpears and the ſhields that were king David's, and were in the houſe of the Lord. But we need not enter into ſuch particulars. Queſtionleſs, the tribes which thought obedience to their princes to be a part of their duty towards God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had kings of their own choice or admiſſion, holding the crown by a more uncertain tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reaſon, why the ten tribes did never ſeek to return to their ancient lords: but after the deſtruction of their ſix firſt kings, which died in the reign of Aſa, admitted a ſeventh of a new family, rather than they would conſubject themſelves, with thoſe of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavy yoak.

So Aſa, having ſeen the death of ſeven kings of Iſrael, died himſelf after 41 years reign, leaving Jehoſhaphat his ſon to deal with Ahab the ſon of Omri, who was the eighth king over the ten tribes.

SECT. VII.

Of Jehoſhaphat and his contemporaries.

JEhoſhaphat, who ſucceeded Aſa, was a prince religious and happy, he deſtroyed all the groves, altars,

altars, and high places dedicated to idolatry, and ſent teachers to all places and people wanting inſtruction, he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philiſtines: from the one he had ſilver, from the other ſheep and goats to the number of fifteen thouſand and four hundred. The numbers of his men of war were more than admirable: for it is written that [a] Adnah had the command of three hundred thouſand, Jehohanan of two hundred and fourſcore thouſand, and Amaſia of two hundred thouſand; alſo that he had, beſides theſe, in Benjamin of thoſe that bare ſhields, which we call Targeteers, and of archers under Eliada two hundred thouſand, and under the commandment of Jehoſabad a hundred and fourſcore thouſand: which numbred together make eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand, all which are ſaid to have waited upon the king beſides his garriſons.

That Juda and Benjamin, a territory not much exceeding the county of Kent, ſhould muſter eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand fighting men, it is very ſtrange, and the number far greater than it was found upon any other view. [b] Joab in David's time found five hundred thouſand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourſcore thouſand: Abia four hundred and eight thouſand: Aſa five hundred and fourſcore thouſand: Amaziah inrolled all that could bear arms, and they amounted to three hundred thouſand: Uzziah three hundred and ſeven thouſand and five hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehoſhaphat, that Moab and Ammon were entred his territory to the weſt of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he fear'd (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would have feared even the army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field eleven hundred and threeſcore thouſand fighting men, leaving all his ſtrong cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my ſelf to better judgment) that theſe numbers ſpecified in the ſecond of Chronicles the ſeventeenth, diſtributed to ſeveral leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thouſand under Adnah, and the two hundred and fourſcore thouſand under Jehohanan, were afterwards commanded and muſtered by Amaſia, Eliada, and Jehoſabad: for the groſs and total is not in that place ſet down, as it was under the other kings formerly named. Again, as the aids which Jehoſhaphat brought to Ahab, did not ſhew that he was a prince of extraordinary power, ſo the Moabites and Ammonites, which he feared could never make the one half of thoſe numbers, which he that commanded leaſt among Jehoſhaphat's leaders had under him.

This mighty prince, notwithſtanding his greatneſs, yet he joined in friendſhip with Ahab king of Iſrael, who had married that wicked woman Jezabel. Him Jehoſhaphat viſited at Samaria, and cauſed his ſon Joram to marry Athaliah, this Ahab's daughter.

Ahab perſuaded Jehoſhaphat to aſſiſt him in the war againſt the Syrians, who held the city of Ramoth-Gilead from him, and called together four hundred of his prophets, or Baalites to foretel the ſucceſs: who promiſed him victory. But Jehoſhaphat believed nothing at all in thoſe diviners, but reſolved firſt of all to confer with ſome one prophet of the Lord God of Iſrael. Hereupon Ahab made anſwer, that he had one called Michaiah, but he hated that prophet, becauſe he always foretold of evil, and never of any good towards him. Yet Michaiah was ſent for to the king, but by the way the meſſenger prayed him to conſent with prophets; and to promiſe victory unto them as they did. But Michaiah ſpake the truth, and repeated his viſion to both the kings, which was, That God asked who ſhall perſuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead? To whom a ſpirit that ſtood before the Lord anſwered, that he would enter into his prophets, and be in them a falſe ſpirit to delude. For as it is ſaid by Chriſt, Non enim vos eſtis qui loquimini, ſed ſpiritus patris veſtri loquitur in vobis: it is not you that ſpeak, but the ſpirit of your father ſpeaks in you: ſo in a contrary kind did the devil in the prophets of Baal, or Satan, encourage Ahab to his deſtruction. And as P. Martyr upon this place well obſerveth, theſe evil ſpirits are the miniſters of God's vengeance, and are uſed as the hangmen and tormentors, which princes ſometimes employ. For as it pleaſeth God by his good angels, to ſave and deliver from deſtruction, of which the ſcriptures have many examples: ſo on the contrary, it is by the evil that he puniſheth and deſtroyeth, both which are ſaid to perform the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Eccleſiaſticus remembreth a ſecond ſort of malignant natures, but they are every where viſible. There are ſpirits, ſaith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on ſure ſtrokes. In the time of deſtruction they ſhew forth their power, and accompliſh the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaia having by this his revelation greatly diſpleaſed the king, and the prophets whoſe ſpirit he diſcovered, was ſtricken by Zedekiah one of Baal's prophets, and by Ahab himſelf committed to priſon: where he appointed him to be reſerved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah not fearing to reply, anſwered, If thou return in peace, the Lord hath not ſpoken by me. Nevertheleſs Ahab went on in that war, and was wounded to death. Jehoſhaphat returned to Jeruſalem, where he was [c] reprehended by Jehu the prophet for aſſiſting an idolatrous prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites of Damaſcus, joined with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans, to invade Judea: who paſs Jordan, and encamp at Engaddi, and when Jehoſhaphat gathered his army, the prophet Jahaziel foretold him of the victory, which ſhould be obtained without any blood-ſhed of his part: and ſo when Jehoſhaphat approached, this aſſembly of nations, the Ammonites and Moabites diſagreeing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for ſome cauſes among themſelves; thoſe of Ammon and Moab ſet upon the Idumeans, and brake them utterly; which done, they alſo invaded each other; in which broil Jehoſhaphat arriving, [d] took the ſpoil of them all without any loſs of his part, as it was foretold and promis'd by God. Notwithſtanding this victory, Jehoſhaphat forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for aſſiſting an idolatrous king, did notwithſtanding join with Ochazias the ſon of Ahab, in preparing a fleet to ſend to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Solomon had: but as [e] Eliezer the prophet foretold him, his ſhips periſhed and were broken in the part of Ezion-gaber, and ſo that enterprize was overthrown.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram the brother of Ochazias, againſt the Moabites, with which kings of Judah and Iſrael the Edomites join their forces, not forgetting, it ſeems, that the Moabites, aſſiſted

by

by the Ammonites, had not long before deſtroyed their army.

The Moabites, ſubjects to David and Solomon, forſaking the kings of Judah, gave themſelves for vaſſals to Jeroboam, and ſo they continued to his ſucceſſors till the death of Ahab: but Jehoſhaphat, notwithſtanding the idolatry of his collegue, yet, as it ſeemeth, he was drawn into this war both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Judah to Iſrael, as alſo becauſe they had lately joined themſelves with the Syrians againſt Jehoſhaphat, and thirdly, to puniſh their double rebellion, who firſt forſook Judah and now Iſrael.

Both kings reſolved to paſs by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to aſſure that nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi againſt Jehoſhaphat: but whether they had then declared themſelves againſt Jehoſhaphat, it is not certain; for in 2 Chron. xi. 8. it is written, that in the time of Jehoram, the ſon of Jehoſhaphat, Edom rebelled; and therefore it ſeemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were ſlain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themſelves ſatisfied in ſuch conditions as they required, offered to turn from them, and to join themſelves with the army of Judah: for that they were numbred among the enemies of Jehoſhaphat, it is plain in 2 Chron. xx. and is plain chap. ii. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a king, till Jehoſhaphat's death. Now in the paſſage of theſe kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumeans having a purpoſe to rebel, miſled the army of Judah and Iſrael with intent to enfeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they ſuffered the ſame, if not a greater thirſt than the armies of Craſſus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, utterly periſhed, had not Eliſha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water ſprang, by which, not only Jehoſhaphat and his army, but Jehoram king of Iſrael an idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodneſs of God, having ever been prone to ſave the evil for the good, whereas he never deſtroyed the good for the evil.

The miſerable iſſue of this war, and how [a] Moab burnt his ſon, or the ſon of the king of Edom for ſacrifice on the rampart of his own city, I have already written in the life of Jehoram among the kings of Iſrael. [b] Jehoſhaphat reigned twenty-five years and died; he was buried in the valley of Jehoſhaphat, and a part of the Pyramis ſet over his grave is yet to be ſeen, ſaith [c] Brochard. His acts are written at large by Jehu the ſon of Hanani.

There lived with Jehoſhaphat, Ophratenes in Aſſyria, Capetus and Tiberinus kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the river Tiber (formerly Albula) took name.

In Jehoſhaphat's time alſo ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Ageſilaus in Corinth; and Archilaus of the ſame race, of the Heraclidæ the ſeventh in Lacedæmon. Badeſorus ruled the Tyrians; Ahab, Ochazias and Jehoram the Iſraelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the ſon of Jehoſhaphat, and Ahaziah.

SECT. I.

That Jehoram was made king ſundry times.

JEHORAM the ſon of Jehoſhaphat king of Judah began to reign at 32 years of age, and lived until he was forty years old, being eight years a king: but of theſe eight years, which Jehoram is ſaid to have reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian war with Ahab, left this Jehoram king in his ſtead, as Ahab did his ſon Ahaziah. This appears by the ſeveral beginnings, which are given in ſcripture to the two Jehorams kings of Iſrael and Judah, and to Ahaziah the eldeſt ſon of Ahab: for [d] Ahaziah is ſaid to have begun his reign, in the ſeventeenth year of Jehoſhaphat. Jehoram the brother of [e] Ahaziah ſucceeded him in the ſecond year of Jehoram the ſon of Jehoſhaphat king of Judah, that is, in the next year after that Jehoram of Judah was deſigned king by his father; it being (as we find elſewhere) the [f] eighteenth year of Jehoſhaphat himſelf, who went with the Iſraelite againſt Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royal office was retained ſtill by Jehoſhaphat, who governed abſolutely by himſelf, not communicating the rule with his ſon. But in the fifth year of [g] Jehoram king of Iſrael, which was the two and twentieth of Jehoſhaphat, the old king took unto him, as partner in the government, this his eldeſt ſon, who was at that time thirty-two years old, his father being fifty-ſeven. Now foraſmuch as Jehoſhaphat reigned [h] twenty-five years, it is evident that his ſon did not reign alone till the eighth of Joram king of Iſrael. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other kings of Judah and Iſrael, who did not always reign preciſely ſo long as the bare letter of the text may ſeem at firſt to affirm: but their years were ſometimes complete, ſometimes only current, ſometimes confounded with the years of their ſucceſſors or foregoers, and muſt therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of thoſe others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing leſs needful than curious, to enquire into the reaſons moving Jehoſhaphat either to aſſume unto him his ſon as partner in the kingdom, whilſt he was able himſelf to command both in peace and in war, the like having never been done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the ſeventeenth of his reign) vouchſafed unto him that honour, to reſume it unto himſelf, or at leaſt-wiſe to defer the confirmation of it, until four or five years were paſſed. Yet foraſmuch as to enter into the examination of theſe paſſages, may be a means to find ſome light, whereby we may more clearly diſcover the cauſes of much extraordinary buſineſs enſuing, I hold it not amiſs to make ſuch conjecture, as the circumſtances of the ſtory briefly handled in the ſcriptures may ſeem to approve.

We are therefore to conſider; that this king Jehoſhaphat was the firſt of Reboboam's iſſue that ever entred into any ſtreight league with the kings of the ten tribes. All that reigned in Judah before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themſelves in vain, making ſmall profit of the greateſt advantages that could be wiſhed. Wherefore Jehoſhaphat thought it the wiſeſt way to make a league offenſive and defenſive between Iſrael and Judah, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious king, with one that did [a] hate the Lord, could not long proſper, as not iſſuing from the true root and fountain of all wiſdom: yet as a piece of ſound policy, doubtleſs it wanted not fair pretences of much common good thereby likely to ariſe, with mutual fortifications of both thoſe kingdoms, againſt the uncircumciſed nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit being ſo ineſtimable a jewel that it might not eaſily be loſt, but continue as hereditary from father to ſon, it was thought a very good courſe to have it confirmed by ſome ſure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Athaliah the daughter of Omri, and ſiſter of Ahab king of Iſrael, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was ſon and heir apparent to the king of Judah. This lady was of a maſculine ſpirit, and learn'd ſo much of queen Jezabel her brother's wife, that ſhe durſt undertake, and could thoroughly perform, a great deal more in Jeruſalem, than the other knew how to compaſs in Samaria. She was indeed a fire-brand, ordained by God to conſume a great part of the nobleſt houſes in Judah, and perhaps of thoſe men or their children, whoſe worldly wiſdom, regardleſs of God's pleaſure, had brought her in.

The firſt-fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Judah and Iſrael did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory ſhould have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly princes very ſeldom thrive by matching with idolaters, but rather ſerve the turns of thoſe falſe friends, who being ill affected to God himſelf, cannot be well affected to his ſervants. Before their ſetting forth, Ahab deſigned as king, his ſon Ahaziah; not ſo much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of war (for none of his predeceſſors had ever done the like upon the like occaſions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the prophet Michaia (for he deſpiſed them) as inviting Jehoſhaphat by his own example, to take the ſame courſe, wherein he prevailed.

SECT. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old king Jehoſhaphat to change his purpoſe often, in making his ſon Jehoram king.

MANY arguments do very ſtrongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his wife; eſpecially for his forſaking the religion of his godly anceſtors, and following the abominable ſuperſtitions of the houſe of Ahab.

That ſhe was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole courſe of her actions witneſſeth at large. Much vain matter ſhe was able to produce, whereby to make her husband think that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy perſons in compariſon of him, and his children, which were begotten upon the daughter and ſiſter of two great kings, not upon baſe women and mere ſubjects. The court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained againſt the Syrian Benhadad, were matter ſufficient to make an inſolent man think highly of himſelf, as being allied ſo honourably; who could otherwiſe have found in his heart well enough, to deſpiſe all his brethren, as being the eldeſt, and heir apparent to the crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the poſſeſſion.

How ſoon his vices brake out, or how long he diſſembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that ſome ſmoak, out of the hidden fire, did very ſoon make his father's eyes to water; who thereupon cauſed the young man to know himſelf better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger brethren. And ſurely the doings of Jehoſhaphat about the ſame time, argue no ſmall diſtemper of the whole country, thro' the miſgovernment of his ungodly ſon. For the good old king was fain to make his progreſs round about the land, reclaiming the people unto the ſervice of God, and appointing judges [b] throughout all the ſtrong cities of Judah, city by city. This had been a needleſs labour, if the religion taught and ſtrongly maintained by Aſa, and by himſelf, had not ſuffered alteration, and the courſe of juſtice been perverted by the power of ſuch as had borne authority. But the neceſſity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the king did give to the judges; and by his commiſſion given to one of the prieſts in ſpiritual cauſes, and to the ſteward of his houſe in temporal matters, to be general overſeers.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the ſon of Ahab; but how long after, it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahaziah began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoſhaphat, which was then accounted the ſecond of Jehoram, Jehoſhaphat's ſon, tho' afterwards this Jehoram of Judah had another firſt and ſecond year even in his father's time, before he reigned alone, as the beſt chronologers and expoſitors of the holy text agree. So he continued in private eſtate, until the two and twentieth of his father's reign, at which time, tho' the occaſions inducing his reſtitution to former dignity are not ſet down, yet we may not think, that motives thereto appearing ſubſtantial were wanting. Jehoram of Iſrael held the ſame correſpondence with Jehoſhaphat, that his father had done; and made uſe of it. He drew the Judean into the war of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young prince of Judah was again ordained king by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if we ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize againſt Moab did not occupy ſo much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoſhaphat, in which year that nation rebelled againſt Iſrael, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations between the two kings of Judah and Iſrael, and the affinity between them contracted in the perſon of Jehoram, might offer ſome good occaſions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger ſons, in their elder brother's diſgrace, might cauſe their father to put him in poſſeſſion, for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep diſſimulation of Jehoram himſelf, might win the good opinion both of his father and brethren; it being a thing uſual in miſchievous fell natures, to be as abject and ſervile in time of adverſity, as inſolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifeſt, that being repoſſeſſed of his former eſtate, he demeaned himſelf in ſuch wiſe towards his brethren, as cauſed their father to enable them, not only with ſtore [c] of ſilver, and of gold, and of precious things (which kind of liberality other kings doubtleſs had uſed unto their younger ſons) but with the cuſtody of ſtrong cities in Judah, to aſſure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means againſt unwonted perils.

SECT. III.

The doings of Jehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BUT all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwiſe determined of the ſequel. When once the good old man, their father, was dead, the younger ſons of Jehoſaphat, found ſtrong cities a weak defence againſt the power of him to whom the citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the ſummons of a king their brother, then had he them without any more ado; if they ſtood upon their guard, then were they traitors, and ſo unable to hold out againſt him, who, beſides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Iſraelitiſh kingdom againſt them; ſo that the apparent likelihood of their final overthrow, ſufficed to make all forſake them in the very beginning. Howſoever it was, they were all taken and ſlain, and with them for company many great men of the land; ſuch belike, as either had taken their part, when the tyrant ſought their lives, or had been appointed rulers of the country, when Jehoram was depoſed from his government; in which office they, without forbearing to do juſtice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things, derogatory to their young maſter, which if he would now call treaſon, ſaying that he was then king, who durſt ſay the contrary?

After this, Jehoram took upon him, as being now lord alone, to make innovations in religion; wherein he was not contented, as other idolatrous princes, to give way and ſafe-conduct unto ſuperſtition and idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that ſin, whereto it is wonderful that they were ſo much addicted, having ſuch knowledge of God, and of his deteſting that above all other ſins; but he uſed compulſion, and was (if not the very firſt) the firſt that is regiſtred, to have ſet up irreligion by force.

Whilſt he was thus buſied at home, in doing what he liſted, the Edomites his tributaries rebelled againſt him abroad; and having hitherto, ſince David's time, been govern'd by a viceroy, did now make unto themſelves a king. Againſt theſe Jehoram in perſon made an expedition, taking along with him his princes, and all his chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing ſome of thoſe, whom he ſhould have ſubdued, and kept his ſervants. Now began the prophecy of Iſaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Eſau in proceſs of time ſhould break the yoke of Jacob. For after this, the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the kings of Juda, but held their own ſo well, that when, after many civil and foreign wars, the Jews by ſundry nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his ſon, and others of that race following them, became lords of the Jews, in the decrepit age of Iſrael, and reigned as kings, even in Jeruſalem it ſelf.

The freedom of the Edomites, tho' purchaſed ſomewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great city within Juda, which in the time of Joſhua had a peculiar king, to rebel againſt Jehoram, and ſet it ſelf at liberty. Libna ſtood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the aſſiſtance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore ſo unlikely it was to have maintained it ſelf in liberty, that it may ſeem ſtrange how it could eſcape from utter deſtruction, or at the leaſt from ſome terrible vengeance, moſt likely to have been taken by their powerful, cruel, and throughly incenſed lord. The Iſraelite held ſuch good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the town, had it offered it ſelf unto him: neither do we read that it ſought how to caſt it ſelf into a new ſubjection, but continued a free eſtate. The rebellion of it againſt Jehoram was, [a] Becauſe he had forſaken the Lord God of his fathers; which I take to have not only been the firſt and remote cauſe, but even the next and immediate reaſon, moving the inhabitants to do as they did: for it was a town of the Levites: who muſt needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion contrary to God's law, had not only ſome allowance to countenance it by the king, but compulſive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the uſe of the temple at Jeruſalem (which, being devout men, they might fear to loſe by this rebellion) it was never deny'd to thoſe of the ten revolted tribes by any of the religious kings, who rather invited the [b] Iſraelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under idolaters they muſt have been without it, whether they lived free or in ſubjection. Yet it ſeems that private reaſons were not wanting, which might move them rather to do than to ſuffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the general viſitation before remembred, wherein Jehoſhaphat reformed his kingdom, the good old king appointing new governours, and giving them eſpecial charge to do juſtice without reſpect of perſons, uſed theſe words, The Levites ſhall be officers before you; be of good courage and do it, and the Lord ſhall be with the good. By theſe phraſes, it ſeems, that he encouraged them againſt the more powerful, than juſt proceedings of his ſon; whom if the Levites did (according to the truſt repoſed in them) neglect, in diſcharging their duties, likely it is, that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feel, as many princes of the land had done, his heavy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon deſtroy'd, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) ſo much as beſieged or moleſted, may juſtly ſeem very ſtrange. And the more ſtrange it is in regard of the mighty armies which Jehoſhaphat was able to raiſe, being ſufficient to have over-whelmed any one town, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one month have caſt into it with ſhovels, by ordinary approaches.

But it ſeems that of thoſe great numbers which his father could have levied, there were not many whom Jehoram could well truſt; and therefore perhaps he thought it an eaſier loſs, to let one town go, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to puniſh it. So deſperate is the condition of tyrants, who thinking it a greater happineſs to be feared, than to be loved; are fain themſelves to ſtand in fear of thoſe, by whom they might have been dreadful unto others.

SECT. IV.

Of the miſeries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

THESE afflictions not ſufficing to make any impreſſion of God's diſpleaſure in the mind of the wicked prince; a prophecy in writing was deliver'd unto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wives, and his own body. Hereby likewiſe it appears, that he was a cruel perſecutor of God's ſervants; in as much as the prophets durſt not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predeceſſors, both good and evil kings, but were fain to denounce God's judgments againſt him by letters, keeping themſelves cloſe and far from him. This epiſtle is ſaid to have been ſent unto him from [a] Elias the prophet. But Elias was tranſlated, and Elizeus propheſied in his ſtead before this time, even in the days of Jehoſhaphat [b]. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecy in writing behind him, or that (as ſome conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occaſion that we read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be believed than the tradition held by ſome of the Jewiſh Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did ſend this epiſtle; a tale ſomewhat like to the fable of our Lady's letters, deviſed by Eraſmus, or of the verſe that was ſent from heaven to St. Giles.

But whoſoever was the author of this threatning epiſtle, the accompliſhment of the prophecy was as terrible as the ſentence. For the Philiſtines and Arabians brake into Judea, and took the king's houſe, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they ſlew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. Theſe Philiſtines had not preſumed ſince the time of David, to make any offenſive war till now; for they were by him almoſt conſumed, and had loſt the beſt of their towns, maintaining themſelves in the reſt of their ſmall territories, by defenſive arms, to which they were conſtrained at Gibbethon by the Iſraelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then, as they are now, a naked people, all horſemen, and ill appointed; their country affording no other furniture, than ſuch as might make them fitter to rob and ſpoil in the open fields, than to offend ſtrong cities ſuch as were thick ſet in Juda. True it is, that in ages long after following, they conquer'd all the ſouth parts of the world then known, in a very ſhort ſpace of time, deſtroying ſome, and building other ſome very ſtately cities. But it muſt be conſidered, that this was when they had learned of the Romans the art of war; and that the proviſions which they found, together with the arts which they learned, in one ſubdued province, did make them able and skilful in purſuing their conqueſt, and going onward into regions far removed from them. At this day having loſt in effect all that they had gotten, ſuch of them as live in Arabia it ſelf are good horſemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to paſſengers, but unable to deal with good ſoldiers, as riding ſtark naked, and rather truſting in the ſwiftneſs of their horſes, than in any other means of reſiſtance, where they are well oppoſed. And ſuch, or little better, may they ſeem to have been, that ſpoiled Judea in the time of Jehoram. For their country was always barren and deſart, wanting manual arts whereby to ſupply the naturals with furniture: neither are theſe bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philiſtines. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the leaſt muſter of Juda and Benjamin under Jehoſhaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eighty thouſand fighting men) had been enough to have driven away far greater forces than theſe enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people been unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their prince's jealouſy, as in Saul's time by the policy of the Philiſtines.

It may ſeem that the houſe of the king which theſe invaders took, was not his palace in Jeruſalem, but rather ſome other houſe of his abroad in the country, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: becauſe we read not, that they did ſack the city, or ſpoil the temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious booty, had they got poſſeſſion thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jeruſalem it ſelf by ſurpriſe, the people being diſarmed, and the king's guards too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, becauſe it was ſo large and populous; and therefore having done what ſpoil they could, withdrew themſelves with ſuch purchaſe as they were able ſafely to convey away.

The ſlaughter committed by Jehu upon the two and forty brethren of Ahazia, or (as they are called elſewhere) ſo many of his brothers ſons, and the cruel maſſacre, wherein all the royal ſeed periſhed (only Joas excepted) under the tyranny of Athalia, following within two years after this invaſion of the Philiſtines and Arabians, make it ſeem probable, that the ſons of Jehoram were not all ſlain at once, but that rather the firſt murder began in his own time, and was ſeconded by many other heavy blows, wherewith his houſe was inceſſantly ſtricken, until it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After theſe calamities, the hand of God was extended againſt the body of this wicked king, ſmiting him with a grievous diſeaſe in his bowels, which left him not until his guts fell out, and his wretched ſoul departed from his miſerable carcaſs. The people of the land, as they had ſmall cauſe of comfort in his life, ſo had they not the good manners to pretend ſorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of burial among his anceſtors the kings of Juda, tho' his own ſon ſucceeded him in the kingdom, who was guided by the ſame ſpirits that had been his father's evil angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead husband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatneſs, to retain her favourites in their authority, and to place about her ſon ſuch [c] counſellors, of the houſe of Ahab, as were fitteſt for her turn. Wherefore ſhe thought it unreaſonable to make much ado about a thing of nothing, and offend the people's eyes, with a ſtately funeral of a man by them deteſted: but rather choſe to let the blame of things paſſed be lain upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her ſelf, and hers, which it now did concern her to avoid. Such is the quality of wicked inſtigators, having made greedy uſe of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults alſo, the man whoſe evil inclinations their ſiniſter counſels have made worſe, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a buſy time; when his friend and coſin the Iſraelite, who had the ſame name, was entangled in a difficult war againſt the Aramite; and therefore could have had no better leiſure to help Athalia in ſetting of things according to her own mind, than he had (perhaps through the ſame hindrance) to help her huſband, when he was diſtreſſed by the Philiſtines. Yea rather, he needed and craved the aſſiſtance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not ſped ſo well the laſt time, that they ſhould willingly run thither again, unleſs they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (purſuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumſtances remembred in holy ſcripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accompliſh nevertheleſs his hidden purpoſe, and without miraculous means, confound themſelves in the ſeeming-wiſe devices of their own folly: as likewiſe to the end that all men might learn to ſubmit their judgments to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may ſafely diſpenſe with his commandments, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wiſdom dictateth unto them. For in ſuch kind of unhappy ſubtilties, it is manifeſt that Athaliah was able to furniſh both her husband and her ſon, but the iſſue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear in that which immediately followeth.

SECT. V.

Of the reign of Ahaziah, and his buſineſs with the king of Iſrael.

OCHAZIAS, or Ahazia, the ſon of Jehoram and Athaliah, began his reign over Judah in the twelfth year of Jehoram, the ſon of Ahab king of Iſrael, and reigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficulty than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much diſputation, whereof I ſee no more probable concluſion, than that of Torniellus, alledging the edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588, which ſaith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his kingdom, and the annotations thereupon, which cite other copies, that give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young; for he was governed by his mother, and her miniſters, who gave him counſel by which he periſhed. In matter of religion he altered none of his father's courſes. In matter of ſtate, he likewiſe upheld the league made with the houſe of Ahab. He was much buſied in doing little, and that with ill ſucceſs. He accompanied his couſin the Iſraelite againſt Ramoth Gilead, which they won, but not without blows: for the Aramites fought ſo well, that the king of Iſrael was fain to adventure his own perſon, which eſcaped not unwounded.

The town being won, was manned ſtrongly, in expectation of ſome attempt likely to be made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Jehoram king of Iſrael withdrew himſelf to the city of Jezreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahaziah returned to Jeruſalem. It ſeems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all ſcantly one year, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part) when he made a new journey, as it were for good manners ſake, to viſit the king of Iſrael, who lay ſore of his wounds. Belike Athaliah was brewing ſome new plots, which his preſence would have hindred, and therefore ſought every occaſion to thruſt him abroad: for otherwiſe it was but a vain piece of work ſo to leave his kingdom, having no other buſineſs than by way of complement to go to ſee one whom he had ſeen yeſterday. Certain it is, that the Lord had reſolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgment, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the prophet, upon the houſe of Ahab. And hereunto at this time had he diſpoſed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in man's eyes might ſeem to have been accidental; but the very thoughts and affections of ſuch perſons, as intended nothing leſs than the fulfilling of his high pleaſure. Of theſe Athaliah doubtleſs was one; whoſe miſchievous purpoſes it will ſhortly be needful, for explanation of ſome difficulties ariſing, that we diligently conſider and examine.

SECT. VI.

How Ahaziah periſhed with the houſe of Ahab: and how that family was deſtroyed by Jehu.

THE whole army of Iſrael, with all the principal captains lying in Ramoth Gilead, a diſciple of Elizeus the prophet, came in among the captains that were ſitting together, who calling out from among them Jehu, a principal man, took him apart, and anointed him king over Iſrael; rehearſing unto him the prophecy of Elias againſt the houſe of Ahab, and letting him underſtand that it was the pleaſure of God to make him executioner of that ſentence. The faſhion of the meſſenger was ſuch as bred in the captains a deſire to know his errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had overheard all the talk or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him king: for the prophecy of Elias was well known among them, neither durſt any one oppoſe himſelf againſt him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu, who had upon the ſudden this great honour thrown upon him, was not ſlow to put himſelf in poſſeſſion of it, but uſed the firſt heat of their affections who joined with him, in ſetting on foot the buſineſs which nearly concerned him, and was not to be foreſlowed, being no more his own than God's.

The firſt care taken was, that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezreel, whereby the king might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreſeen, he marched ſwiftly away to take the court while it was yet ſecure. King Jehoram was now ſo well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cauſe it ſeems that there was much feaſting and joy made, eſpecially by queen Jezabel, who kept her ſtate ſo well, that the brethren of Ahaziah coming hither at this time, did make it as well their errand to ſalute the queen, as to viſit the king.

Certain it is, that ſince the rebellion of Moab againſt Iſrael, the houſe of Ahab did never ſo much flouriſh as at this time. Seventy princes of the blood royal there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the ſon of queen Jezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his father had attempted in vain, with loſs of his life; and he won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now paſt, but the honour likely to continue. The amity was ſo great between Iſrael and Judah, that it might ſuffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of ſucceſs to any rebellious enterprizer: ſo that now the prophecy of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwiſe remembred, than as an unlucky tale, by them that beheld the majeſtical face of the court, wherein ſo great a friend as the king of Judah was entertained, and forty princes of his blood expected.

In the midſt of this ſecurity, whilſt theſe great eſtates were (perhaps) either conſulting about proſecution of their intents, firſt againſt the Aramites, and then againſt Moab, Edom and other rebels and enemies; enemies; or elſe were triumphing in joy of that which was already atchieved, and the queen-mother dreſſing herſelf in the braveſt manner to come down amongſt them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a tower diſcovered a company coming. This news was not very troubleſome: for the army, that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be ready againſt all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be diſcharged upon ſome notice taken, that the enemy would not, or could not ſtir. Only the king ſent out an horſeman to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The meſſenger coming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the king as little warning as might be. The ſeeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an anſwer, might argue the matter to be of ſmall importance; yet the king to be ſatisfied, ſent out another, that ſhould bring him word how all went; and he was likewiſe detained by Jehu. Theſe dumb ſhews bred ſome ſuſpicion in Jehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew ſo near, that they might, tho' not perfectly, be diſcerned, and notice taken of Jehu himſelf, by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the king, that was loth to diſcover any weakneſs, cauſed his chariot to be made ready, and iſſued forth with Ahaziah king of Judah in his company, whoſe preſence added majeſty to his train, when ſtrength to reſiſt, or expedition to flee, had been more needful. This could not be done ſo haſtily, but that Jehu was come even to the town's end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to ſalute Jehu with terms of peace, but receiving a bitter anſwer, his heart failed him, ſo that crying out upon the treaſon to his fellow-king, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu ſoon overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he ſtruck him dead, and threw his carcaſe into that field, which, purchaſed with the blood of the rightful owner, was to be watered with the blood of the unjuſt poſſeſſor. Neither did Ahaziah eſcape ſo well, but that he was arreſted by a wound, which held him till death did ſeize upon him.

The king's palace was joining to the wall, by the gate of the city, where Jezabel might ſoon be advertiſed of this calamity, if ſhe did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercy, whoſe judgment, pronounced againſt her long before, had overtaken her when ſhe leaſt expected it. But ſhe, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made herſelf ready in all haſte, and painted her face, hoping with her ſtately and imperious looks to daunt the traitor, or at the leaſt to utter ſome Apophthegm, that ſhould expreſs her brave ſpirit, and brand him with ſuch a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did ſhe think upon the hungry dogs, that were ordained to devour her, whoſe paunches the ſtibium, with which ſhe beſmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the ſcolding language, wherewith ſhe armed her tongue, could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew near, ſhe opened her window, and looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treaſon, and murder of the king his maſter. This was in mere human valuation ſtoutly ſpoken, but was indeed a part of miſerable folly, as are all things, howſoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own eunuchs, that ſtood by and heard her, were not affected ſo much as with any compaſſion of her fortune; much leſs was her enemy daunted with her proud ſpirit. When Jehu ſaw that ſhe did uſe the little remainder of her life in ſeeking to vex him; he made her preſently to underſtand her own eſtate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her ſervants, to know which of them would be of his ſide, and ſoon found them ready to offer their ſervice, before the very face of their proud lady. Hereupon he commanded them to caſt her down headlong: which immediately they perform'd without all regard of her greatneſs and eſtate, wherein ſhe had a few hours before ſhined ſo gloriouſly in the eyes of men; of men that conſidered not the judgments of God that had been denounced againſt her.

So periſhed this accurſed woman by the rude hands of her own ſervants, at the commandment of her greateſt enemy, that was yeſterday her ſubject, but now her lord: and ſhe periſhed miſerably ſtruggling in vain with baſe grooms, who contumelioufly did hale and thruſt her, whilſt her inſulting enemy ſat on horſe-back, adding indignity to her grief by ſcornfully beholding the ſhameful manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carcaſs that was left without the walls was devoured by dogs, and her very memory was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her idolatry, murder, and oppreſſion, with ſlow, but ſure payment, and full intereſt.

Ahaziah king of Judah flying apace from Jehu, was overtaken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly wound in the kingdom of Samaria, was ſuffered to get him gone (which he did in all haſte) and ſeek his burial in his own kingdom: and this favour he obtained for his grandfather's ſake, not for his father's, nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jeruſalem, where he was interred with his anceſtors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whoſe ſon he was that ſucceeded her.

SECT. I.

Of Athalia's uſurping the kingdom, and what pretences ſhe might forge.

AFTER the death of Ahaziah, it is ſaid, that his houſe was not able to retain the kingdom: which note, and the proceedings of [a] Athalia upon the death of her ſon, have given occaſion to divers opinions concerning the pedigree of Joas who reigned ſhortly after. For Athalia being thus diſpoiled of her ſon, under whoſe name ſhe had ruled at her pleaſure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the princes of the blood, and ſlew them, that ſo ſhe might occupy the royal throne herſelf, and reign as queen, rather than live a ſubject. She had before-hand put into great place, and made counſellors unto her ſon, ſuch as were fitteſt for her purpoſe, and ready at all times to execute her will: that ſhe kept a ſtrong guard about her, it is very likely; and as likely it is, that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the princes, and many of the nobility, had made the people tame, and fearful to ſtir, whatſoever they ſaw or heard.

[a] 2 Chron. 22. 9.

Yet ambition, how violent ſoever it be, is ſeldom or never ſo ſhameleſs as to refuſe the commodity of goodly pretences offering themſelves; but rather ſcrapes together all that will any way ſerve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not abſurd for us to think, that Athalia, when ſhe ſaw the princes of the royal blood, all of them in a manner, ſlain by her huſband, and afterwards his own children deſtroy'd by the Philiſtines, began even then to play her own game, reducing by artificial practice, into fair likelihoods, thoſe poſſibilities wherewith her huſband's bad fortune had preſented her. Not without great ſhew of reaſon, either by her own mouth, or by ſome truſty creature of hers, might ſhe give him to underſtand, how needful it were to take the beſt order whilſt as yet he might, for fear of the worſt that might happen. If the iſſue of David, which now remained only in his family, ſhould by any accident fail (as woful experience had already ſhewed what might after come to paſs) the people of Juda were not unlikely to chooſe a king of ſome new ſtock, a popular ſeditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his own unworthineſs, would not care what aſperſions he laid upon that royal houſe, which was fallen down. And who could aſſure him, that ſome ambitious ſpirit, foreſeeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the deſtruction of him, and all his ſeed? Wherefore it were the wiſeſt way to deſign by his authority, not only his ſucceſſor, but alſo the reverſioner, and ſo to provide, that the crown might never be ſubject to any rifling, but remain in the diſpoſition of them that loved him beſt, if the worſt that might be feared coming to paſs, his own poſterity could not retain it.

Such perſuaſions being urged, and earneſtly followed, by the importunate ſollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous tyrant think, that the only way to fruſtrate all devices of ſuch as gaped after a change, was to make her heir the laſt and youngeſt of his houſe, whom it moſt concern'd, as being the queen-mother, to uphold the firſt and eldeſt.

If Athalia took no ſuch courſe as this in her huſband's times, yet ſhe might do it in her ſon's. For Ahazia (beſides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the ſecurity of his half-brethren, or their children; as accounting his father's other wives, in reſpect of his own born-mother, little better than concubines, and their children baſely begotten. But if this miſchievous woman forgot herſelf ſo far in her wicked policy, that ſhe loſt all opportunity, which the weakneſs of her huſband and ſon did afford, of procuring unto herſelf ſome ſeeming title: yet could ſhe afterwards fain ſome ſuch matter, as boldly ſhe might: being ſure that none would ask to ſee her evidence, for fear of being ſent to learn the certainty of her ſon or huſband in another world. But I rather think that ſhe took order for her affairs beforehand. For tho' ſhe had no reaſon to ſuſpect or fear the ſudden death of her ſon, yet it was the wiſeſt way to provide betimes againſt all that might happen, whilſt her husband's iſſue by other women was young and unable to reſiſt. We plainly find that the brethren or nephews of Ahazia, to the number of two and forty, were ſent to the court of Iſrael, only to ſalute the children of the king, and the children of the queen. The ſlender occaſion of which long journey, conſider'd together with the quality of theſe perſons (being in effect all the ſtock of Jehoram that could be grown to any ſtrength) makes it very ſuſpicious that their entertainment in Jezabel's houſe would only have been more formal, but little differing in ſubſtance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courſes held both before and after by theſe two queens, will find cauſe enough to think no leſs. Of ſuch as have aſpired unto lordſhips not belonging to them, and thruſt out the right heirs by pretence of teſtaments, that had no other validity than the ſword of ſuch as claimed by them could give, hiſtories of late, yea of many ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Solomon is true: [a] Is there any thing whereof one may ſay, behold, this is new? It hath been already in the old time that was before us. That a king might ſhed his brother's blood, was proved by Solomon upon Adonia; that he might alienate the crown from his natural heirs, David had given proof; but theſe had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that pleaſe them, will neglect the reaſons of thoſe examples, if they pleaſe them not, and reſt contented with the practice, as more willingly ſhewing what they may do, than acknowledging why Solomon ſlew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entring into another. [b] Jehoram ſlew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchaſed the kingdom, and might the more freely diſpoſe of it, yet he diſpoſed of it as the Lord appointed; if Jehoram, who had loſt much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alienate the remainder at his pleaſure; or if Ahazia ſought to cut off the ſucceſſion of his brethren, or of their iſſue; either of theſe was to be anſwered with the words which Jehoiada the prieſt uſed afterwards, in declaring the title of Joaſh: Behold, the king's ſon muſt reign; as the Lord hath ſaid of the ſons of David. Wherefore, tho' I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend ſome title, whatſoever it might be, to the crown of Juda; yet it is moſt certain, that ſhe had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and ſo ſhe held it ſix whole years, and a part of the ſeventh in good ſeeming ſecurity.

SECT. II.

How Jehu ſpent his time in Iſrael, ſo that he could not moleſt Athalia.

IN all this time Jehu did never go about to diſturb her; which in reaſon he was likely to deſire, being an enemy to her whole houſe. But he was occupied at the firſt in eſtabliſhing himſelf, rooting out the poſterity of Ahab, and reforming ſomewhat in religion: afterwards in wars againſt the Aramite, wherein he was ſo far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much leſs attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were ſeventy living in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by letter, adviſed the citizens to ſet up ſome one as king, and to prepare themſelves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was, which they well underſtood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to reſiſt him. Wherefore they took example by the two kings whom he had ſlain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their ſervice; wherein they ſo readily ſhewed themſelves obedient, that in leſs than one day's warning, they ſent him the heads of all thoſe princes, as they were injoined by a ſecond letter from him. After this, he ſurprized all the prieſts of Baal by a ſubtilty, feigning a great ſacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them altogether into one temple, where he ſlew them: and in the ſame zeal to God, utterly demoliſhed all the monuments of that impiety.

means

Concerning the idolatry deviſed by Jeroboam, no king of Iſrael had ever greater reaſon than Jehu to deſtroy it. For he needed not to fear leſt the people ſhould be allured unto the houſe of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the crown of Juda in the poſſeſſion of a cruel tyranneſs: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeal expreſſed in deſtroying Baal out of Iſrael, he was promiſed, notwithſtanding his following the ſin of Jeroboam, that the kingdom ſhould remain in his family, to the fourth generation. But all this would not ſerve; he would needs help to piece out God's providence with his own circumſpection; doing therein like a fooliſh greedy gameſter, who by ſtealing a needleſs card to aſſure himſelf of winning a ſtake, forfeits his whole teſt. He had queſtionleſs diſpleaſed many, by that which he did againſt Baal; and many more he ſhould offend by taking from them the uſe of a ſuperſtition, ſo long practiſed as was that idolatry of Jeroboam. Yet all theſe, how many ſoever they were, had never once thought upon making him king, if God, whom (to retain them) he now forſook, had not given him the crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Iſrael, whereof Hazael king of Damaſcus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous prince we may find in the prophecy of Elizeus, who foretold it, ſaying: [a] Their ſtrong cities ſhalt thou ſet on fire; and their young men ſhalt thou ſlay with the ſword, and ſhalt daſh their infants againſt the ſtones, and rent in pieces their women with child. So did not only the wickedneſs of Ahab cauſe the ruin of his whole houſe, but the obſtinate idolatry of the people bring a lamentable miſery upon all the land. For the fury of Hazael's victory was not quenched with the deſtruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invaſion; but he [b] ſmote them in all the coaſts of Iſrael, and waſted all the country beyond the river of Jordan. Notwithſtanding all theſe calamities, it ſeems that the people repented not of their idolatry (For in thoſe days the Lord began to loath Iſrael) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble houſe of Ahab, under which they had beaten thoſe enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the conqueſt of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to reſtore the cities which his father had won: whereas now they were fain to make woful ſhifts, living under a lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his maſter that had put him in truſt, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in ſerving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, inſtead of the eaſe and pleaſure to themſelves propounded by contrary courſes, over-whelm'd with the troubles which they ſought to avoid, and therein by God whom they firſt forſook, forſaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wiſdom, wherein they had repoſed all their confidence.

SECT. III.

Of Athalia's government.

THESE calamities falling upon Iſrael, kept Athalia ſafe on that ſide, giving her leiſure to look to things at home; as having little to do abroad, unleſs it were ſo that ſhe held ſome correſpondency with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husband's grandfather king Aſa, who had done the like. And ſome probability that ſhe did ſo, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we find, that this [c] wicked Athalia and her children brake up the houſe of God, and all things that were dedicate for the houſe of the Lord did they beſtow upon Baalim. Such a ſacrilege, tho' it proceeded from a deſire to ſet out her own idolatry, with ſuch pomp as might make it the more glorious in the people's eyes, was not likely to want ſome fair pretext of neceſſity of the ſtate ſo requiring: in which caſe others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next ſucceſſor was fain to do the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taſte of that which was formerly thence extracted for his ſake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the prieſts and Levites was very notable, and ſerved (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the religion taught by God himſelf, howſoever the queen's proceedings advanc'd the contrary. For the poverty of that ſacred tribe of Levi muſt needs have been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and poſſeſſions in the ten tribes being utterly loſt, the oblations and other perquiſites, by which they liv'd, being now very few, and ſmall; and the ſtore laid up in better times under godly kings, being all taken away by ſhameful robbery. Yet they upheld in all this miſery the ſervice of God, and the daily ſacrifice, keeping daily their courſes, and performing obedience to the high prieſt, no leſs than in thoſe days wherein their entertainment was far better.

SECT. IV.

Of the preſervation of Joas.

JEHOIADA then occupied the prieſthood, an honourable, wiſe, and religious man. To his carefulneſs it may be aſcribed, that the ſtate of the church was in ſome ſlender ſort upheld in thoſe unhappy times. His wife was Jehoſhabeth, who was daughter of king Jehoram, and ſiſter to Ahazia, a godly lady and virtuous, whoſe piety makes it ſeem that Athalia was not her mother, tho' her acceſs to the court argue the contrary: but her diſcreet carriage might more eaſily procure her welcome to her own father's houſe, than the education under ſuch a mother could have permitted her to be ſuch as ſhe was. By her care Joas the young prince that reigned ſoon after, was convey'd out of the nurſery, when Athalia deſtroy'd all the king's children, and was carried ſecretly into the temple, where as ſecretly he was brought up. How it came to paſs that this young child was not hunted out, when his body was miſſing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his eſcape, I will not ſtand to examine; for it was not good in policy, that the people ſhould hear ſay, that one of the children had avoided that cruel blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and ſo be the leſs conformable to the preſent government. So Joas was delivered out of that ſlaughter, he and his nurſe being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be caſt away, as having no other guard than a poor woman that gave him ſuck, who fooliſhly doubting that ſhe herſelf ſhould have been ſlain, was fled away with him into ſome deſolate place, where it was like enough that ſhe and he ſhould periſh. In ſuch caſes flatterers, or men deſirous of reward, eaſily coin ſuch tales, and rather ſwear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will loſe the thanks due to their joyful tidings.

SECT. V.

Whoſe ſon Joas was.

† I.

Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the ſon of Ahazia.

NOW concerning this [a] Joas, whoſe ſon he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirm, and hath cauſed much controverſy among writers. The places of ſcripture, which call him the ſon of Ahazia, ſeem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give the title of ſon unto him, in regard that he was his ſucceſſor, I neither by myſelf can find, nor can by any help of authors learn how to anſwer the difficulties, appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the natural ſon of Ahazia. For whereas it is ſaid, that [b] the houſe of Ahazia was not able to retain the kingdom; ſome do infer that this Joas was not properly called his ſon, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore ſucceeded him, as a ſon in the inheritance of his father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For ſhe perceiving that the kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom ſhe had no intereſt, might eaſily find cauſe to fear, that the tyranny exerciſed by her husband, at her inſtigation, upon ſo many noble houſes, would now be revenged upon herſelf. The ruin of her idolatrous religion might in this caſe terrify both her and her minions; the ſentence of the law rewarding that offence with death, and the tragedy of Jezabel teaching her what might happen to another queen. All this had little concerned her, if her own grandchild had been heir to the crown; for ſhe that had power enough to make herſelf queen, could with more eaſe, and leſs envy, have taken upon her the office of a protector, by which authority ſhe might have done her pleaſure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and ſecure of her own eſtate, as not wanting an heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that ſhe ſhould be ſo unnatural, as to deſtroy the child of her own ſon, of whoſe life ſhe might have made greater uſe, than ſhe could of his death; whereas indeed the love of grand-mothers to their nephews is little leſs than that of mothers to their children.

This argument is very ſtrong; for it may ſeem incredible, that all natural affection ſhould be caſt aſide, when as neither neceſſity urgeth, nor any commodity thereby gotten requireth it; yea when all human policy doth teach one the ſame, which nature without reaſon would have perſuaded.

† II.

That Joas did not deſcend from Nathan.

BUT (as it is more eaſy to find a difficulty in that which is related, than to ſhew how it might have otherwiſe been) the pedigree of this Joas is, by them which think him not the ſon of Ahazia, ſet down in ſuch ſort that it may very juſtly be ſuſpected. They ſay that he deſcended from Nathan the ſon of David, and not from Solomon; to which purpoſe they bring a hiſtory (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, ſaying that the line of Solomon held the kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the family of Nathan ſhould ſucceed it. Concerning this Nathan, the ſon of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the prophet, who (as they think) was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as alſo St. Auguſtine ſometime was; but afterwards he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the ſons of David, by [c] Bathſhua the daughter of Ammiel, and therefore could not be the prophet. Gregory Nazianzene (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him Eraſmus and Faber Stapulenſis, have likewiſe held the ſame of Joas, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan, and thoſe other brethren of Solomon by the ſame mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods, to have been the children of Uria the Hittite: and ſo are they accounted by ſundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenſis, who follow the Hebrew expoſitors of that place in the firſt of Chronicles. The words of Solomon, calling himſelf the only begotten of his mother, do approve this expoſition; for we read of no more than two ſons which Bathſhua or Bathſheba did bear unto David, whereof the one, begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Solomon only of her children by the king did live. So that the reſt muſt needs have been the children of Uria, and are thought to have been David's only by adoption. Wherefore, if Joas had not been the ſon of Ahazia, then muſt that pedigree have been falſe, wherein St. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Solomon; yea, then had not our bleſſed Saviour iſſued from the loins of David, according to the fleſh, but had only been of his line by courteſy of the nation, and form of law, as any other might have been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late writers into the opinion that Joas was not of the poſterity of Solomon, it is enough to ſay that this was Frier Annius's Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any ſuch matter: but Annius can make authors to ſpeak what he liſts.

† III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the ſon of Jehoram.

IN ſo doubtful a caſe, if it ſeem lawful to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, methinks it were not amiſs to lay open at once, and peruſe together two places of Scripture, whereof the [d] one telling the wickedneſs of Jehoram, the ſon of Jehoſhaphat, king of Judah, for which he and his children periſhed, rehearſeth it as one of God's mercies towards the houſe of David, that according to his promiſe he would give him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth ſay, that for the offences of the ſame Jehoram, there was not a ſon left him ſave Jehoahas, the youngeſt of his ſons. Now, if it were in regard of God's promiſe to David,

[a] 2 Kings 11. 2. 2 Chron. 22. 11. [b] 2 Chron. 22. 9. [c] 1 Chron. 3. 5. [d] 2 Kings 8. 19.

vid, that, after thoſe maſſacres of Jehoram upon all his brethren, and of the Philiſtines and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the ſeed of David eſcaped; why may it not be thought that he was ſaid to have eſcaped, in whom the line of David was preſerved? for had all the race of Solomon been rooted up in theſe woeful tragedies, and the progeny of Nathan ſucceeded in place thereof, like enough it is, that ſome remembrance more particular would have been extant of an event ſo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguiſhed, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogy of our Lord, as it is recounted by St. Luke; but the preſervation of the houſe of David, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the perſon of Jehoahas, in whom the royal branch of Solomon, the natural, and not only legal iſſue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joas, who followed Athalia in the kingdom, was the youngeſt ſon of Jehoram, whoſe life Athalia, as a ſtep-dame, was not unlikely to purſue. For it were not eaſily underſtood, why the preſervation of David's line, by God's eſpecial mercy in regard of his promiſe made, ſhould pertain rather to that time, when beſides Ahazia himſelf there were two and forty of his [a] brethren, or (as in another place they are called) ſons of his brethren, remaining alive, which afterwards were all ſlain by Jehu, than have reference to the lamentable [b] deſtruction, and little leſs than extirpation of that progeny, wherein one only did eſcape. Certainly that inhuman murder which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the hiſtory) revenged upon his own children, then was not this vengeance of God accompliſhed by the Philiſtines and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards proſecuted by Jehu, and finally took effect by the hands of that ſame wicked woman, at whoſe inſtigation he had committed ſuch barbarous outrage. And from this execution of God's heavy judgment laid upon [c] Jehoram and all his children, only Jehoahas, his youngeſt ſon, was exempted; whom therefore if I ſhould affirm to be the ſame with Joas, which is called the ſon of Ahazia, I ſhould not want good probability. Some further appearance of neceſſity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwiſe have been. For it was the youngeſt ſon of Jehoram in whom the race was preſerved, which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, ſeeing that he was twenty years old at the leaſt (as is already noted) when he began to reign, and conſequently was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his father's age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram ſhould have begotten many children before he was eighteen years old, or that having (as he had) many wives and children, he ſhould upon the ſudden, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitful, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which muſt have been true, if this were true that Ahazia was the ſame Jehoahas, which was his youngeſt ſon. But this inconvenience is taken away, and thoſe other doubts ariſing from the cauſeleſs cruelty of Athalia, in ſeeking the life of Joas, are eaſily cleared, if Joas and Jehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withſtand this opinion, for he was [d] ſeven years old when he began to reign; which if we underſtand of years compleat, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten ſomewhat after the beginning of his ſickneſs. Neither is it more abſurd to ſay that he was the natural ſon of Jehoram, though called the ſon of Ahazia, than it were to ſay, as great authors have done, this difficulty notwithſtanding, that he was of the poſterity of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to anſwer; which, had it concurred with the reſt, might have ſerved as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that ſoundeth much more near to Joas, than to Ahazia, in an Engliſh ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by ſome skilful in that language) through the diverſity of certain letters, differ much from that which it moſt reſembleth in our weſtern manner of writing, and little from the other. Now although it be ſo that Ahazia himſelf be alſo call'd [e] Azaria, and muſt have had three names, if he were the ſame with Jehoahas; in which manner Joas might alſo have had ſeveral names; yet becauſe I find no other warrant hereof than a bare poſſibility, I will not preſume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the conſideration of ſuch as have more ability to judge, and leiſure to conſider of this point.

† IV.

Upon what reaſons Athalia might ſeek to deſtroy Joas, if he were her own grand-child.

IF therefore we ſhall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be ſaid that Athalia was not only blinded by the paſſions of ambition and zeal to her idolatrous worſhip of Baalim, but purſued the accompliſhment of ſome natural deſires, in ſeeking the deſtruction of her grand-child, and the reſt of the blood royal. For whether it were ſo that Athalia (as proud and cruel women are not always chaſt) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel, her ſiſter-in-law, whoſe [f] whoredoms were upbraided by Jehu to her ſon; or whether ſhe had children by ſome former huſband, before ſhe was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and ſiſter to Ahab) certain it is that ſhe had ſons of her own, and thoſe old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to ſettle the crown upon her own children, ſhe did ſeek to cut off, by wicked policy, all other claims. As for Joas, if ſhe were his grand-mother, yet ſhe might miſtruſt the intereſt which his mother would have in him, leſt when he came to years it might withdraw him from her devotion. And hereof (beſides that women do commonly better love their daughters huſbands than their ſons wives) there is ſome appearance in the reign of her ſon: for ſhe made him ſpend all his time in idle journies, to no other apparent end, than that ſhe might rule at home; and he living abroad, be eſtranged from his wife, and entertain ſome new fancies, wherein Jezabel had cunning enough to be his tutoreſs. But when the ſword of Jehu had rudely cut in ſunder all theſe fine devices, then was Athalia fain to go roundly to work, and do as ſhe did, whereby ſhe thought to make all ſure. Otherwiſe, if (as I could rather think) ſhe were only ſtep-dame to Joas, we need not ſeek into the reaſons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cauſe enough to diſpatch him among the firſt.

SECT. VI.

A digreſſion, wherein is maintained the liberty of uſing conjecture in hiſtories.

THUS much concerning the perſon of Joas, from whom, as from a new root, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I conſider the nature of this hiſtory, and the diverſity between it and others, the leſs methinks I need to ſuſpect mine own preſumption, as deſerving blame, for curioſity in matter of doubt, or boldneſs in liberty of conjecture. For all hiſtories do give us information of human counſels and events, as far forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of God's will, by which all things are ordered, they ſpeak only at random, and many times falſly. This we often find in prophane writers, who aſcribe the ill ſucceſs of great undertakings to the neglect of ſome impious rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omiſſion. Hereat we may the leſs wonder, if we conſider the anſwer made by the Jews in Egypt unto Jeremy the prophet, reprehending their idolatry. For, howſoever the written law of God was known unto the people, and his puniſhments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they ſo obſtinately bent unto their own wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cauſe of their affliction. But they told the prophet roundly, that they would worſhip the queen of heaven, as they and their fathers, their kings and their princes had uſed to do; [a] For then, ſaid they, had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: adding that all manner of miſeries were befallen them, ſince they left off that ſervice of the Queen of heaven. So blind is the wiſdom of man, in looking into the counſel of God, which to find out there is no better or other guide than his own written will, not perverted by vain additions.

But this hiſtory of the kings of Iſrael and Judah hath herein a ſingular prerogative above all that have been written by the moſt ſufficient of merely human authors: it ſetteth down expreſsly the true and firſt cauſes of all that happened; not imputing the death of Ahab to his over-forwardneſs in battle, the ruin of his family to the ſecurity of Jeroboam in Jezreel, nor the victories of Hazael to the great commotions raiſed in Iſrael, by the coming in of Jehu; but referring all unto the will of God, I mean, to his revealed will: from which, that his hidden purpoſes do not vary, this ſtory, by many great examples, gives moſt notable proof. True it is, that the concurrence of ſecond cauſes with their effects, is in theſe books nothing largely deſcribed; nor perhaps exactly in any of thoſe hiſtories that are in theſe points moſt copious. For it was well noted by that worthy gentleman [b] Sir Philip Sidney, that hiſtorians do borrow of poets, not only much of their ornament, but ſomewhat of their ſubſtance. Informations are often falſe, records not always true, and notorious actions commonly inſufficient to diſcover the paſſions, which did ſet them firſt on foot. Wherefore they are fain (I ſpeak of the beſt, and in that which was allowed: for to take out of Livy every one circumſtance of Claudius his journey againſt Aſdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another buſineſs, or any practice of that kind, is neither hiſtorical nor poetical) to ſearch into the particular humours of princes, and of thoſe which have governed their affections, or the inſtruments by which they wrought, from whence they do collect the moſt likely motives, or impediments of every buſineſs; and ſo figuring, as near to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciouſly conſider the defects in counſel, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the moſt part, is not enough to give aſſurance, howſoever it may give ſatisfaction. For the heart of man is unſearchable; and princes, howſoever their intents be ſeldom hidden from ſome of thoſe many eyes which pry both into them, and into ſuch as live about them, yet ſometimes either by their own cloſe temper, or by ſome ſubtile miſt, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themſelves lie dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat are converted to another uſe. The induſtry of an hiſtorian having ſo many things to weary it, may well be excuſed, when finding apparent cauſe enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further ſearch; tho' it often fall out, where ſundry occaſions work to the ſame end, that one ſmall matter in a weak mind is more effectual than many that ſeem far greater. So comes it many times to paſs, that great fires, which conſume whole houſes or towns, begin with a few ſtraws that are waſted or not ſeen; when the flame is diſcovered, having faſtned upon ſome wood pile, that catcheth all about it. Queſtionleſs it is, that the war commenced by Darius, and purſued by Xerxes againſt the Greeks, proceeded from a deſire of the Perſians to enlarge their empire: howſoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noiſed abroad as the ground of that quarrel; yet [c] Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton deſire of queen Atoſſa, to have the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did firſt move Darius to prepare for this war, before he had received any injury; and when he did not yet ſo much deſire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

I will not here ſtand to argue whether Herodotus be more juſtly reprehended by ſome, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and ſecret ſpeech of the queen in bed with her husband, as the cauſe of thoſe great evils following; this I may boldly affirm (having, I think, in every eſtate ſome ſufficient witneſs) that matters of much conſequence, founded in all ſeeming upon ſubſtantial reaſons, have iſſued indeed from ſuch petty trifles, as no hiſtorian would either think upon, or could well ſearch out.

Therefore it was a good anſwer that Sixtus Quintus the pope made to a certain friar coming to viſit him in his popedom, as having long before, in his meaner eſtate, been his familiar friend. This poor friar being emboldned by the pope to uſe his old liberty of ſpeech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was poſſible for his holineſs, whom he rather took for a direct honeſt man, than any cunning politician, to attain unto the papacy; in compaſſing of which, all the ſubtilty, ſaid he, of the moſt crafty brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the art of the conclave, and your unaptneſs thereto, the more I needs muſt wonder. Pope Sixtus, to ſatisfy the plain-dealing friar, dealt with him again as plainly, ſaying, Hadſt thou lived abroad as I have done, and ſeen by what folly this world is governed, thou wouldſt wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto thoſe exorbitant engines,

engines, by which the courſe of affairs is moved. The pope ſaid true: for the wiſeſt of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutual toleration, work more cloſely, and earneſtly, than right reaſon either needs or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that ſupreme governor, of whoſe empire all that is true, which by the poet was ſaid of Jupiter:

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventoſum, & urbes, regnaque triſtia,
Divoſque, mortaleſque turmas,
Imperio regit unus æquo.

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-ſwoln ſtreams,
The civil cities, and th'infernal realms,
Who th'hoſt of heaven and the mortal band,
Alone doth govern by his juſt command.

Then ſhall we find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change; he foreſeeth all things, and all things diſpoſeth to his own honour; he neither deceiveth nor can be deceived; but continuing one and the ſame for ever, doth conſtantly govern all creatures by that law which he hath preſcribed, and will never alter. The vanities of men beguile their vain contrivers, and the proſperity of the wicked is the way leading to their deſtruction: yea, this broad and headlong paſſage to hell, is not ſo delightful as it ſeemeth at the firſt entrance, but hath growing in it, beſides the poiſons which infect the ſoul, many cruel thorns deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few eſcape, they have only this miſerable advantage of others, that their deſcent was the more ſwift and expedite. But the ſervice of God is the path guiding us to perfect happineſs, and hath in it a true, tho' not compleat felicity, yielding ſuch abundance of joy to the conſcience, as doth eaſily countervail all afflictions whatſoever: tho' indeed thoſe brambles that ſometimes tear the ſkin of ſuch as walk in this bleſſed way, do commonly lay hold upon them at ſuch time as they ſit down to take their eaſe, and make them wiſh themſelves at their journies end, in preſence of their Lord, whom they faithfully ſerve; in whoſe Preſence is the fulneſs of joy, and at whoſe right hand are pleaſures for evermore, Pſal. xvi. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and ſcope of all hiſtory, to teach by examples of times paſt, ſuch wiſdom as may guide our deſires and actions, we ſhould not marvel tho' the chronicles of the kings of Judah and Iſrael, being written by men inſpired with the ſpirit of God, inſtruct us chiefly in that which is moſt requiſite for us to know, as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illuſtrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wiſdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by ſome prophet after the captivity, we may well believe, that the counſel of God therein, and the execution of his righteous will, ſhould have occupied either the whole, or the principal room in that narration. Yet had not the purpoſe of Darius, the deſire of his wife, and the buſineſs at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the leſs true, tho' they might have been omitted, as the leſs material: but theſe things it had been lawful for any man to gather out of prophane hiſtories, or out of circumſtances otherwiſe appearing, wherein he ſhould not have done injury to the ſacred writings, as long as he had forborn to derogate from the firſt cauſes, by aſcribing to the ſecond more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the buſineſs that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any man of judgment will tax me as either fabulous or preſumptuous. For he doth not feign, that rehearſeth probabilites as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprive the text, that ſeeketh to illuſtrate, and make good in human reaſon, thoſe things which authority alone, without further circumſtance, ought to have confirmed in every man's belief. And this may ſuffice in defence of the liberty which I have uſed in conjectures, and may hereafter uſe when occaſion ſhall require, as neither unlawful, nor unbeſeeming an hiſtorian.

SECT. VII.

The conſpiracy againſt Athalia.

WHEN Athalia had now ſix years and longer worn the crown of Judah, and had found neither any foreign enemy, nor domeſtical adverſary to diſturb her poſſeſſion, ſuddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickedneſs meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and ſhameful death. For the growth of the young prince began to be ſuch, as permitted him no longer to be concealed; and it had been very unfitting that his education ſhould be ſimple, to make him ſeem the child of ſome poor man (as for his ſafety it was requiſite) when his capacity required to have been endued with the ſtomach and qualities meet for a king. All this Jehoiada the prieſt conſidered, and withal the great increaſe of impiety, which taking deep root in the court, was likely to ſpread itſelf over all the country, if care were not uſed to weed it up very ſpeedily. Wherefore he aſſociated unto himſelf five of the captains, in whoſe fidelity he had beſt aſſurance, and having taken an oath of them, and ſhewed them the king's ſon, he made a covenant with them, to advance him to the kingdom. Theſe drew in others of the principal men to countenance the action, procuring at the firſt only, that they ſhould repair to Jeruſalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perſuaſions to win them to the buſineſs: the promiſe of the Lord unto the houſe of David was enough to aſſure them, that the action was both lawful, and likely to ſucceed as they deſired.

But in compaſſing their intent, ſome difficulties appeared. For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they ſhould bring their purpoſe to good iſſue; neither were the captains, and other aſſociates of Jehoiada, able by cloſe working to draw together ſo many truſty and ſerviceable hands as would ſuffice to manage the buſineſs. To help in this caſe, the prieſt gave order to ſuch of the Levites as had finiſhed their courſes in waiting on the divine ſervice at the temple, and were now relieved by others that ſucceeded in their turns, that they ſhould not depart until they knew his farther pleaſure. So by admitting the new comers, and not diſcharging the old, he had, without any noiſe, made up ſuch a number as would be able to deal with the queen's ordinary guard, and that was enough; for if the tyranneſs did not prevail againſt them at the firſt brunt, the favour of the people was like to ſhew itſelf on their ſide who made head againſt her. Theſe Levites were placed in the inner court of the temple, about the perſon of the king, who as yet was kept cloſe; the followers of the captains, and other adherents were beſtowed in the outer courts: as for weapons, the temple itſelf had ſtore enough; king David,

David had left an armoury to the place, which was now employ'd to the defence of his iſſue.

All things being in a readineſs, and the day come wherein this high deſign was to be put in execution, Jehoiada deliver'd unto the captains armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard unto the king's perſon, produc'd him openly, and gave unto him the crown; uſing all ceremonies accuſtomed in ſuch ſolemnities, with great applauſe of the people. Of theſe doings the queen was the laſt that heard any word; which is not ſo ſtrange as it may ſeem; for inſolent natures, by dealing outragiouſly with ſuch as bring them ill tidings, do commonly loſe the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilſt yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the ſuddenneſs, behold it in the ſhape of inevitable miſchief.

All Jeruſalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the news, others ran forth to ſee, and the common joy was ſo great, that without apprehenſion of peril, under the windows of the court, were the people running and praiſing the king[a]. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourſe, and noiſe, of folks in the ſtreets, making towards the temple, with much unuſual paſſion in their looks, did preſently conceive, that ſomewhat worthy of her care was happened; tho' what it might be ſhe did not apprehend. Howſoever it were, ſhe meant to uſe her own wiſdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occaſion might happen to require. It may be, that ſhe thought it ſome eſpecial ſolemnity uſed in the divine ſervice, which cauſed this much ado; and hereof the unaccuſtomed number of Levites, and of other devout men, about the town, might give ſome preſumption.

Many things argue that ſhe little thought upon her own tragedy; altho' Joſephus would make it ſeem otherwiſe. For we find in the text, [b] She came to the people into the houſe of the Lord (which was near to her palace) and that when ſhe looked and ſaw the king ſtand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the princes, or great men of the land by him, and the trumpeters proclaiming him, ſhe rent her cloaths, and cry'd, Treaſon, Treaſon. Hereby it appears, that ſhe was quietly going, without any miſtruſt or fear, to take her place, which when ſhe found occupied by another, then ſhe began to afflict herſelf, as one caſt away, and cry'd out in vain upon the treaſon whereby ſhe ſaw that ſhe muſt periſh. But that ſhe came with a guard of armed men to the temple (as Joſephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, ſhe entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young tyrant, I find no where in ſcripture, neither do I hold it credible. For had ſhe truly known how things went, ſhe would ſurely have gathered her friends about her, and uſed thoſe forces in defence of her crown, by which ſhe got it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that ſhe, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troop, yet it had been meer madneſs in her to enter the place alone, when her aſſiſtants were kept out; but if ſhe, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would nevertheleſs take upon her to command the death of the new king, calling a child of ſeven years old a conſpirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom ſhe ſaw to be armed in his defence, may we not think that ſhe was mad in the moſt extreme degree? Certain it is, that the counſel of God would have taken effect, in her deſtruction, had ſhe uſed the moſt likely means to diſappoint it: yet we need not ſo cut her throat with any moral impoſſibilities. It is enough to ſay, that the godly zeal of Jehoiada found more eaſy ſucceſs, through her indiſcretion, than otherwiſe could have been expected; ſo that at his appointment ſhe was without more ado carried out of the temple and ſlain; yea ſo, that no blood ſave her own was ſhed in that quarrel; her ſmall train, that ſhe brought along with her, not daring to ſtand in her defence.

SECT. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a compariſon of her and Jezabel.

MOST like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the raſhneſs of her nephew Jehoram the Iſraelite, who did fooliſhly caſt himſelf into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, only through his eager deſire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet ſhe herſelf, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived ſuch a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a ſuitable death. Theſe two queens were in many points much alike, each of them was daughter, wife, and mother to a king; each of them ruled her husband; was an idolatreſs, and a murdereſs. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: ſo that each of them ſurviving her huſband about eight years, did ſpend the time in ſatisfying her own affections; the one uſing tyranny, as the exerciſe of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaſt body. In the manner of their death, little difference there was, or in thoſe things which may ſeem in this world to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the ſudden by conſpirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the treaſon, received ſentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her ſubjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horſes; Athalia ſlain at her own horſe-gate; the death of Athalia having (tho' not much) the more leiſure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel, the more indignity, and ſhame of body. Touching their burial, Jezabel was devoured by dogs, as the Lord had threatened by the prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we do not find. Like enough it is, that ſhe was buried, as having not perſecuted and ſlain the Lord's prophets, but ſuffered the prieſts to exerciſe their function; yet of her burial their is no monument; for ſhe was a church-robber. The ſervice of Baal, erected by theſe two queens, was deſtroy'd as ſoon as they were gone; and their chaplains, the prieſts of that religion, ſlain. Herein alſo it came to paſs alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the kings who ſlew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the ſame hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who ſeems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrel to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel periſh'd in few days after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; ſhe had ſons living after ſhe was queen; of whom,

[a] 2 Chron. 23. 12. [b] 2 Chron. 23. 12, 13. 2 Kings 11. 13, 14.

or of any other, that they were ſlain with her, we do not find.

This is a matter not unworthy conſideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had been in Jeruſalem, when their mother fell, their death would ſurely have follow'd hers as nearly, and been regiſtred, as well as the death of Mattan the prieſt of Baal. That law by which [a] God forbad that the children ſhould die for the fathers, could not have ſaved theſe ungracious imps, whom the clauſe following would have cut off, which commands, that every man ſhall die for his own ſin. Seeing therefore that they had been profeſſors and advancers of that vile and idolatrous worſhip of Baal, yea, had robb'd the temple of the Lord, and inrich'd the houſe of Baal with the ſpoil of it; likely it is, that they ſhould not have eſcap'd with life, if Jehoiada the prieſt could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawful cauſe enough requiring their death, ſo the ſecurity of the king and his friends, that is, of all the land, crav'd as much, and that very earneſtly. For theſe had been eſteem'd as heirs of their mother's crown, and being reckon'd as her aſſiſtants in that particular buſineſs of robbing the temple, may be thought to have carried a great ſway in other matters, as princes and fellows with their mother in the kingdom. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in the wars againſt Jehu) abſent from Jeruſalem; whereby Jehoiada might with the more confidence, adventure to take arms againſt their mother, that was deſolate.

SECT. I.

Of Joas's doings whilſt Jehoiada the prieſt lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole country of Juda was filled with great joy and quietneſs; wherein Joas a child of ſeven years old or thereabout, began his reign, which continu'd almoſt forty years. During his minority, he liv'd under the protection of that honourable man Jehoiada the prieſt, who did as faithfully govern the kingdom, as he had before carefully preſerv'd the king's life, and reſtor'd him unto the throne of his anceſtors. When he came to man's eſtate, he took by appointment of Jehoiada two wives, and begat ſons and daughters, repairing the family of David which was almoſt worn out. The firſt act that he took in hand, when he began to rule without a protector, was the reparation of the temple. It was a needful piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, thro' the wickedneſs of ungodly tyrants; and requiſite it was that he ſhould uphold the temple, whom the temple had upheld. This buſineſs he follow'd with ſo earneſt a zeal, that not only the Levites were more ſlack than he, but even Jehoiada was fain to be quicken'd by his admonition. Money was gather'd for the charges of the work, partly out of the tax impos'd by [b] Moſes, partly out of the liberality of the people: who gave ſo freely, that the temple, beſides all reparations, was enrich'd with veſſels of gold and ſilver, and with all other utenſils. The ſacrifices likewiſe were offer'd, as under godly kings they had been, and the ſervice of God was magnificently celebrated.

SECT. II.

The death of Jehoiada, and apoſtacy of Joas.

BUT this endured no longer than the life of Jehoiada the prieſt: who having lived an hundred and thirty years, died before his country could have ſpared him. He was buried among the kings of Juda, as he well deſerv'd, having preſerved the race of them, and reſtor'd the true religion, which the late princes of that houſe, by attempting to eradicate, fail'd but a little of rooting up themſelves, and all their iſſue. Yet this honourable funeral ſeems to have been given to him, at the motion of the people; it being ſaid, They buried him in the city of David. As for the king himſelf, who did owe to him no leſs than his crown and life, he is not likely to have been author of it, ſeeing that he was as eaſily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been diſcharg'd of ſome heavy debt.

For after the death of Jehoiada, when the princes of Juda began to flatter their king, he ſoon forgot, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old counſellor, but alſo the good precepts which he had received from him, yea, and God himſelf, the author of all goodneſs. Theſe princes drew him to the worſhip of idols, wherewith Jehoram and Athalia had ſo infected the country, in 15 or 16 years; that 30 years, or thereabouts, of the reign of Joas, wherein the true religion was exerciſed, were not able to clear it from that miſchief. The king himſelf, when once he was entred into theſe courſes, ran on headlong, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to deſpiſe the ſervice of God; and a manifeſt proof of his being now king indeed, that he regarded no longer the four admonitions of devout prieſts. Hereby it appears, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an actor upon the ſtage, he had ſtriven to expreſs much more lively affection, than they could ſhew, that were indeed religious.

SECT. III.

The cauſes and time of the Syrians invading Juda in the days of Joas.

BUT God, from whom he was broken looſe, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not eaſily be ſhaken off. Hazael, king of Aram, having taken Gath, a town of the Philiſtines, addreſs'd himſelf towards Jeruſalem, whither the little diſtance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an army hearten'd by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition car'd for pretences) it was enough, that the kings of Juda had aſſiſted the Iſraelites, in their enterpriſes upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think he did not want ſome further inſtigation. For if the kingdom of Juda had moleſted the Aramites, in the time of his predeceſſor, this was throughly recompenſed, by forbearing to ſuccour Iſrael, and leaving the ten tribes in their extream miſery, to the fury of Hazael himſelf. Neither is it likely, that Hazael ſhould have gone about to awake a ſleeping dog, and ſtir up againſt himſelf a powerful enemy, before he had aſſured the conqueſt of Iſrael, that lay between Jeruſalem and his own kingdom, if ſome opportunity had not promiſed ſuch eaſy and good ſucceſs, as might rather advance, than, any way disturb, his future proceedings against the ten tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sons of Athalia, mention'd before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expell'd their countries usually do) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutral in the war between him and Israel, but to join all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu's posterity, who, like a bloody traitor, had utterly destroy'd all the kindred of the queen's, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the kingdom of Juda. Howsoever it were, we find it plainly, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore [a] took all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionless) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich booty of unhappy treasure, which, belonging to the living God, remain'd a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the 37th year of Joas, which was the 15th of Jehoahaz, he made this purchase; but in the same, or the very next year, he died, leaving all that he had unto his son Benhadad, with whom these treasures prosper'd none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that war of the Aramites upon Juda, mention'd in the 2d book of Chronicles. But the reasons alledg'd by them that hold the contrary opinion, do forcibly prove, that it was not all one war. For the former was compounded without bloodshed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battel, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his princes, and hardly escap'd with life: in the one, Hazael himself was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwise, the king of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have then been the son of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first army came to conquer, and was so great that it terrified the king of Juda; the second was a [b] small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vain, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great army.

Now concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsook him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehoiada the priest, because that story is joined unto the restauration of the temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehoiada had been afterwards mention'd in that place of the 2d book of Kings, or if the apostacy of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had follow'd in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will and pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Job that righteous man, or the death of Josias that godly king, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgments upon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithal, which are join'd together, were used [c] in the house of the Lord continually, all the days of Jehoiada; soon after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the 36th or 37th year of this Joas's reign, the king falling away from the God of his father, became a foul idolater.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have always tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the suffering of the blessed martyrs ([d] the death of the saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even, and more strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickedness be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not only continue an obstinate idolater, but grew so forgetful of God and all goodness, as if he had striven to exceed the wickedness of all that went before him, and to leave such a villainous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous tyrants should indure to imitate.

SECT. IV.

How Zacharia was murdered by Joas.

SUndry prophets having labour'd in vain to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia, the son of Jehoiada the priest, was stirred up at length by the spirit of God to admonish them of their wickedness, and made them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable, and son to a man so exceeding beloved in his life time, and reverenced, that if Joas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: on the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne unto the king, and the unrecountable benefits which they had done unto him, from his first infancy, were such, as should have plac'd Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea, tho' he had been otherwise a man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appears that brings it. But this king Joas having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such prophets as first were sent, did now deal with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandman in that parable of our Saviour dealt with the heir of the vineyard; who said, [e] This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute commander, supposing belike that he was no free prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that man's deserving were, that did so, yea, though God's commandment requir'd it. So they conspired against this holy prophet, and ston'd him to death at the king's appointment; but whether by any form of open law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treachery, I do neither read nor conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it

it probable, that they durſt not call him into publick judgment; though the manner of his death, being ſuch as was commonly, and by order of law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Moſt likely it is, that the king's commandment, by which he ſuffered, took place in ſtead of law: which exerciſe of mere power (as hath been already noted) was nothing ſtrange among the kings of Juda.

SECT. V.

How Joas was ſhamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

THIS odious murder, committed by an unthankful ſnake upon the man in whoſe boſom he had been foſtered, as of itſelf alone it ſufficed to make the wretched tyrant hateful to men of his own time, and his memory deteſted in all ages; ſo had it the well-deſerved curſe of the bleſſed martyr, to accompany it unto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell down ſwiftly and heavily upon the head of that ungrateful monſter. It was the laſt year of his reign; the end of his time coming then upon him, when he thought himſelf beginning to live how he liſted, without controulment. When that year was expired, the Aramites came into the country, rather as may ſeem to get pillage, than to perform any great action; for they [a] came with a ſmall company of men; but God had intended to do more by them than they themſelves did hope for.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloody malice againſt his beſt friend is, in my judgment, proof ſufficient: though otherwiſe his baſe compoſition with Hazael, when he might have levied (as his ſon after him did muſter) three hundred thouſand choſen men for the war, doth well enough ſhew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how ſtout of diſpoſition their king was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of rovers, he took a very great army; ſo that wiſe men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making ſhew as if he would fight for his country, and expoſe his perſon to danger of war, when as indeed all was meer oſtentation, and no peril to be feared; he going forth ſo ſtrongly appointed, againſt ſo weak enemies. Thus might wiſe men think, and laugh at him in ſecret, conſidering what ado he made about that, which in all apparent reaſon was (as they ſay) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wiſdom of this world is fooliſhneſs, did laugh, not only at this vain-glorious king, but at them that thought their king ſecure, by reaſon of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and king Joas met, whether it were by ſome folly of the leaders, or by ſome amazement happening among the ſoldiers, or by whatſoever means it pleaſed God to work, ſo it was, that that great army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the princes were deſtroyed: the princes of Juda, at whoſe perſuaſion the king had become a rebel to the King of kings. As for Joas himſelf (as Abulenſis and others expound the ſtory) he was ſorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they think) taken and ſhamefully tormented, to wring out of him an exceſſive ranſom.

And ſurely all circumſtances do greatly ſtrengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old tranſlation) ſaith, they exerciſed upon Joas ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they diſmiſſed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favouredly. Now at that time, Joas the ſon of Jehoahaz reigned over Iſrael, and Benhadad the ſon of Hazael over the Syrians in Damaſcus; the one a valiant undertaking prince, raiſed up by God to reſtore the ſtate of his miſerable country; the other inferior every way to his father, of whoſe purchaſes he loſt a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between theſe two princes, promiſing no other event than ſuch as after followed, might have given to the king of Juda good cauſe to be bold, and pluck up his ſpirits, which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been againſt him. But his fearful heart being likely to quake upon any apprehenſion of danger, was able to put the Syrian king in hope, that by terrifying him with ſome ſhew of war at his doors, it were eaſy to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good ſucceſs hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unexpected) ill ſucceſs, which the Aramites found in their following wars againſt the king of Iſrael, ſheweth plainly the weakneſs of all earthly might reſiſting the power of the Almighty. For by his ordinance, both the kingdom of Juda, after more than forty years time of gathering ſtrength, was unable to drive out a ſmall company of enemies; and the kingdom of Iſrael, having ſo been trodden down by Hazael, that only fifty horſemen, ten chariots, and ten thouſand footmen were left, prevailed againſt his ſon, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, and therefore I will not inſiſt upon this; though indeed we ſhould not, if we be God's children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our heavenly Father's honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they liſted, and ſaw that they were not able, being ſo few, to take any poſſeſſion of the country, they departed out of Juda loaden with ſpoil, which they ſent to Damaſcus, themſelves belike falling upon the ten tribes, where it is to be thought that they ſped not half ſo well. The king of Juda being in ill caſe, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the ſons of an Ammoniteſs, and of a Moabiteſs, whom ſome (becauſe only their mothers names, being ſtrangers, are expreſſed) think to have been bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, leſt (as tyrants uſe) he ſhould revenge his diſaſter upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatſoever elſe it were that animated them to murder their king; the ſcripture tells us plainly, that [b] for the blood of the children of Jehoiada this befell him. And the ſame appears to have been uſed as the pretence of their conſpiracy, in excuſe of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Joas, durſt not puniſh them, till his kingdom was eſtabliſhed; but contrariwiſe, his body was judged unworthy of burial in the ſepulchres of the kings; whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharia cauſed the treaſon, wrought againſt the king, to find more approbation than was requiſite among the people, though afterwards it was recompenſed by his ſon, upon the traytors, with well-deſerved death.

SECT.

SECT. VI.

Of the princes living in the time of Joas: Of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

THERE lived with Joas, Mezades and Dignetus in Athens; Eudemus and Ariſtomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Alladius, were kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty-ſeventh king ſucceeding unto Ophratanes, began his reign over the Aſſyrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which laſted forty-two years. In the ſixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Seſac, ſucceeded unto Cheops in the kingdom of Egypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas was likewiſe the reign of Pygmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which city is, by divers authors, placed in divers ages, ſome reporting it to be ſeventy years younger than Rome, others above four hundred years elder, few or none of them giving any reaſon of their aſſertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow: [a] Joſephus, who had read the annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight months from the building of Solomon's temple, in the twelfth year of Hyram king of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the ſeventh of Pygmalion. The particulars of this account (which is not rare in Joſephus) are very perplexed, and ſerve not very well to make clear the total ſum. But whether it were ſo that Joſephus did omit, or elſe that he did miſ-write ſome number of the years, which he reckoneth in fractions, as they were divided among the kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pygmalion; we may well enough believe, that the Tyrian writers, out of whoſe books he gives us the whole ſum, had good means to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other, than the memory of three or four generations might eaſily reach. This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Solomon's temple, being the eleventh year of Joas, was a hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome, and after the deſtruction of Troy two hundred eighty and nine: a time ſo long after the death of Æneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Auſonius noteth, who doth honour her ſtatue with this epigram.

[b] Illa ego ſum Dido vultu quam conſpicis hoſpes,
Aſſimulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
Talis eram, ſed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens,
Vita nec inceſtis læta cupidinibus.
(Namque nec Æneas vidit me Troius unquam,
Nec Libyam advenit, claſſibus Iliacis:
Sed furias fugiens, atque arma procacis Iarbæ,
Servavi, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo, caſtos quod pertulit enſes:)
Non furor, aut læſo crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidiſſe juvat: vixi ſine vulnere famæ,
Ulta virum, poſitis mœnibus oppetii.
Invida cur in me ſtimulâſti Muſa Maronem,
Fingeret ut noſtræ damna pudicitiæ?
Vos magis hiſtoricis, lectores, credite de me,
Quam qui furta deûm concubituſque canunt.
Falſidici vates, temerant qui carmine verum,
Humaniſque deos aſſimulant vitiis.

Which in effect is this:

I am that Dido which thou here do'ſt ſee,
Cunnningly framed in beauteous imag'ry.
Like this I was, but had not ſuch a ſcul,
As Maro feign'd, inceſtuous and foul.
Æneas never with his Trojan hoſt
Beheld my face, or landed on this coaſt:
But flying proud Iarba's villany,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealouſy,
I did with weapon chaſt, to ſave my fame,
Make way for death untimely, e're it came.
This was my end; but firſt I built a town,
Reveng'd my husband's death, liv'd with renown.
Why did'ſt thou ſtir up Virgil, envious Muſe,
Falſely my name and honour to abuſe?
Readers, believe hiſtorians; not thoſe
Which to the world Jove's thefts and vice expoſe.
Poets are liars, and for verſes ſake
Will make the gods of human crimes partake.

From the time of Dido unto the firſt Punic war, that Carthage grew and flouriſhed in wealth and conqueſts, we find in many hiſtories: but in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affairs before that war, excepting thoſe few things that are recorded of their attempts upon the iſle of Sicily. We will therefore defer the relation of matters concerning that mighty city, until ſuch time as they ſhall encounter with the eſtate of Rome, by which it was finally deſtroyed; and proſecute in the mean while the hiſtory that is now in hand.

SECT. VII.

The beginning of Amazia's reign. Of Joas king of Iſrael, and Eliſha the prophet.

AMAZIA, the ſon of Joas, being twenty-five years old when his father died, took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Juda, wherein he labour'd ſo to demean himſelf, as his new beginning reign might be leaſt offenſive. The law of Moſes he profeſſed to obſerve; which howſoever it had been ſecretly deſpiſed ſince the time of Jehoram, by many great perſons of the land, yet had it, by proviſion of good princes, yea and of bad ones (in their beſt times) imitating the good, but eſpecially by the care of holy prieſts, taken ſuch deep root in the people's hearts, that no king might hope to be very plauſible, who did not conform himſelf unto it. And at that preſent time, the ſlaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the princes, who had withdrawn the late king from the ſervice of God, being ſeconded by the death of the king himſelf, even whilſt that execrable murder, committed by the king upon Zecharia, was yet freſh in memory, did ſerve as a notable example of God's juſtice againſt idolaters, both to animate the better ſort of the people in holding the religion of their fathers, and to diſcourage Amazia from following the way which led to ſuch an evil end. He therefore, having learn'd of his father the art of diſſimulation, did not only forbear to puniſh the traytors that had ſlain king Joas, but gave way to the time, and ſuffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been, in the city of David, yet not among the ſepulchres of the kings of Juda. Nevertheleſs after this, when (belike) the noiſe of the people having wearied itſelf into ſilence, it was found that the conſpirators (howſoever their deed done was applauded as the handy work of GOD) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor

ſtrong maintainers of their perſons; but reſted ſecure, as having done well, ſeeing it was not ill taken; the king, who perceived his government well eſtabliſhed, called them into queſtion, at ſuch a time, as the heat of mens affections, being well allayed, it was eaſy to diſtinguiſh between their treaſons and God's judgments, which, by their treaſons, had taken plauſible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the law did require) were ſuffered to live; which could not but give contentment to the people, ſeeing that their king did the office of a juſt prince, rather than of a revenging ſon. This being done, and his own life better ſecured, by ſuch exemplary juſtice, againſt the like attempts; Amazia carried himſelf outwardly as a prince well affected to religion, and ſo continued in reſt, about twelve or thirteen years.

As Amazia gathered ſtrength in Judah by the commodity of a long peace, ſo Joas the Iſraelite, grew as faſt in power, by following the war hotly againſt the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate prince, yet an idolater, as his predeceſſors had been, worſhipping the calves of Jeroboam. For this ſin had God ſo plagued the houſe of Jehu, that the ten tribes wanted little of being utterly conſumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his ſon Jehoahaz. But as God's benefits to Jehu ſufficed not to withdraw him from this politick idolatry; ſo were the miſeries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the ſame impious courſe: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Iſrael, condeſcended unto the prayers of this ungodly prince, even then when he and his miſerable ſubjects were obſtinate in following their own abominable ways. Therefore in temporal matters, the ten tribes recovered apace, but the favour of God, which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor believe that they ſought; that they had it not, I find in the words of the prophet, ſaying plainly to Amazia, [a] The Lord is not with Iſrael, neither with all the houſe of Ephraim.

Whether it were ſo, that the great prophet Eliſha, who lived in thoſe times, did foretell the proſperity of the Iſraelites under the reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz, wearied and broken with long adverſity, thought it the wiſeſt way to diſcharge himſelf in part of the heavy cares attending thoſe unhappy Syrian wars, by laying the burden upon his hopeful ſon; we find, [b] That in the thirty-ſeventh year of Joas, king of Judah, Joas the ſon of Jehoahaz began to reign over Iſrael in Samaria, which was in the fifteenth year of his father's reign, and ſome two or three years before his death.

It appears that this young prince, even from the beginning of his rule, did ſo well husband that poor ſtock which he received from his father, of ten chariots, fifty horſemen, and ten thouſand foot, that he might ſeem likely to prove a thriver. Among other circumſtances, the words which he ſpake to Eliſha the prophet, argue no leſs. For Joas viſiting the prophet, who lay ſick, ſpake unto him thus; [c] O my father, my father, the chariots of Iſrael, and the horſemen of the ſame; by which manner of ſpeech he did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had ſtood his kingdom in more ſtead, than all the horſes and chariots could do.

This prophet, who ſucceeded unto Elias, about the firſt year of Jehoram the ſon of Ahab king of Iſrael, died (as ſome have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the nephew of Jehu. To ſhew how the ſpirit of Elias was doubled, or did reſt upon him; it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that he did not only raiſe a dead child unto life, as Elias had done; but when he himſelf was dead, it pleaſed God that his dead bones ſhould reſtore life unto a carcaſe, which touched them in the grave. In fine, he beſtowed, as a legacy, three victories upon king Joas, who thereby did ſet Iſrael in a fair way of recovering all that the Aramites had uſurped, and weakening the kings of Damaſcus in ſuch ſort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

SECT. VIII.

Of Amazia's war againſt Edom; his apoſtacy; and overthrow by Joas.

THE happy ſucceſs which Joas had found in his war againſt the Aramites, was ſuch as might kindle in Amazia a deſire of undertaking ſome expedition, wherein himſelf might purchaſe the like honour. His kingdom could furniſh three hundred thouſand ſerviceable men for the wars; and his treaſure was ſufficient for the payment of theſe and the hire of many more. Cauſe of war he had very juſt againſt the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grandfather Jehoram, had about fifty years been unreclaimed; partly by reaſon of the troubles happening in Judah, partly thro' the ſloth and timorouſneſs of his father Joas. Yet, foraſmuch as the men of Judah had in many years been without all exerciſe of war (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wiſdom to encreaſe his forces, with ſoldiers waged out of Iſrael, whence he hired for an hundred talents of ſilver, [d] an hundred thouſand valiant men, as the ſcripture telleth us, tho' [e] Joſephus diminiſhes the number, ſaying, that they were but twenty thouſand.

This great army, which with ſo much coſt Amazia had hired out of Iſrael, he was fain to diſmiſs, before he had employed it, being threatned by a prophet with ill ſucceſs, if he ſtrengthned himſelf with the help of thoſe men, whom God (tho' in mercy he gave them victory againſt the cruel Aramites) did not love, becauſe they were idolaters. The Iſraelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this diſmiſſion, as an high diſgrace; which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Judah in their return, and ſhewed their malice in the ſlaughter of three thouſand men, and ſome ſpoil, which they carried away. But Amazia with his own forces, knowing that God would be aſſiſtant to their journey, entered courageouſly into the Edomites country; over whom obtaining victory, he ſlew ten thouſand, and took other ten thouſand priſoners, all which he threw from an high rock; holding them, it ſeems, rather as traitors, than as juſt enemies. This victory did not ſeem to reduce Edom under the ſubjection of the crown of Judah, which might be the cauſe of that ſeverity, which was uſed to the priſoners; the Edomites that had eſcaped, refuſing to buy the lives of their friends and kinſmen at ſo dear a rate, as the loſs of their own liberty. Some towns in mount Seir, Amazia took, as appears by his carrying away the idols thence; but it is like they were the places moſt indefenſible, in that he left no garriſons there, whereby he might another year the better have purſued the conqueſt of the whole country. Howſoever it were, he got both honour by the journey, and gains enough, had he not loſt himſelf.

Among other ſpoils of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquiſhed and taken priſoners, did deſerve well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwiſe, I know not by what ſtrange witchcraft, ſo beſotted this unworthy king Amazia, [a] That he ſet them up to be his gods, and worſhipped them, and burnt incenſe unto them.

When he was rebuked for this by a prophet ſent from God, he gave a churliſh and threatning anſwer; asking the prophet, Who made him a counſellor, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the worſt. If either the coſtly ſtuff whereof theſe idols were made, or the curious workmanſhip and beauty with which they were adorned by artificers, had raviſhed the king's fancy, methinks he ſhould have rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as houſhold ornaments and things of pleaſure, than thereby have ſuffered himſelf to be blinded with ſuch unreaſonable devotion towards them. If the ſuperſtitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his imagination; much more ſhould the bad ſervice which they had done to their old clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites and them. Wherefore it ſeems to me, that the ſame affections carried him from God unto the ſervice of idols, which afterwards moved him to talk ſo roughly to the prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a prophet, and ſent ſuch auxiliary forces as he had gathered out of Iſrael; which done, it is ſaid, that he [b] was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather aſſiſt him by miracle, than let him fail of obtaining all his heart's deſire. But with better reaſon he ſhould have limited his deſires by the will of God, whoſe pleaſure it was, that Eſau, having broken the yoke of Jacob from his neck, accordingly as Iſaac had foretold, ſhould no more become his ſervant. If therefore Amazia did hope to re-conquer all the country of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet ſo, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might have well contented him.

But there is a fooliſh and a wretched pride, wherewith men being tranſported, can ill endure to aſcribe unto God the honour of thoſe actions, in which it hath pleaſed him to uſe their own induſtry, courage or foreſight. Therefore it is commonly ſeen, that they, who entring into battle, are careful to pray for aid from heaven, with due acknowledgment of his power who is the giver of victory; when the field is won, do vaunt of their own exploits: one telling how he got ſuch a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to ſuch a battalion; a third, how he ſeized on the enemies cannon; every one ſtriving to magnify himſelf, whilſt all forget God, as one that had not been preſent in the action. To aſcribe to fortune the effects of another man's virtue, is, I confeſs, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he, which findeth better ſucceſs, than he did, or in reaſon might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the author of his happineſs; ſo he, whoſe mere wiſdom and labour hath brought things to a proſperous iſſue, is doubly bound to ſhew himſelf thankful, both for the victory, and for thoſe virtues by which the victory was gotten. And indeed ſo far from weakneſs is the nature of ſuch thankſgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no virtue being ſo truly heroical, as that by which the ſpirit of man advanceth it ſelf with confidence of acceptation, unto the love of God. In which ſenſe it is a brave ſpeech that Evander in Virgil uſeth to Æneas, none but a Chriſtian being capable of the admonition.

Aude hoſpes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this philoſophy Amaziah (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had ſhewed himſelf a better man of war than any king of Juda, ſince the time of Jeboſhaphat, and could be well contented, that his people ſhould think him little inferior to David: of which honour he ſaw no reaſon why the prophets ſhould rob him, who had made him loſe an hundred talents, and done him no pleaſure, he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was diſtempered with ſuch vain thoughts as theſe (beſides the witneſs of his impiety following) [c] Joſephus doth teſtify, ſaying, That he deſpiſed God, and that being puff'd up with his good ſucceſs, of which nevertheleſs he would not acknowledge God to be the author, he commanded Joas king of Iſrael to become his ſubject, and to let the ten tribes acknowledge him their ſoveraign, as they had done his anceſtors king David and king Solomon. Some think that his quarrel to Joas was rather grounded upon the injury done to him by the Iſraelites, whom he diſmiſſed in the journey againſt mount Seir. And likely it is, that the ſenſe of a late wrong had more power to ſtir him up, than the remembrance of an old title forgotten long ſince, and by himſelf neglected thirteen or fourteen years. Nevertheleſs it might ſo be, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would alſo call old matters into queſtion; that ſo the kings of Iſrael might, at the leaſt, learn to keep their ſubjects from offending Judah, for fear of endangering their own crowns. Had Amazia deſired only recompence for the injury done to him, it is not improbable that he ſhould have had ſome reaſonable anſwer from Joas, who was not deſirous to fight with them. But the anſwer which Joas returned, likening himſelf to a cedar, and Amazia in reſpect of him no better than a thiſtle, ſhews that the challenge was made in inſolent terms, ſtuffed perhaps with ſuch proud compariſon of nobility, as might be made (according to that which Joſephus hath written) between a king of ancient race, and one of leſs nobility than virtue.

It is by [d] Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the war of Troy, his father had bid him to be valiant, and get victory by God's aſſiſtance, he made anſwer, that by God's aſſiſtance, a coward could get victory, but he would get it alone without ſuch help; after which proud ſpeech, tho' he did many valiant acts, he had ſmall thanks, and finally killing himſelf in a madneſs, whereinto he fell upon diſgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of burial. That Amaziah did utter ſuch words, I do not find: but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of ſuch words, he was rewarded with ſucceſs according. The very firſt council wherein this war was concluded, ſerves to prove that he was a wiſe prince indeed at Jeruſalem, among his paraſites; but a fool when he had to deal with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak people, truſting more in the ſite of their country, than the valour of their

ſoldiers; and to encounter with Joas, who from ſo poor beginnings had raiſed himſelf to ſuch ſtrength, that he was able to lend his friend an hundred thouſand men, and had all his nation exerciſed, and trained up, in a long victorious war. But as Amazia diſcover'd much want of judgment, in undertaking ſuch a match; ſo in proſecuting the buſineſs, when it was ſet on foot, he behaved himſelf as a man of little experience, who having once only tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in war there was nothing elſe to do, than ſend a defiance, fight, and win. Joas, on the contrary ſide, having been accuſtom'd to deal with a ſtronger enemy than the king of Juda, uſed that celerity, which peradventure had often ſtood him in good ſtead againſt the Aramite. He did not ſit waiting till the enemies broke in and waſted his country, but preſented himſelf with an army in Juda, ready to bid battel to Amazia, and ſave him the labour of a long journey. This could not but greatly diſcourage thoſe of Juda; who (beſides the impreſſion of fear which an invaſion beats into people, not inur'd to the like) having devour'd, in their greedy hopes, the ſpoil of Iſrael, fully perſuading themſelves to get as much, and at as eaſy a rate, as in the journey of Edom, were ſo far diſappointed of their expectation, that well they might ſuſpect all new aſſurance of good luck, when the old had thus beguiled them. Notwithſtanding all this, their king that had ſtomach enough to challenge the patrimony of Solomon, thought like another David, to win it by the ſword. The iſſue of which fool-hardineſs might eaſily have been foreſeen in human reaſon; comparing together, either the two kings, or the quality of their armies, or the firſt and ominous beginning of the war. But meer human wiſdom, howſoever it might foreſee much, could not have prognoſticated all the miſchief that fell upon Amazia. For as ſoon as the two armies came in ſight, God, whoſe help this wretched man had ſo deſpiſed, did (as [a] Joſephus reports it) ſtrike ſuch terror and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their king to ſhift for himſelf, which he did ſo ill, that his enemy had ſoon caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into moſt abject baſeneſs. That the army which fled, ſuſtained any other loſs than of honour, I neither find in the ſcriptures, nor in Joſephus; it being likely that the ſoon beginning of their flight, which made it the more ſhameful, made it alſo the more ſafe. But of the miſchief that follow'd this overthrow, it was God's will that Amazia himſelf ſhould ſuſtain the whole diſgrace. For Joas carried him directly to Jeruſalem, where he bad him procure that the gates might be open'd, to let him in and his army; threatning him otherwiſe with preſent death. So much amaz'd was the miſerable captive, with theſe dreadful words, that he durſt do no other, than perſuade the citizens to yield themſelves to the mercy of the conqueror. The town, which afterwards being in weaker ſtate held out two years againſt Nebuchadnezzer, was utterly diſmay'd, when the king, that ſhould have given his life to ſave it, uſed all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Jeruſalem were open'd to Joas, with which honour (greater than any king of Iſrael had ever obtained) he could not reſt contented, but, the more to deſpight Amazia and his people, he cauſed four hundred cubits of the wall to be thrown down, and entred the city in his chariot through that breach, carrying the king before him, as in triumph. This done, he ſack'd the temple, and the king's palace, and ſo, taking hoſtages of Amazia, he diſmiſſed the poor creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

SECT. IX.

A diſcourſe of the reaſons hindering Joas from uniting Juda to the crown of Iſrael, when he had won Jeruſalem, and held Amazia priſoner. The end of Joas's reign.

WE may juſtly marvel how it came to paſs, that Joas, being thus in poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, having the king in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his own entire, could be ſo contented to depart quietly, with a little ſpoil, when he might have ſeiz'd upon the whole kingdom. The reign of Athalia had given him cauſe to hope, that the iſſue of David might be diſpoſſeſſed of that crown; his own nobility, being the ſon and grandchild of kings, together with the famous acts that he had done, were enough to make the people of Juda think highly of him; who might alſo have prefer'd his form of government before that of their own king's, eſpecially at ſuch a time, when a long ſucceſſion of wicked princes had ſmothered the thanks, which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have enſu'd, upon the union of all the twelve tribes, under one prince, is ſo apparent, that I need not to inſiſt on it. That any meſſage from God forbad the Iſraelites (as afterwards in the victory which Peka the ſon of Romelia got upon Ahaz) to turn his preſent advantage to the beſt uſe, we do not read. All this makes it the more difficult to reſolve the queſtion, why a prince ſo well exerciſed, as Joas had been, in recovering his own, and winning from his enemy, ſhould forſake the poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, and wilfully neglect the poſſibilities, or rather caſt away the full aſſurance of ſo fair a conqueſt, as the kingdom of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others had been moſt material, I mean the deſire of the vanquiſhed people to accept the Iſraelite for their king, it is plainly ſeen, that entring Jeruſalem in triumphant manner, Joas was unable to concoct his own poſterity. For the opening of the gates had been enough to have let him not only into the city, but into the royal throne; and the people's hearts, whom by fair intreaty (eſpecially having ſure means of compulſion) he might have made his own, when they ſaw themſelves betray'd, and baſely given away by him whoſe they had been before. The fair mark which this opportunity preſented he did not aim at, becauſe his ambition was otherwiſe and more meanly buſied, in levelling at the glory of a triumphant entry through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards have been corrected well enough, if entring as an enemy, and ſhewing what he could do, by ſpending his anger upon the walls, he had within the city done offices of a friend, and labour'd to ſhew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his covetouſneſs began and ſought to pleaſe it ſelf, with that which is commonly moſt ready to the ſpoiler, yet ſhould be moſt forborn. The treaſure wherewith Seſac, Hazael, and the Philiſtines, men ignorant of the true God and his religion, had quench'd their greedy thirſt, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Joas, who, tho' an idolater, yet acknowledg'd alſo and worſhipped the eternal God, whoſe temple was at

Jeruſalem. Therefore when the people ſaw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands upon the conſecrated veſſels, calling the family of [a] Obed Edom (whoſe children had hereditary charge of the treaſury) to a ſtrict account, as if they had been officers of his own exchequer, they conſidered him rather as an execrable church-robber, than as a noble prince, an Iſraelite and their brother, tho' of another tribe. Thus following that courſe, which the moſt virtuous king of our age (taxing it with the ſame phraſe) hath wiſely avoided; by ſtealing a few apples, he loſt the inheritance of the whole orchard. The people deteſted him, and after the reſpite of a few days, might by comparing themſelves one to one, perceive his ſoldiers to be no better than men of their own mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of ſo great a city. It is not ſo eaſy to hold by force a mighty town entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates open'd by unadviſed fear. For when the citizens, not being diſarmed, recover their ſpirits, and begin to underſtand their firſt error; they will think upon every advantage, of place, of proviſions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-ſtones, and rather chooſe by deſperate reſolution, to correct the evils grown out of their former cowardiſe, than ſuffer thoſe miſchiefs to poiſon the body, which in ſuch half-conqueſts, are eaſily taſted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be deſired, than the city of Florence, which through the weakneſs of Peter de Medices, governing therein as a prince, was reduced into ſuch hard terms, that it opened the gates unto the French king Charles the eighth, who not plainly profeſſing himſelf either friend or foe to the ſtate, entered the town with his army, in triumphant manner, himſelf and his horſe armed, with his lance upon his thigh. Many inſolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrel miniſtred, between them and the townſmen: ſo far forth, that the Florentines, to preſerve their liberty, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge ſums of ready money, and the abſolute ſeignory of the ſtate, as conquered by him, who entred the city in arms. But Peter Caponi, a principal citizen, catching theſe articles from the king's ſecretary, and tearing them before his face, bid him ſound his trumpets, and they would ring their bells: which peremptory words made the French bethink themſelves, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thouſand pounds, and not half of that money to be paid in hand, Charles ſhould not only depart in peace, but reſtore whatſoever he had of their dominion, and continue their aſſured friend. So dangerous a matter did it ſeem for that brave army, which in few months after won the kingdom of Naples, to fight in the ſtreets, againſt the armed multitude of that populous city. It is true, that Charles had other buſineſs (and ſo perhaps had Joas, as ſhall anon be ſhewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehenſion of imminent danger that made him come to reaſon. In ſuch caſes the firing of houſes uſually draws every citizen to ſave his own, leaving victory to the ſoldier: yet where the people are prepar'd and reſolv'd, women can quench, as faſt as the enemy, having other things to look unto, can ſet on fire. And indeed that commander is more given to anger than regardful of profit, who, upon the uncertain hope of deſtroying a town, forſakes the aſſurance of a good compoſition. Diverſity of circumſtance may alter the caſe: it is enough to ſay, that it might be in Jeruſalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How ſtrongly ſoever Joas might hold himſelf within Jeruſalem, he could not eaſily depart from thence, with his booty ſafe, if the army of Juda, which had been more terrified than weaken'd in the late encounter, ſhould reinforce itſelf, and give him a check upon the way. Wherefore it was wiſely done of him, to take hoſtages for his better ſecurity, his army being upon return, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which cauſes it was the more unapt to fight.

Beſides theſe impediments, within the city and without, ſerving to cool the ambition of Joas, and keep it down from aſpiring to the crown of Juda; it appears that ſomewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Eliſha the prophet; who, when this Joas had ſmitten the ground with his arrows thrice, told him that he ſhould no oftner ſmite the Aramites. The three victories which Iſrael had againſt Aram, are by ſome, and with great probability, referred unto the fifth, ſixth and ſeventh years of Joas, after which time, if any loſſes enſuing had blemiſhed the former good ſucceſs, ill might the king of Iſrael have likened himſelf to a ſtately cedar, and worſe could he have either lent the Judean one hundred thouſand men, or meet him in battel, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thouſand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the words of Eliſha, that after three victories, Joas ſhould find ſome change of fortune, and ſuffer loſs; we muſt needs conclude, that the Aramite prevailed upon him this year, it being the laſt of his reign. That this was ſo, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Joas's abſence, gave ſuch a blow to Iſrael, as the king at his return was not able to remedy, but rather fell himſelf into new misfortunes, which increaſed the calamity, we may evidently perceive in that which is ſpoken of Jeroboam's ſon. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſaw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Iſrael, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Iſrael from under the heaven, he preſerved them by the hand of Jeroboam, the ſon of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious reign of Joas was concluded with a ſad cataſtrophe; the riches of the temple haſtning his miſery and death, as they had done with Seſac, Athalia and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craſſus, and other ſacrilegious potentates.

Thus either thro' indignation conceived againſt him, by the people of Jeruſalem, and courage which they took to ſet upon him within the walls: or thro' preparation of the army that lay abroad in the country, to bid him battel in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was loſt at the former encounter; or thro' the miſeries daily brought upon his own country, by the Syrian in his abſence, if not by all theſe; Joas was driven to lay aſide all thought of winning the kingdom of Juda; and taking hoſtages for his quiet paſſage, made all haſte homewards, where he found a ſad welcome, and being utterly forſaken of his wonted proſperity, forſook alſo his life in few months after, leaving his kingdom to Jeroboam the ſecond, his fortunate and valiant ſon.

SECT.

SECT. X.

The end of Amazia's reign and life.

ANY man is able to gueſs how Amazia look'd, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted ſo much of his own great proweſs and skill in arms, threatening to work wonders, and ſet up anew the glorious empire of David, was now uncaſed of his lion's hide, and appeared nothing ſo terrible a beaſt as he had been painted. Much argument of ſcoffing at him he had miniſtred unto ſuch as held him in diſlike; which at this time, doubtleſs, were very many: for the ſhame that falls upon an inſolent man ſeldom fails of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia (beſides that the multitude are always prone to lay the blame upon their governours, even of thoſe calamities which have happened by their own default) there was no child in all Jeruſalem, but knew him to be the root of all this miſchief. He had not only challenged a good man of war, being himſelf a daſtard, but when he was beaten and taken by him, had baſely pleaded for the common enemy, to have him let into the city, that with his own eyes he might ſee what ſpoil there was, and not make a bad bargain by hear-ſay. The father of this Amazia was a beaſtly man; yet when the Aramites took him, and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at ſo dear a rate, as the city and temple of Jeruſalem. Had he offered; ſhould they have made his promiſe good? Surely the haſte which they had made, in condeſcending to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Iſraelite (which was eaſy enough) any little while, they ſhould ſoon have been rid of him, ſeeing that the Aramites would have made him run home with greater ſpeed than he came forth. Then alſo, when having truſſed up his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would have ſerved to perſuade him to leave his load behind; had not their good king delivered up hoſtages, to ſecure his return, as loth to defraud him of the recompence due to his pains taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy king: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults unto God, that had puniſhed him by all this diſhonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an idolater to the very laſt. For it is ſaid of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, [a] they wrought treaſon againſt him in Jeruſalem; a manifeſt proof that he was not reclaimed, unto his life's end. And certainly they, which tell a man in his adverſity of his faults paſſed, ſhall ſooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to ſeek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that prieſts and prophets were leſs welcome to him than ever they had been. On the other ſide, flatterers, and ſuch as were deſirous to put a heart into him, whereof themſelves might always be maſters, wanted not plauſible matter to revive him. For he was not firſt, nor ſecond, of the kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battle. David himſelf had abandoned the city, leaving it, before the enemy was in ſight, unto Abſalom his rebellious ſon. Many beſides him had received loſſes, wherein the temple bare a part. If Joas might ſo eaſily have been kept out; why did their anceſtors let Seſac in? Aſa was reputed a virtuous prince, yet with his own hands he emptied the temple, and was not blamed, but held excuſable by neceſſity of the ſtate. Belike theſe traducers would recommend no actions but of dead princes; if ſo, he ſhould rather live to puniſh them, than die to pleaſe them. Though wherein had he given them any cauſe of diſpleaſure? It was he indeed that commanded to ſet open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good ſervants ought not to have obeyed their maſter's commandments to his diſadvantage, when they ſaw him not maſter of his own perſon. As his captivity did acquit him from blame, of all things that he did or ſuffered in that condition; ſo was that misfortune itſelf, in true eſtimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loſs. For had he been as haſty to fly as others were, he might have eſcaped as well as others did. But ſeeking to teach the baſe multitude courage, by his royal example, he was ſhamefully betrayed by thoſe in whom he truſted. Unworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when ſpeaking another man's words, being priſoner, he commanded them to yield; having neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bad them ſtand to it, and fight like men. The beſt was, that they muſt needs acknowledge his miſchance, as the occaſion whereby many thouſand lives were ſaved; the enemy having wiſely preferred the ſurpriſe of a lion that was captain, before the chaſe and ſlaughter of an army of ſtags, that followed him.

Theſe or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perſuade him, that it was even ſo indeed. And ſuch excuſes might have ſerved well enough to pleaſe the people, if the king had firſt ſtudied how to pleaſe God. But he that was unwilling to aſcribe unto God the good ſucceſs foretold by a prophet, could eaſily find how to impute this late diſaſter unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it ſeems that he meant to keep himſelf ſafe from her, by ſitting ſtill; for in fifteen years following (ſo long he out-lived his honour) we find not that he ſtirred. As for his ſubjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government; yet we may ſee by his end, that the middle time was ill ſpent among them, increaſing their hatred to his own ruin. He that ſuſpecteth his own worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the leſs regard is had of his perſon, than he believeth to be due to his place, will commonly ſpend all the force of his authority, in purchaſing the name of a ſevere man. For the affected ſourneſs of a vain fellow doth many times reſemble the gravity of one that is wiſe: and the fear wherein they live, which are ſubject unto oppreſſion, carries a ſhew of reverence to him that does the wrong; at leaſt it ſerves to dazzle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakneſs of ſuch as have juriſdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well uſing it, men might attain to be ſuch as they ought, they do uſually miſpend, in ſeeking to appear ſuch as they are not. This is a vain and deceivable courſe; procuring, inſtead of the reſpect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous conſequence; eſpecially when an unable ſpirit, being over-perted with ſo high authority, is too paſſionate in the execution of ſuch an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he elſe than ſtrive to make the people think he hated them, when of themſelves they were apt enough to believe that he did not love them? The beſt was, that he had, by revenging his father's death, provided well enough for his own ſecurity: but who ſhould take vengeance

[a] 2 Chron. 25. 27.

(or upon whom?) of ſuch a murther, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himſelf, who had not given commandment or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in ſhedding the blood of his anointed. Yet as Amazia, careleſs of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; ſo his ſubjects, following the ſame ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, roſe up againſt him, with ſuch headlong fury, that being unable to defend himſelf in Jeruſalem, he was driven to forſake the City, and fly to Lachis for ſafeguard of his life. But ſo extreme was the hatred conceived againſt him, and ſo general, that neither his abſence could allay the rage of it in the capital city, nor his preſence in the country abroad procure friends to defend his life. Queſtionleſs, he choſe the town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other beſt affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands: for when the Conſpirators (who troubled not themſelves about raiſing an army for the matter) ſent purſuers after him, he was abandon'd to death. Lachis was the utmoſt city of his dominion weſtward, ſtanding ſomewhat without the border of Juda; ſo that he might have made an eaſy eſcape (if he dar'd adventure) into the territory of the Philiſtins, or the kingdom of Iſrael. Therefore it may ſeem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this town added their own treaſon to the general inſurrection; the murderers could not, at ſo good leiſure as they did, have carried away his body to Jeruſalem, where they gave him burial with his Fathers.

SECT. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancy, that was in the Kingdom of Juda, after the death of Amazia.

IT hath already been ſhewed, that the reigns of the kings of Juda and Iſrael were ſometimes to be meaſured by compleat years; otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one king is now and then confounded with the laſt years of his father's reign, or the foremoſt of his ſon's. But we are now arrived at a mere vacation, wherein the crown of Juda lay void eleven whole years: a thing not plainly ſet down in ſcriptures, nor yet remembered by Joſephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by neceſſary conſequence.

Twice we find it written, that [a] Amazia king of Juda, lived after the death of Joas king of Iſrael fifteen years; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteen years compleat, which Jeroboam the ſecond (who [b] in the fifteenth year of Amazia was made king over Iſrael) had reigned in Samaria. But the ſucceſſion of Uzzia, who is alſo called Azaria, unto his father in the Kingdom of Juda, was eleven years later than the ſixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expreſſed, that [c] Azaria began to reign in the ſeven and twentieth year of Jeroboam; the ſixteenth year of his life being joined with the firſt of two and fifty that he reigned. So the Interregnum of eleven years cannot be divided, without ſome hard means uſed, of interpreting the text otherwiſe than the letter ſounds.

Yet ſome conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought, that in the place laſt of all cited, by the ſeven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we ſhould perhaps underſtand the ſeven and twentieth year of his life; or elſe (becauſe the like words are no-where elſe interpreted in the like ſenſe) that Azaria was eleven years under age, that is, five years old, when his father died, and ſo his ſixteenth year might concur with the ſeven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or, that the text itſelf may have ſuffered ſome wrong, by miſwriting twenty-ſeven for ſeventeen years, and ſo, by making the 17th year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be ſalved. Theſe are the conjectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the firſt of which it may ſuffice, that the author himſelf doth eaſily let it paſs as improbable; the laſt is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, we ſhould call the text in queſtion, which could not be ſatisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the ſecond, it may be held with ſome qualification, that Azaria began his reign being five years old; but then muſt we add thoſe 11 years which paſſed in his minority, to the 52 that followed his 16th year, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why ſhould we be ſo careful to avoid an interregnum in Juda, ſeeing that the like neceſſity hath enforced all good writers to acknowledge the like vacancy twice happening within few years, in the kingdom of Iſrael? The ſpace of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zachariah's reign, and ſuch another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hoſea, have made it eaſily to be admitted into Samaria, which the conſideration of things as they ſtood in Juda, when Amazia was ſlain, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea altho' the neceſſity of computation were not ſo apparent.

For the publick fury, having ſo far extended it ſelf, as unto the deſtruction of the king's own perſon, was not like to be appeaſed without order taken for obtaining ſome redreſs of thoſe matters, which had cauſed it at the firſt to break forth into ſuch extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to paſs, that they, which had already thrown themſelves into ſuch an horrible treaſon, ſhould afterwards dare to withhold the crown from a prince of that age, which being inveſted in all ornaments of regality, is nevertheleſs expoſed to many injuries, proceeding from headſtrong and forgetful ſubjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have been king but 41 years, after he came out of his non-age, I dare not allow it, becauſe it agrees too harſhly with the text. The beſt opinion were that, which gives unto Jeroboam 11 years of reign with his father, before he began to reign ſingle in the 15th of Amazia; did it not ſwallow up almoſt the whole reign of Joas, and extending they ears of thoſe which reigned in Iſrael (by making ſuch of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the ſhorteſt the reigns of princes auling in other nations. But I will not ſtand to diſpute further of this: every man may follow his own opinion, and ſee mine more plainly in the chronological table drawn for theſe purpoſes.

SECT. XII.

Of princes contemporary with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THE princes living with Amazia, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were

[a] 2 Chron. 25. 2. & 2 Kings 14. 17. [b] 2 Kings 14. 23. [c] 2 Kings 15. 1.

Joas

Joas and Jeroboam in Iſrael; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Alladius, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Thelectus, in whoſe time the Spartans won from the Achaians, Gerauthæ, Amyclæ, and ſome other towns.

But more notable than all theſe, was Aſſyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazia ſucceeded his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty years, and was ſlain the laſt of the eleven void years which forewent the reign of Azaria. In him ended (as moſt agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that empire one thouſand two hundred and forty years. A moſt luxurious and effeminate palliard he was, paſſing away his time among ſtrumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In theſe voluptuous courſes he lived an unhappy life, knowing himſelf to be ſo vile, that he durſt not let any man have a ſight of him; yet ſeen he was at length, and the ſight of him was ſo odious, that it procured his ruin. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding means to behold the perſon of his king, was ſo incenſed with that beaſtly ſpectacle, of a man diſguiſed in womans attire, and ſtriving to counterfeit an harlot, that he thought it great ſhame to live under the command of ſo unworthy a creature. Purpoſing therefore to free himſelf and others from ſo baſe ſubjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleſis or Beloſus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the kingdom of Sardanapalus ſhould fall into his hands. Arbaces, well pleaſed with this prophecy, did promiſe unto Beloſus himſelf the government of Babylon; and ſo concluding how to handle the buſineſs, one of them ſtirred up the Medes, and allured the Perſians into the quarrel, the other perſuaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themſelves in the ſame cauſe. Theſe four nations armed forty thouſand men againſt Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himſelf, but gathering ſuch forces as he could, out of other nations, encountered the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that war anſwer to the manner of his retiredneſs. For in three battles he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into ſuch fearful terms, that had not Beloſus promiſed them conſtantly ſome unexpected ſuccours, they would forthwith have broken up their camp. About the ſame time, an army out of Bactria was coming to aſſiſt the king; but Arbaces encountering it upon the way, perſuaded ſo ſtrongly by promiſe of liberty, that thoſe forces joined themſelves with his. The ſudden departure of the enemy ſeeming to be a flight, cauſed Sardanapalus to feaſt his army, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being ſtrengthened with this new ſupply, came upon him by night, and forced his camp, which through over-great ſecurity, was unprepared for reſiſtance.

This overthrow did ſo weaken the king's heart, that leaving his wife's brother Salamenus to keep the field, he withdrew himſelf into the city of Niniveh; which, till new aids that he ſent for ſhould come, he thought eaſily to defend; it having been propheſied, that Niniveh ſhould never be taken till the river were enemy to the town. Of the greatneſs and ſtrength of Niniveh, enough hath been ſpoken in our diſcourſe of Ninus. It was ſo well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battles overthrown the king's army, and ſlain Salamenus) was fain to lie two whole years before it, in hope to win it by famine; whereof yet he ſaw no appearance. It ſeems that he wanted engines and ſkill to force thoſe walls, which were a hundred foot high, and thick enough for three chariots in front to paſs upon the rampire. But that which he could not do in two years, the river of Tigris did in the third: for being high ſwoln with rains, it not only drown'd a part of the city through which it ran, but threw down twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accompliſhment of the old oracle, or ſeeing no means of reſiſtance left, ſhutting up himſelf into his palace, with his wives, eunuchs, and all his treaſures, did ſet the houſe on fire, wherewith he and they were together conſum'd. [a] Strabo ſpeaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale, a city of Cilicia, whereon was found an inſcription, ſhewing that he built that city and Tharſus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eat and drink and make merry, encouraging others, with verſes well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example, teſtify'd that his nature was more prone to ſenſuality, than to any virtue beſeeming a prince.

There are ſome that faintly report otherwiſe of his end; ſaying that Arbaces, when he firſt found him among his concubines, was ſo enrag'd, that ſuddenly he ſlew him with a dagger. But the more general conſent of writers agree with this relation of [b] Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Cteſias a Greek writer, that liv'd in the court of Perſia, where the truth might beſt be known.

Concerning the princes which reigned in Aſſyria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, tho' I believe that they were ſometimes (yet not, as Oroſius hath it, inceſſantly) buſied, in offenſive or elſe defenſive arms; yet for the moſt part of them I do better truſt [c] Diodorus Siculus, who ſaith, that their names were overpaſſed by Cteſias, becauſe they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatſoever they did; that which [d] Theophilus Antiochenus hath ſaid of them is very true; Silence and oblivion hath oppreſſed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of UZZIA.

SECT. I.

The proſperity of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the ſecond, who reigned with him in Iſrael. Of the anarchy that was in the ten tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem and Pekahia.

UZZIA, who is alſo called Azaria, the ſon of Jotham, was made king of Juda, when he was 16 years old, in the 27th year of Jeroboam the ſon of Joas king of Iſrael. He ſerved the God of his father David, and had therefore good ſucceſs in all his enterpriſes. He built Eloth, a town that ſtood near to the Red ſea, and reſtored it to Juda. He overcame the Philiſtines, of whoſe towns he diſmantled ſome, and built others in ſundry parts of their territories. Alſo he got the maſtery over ſome parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his proſperous wars, wherein (as Joſephus rehearſeth his acts) he began with the Philiſtines, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His army conſiſted of three hundred and ſeven thouſand men of war, over which were appointed two thouſand ſix hundred captains. For all this multitude the king prepared [a] ſhields, and ſpears, and helmets, and other arms requiſite; following therein happily a courſe quite oppoſite unto that which ſome of his late predeceſſors had held, who thought it better policy to uſe the ſervice of the nobility, than of the multitude; carrying forth to war the princes and all the chariots, 2 Chron. xxi. 9.

As the victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the atchievements of all that had reign'd in Juda, ſince the time of David; ſo were his riches and magnificent works equal, if not ſuperiour, to any of theirs that had been kings between him and Solomon. For beſides that great conqueſts are wont to repay the charges of war with triple intereſt, he had the skill to uſe, as well as the happineſs to get. He turn'd his lands to the beſt uſe, keeping ploughmen and dreſſers of vines, in grounds convenient for ſuch huſbandry. In others places he had cattel feeding, whereof he might well keep great ſtore, having won ſo much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waſte ground ſerving for paſturage. For defence of his cattel and herdſmen, he built towers in the wilderneſs. He alſo digg'd many ciſterns or ponds. Joſephus calls them water-courſes; but in ſuch dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the moſt likely places. If by theſe towers he ſo commanded the water, that none, could without his conſent, relieve themſelves therewith; queſtionleſs he took the only courſe, by which he might ſecurely hold the lordſhip over all the wilderneſs; it being hardly paſſable, by reaſon of the extreme drought, when the few ſprings therein found, are left free to the uſe of travellers.

Beſides all this coſt, and the building both of Eloth by the Red ſea, and of ſundry towns among the Philiſtines; he repaired the wall of Jeruſalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with towers, whereof ſome were an hundred and fifty cubits high.

The ſtate of Iſrael did never ſo flouriſh, as at this time, ſince the diviſion of the twelve tribes into two kingdoms. For as Uzzia prevailed in the ſouth, ſo (if not more) Jeroboam the ſon of Joas, king of the ten tribes, enlarged his border on the north; where, obtaining many victories againſt the Syrians, he won the royal city of Damaſcus, and he won Hamath, with all the country thereabout [b] from the entring of Hamath, unto the ſea of the wilderneſs, that is (as the moſt expound it) unto the vaſt deſarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiſcover'd. So the bounds of Iſrael in thoſe parts, were in the time of this Jeroboam, the ſame (or not much narrower) which they had been in the reign of David.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived ſo well; for he was an idolater; it was only the compaſſion which the Lord had on Iſrael, ſeeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which cauſed him to alter the ſucceſs of war, and to throw the victorious Aramites, under the feet of thoſe, whom they had ſo cruelly oppreſs'd. The line of Jehu, to which God had promiſed the kingdom of [c] Iſrael unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was invited unto repentance, by new benefits, as it had been at the beginning. But the ſin of Jeroboam the ſon of Nebat, was held ſo precious, that neither the kingdom it ſelf, given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick idolatry; nor the miſery falling upon him and his poſterity, to bring them to a better courſe of religion; nor yet, at the laſt, this great proſperity of Jeroboam the ſon of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the only giver of victory. Wherefore the promiſe of God, made unto Jehu, that his ſons, unto the fourth generation, ſhould ſit on the throne of Iſrael, was not enlarged; but, being almoſt expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (ſo ſtrange, that we, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly gueſs at the occaſions) foregoing the laſt accompliſhment.

When Jeroboam, the ſon of Joas, after a victorious reign of 41 years, had ended his life, it ſeems in all reaſon that Zacharia his ſon ſhould forthwith have been admitted, to reign in his ſtead; the nobility of that race having gotten ſuch a luſtre by the immediate ſucceſſion of four kings, that any competitor, had the crown paſs'd by election, muſt needs have appear'd baſe; and the virtue of the laſt king, having been ſo great, as might well ſerve to lay the foundation of a new houſe, much more to eſtabliſh the already confirmed right of a family ſo rooted in poſſeſſion. Notwithſtanding all this, two or three and twenty years did paſs before Zacharia the ſon of Jeroboam was, by uniform conſent, received as king. The true original cauſes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden calves did ſtand: yet ſecond inſtruments of this diſturbance, are likely not to have been wanting, upon which the wiſdom of man was ready to caſt an eye. Probable it is, that the captains of the army (who afterwards ſlew one another, ſo faſt, that in 14 years there reign'd 5 kings) did now by headſtrong violence, rent the kingdom aſunder, holding each what he could, and either deſpiſing or hating ſome qualities in Zacharia; until, after many years, wearied with diſſenſion, and the principal of them perhaps, being taken out the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they conſented to yield all quietly to the ſon of Jeroboam. That this anarchy laſted almoſt 23 years, we find by the difference of time, between the 15th year of Uzzia, which was the laſt of Jeroboam's 41ſt (his 27th concurring with the 1ſt of Uzzia) and the 38th of the ſame Uzzia, in the laſt 6 months whereof, Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are ſome indeed, that by ſuppoſing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father 11 years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before-mentioned) and by the ſame reaſon, abridge this anarchy, that was before the reign of Zacharia in Iſrael. Yet they leave it 12 years long; which is time ſufficient to prove that the kingdom of the ten tribes, was no leſs diſtempered, than as is already noted. But I chooſe rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other princes reigning abroad in the world, than this doubtful conjecture, which gives to Jeroboam 52 years, by adding three quarters of his father's reign unto his own, which was it ſelf indeed ſo long, that he may well ſeem to have begun it very young: for I do not think, that God bleſſed this idolater, both with a longer reign, and with a longer life, than he did his ſervant David.

Thus much being ſpoken of the time, wherein the throne of Iſrael was void, before the reign of Zacharia; little may ſuffice to be ſaid of his reign it ſelf, which laſted but a little while. Six months only was he king; in which time he declared himſelf a worſhipper of the golden calves; which was enough to juſtify the judgment of God, whereby he was ſlain. He was the laſt of Jehu's houſe, being (inclufively) the firſt of that line; which may have been ſome cauſe of the troubles impeaching his orderly ſucceſſion: the prophecy having determined that race in the 4th generation. But (beſides that God's promiſe was extended unto the utmoſt) there was no warrant given to Sallum, or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as has been given to Jehu, for the ſlaughter of Jehoram, and for the eradication of Ahab's houſe.

Zacharia having been 6 months a king, was then ſlain by Sallum, who reigned after him, [a] the ſpace of a month in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I do not find; ſave only that he was a traitor, and the ſon of one Jabeſh, whereby his father got no honour. It ſeems that he was one of thoſe, who in time of faction had laboured for himſelf; and now, when all other competitors were ſitten down, thought eaſily to prevail againſt that king, in whoſe perſon the race of Jehu was to fail. Manifeſt it is, that Sallum had a ſtrong party: for Tiphſah or Thapſa, and the coaſt thereof even from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemy and ſupplanter, then lay, refuſed to admit, as king in his ſtead, the man that murthered him. Yet at the end of one month, Sallum received the reward of his treaſon, and was ſlain by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the ſon of Gadi, reigned after Sallum 10 years. In oppoſition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhuman; for he not only deſtroy'd Tiphſah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he rip'd up all their women with child, becauſe they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been uſed in revenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earneſt, in procuring unto him his father's crown when it was firſt due. But in performing that office, there was uſed ſuch long deliberation, that we may plainly diſcover ambition, diſdain, and other private paſſions, to have been the cauſes of this beaſtly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it ſeems) in the beginning of his reign, Pul, king of Aſſyria, came againſt the land of Iſrael; whom this new king appeaſed, with a thouſand talents of ſilver, levied upon all the ſubſtantial men in his country. With this money the Iſraelite purchaſed not only the peace of his kingdom, but his own eſtabliſhment therein: ſome factious man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) ſought to uſe his help, in depoſing this ill-beloved king. [b] Joſephus reports of this Menahem, that his reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his tyranny ended with his life: and Pekahia, his ſon, occupied his room.

Of this Pekahia the ſtory is ſhort: for he reigned only two years; at the end whereof he was ſlain by Peka, the ſon of Remalia, whoſe treaſon was rewarded with the crown of Iſrael, as, in time coming another man's treaſon againſt himſelf ſhall be. There needs no more to be ſaid of Menahem, and his ſon, ſave that they were, both of them, idolaters; and the ſon (as we find in [c] Joſephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Aſſyrian king, who firſt opened unto thoſe northern nations the way into Palæſtina; it will ſhortly follow, in order of the ſtory, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Beloſus (called alſo Beleſes, and by ſome, Phul Belochus) who joined with Arbaces the Median, againſt Sardanapalus, or whether he were ſome other man. At the preſent it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who outlived the happineſs wherein we left him.

SECT. II.

The end of Uzzia's reign and life.

AS the zeal of Jehoiada, that godly prieſt, was the means to preſerve the lineage of David, in the perſon of Joas; ſo it appears, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up, and advance him to the crown of Juda, when the hatred borne to his father Amazia, had endangered his ſucceſſion. For it is ſaid of Uzzia, That [d] he ſought God in the days of Zacharia (which underſtood the viſions of God) and when he ſought the Lord, God made him proſper.

[e] But, when he was ſtrong, his heart was lifted up to his deſtruction: for he tranſgreſſed againſt the Lord his God: and went into the temple of the Lord to burn incenſe, upon the altar of incenſe. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by medling in the prieſts office, whoſe power had in every extremity been ſo helpful to the kings of Juda, that meer gratitude, and civil policy, ſhould have held back Uzzia from incroaching thereupon; yea, tho' the law of God had been ſilent in this caſe, and not forbidden it. Howſoever the king forgot his duty, the prieſts remembred theirs, and God forgot not to aſſiſt them. Azaria the high prieſt interrupted the king's purpoſe, and gave him to underſtand, how little to his honour it would prove, that he took upon him the office of the ſons of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourſcore other prieſts, valiant men, but their valour was ſhew'd, only in aſſiſting the high prieſt, when (according to his duty) he reprehended the king's preſumption. This was enough, the reſt God himſelf perform'd. We find in Joſephus, l. 9. c. 11. that the king had apparell'd himſelf in prieſtly habit, and that he threaten'd Azaria and his companions, to puniſh them with death, unleſs they would be quiet. Joſephus indeed enlargeth the ſtory, by inſerting a great earth-quake, which did tear down half an hill, that rouled four furlongs, till it reſted againſt another hill, ſtopping up the high-ways, and ſpoiling the king's garden in the paſſage. With this earthquake, he ſaith, that the roof of the temple did cleave, and that a ſun-beam did light upon the king's face, which was preſently infected with leproſy. All this may have been true; and ſome there are who think that this earthquake is the ſame, which is mention'd by the prophet Amos; wherein they do much miſreckon the times. For the earthquake ſpoken of by Amos, was in the days of Jeroboam king of Iſrael, who died 37 years before Uzzia; ſo that Jotham the ſon of Uzzia, which ſupplied his father's place in government of the land, ſhould, by this account, have been then unborn: for he was but 25 years old, when he began to reign as king. Therefore thus far only we have aſſurance; that while Uzzia, was wroth with the prieſts, the leproſy roſe up in his forehead, before the prieſts, 2 Chron. xxvi. 20. Hereupon he was cauſed, in all haſte, to depart the place, and to live in a houſe by himſelf, until he died; the rule over the king's houſe, and over all the land, being committed to Jotham, his ſon and ſucceſſor. Jotham took not upon himſelf the ſtyle of a king, till his father was dead; whom they buried in the ſame field wherein his anceſtors lay interred, yet in a monument apart from the reſt, becauſe he was a leper.

SECT. III.

Of the prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of princes then ruling in Egypt, and in ſome other countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the firſt of the leſſer prophets, Hoſea, Joel, Amos, Obadia and Jonas. It is not indeed ſet down, when Joel or Obadia did propheſy: but if the prophets, whoſe times are not expreſſed, ought to be ranged (according to St. Jerome's rule) with the next before them; then muſt theſe two be judged contemporary with Hoſea and Amos, who lived under king Uzzia. To enquire which of theſe five was the moſt ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at leaſt, a ſuperfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath ſo painfully been ſought, without reprehenſion; how can he be taxed, which offers to ſearch out the antiquity of theſe holy prophets? It ſeems to me, that the firſt of theſe, in order of time, was the prophet Jonas, who foretold the great victories of Jeroboam king of Iſrael; and therefore is likely to have propheſied in the days of Joas, whilſt the affliction of Iſrael was exceeding bitter, the [a] text it ſelf intimating no leſs: by which conſequence, he was elder than the other prophets, whoſe works are now extant. But his prophecies, that concerned the kingdom of Iſrael, are now loſt. That which remaineth of him, ſeems, not without reaſon, unto ſome very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whoſe days Nineveh was firſt of all deſtroyed. This prophet rather taught Chriſt by his ſufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the reſt are found expreſs promiſes of the Meſſias.

In the reign of Uzzia likewiſe it was, that Iſaiah, the firſt of the four great prophets, began to ſee his viſions. This difference of greater and leſſer prophets, is taken from the volumes which they have left written (as [b] St. Auguſtine gives reaſon of the diſtinction) becauſe the greater have written larger books. The prophet Iſaiah was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing; or of his nobility (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the ſon of Amos the prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellency, both of his ſtyle, and argument, wherein he ſo plainly fortelleth the birth, miracles, paſſion, and whole hiſtory of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an evangeliſt, as a prophet; having written in ſuch wiſe, that (as [c] Jerome ſaith) One would think he did not fortel of things to come, but compile an hiſtory of matters already paſt.

Bocchoris was king of Egypt, and the ninth year of his reign, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reaſon) was current, when Uzzia took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Judah.

After the death of Bocchoris, Aſychis followed in the kingdom of Egypt, unto him ſucceeded Anyſis; and theſe two occupied that crown ſix years. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became king of Egypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten firſt ran along with the laſt of Uzzia's reign and life. Of theſe and other Egyptian kings, more ſhall be ſpoken, when their affairs ſhall come to be intermedled with the buſineſs of Judah.

In Athens, the two laſt years of Ariphron's twenty, the ſeven and twentieth of Theſpeius, the twentieth of Agamneſtor, and the three firſt of Æſchylus's three and twenty, made even with the two and fifty of Uzzia: as likewiſe did in Alba the laſt ſeven of Sylvius Aventinus's ſeven and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Sylvius Procas, and two and twenty the firſt of Sylvius Amulius. In Media, Arbaces began his new kingdom, in the firſt of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty years, his ſon Soſarmus ſucceeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the diviſion of the Aſſyrian empire between him and others, when they had oppreſſed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to uſe more particular diſcourſe, that we may not wander in too great uncertainty in the ſtory of the Aſſyrian kings, who have already found the way into Palæſtina, and are not likely to forget it.

SECT. IV.

Of the Aſſyrian kings deſcending from Phul: and whether Phul and Beloſus were one perſon; or heads of ſundry families, that reigned apart in Nineveh and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been ſhewed of Sardanapalus's death, it is apparent that the chief therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the reſt of the confederates did not only ſubmit themſelves in that war, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authority ſentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The firſt example of this his power, was ſhewn upon Beloſus the Babylonian, by whoſe eſpecial advice and help, Arbaces himſelf was become ſo great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exerciſed in ſo tyrannical a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the princes that had aſſiſted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Beloſus, he uſed the counſel of his other captains, and then pardoned him of his own grace; allowing him to hold, not only the city and province of Babylon, but alſo thoſe treaſures, for embezzeling whereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the reſt of his partakers, and made them rulers of provinces; retaining (as it appears) only the ſoveraignty to himſelf, which to uſe immoderately he did naturally abhor. He is ſaid, indeed, to have excited the Medes againſt Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the empire to their nation. And to make good this his promiſe, he deſtroyed the city of Nineveh; permitting the citizens nevertheleſs to take and carry away every one his own goods. The other nations that joined with him, as the Perſians and Bactrians, he drew to his ſide, by the allurement of liberty; which he himſelf ſo greatly loved, that by ſlackning too much the reins of his own ſoveraignty, he did more harm to the general eſtate of Media, than the pleaſure of the freedom which it enjoyed could recompenſe. For both the territory of that country was pared narrower by Salmanaſſar (or perhaps by ſome of his progenitors) whom we find, in the ſcriptures, to have held ſome towns of the Medes; and the civil adminiſtration was ſo diſorderly, that the people themſelves were glad to ſee that reformation, which Deioces, the fifth of Arbaces's line, did make in that government, by reducing them into ſtricter terms of obedience.

How the force of the Aſſyrians grew to be ſuch, as might in fourſcore years, if not ſooner, both extend it ſelf unto the conqueſt of Iſrael, and tear away

ſome part of Media, is a queſtion hardly to be anſwered; not only in regard of the deſtruction of Nineveh, and ſubverſion of the Aſſyrian kingdom, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may ſeem at that time to have kept the Aſſyrians under their ſubjection, when the reſt of the provinces were ſet at liberty; but, in conſideration of the kings themſelves, who reigned afterwards in Babylon and Nineveh, are confounded by ſome, and diſtinguiſhed by others; whereby their hiſtory is made uncertain.

I will firſt therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it ſtands: then, producing the objections made againſt it, I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Joſeph Scaliger, with thoſe learned that ſubſcribe thereunto, and the judgment of others that were more ancient writers, or have followed the ancients in this doubtful caſe. Neither ſhall it be needful to ſet down apart the ſeveral authorities and arguments of ſundry men, adding ſomewhat of weight or of clearneſs one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole ſubſtance of each diſcourſe: which I will do as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine own, but merely led by thoſe reaſons, which upon examination of each part, ſeemed to me moſt forcible, tho' to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, until of late, hath paſſed as current, is this: That Beloſus was the ſame king, who firſt, of the Aſſyrians, entred Palæſtina with an army; being called Pul, or Phul, in the ſcriptures, and by Annius's authors, with ſuch as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is ſaid, that he was a ſkilful aſtrologer, ſubtil and ambitious; that he got Babylon by compoſition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Aſſyria: finally, that he reigned eight and forty years, and then dying, left the kingdom to Teglat Phalaſar his ſon, in whoſe poſterity it continued ſome few deſcents, till the houſe of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius's Metaſthenes were ſufficient proof, could not be gainſaid: for that author, ſuch as he is, is peremptory herein. But howſoever Annius's authors deſerve to be ſuſpected, it ſtands with no reaſon, that we ſhould conclude all to be falſe which they affirm. They, who maintain this tradition, juſtify it by divers good allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumſtances found in all authors, and repugnant unto no hiſtory at all. For it is manifeſt by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Beloſus were partners in the action againſt Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joined with them, were thought well rewarded with liberty, as likewiſe other captains were with governments: but that any third perſon was ſo eminent, as to have Aſſyria itſelf, the chief country of the empire, beſtowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the leaſt appearance is found in any hiſtory. And certainly it ſtood with little reaſon, that the Aſſyrians ſhould be committed unto a peculiar king at ſuch time as it was not thought meet to truſt them in their own walls and houſes. Rather it is apparent, that the deſtruction of Nineveh by Arbaces, and the tranſplantation of the citizens, was held a needful policy, becauſe thereby the people of that nation might be kept down, from aſpiring to recover the ſoveraignty, which elſe they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the ſeat of the empire.

Upon ſuch conſiderations did the Romans, in ages long after following, deſtroy Carthage, and diſſolve the corporation, or body politick, of the citizens of Capua; becauſe thoſe two towns were capable of the empire: a matter eſteemed over-dangerous even to [a] Rome itſelf, that was miſtreſs of them both. This being ſo, how can it be thought, that the Aſſyrians in three or four years had erected their kingdom anew, under one Pul? or what muſt this Pul have been (of whoſe deſerving, or intermedling, or indeed of whoſe very name, we find no mention in the war againſt Sardanapalus) to whom the principal part of the empire fell, either by general conſent in diviſion of the provinces, or by his own power and purchaſe very ſoon after? Surely he was none other than Beloſus; whoſe near neighbourhood gave him opportunity (as he was wiſe enough to play his own game) both to get Aſſyria to himſelf, and to impeach any other man that ſhould have attempted to ſeize upon it. The province of Babylon, which Beloſus held, being, as [b] Herodotus reports, in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Perſian empire, was able to furniſh him with all that was requiſite for ſuch a buſineſs: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his own hands all the gold and ſilver that had been in the palace of Nineveh. And queſtionleſs to reſtore ſuch a city as Nineveh, was an enterprize fit for none to take in hand, except he had ſuch means as Beloſus had; which Pul, if he were not Beloſus, is likely to have wanted.

Beſides all this, had Pul been a diſtinct perſon from Beloſus, and lord of Aſſyria, which lay beyond the countries of Babylon and Meſopotamia, it would not have been an eaſy matter for him, to paſs quite thro' another man's kingdom with an army, ſeeking booty afar off in Iſrael: the only action by which the name of Phul is known. But if we grant, that he, whom the ſcriptures call Pul, or Phul, was the ſame whom prophane writers have called Beloſus, Beleſes, and Beleſtis, in like manner as [c] Joſephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the ſcriptures called never otherwiſe than Darius the Mede, was the ſon of Aſtyages, and called of the Greeks by another name (that is, Cyaxares) then is this ſcruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Meſopotamia did border upon Syria and Paleſtina: ſo that Beloſus, having ſettled his affairs in Aſſyria towards the eaſt and north, might with good leiſure encroach upon the countries that lay on the other ſide of his kingdom, to the ſouth and weſt. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumſtance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Iſrael, was none other than Beloſus. For the prince of the Arabians, who joined with Arbaces, and brought no ſmall part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, merely for the love of Beloſus. The friendſhip of theſe Arabians was a thing of main importance, to thoſe that were to paſs over Euphrates with an army into Syria. Wherefore Beloſus, that held good correſpondence with them, and whoſe moſt fruitful province adjoining to their barren quarters, might yearly do them ineſtimable pleaſures, was not only like to have quiet paſſage thro' their borders, but their utmoſt aſſiſtance; yea, it ſtands with good reaſon, that they, who loved not Iſrael, ſhould, for their own behoof, have given him intelligence of the deſtruction and civil broils among the ten tribes; whereby, as this Phul got a thouſand talents, ſo it ſeems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavy neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their own, ſetting up a new king in Damaſco, and clearing the coaſt of Arabia (from the ſea of the wilderneſs to Hamath) of the Hebrew garriſons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the nations divided by Euphrates hold together in ſo good terms of friendſhip: it was ancient conſanguinity; the memory whereof was available to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river came over willingly, to the ſuccour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damaſco. So Beloſus had good reaſon to look into thoſe parts; what a king, reigning ſo far off as Nineveh, ſhould have to do in Syria, if the other end of his kingdom had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to ſhew.

But concerning this laſt argument of the buſineſs, which might allure the Chaldeans into Palæſtina, it may be doubted, leſt it ſhould ſeem to have ill coherence with that which hath been ſaid of the long anarchy that was in the ten tribes. For if the crown of Iſrael were worn by no man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Beloſus was either unwilling to ſtir, or unable to take the advantage when it was faireſt, and firſt diſcovered. This might have compelled thoſe, who alone were not ſtrong enough, to ſeek after help from ſome prince that lay further off; and ſo the opinion of thoſe that diſtinguiſh Phul from Beloſus, would be ſomewhat confirmed. On the other ſide, if we ſay, that Beloſus did paſs the river of Euphrates, as ſoon as he found likelihood of making a proſperous journey; then may it ſeem that the interregnum in Iſrael was not ſo long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leiſure would have afforded better opportunity, which ought not to have been loſt.

For anſwer hereunto, we are to conſider what Oroſius and Euſebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arſaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, tho' it be held an error of Oroſius, where he ſuppoſeth that the occupying of Babylonia, by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Euſebius do concur, that the authority of Arbaces did reſtrain the ambition, which by his abſence grew bold, and by his death regardful only of itſelf. Now, tho' ſome have conjectured that all Aſſyria was given to Beloſus (as an overplus, beſides the province of Babylon, which was his by plain bargain made afore-hand) in regard of his high deſervings; yet the opinion more commonly received is, that he did only encroach upon that province by little and little, whilſt Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly got it all himſelf. Seeing therefore, that there paſſed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem's reign, manifeſt it is, that the conqueſt of Aſſyria, and ſetling of that country, was work enough to hold Beloſus occupied, beſides the reſtauration of Nineveh, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reign, if perhaps he lived to ſee it finiſhed in his own days. So that this argument may rather ſerve to prove that Phul and Beloſus were one perſon; foraſmuch as the journey of Phul againſt Iſrael was not made until Beloſus could find leiſure; and the time of advantage which Beloſus did let ſlip, argued his buſineſs in ſome other quarter, namely in that province of which Phul is call'd king. Briefly, it may be ſaid, that he who conquered Aſſyria, and performed ſomewhat upon a country ſo far diſtant as Palæſtina, was likely to have been at leaſt named in ſome hiſtory, or if not himſelf, yet his country to have been ſpoken of for thoſe victories: but we neither hear of Phul in any prophane author, neither doth any writer, ſacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatſoever of the Aſſyrians, done in thoſe times; whereas of Beloſus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we find good record.

Surely that great ſlaughter of ſo many thouſand Aſſyrians, in the quarrel of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate war, which overwhelmed the whole country, not ending but with the ruin and utter deſolation of Nineveh, muſt needs have ſo weaken'd the ſtate of Aſſyria, that it could not in thirty years ſpace be able to invade Palæſtina, which the ancient kings, reigning in Nineveh, had in all their greatneſs forborn to attempt. Yet theſe afflictions, diſabling that country, did help to enable Beroſus to ſubdue it; who having once extended his dominions to the borders of Media, and being (eſpecially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interpoſition of that country, ſecure of the Scythians, and other warlike nations on that ſide, might very well turn ſouthward, and try his fortune in thoſe kingdoms, whereinto civil diſſenſion of the inhabitants, and the bordering envy of the Arabians and Aramites about Damaſco, friends and couſins to the Chaldeans and Meſopotamians, did invite him. For theſe, and the other before-alledged reaſons, it may be concluded, that what is ſaid of Phul in the ſcriptures ought to be underſtood of Beloſus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaſhaſht, and Ahaſhueroſh, with the like, are thought or known to be meant the ſame, whom prophane hiſtorians, by names better known in their own countries, have called Nabopollaſſar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: eſpecially conſidering, that hereby we ſhall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, nor need to trouble ourſelves and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themſelves eaſily follow. For it is a matter of no great conſequence to know the truth of this point (conſidering it apart from that which depends thereon) whether Phul were Beloſus, or ſome other man: the whole race of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian kings, wherein are found thoſe famous princes, Nabonaſſar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollaſſar (famous for the aſtronomical obſervations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Beloſus or Beleſis were that Phul which invaded Iſrael; if he and his poſterity reigned both in Nineveh and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Aſar, from whom Salmanaſar, Sennacherib, and Aſar-haddon deſcended; then it is manifeſt, that we muſt ſeek Nabonaſſar, the Babylonian king, among theſe princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanaſar, who is known to have reigned in thoſe years, which Ptolomy the mathematician hath aſſigned unto Nabonaſſar. As for Merodach, who ſupplanted Aſar-haddon, manifeſt it is, that he and his ſucceſſors were of another houſe. This is the ſcope and end of all his diſputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be ſatisfied with ſuch conjectures. They lay hold upon the concluſion, and by ſhaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the premiſſes, upon which it is inferred. For (ſay they) if Nabonaſſar, that that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanaſſar, or any of thoſe other Aſſyrian kings, then is it manifeſt, that the races were diſtinct, and that Phul and Beloſus were ſeveral kings. This conſequence is ſo plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabonaſſar was a diſtinct perſon from Salmanaſſar, are brought ſuch arguments as would ſtagger the reſolution of him that had ſworn to hold the contrary. For firſt, Nabonaſſar was king of Babylon, and not of Aſſyria. This is proved by his name, which is merely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the firſt part of Salmanaſſar's name, is proper to the Aſſyrians. It is likewiſe proved by the aſtronomical obſervations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Aſſyrians, do ſhew that Nabonaſſar, from whom Ptolemy draws that epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Aſſyrian. Thirdly, and more ſtrongly, it is confirmed by the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his own language Merodac-ken-pad, but more briefly, in [a] Eſay's prophecy, Merodac, by the former part of his name; or Merodac Baladan, the ſon of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the ſon of Baladan, king of Babel, were the ſon of Nabonaſſar, then was Nabonaſſar none other than Baladan king of Babel, and not Salmanaſſar king of Aſſyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of theſe two names, Nabonaſſar and Salmanaſſar, which in Greek or Latin writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanaſſar carried captive ſome part of the ten tribes, it may well be granted, that in the province of Babylon Salmanaſſar had gotten ſomewhat, yet will it not follow that he was king of Babylon itſelf. To conclude, Merodach began his reign over Babylon in the ſixth year of Hezekia, at which time Salmanaſſar took Samaria; therefore, if Salmanaſſar were king of Babylon, then muſt we ſay that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonaſſar, were all one man. Theſe are the arguments of that noble and learned writer Joſeph Scaliger, who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofs from matter of more neceſſary inference.

Touching all that was ſaid before of Phul Beloſus, for the proving that Phul and Beloſus were not ſundry kings; Joſeph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have ſpent their labour to ſo little purpoſe. Honeſt and painful men he confeſſeth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their readers, had they not by mentioning Annius's authors given ſuch offence, that men refuſed thereupon to read their books and chronologies. A ſhort anſwer.

For mine own part, howſoever I believe nothing that Annius's Beroſus, Metaſthenes, and others of that ſtamp affirm, in reſpect of their bare authority; yet am I not ſo ſqueamiſh, but that I can well enough digeſt a good book, tho' I find the names of one or two of theſe good fellows alledged in it: I have ſomewhat (peradventure too often) already ſpoken my mind of Annius's authors; nevertheleſs, I may ſay here again, that where other hiſtories are ſilent, or ſpeak not enough, there may we without ſhame borrow of theſe, as much as agrees with that little which elſewhere we find, and ſerveth to explain or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are thoſe honeſt and painful men (as Scaliger terms them, meaning, if I miſtake him not, good ſilly fellows) who ſet down the Aſſyrian kings from Pul forwards, as lords alſo of Babylon, taking Pul for Beloſus, and Salmanaſſar for Nabonaſſar, ſuch writers as a man ſhould be aſhamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, tho' diſliking him in general) Gerard Mercator is not ſo ſlight a chronologer, that he ſhould be laughed out of doors, with the name of an honeſt-meaning fellow.

But I will not make compariſons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and ſee whether they be of ſuch force, as cannot either be reſiſted or avoided. It will eaſily be granted, that Nabonaſſar was king of Babylon; that he was not king of Aſſyria, ſome men doubt whether Scaliger's reaſons be enough to prove. For though Nabonaſſar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanaſſar an Aſſyrian; yet what hinders us from believing, that one man in two languages might be called by two ſeveral names? That aſtronomy flouriſhed among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonaſſar either an aſtrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himſelf calls them, [b] Prophetas neſcio quos, qui Nabonaſſarum aſtronomum fuiſſe in ſomnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their ſleep have dreamt of Nabonaſſar, that he was an aſtrologer.

Whether Nabonaſſar were an aſtrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative. But as his being lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their ſciences; ſo doth it not prove him, not to have been alſo king of Aſſyria. The emperor Charles the fifth, who was born in Gant, and Philip his ſon, king of Spain, and lords of the Netherlands, had men far more learned in all ſciences, and particularly in the mathematicks, among their ſubjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, poſterity will not uſe this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanaſſar or Nabonaſſar did uſe the Aſſyrian ſoldiers, and Babylonian ſcholars: but it ſeems, that he and his poſterity, by giving themſelves wholly to the more warlike nation, loſt the richer, out of which they firſt iſſued; as likewiſe king Philip loſt partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard, all the Netherlands, by ſuch a courſe. As for the two unanſwerable arguments (as Scaliger terms them, being methinks none other than anſwers to ſomewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrary ſide) one of them which is drawn from the unlike ſound and writing of thoſe names, Salmanaſſar and Nabonaſſar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will diſpute; for it is not likeneſs of ſound, but agreement of time, and many circumſtances elſe, that muſt take away the diſtinction of perſons: the other likewiſe may be granted; which is, that Salmanaſſar might be lord of ſome places in the province of Babylon, yet not king of Babylon itſelf: this indeed might be ſo, and it might be otherwiſe. Hitherto there is nothing ſave conjecture againſt conjecture. But in that which is alledged out of the prophet Eſay, concerning Merodach the ſon of Baladan; and in that which is ſaid of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, and his beginning to reign in the ſixth year of Hezekia, I find matter of more difficulty, than can be anſwered in haſte. I will therefore defer the handling of theſe objections, until I meet with their ſubject in its proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekiah, wherein Merodach lived and was king. Yet that I may not leave too great a ſcruple in the mind of the reader, thus far will I here ſatisfy him; that how ſtrong ſoever this argument may ſeem, Scaliger himſelf did live to retract it, ingenuouſly confeſſing, that in thinking Merodach to be the ſon of Nabonaſſar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us conſider in what ſort they have faſhioned their ſtory, who taking Pul to be a diſtinct perſon from Beloſus or Beleſtis, have in like ſort, as was neceſſary, diſtinguiſhed their offſpring, making that of Pul to fail in Aſarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I muſt firſt confeſs my want of books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into ſome ſuch order, as might preſent unto us the body of this hiſtory in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have ſeen, that ſince Joſeph Scaliger delivered his opinion have written in favour of ſome one or other point thereof: but Sethus Calviſius himſelf, who hath abridged Scaliger's learned work, De emendatione temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Beloſus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaſſar did reign (perhaps becauſe he found it not expreſſed in Scaliger) but is content to ſet down Baladan, for the ſame perſon with Nabonaſſar, which Scaliger himſelf revoked. In this caſe therefore I muſt lay down the plot of theſe divided kingdoms, in ſuch ſort as I find it contrived by Auguſtinus Torniellus; who only of all that I have ſeen, ſets down the ſucceſſion, continuance, and acts, of thoſe that reigned in Aſſyria after Sardanapalus, diſtinguiſhing them from Beloſus and his poſterity, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a regular clerk of the congregation of St. Paul, whoſe annals were printed the laſt year; he appears to me a man of curious induſtry, ſound judgment, and free ſpirit; yet many times, and, I take it, wilfully, forgetful of thanking, or mentioning thoſe proteſtant writers, by whoſe books he hath received good information, and enriched his works by inſerting ſomewhat of theirs. But in this buſineſs he hath openly profeſſed to follow Scaliger, whoſe help, without wrong or diſhonour to himſelf, he hath both uſed and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not ſpare to do right unto Torniellus; but confeſs my ſelf to have received benefit by his writing; and wiſh that his annals had ſooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in ſome things, ſo would he have inſtructed and embolden'd me to write more fully and leſs timorouſly in other things, which now I have not leiſure to reviſe. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared leſt it had over-haſtily paſſed out of my hand, and been expos'd to other mens conſtructions) of the four kings that invaded the valley of Siddim, and were ſlain by Abraham, I find him adventuring, as I have done, to ſay, [a] that they may probably be thought to have been ſome petty lords; the contrary opinion of all writers notwithſtanding. But now let us conſider how he hath ordered theſe laſt Aſſyrian and Babylonian kings.

After the deſtruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the moſt mighty, ſought to get all to himſelf, but was oppos'd by Beloſus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerful man in Aſſyria, ſided with Beloſus, and they two prevailed ſo far, that finally Arbaces was content to ſhare the empire with them, making ſuch a diviſion thereof, as was long after made of the Roman empire, between Octavian, Anthony and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the reſt, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himſelf ſoveraign lord of all, and placed the ſeat of his empire in Media, appointing Beloſus his lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Aſſyria. But in ſhort ſpace, that is, in four years, it came to paſs, by the juſt judgment of God, that Phul and Beloſus rebelled againſt Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done againſt Sardanapalus, and inſtead of being his viceroys, made themſelves abſolute kings. And to this latter opinion, Torniellus himſelf leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in profane hiſtories. Why he did make and publiſh the former ſuppoſition, reſolving to hold the latter, I ſhall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to gueſs. Having thus deviſed, how Phul and Beloſus might, at the firſt, attain to be kings, he orders their time, and their ſucceſſors in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to reign, and continues eight and forty years. Theglat-phalaſar (whoſe name, and the names of other princes, I write diverſly, according as the authors whom I have in hand are pleaſed to diverſify them) ſucceeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanaſſar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned ſeven: and when he was ſlain, Aſarhaddon his ſon ten years; in whom that line failed.

The ſame time that Phul took upon him as king of Aſſyria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for ſo it had been more likely) Beloſus uſurped the kingdom of Babylon, and held it threeſcore and eight years; at the leaſt threeſcore and eight years did paſs, before Nabonaſſar followed him in the poſſeſſion.

To Nabonaſſar, whom, with Scaliger, he thinks to be Baladan, are aſſigned ſix and twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus; four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and laſtly, one and twenty to Nabolaſſar, the father of Nabuchodonoſor, who is like to offer matter of further diſputation.

Concerning the original of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian kingdoms, I may truly ſay, that the conjectures of other men, who give all to Beloſus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more nearly reſembling the truth. Neither do I think, that Torniellus would have conceived two different ways, by which Phul might have gotten Aſſyria (for how Beloſus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other hiſtorians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the ſudden king of Aſſyria; or to give him ſo noble a province, as would, of it ſelf, invite him to accept the name and power of a king, was a thing moſt unlikely to have happened, unleſs his deſerts (whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to ſo high a reward. And for this cauſe (as I take it) hath he deviſed the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of ſo great a ſhare in the empire. If this were a true or probable ſuppoſition, then would a new doubt ariſe, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgetten by all hiſtorians? yea, why this diviſion itſelf, and the civil wars that cauſed it, were never heard of. Queſtionleſs the interverting of ſome treaſures by Beloſus, with his judgment, condemnation, and pardon following, were matters of far leſs note. Therefore I do not ſee, how one of the two inconveniencies can this way be avoided; but that either we muſt confeſs the dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his merits, or elſe his merits, and name withal, to have been ſtrangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the conjecture inferring ſuch a ſequel, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Beloſus againſt Arbaces, it was almoſt impoſſible for the Aſſyrians to recover ſuch ſtrength in four years, as might ſerve to hold out in rebellion: for Beloſus it was needleſs to rebel, conſidering, that Arbaces did not ſeek to moleſt him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were under his own government, to do what they liſted.

But it is now fit that we peruſe the catalogue of theſe kings: not paſſing thro' them all (for ſome will require a large diſcourſe in their own times) but ſpeaking of their order and time in general. If it be ſo unlawful to think, that ſome of Annius's tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other authors as well as in his) may be true, eſpecially ſuch, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood, why then is it ſaid, that Phul did reign in Aſſyria eight and forty years? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painful and judicious writers have found this number of years, to agree fitly with the courſe of things in hiſtory: yet all of them took it from Annius. Let it therefore be the puniſhment of Annius's forgery (as queſtionleſs he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth or probability, he be not believed for his own ſake; tho' for our own ſakes we make uſe of his boldneſs, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing elſe being offered) we are unwilling ourſelves to be authors of new, tho' not improbable conjectures. Herein we ſhall have this commodity, that we may without bluſhing alter a little, to help our own opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, againſt whom we ſhall be ſure to find friends that will take our part.

The reigns of Theglathphalaſſar and Salmanaſſar did reach, by Annius's meaſure, to the length of five and twenty years the one, and ſeventeen the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and ſeven from the latter of them, to fit (as I think) his own computation; uſing the liberty whereof I ſpake laſt: for that any author, ſave our good Metaſthenes, or thoſe that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of theſe did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Aſarhaddon, Torniellus gives the ſame length of reign, which is found in Metaſthenes. I think there are not many, that will arrogate ſo much unto themſelves, as may very well be allowed unto a man ſo judicious as is Torniellus: and yet could I wiſh, that he had forborn to condemn the followers of Annius, in this buſineſs, wherein he himſelf hath choſen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to ſay, as elſe he muſt have done, almoſt nothing.

The like liberty we find that he hath uſed in meaſuring the reigns of the Chaldeans; filling up all the ſpace between the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonaſſar, with the threeſcore and eight years of Beloſus. In this reſpect it was, perhaps, that he thought Beloſus might have begun his reign ſomewhat later than Phul: for 68 years would ſeem a long time for him to hold a kingdom, that was no young man when he took poſſeſſion of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by ſhortening his reign, ſeeing his life reacheth to the end of ſuch a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver. Indeed, 48 years had been ſomewhat of the moſt, conſidering that he ſeems by the ſtory to have been little leſs, at ſuch time as he join'd with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of 20 years did well deſerve that note (which Torniellus adviſedly gives) that if his reign extended not ſo far, then the reign of ſuch as came after him, occupied the middle time unto Nabonaſſar.

I neither do reprehend the boldneſs of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modeſty of Scaliger and Sethus Calviſius, in forbearing to ſet down as warrantable, ſuch things as depend only upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by antiquity, muſt be deſcribed in hiſtory, as geographers in their maps deſcribe thoſe countries, whereof as yet there is made no true diſcovery, that is, either by leaving ſome part blank, or by inſerting the land of pigmies, rocks of load-ſtone, with head-lands, bays, great rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, tho' many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from diſtance of place, allows not ſuch liberty to a deſcriber, as that which ariſeth from the remedileſs oblivion of conſuming time. For it is true that the poet ſaith;

——Neque fervidis
Pars incluſa caloribus
Mundi, nec boreæ finitimum latus,
Duratæque ſole nives,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincunt æquora navitæ.

Nor ſouthern heat, nor northern ſnow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The ſubject regions can fence,
And keep the greedy merchant thence.
The ſubtil ſhipmen way will find,
Storm never ſo the ſeas with wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in maps, do ſerve only to miſlead ſuch diſcoverers as raſhly believe them; drawing upon the publiſhers, either ſome angry curſes, or well deſerved ſcorn; but to keep their own credit, they cannot ſerve always. To which purpoſe I remember a pretty jeſt of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spaniſh gentleman, who had been employ'd by his king in planting a colony upon the ſtreights of Magellan: for when I ask'd him, being then my priſoner, ſome queſtion about an iſland in thoſe ſtreights, which methought might have done either benefit or diſpleaſure to his enterpriſe, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters Wives Iſland; ſaying, that whilſt the fellow drew that map, his wife ſitting by, deſired him to put in one country for her; that ſhe, in imagination, might have an iſland of her own. But in filling up the blanks of old hiſtories, we need not be ſo ſcrupulous. For it is not to be fear'd, that time ſhould run backward, and by reſtoring the things themſelves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: what if ſome good copy of an ancient author could be found, ſhewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of theſe uncertainties? would it be more ſhame to have believed in the mean while,

Annius

Annius or Torniellus, than to have believed nothing. Here I will not ſay, that the credit, which we give to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of thoſe authors whoſe names he pretendeth. Let it ſuffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather truſt Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his aſſertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approv'd hiſtories than their conjecture, as in this point it ſeems to me; it having moreover gotten ſome credit, by the approbation of many, and thoſe not meanly learned.

To end this tedious diſputation; I hold it a ſure courſe in examination of ſuch opinions, as have once gotten the credit of being general, ſo to deal as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them deſirous to put all the ſenators of the city to death. He lock'd the ſenators up within the ſtate-houſe, and offered their lives to the people's mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them ſhould periſh, until the commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was haſty; for as faſt as every name was read, all the town cried, Let him die: but the execution required more leiſure; for in ſubſtituting another, ſome notorious vice of the perſon, or baſeneſs of his condition, or inſufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: ſo that finding the worſe and leſs choice, the further and the more that they ſought, it was finally agreed, that the old ſhould be kept for lack of better.

SECT. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

AFter this diviſion of the Aſſyrian empire, follows the inſtauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reign of the ſame king Uzzia, and in his 51ſt year. It is, I know, the general opinion, that theſe games were eſtabliſhed by Iphitus, in the firſt of Jotham: yet is not that opinion ſo general, but that authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting thoſe things unto the ſacred hiſtory, which are found in prophane authors, we ſhould not be too careful of drawing the Hebrews to thoſe works of time, which had no reference to their affairs; it is enough, that ſetting in due order theſe beginnings of accounts, we join them to matters of Iſrael and Juda, where occaſion requires.

Theſe Olympian games and exerciſes of activity, were firſt inſtituted by Hercules, who meaſured the length of the race by his own foot; by which Pythagoras found out the ſtature and likely ſtrength of Hercules's body. They took name, not from the mountain Olympus, but from the city Olympia, otherwiſe Piſa, near unto Elis; where alſo Jupiter's temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the world, was known by the name of the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Theſe games were exerciſed from every fourth year compleat, in the plains of Elis, a city of Peloponneſus, near the river Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, theſe meetings[a] were diſcontinued for many years, till Iphitus by advice from the oracle of Apollo, re-eſtabliſhed them, Lycurgus the law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reign of Theodoſius the emperor, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were diſſolved under Conſtantine the Great.

From this inſtitution, Varro accounted the Grecian times, and their ſtories, to be certain: but reckon'd all before either doubtful, or fabulous: and yet [b] Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reign of Cyrus, who began in the 55th Olympiad, as Euſebius out of Diodore, Caſtor, Polybius, and others have gathered, in whoſe time the ſeven wiſe Grecians flouriſhed. For Solon had ſpeech with Crœſus, and Crœſus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of theſe Olympiads, namely to ſet them in the true year of the world, and the reign of ſuch and ſuch kings: but ſeeing they all differ in the firſt account, that is, of the world's year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril againſt Julian, and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the 49th of Oſias or Azariah.

[c] Euſebius, who is contrary to himſelf in this reckoning, accounts with thoſe that find the firſt Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundred and ſixth year after Troy, yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzzia, which is (as I find it) two years later.

[d] Eratoſthenes placeth the firſt Olympiad four hundred and ſeven years after Troy, reckoning the years that paſſed between; to whom Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The diſtance between the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratoſthenes. From the taking of Troy to the deſcent of Hercules's poſterity into Peloponneſus, were fourſcore years; thence to the Ionian expedition, threeſcore years; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus's government in Sparta, one hundred fifty-nine; and thence to the firſt Olympiad, one hundred and eight years. In this account the firſt year of the firſt Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were, to ſeek the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the years from the taking of Troy, which is of a date far more uncertain. Let it ſuffice, that by knowing the inſtauration of theſe games, to have been in the four hundred and eighth year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that city, ſetting that, and other accidents, which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads, muſt needs teach us how to find when they began.

To this good uſe, we have the enſuing years, unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided, by the ſame Eratoſthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundred fourſcore and ſeventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponneſian war, eight and forty years; forwards to the victory of Lyſander, ſeven and twenty; to the battel of Leuctra, thirty-four; to the death of Philip king of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole ſum ariſeth to four hundred fifty-three years; which number he otherwiſe alſo collecteth, and it is allowed by the moſt.

Now for placing the inſtitution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzziah, we have arguments, grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus's reign, and the death of Alexander; as alſo upon the aſtronomical calculation of ſundry eclipſes of the ſun, as of that which happened when Xerxes ſet out of Sardis with his army to invade Greece; and of divers others.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reign as king, before he was lord of the great monarcy, began the firſt year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty years; they who give him but twenty-nine years of reign (following Herodotus, rather than [a] Tully, Juſtin, Euſebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander ſet by all good writers, in the firſt year of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexander's death, ſerves well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like obſervations do. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, we ſhall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reign, either as king, or (taking the word monarch to ſignify a lord of many kingdoms) as a great monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the 1ſt year of the 55th Olympiad, unto the end of the Perſian empire, which was in the 3d of the 112th Olympiad, we find 230 years compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus's monarchy, which laſted but 7 years, we find compleat 207 years, which was the continuance of the Perſian empire.

Now therefore ſeeing that the firſt year of Cyrus's monarchy (which was the laſt of the 16th Olympiad, and the 240th year from the inſtitution of thoſe games by Iphitus) followed the laſt of the 70 years, of the captivity of Juda, and deſolation of the land of Iſrael; manifeſt it is, that we muſt reckon back thoſe 70 years, and 170 years more, the laſt which paſſed under the kings of Juda, to find the firſt of theſe Olympiads; which by this account is the 51ſt of Uzzia, as we have already noted.

The eclipſes whereof we made mention, ſerve well to the ſame purpoſe. For example's ſake, that which was ſeen when Xerxes muſtered his army at Sardis, in the 267th year of Nabonaſſar, being the laſt of the 74th Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus; whence we have a fair way thro' the 70 years, unto the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; and ſo upwards thro' the reigns of the laſt kings of Juda, to the 51ſt year of Uzzia.

Thus much may ſuffice, concerning the time wherein theſe Olympiads began.

To tell the great ſolemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourſe of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a ſuperfluous labour. It is enough to ſay, that all bodily exerciſes, or the moſt of them, were therein practiſed; as running, wreſtling, fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the maſtery in thoſe feats, whereof there was good uſe, but in running of chariots, fighting with whorl-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exerciſes, that ſerved only for oſtentation. Thither alſo repaired orators, poets, muſicians, and all that thought themſelves excellent in any laudable quality, to make trial of their skill. Yea, the very cryers, which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them ſhould get the honour, of having play'd the beſt part.

The Eleans were preſidents of thoſe games; whoſe juſtice, in pronouncing without partiality who did beſt, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the victors, they were none other than garlands of palm, or olive, without any other commodity following, than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held ſo much, that when Diagoras had ſeen his three ſons crowned for their ſeveral victories in thoſe games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in cœlum aſcenſurus es; that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou ſhalt not climb up to heaven: as if there could be no greater happineſs on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like ſenſe [b] Horace ſpeaks of theſe victors, calling them,

Quos Elæa domum reducit
Palma cœleſtes.

Such as like heavenly wights do come
With an Elean garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the people, or the ſongs of poets, that ſo highly extolled them, which had won theſe Olympian prizes; but even grave hiſtorians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as [c] Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks, that they eſteemed it almoſt as great an honour, to have won the victory at running or wreſtling in thoſe games, as to have triumphed in Rome for ſome famous victory, or conqueſt of a province.

That theſe Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the moon, and upon the fifteenth day of the month Hecatombæon, which doth anſwer to our June; and what means they uſed to make the month begin with the new moon, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I have ſhew'd in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the kings of Juda, and leave the merry Greeks at their games, whom I ſhall meet in more ſerious employments, when the Perſian quarrels draw the body of this hiſtory into the coaſts of Ionia and Helleſpont.

SECT. VI.

Of Jotham and his contemporaries.

Jotham the ſon of Uzzia, when he was twenty five years old, and in the ſecond of [d] Pekah king of Iſrael, was anointed king in Jeruſalem, his father yet living. He built an exceeding high gate to the temple of threeſcore cubits upright, and therefore called Ophel: beſides divers cities in the hills of Juda, and in the foreſts, towers, and palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him tribute, to wit, of ſilver an hundred talents, and of wheat and barly two thouſand meaſures: he reigned twenty-ſix years: of whom Joſephus gives this teſtimony. Ejuſmodi vero princeps hic fuit, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus deſideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus ſuis adeo juſte præfuerit, urbem ipſam tantæ ſibi curæ eſſe paſſus ſit, & tantopere auxerit, ut univerſum regnum hoſtibus quidem minime contemnendum, domeſticis autem ejus incolis atque civibus felix, fauſtum & fortunatum ſua virtute effecerit; This was ſuch a prince, as a man could find no kind of virtue wanting in him: he worſhipped God ſo religiouſly, he governed his men ſo righteouſly, he was ſo provident for the city, and did ſo greatly amplify it, that by his virtue and proweſs he made his whole kingdom not contemptible to his enemies, but to his ſervants, inhabitants and citizens, proſperous and happy.

[c] Tull. in Orat. pro Flacco. [d] 2 Kings 15. 33.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his reign was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himſelf was devout and virtuous.

Auchomenes about this time ſucceeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected magiſtrates, which governed from year to year. And yet Pauſanias in his ſecond book, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, that Corinth was governed by kings of the race of the Bacidæ, to the time of Cypſelus, who drove them out.

[a] Teglathphalaſſar, or Tiglathpeleſer, the ſon of Phul, the ſecond of the Babylonians and Aſſyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Iſrael, while Pekah (who murder'd his maſter Pekaiah) was king thereof. In which expedition he took moſt of the cities of Nephthali and Galilee, with thoſe of Gilead, over Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captive. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty years, according to Metaſthenes. But Krentzhemius finds, that with his ſon Salmanaſſar he reigned yet two years longer: which years I would not aſcribe to the ſon, becauſe the æra of Nabonaſſar begins with his ſingle reign, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulaſſar himſelf, who therewith reigned ſeven and twenty years.

Æſchylus, the ſon of Agamneſtor, about the ſame time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled five and twenty years. Alcamenes governed Sparta: after whom the eſtate changed, according to Euſebius: but therein ſurely Euſebius is miſtaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pauſanias, and others, witneſs the contrary. [b] Pauſanias affirmeth, that Polydorus, a prince of eminent virtues, ſucceeded his father, and reigned threeſcore years, and out-lived the Meſſeniac war: which was ended by Theopompus, the ſon of Nicander, his royal companion.

At this time lived Nahum the prophet, who foretold the deſtruction of the Aſſyrian empire, and of the city of Nineveh; which ſucceeded (ſaith Joſephus) an hundred and fifteen years after. The cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media Soſarmus and Medidus reigned, being the ſecond and third kings of thoſe parts.

SECT. VII.

Of Achaz and his contemporaries.

AHAS, or Achaz, ſucceeded unto Jotham in the [c] ſeventeenth year of Pekah, the ſon of Remalia: the ſame being alſo the laſt year of his father's reign, who began in the ſecond of the ſame Pekah, and reigned ſixteen, but not compleat years. This Ahaz was an idolater, exceeding all his predeceſſors. He made molten images for Baalim, and burnt his ſon for ſacrifice before the idol Moloch, or Saturn, which was repreſented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a calf, ſet up not far from Jeruſalem, in a valley ſhadowed with woods, called Gehinnon, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is uſed for hell. The children offer'd were incloſed within the carcaſs of this idol, and as the fire increaſed, ſo the ſacrificers, with a noiſe of cymbals and other inſtruments, filled the air, to the end the pitiful cries of the children might not be heard: which unnatural, cruel, and deviliſh oblation [d] Jeremy the prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which St. Jerome upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible ſin was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomy, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was alſo practiſed elſewhere, and by many nations remote from Judea, divers authors witneſs; as Virgil in the ſecond of his Æneids —— Sanguine placâſtis, &c. and Silius —— Poſcere cæde deos. Saturn is ſaid to have brought this cuſtom into Italy, beſides the caſting of many ſouls into the river of Tiber, inſtead of which Hercules commanded that the waxen images of men ſhould be thrown in and drowned. The devil alſo taught the Carthaginians this kind of butchery, inſomuch that when their city was beſieged and in diſtreſs, the prieſt made them believe, that becauſe they had ſpared their own children, and had bought and brought up others to be offered, that therefore Saturn had ſtirred up and ſtrengthened their enemies againſt them: whereupon they preſently cauſed two hundred of the nobleſt youths of their city to be ſlain, and offered to Saturn or Satan, to appeaſe him: who beſides theſe fore-named nations had inſtructed the [e] Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Meſſena, of Galatia, with the Maſſagets, and others, in theſe his ſervices: further, as if he were not content to deſtroy the ſouls of many nations in Europe, Aſia, and Africa (as [f] Acoſta writeth) the Mexicans, and other people of America, were brought by the devil under this fearful ſervitude, in which he alſo holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

For the wickedneſs of this king Ahaz, God ſtirred up Rezin of Damaſcus, and Pekah the ſon of Remalia, king of Iſrael, againſt him, who invaded Judæa, and beſieged Jeruſalem, but enter'd it not.

The king of Syria, Rezin, poſſeſs'd himſelf of Elah by the Red ſea, and caſt the Jews out of it; and Pekah ſlaughter'd in one day [g] an hundred and twenty thouſand Judeans, of the ableſt of the kingdom; at which time Maaſeiah the ſon of Achaz was alſo ſlain by Zichri, with Azricham the governour of his houſe, and Elcanah the ſecond perſon unto the king. Beſides all this, two hundred thouſand priſoners of women and children, the Iſraelites led away to Samaria: but by the counſel of the prophet Oded they were returned and delivered back again.

As Iſrael and Aram vexed Juda on the north, ſo the Edomites and the Philiſtines, who evermore attended the ruin of Judæa, enter'd upon them from the ſouth; and took Bethſemes, Ajalon, Gadereth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, [h] ſlew many people, and carried away many priſoners. Whereupon, when Achaz ſaw himſelf environed on all ſides, and that his idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, he ſent to the Aſſyrian Tiglathpileſer, to deſire ſome aid from him againſt the Iſraelites and Aramites, preſenting him with the ſilver and gold both of the [i] temple and king's houſe.

Tiglathpileſer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that roſe in Palæſtina. His father having lately made himſelf, from a provincial lieutenant, king of Babylon and Aſſyria, had a little before led him the way into Judæa, invited by Menahem king of Iſrael. Wherefore now the ſon willingly hearkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himſelf, he was content to aſſign ſome other time for going through with this enterpriſe: becauſe (as I have ſaid before) he was not firmly ſettled at home, and the Syrian kings lay directly in his way, who were yet ſtrong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treaſures of Jeruſalem, prepared his army, firſt invaded the territory of Damaſcus, won the city, and killed Rezin, the laſt of the race of the Adads, who began with David, and ended with this Achaz. At Damaſcus Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a pattern of the altar, ſent it to Uriah the prieſt, commanding the like to be made at Jeruſalem, whereon at his return he burnt ſacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the mean while Tiglath poſſeſs'd all Baſan, and the reſt beyond Jordan, which belonged to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manaſſeh. And then paſſing the river, he maſter'd the cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the kingdom of Iſrael, and made them his vaſſals. And notwithſtanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the ſpoil of Iſrael, he poſſeſs'd himſelf of the greater part of Juda, and as it ſeemeth enforced Achaz to pay him tribute. For in the ſecond of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Aſhur, or rebelled againſt him, and therefore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Achaz had beheld and borne theſe miſeries, in the end of the ſixteenth year of his reign he died; but was not buried in the ſepulchres of the kings of Juda.

With Achaz lived Medidus, the third prince in Media, who governed forty years, ſaith [a] Euſebius: Diodorus and Cteſias find Anticarmus inſtead of this Medidus, to have been Soſarmus's ſucceſſor, to whom they give fifty years.

Tiglath Phileſer held the kingdom of Aſſyria, all the reign of Achaz; yet ſo, that Salmanaſſar his ſon may ſeem to have reigned with him ſome part of the time. For we find that Achaz did [b] ſend unto the kings of Aſhur to help him. The Geneva note ſays, that theſe kings of Aſhur were Tiglath Pileſer, and thoſe kings that were under his dominion. But that he or his father had hitherto made ſuch conqueſts, as might give him the lordſhip over other kings, I do neither find any hiſtory, nor circumſtance that proveth. Wherefore I think that theſe kings of Aſhur were Tiglath, and Salmanaſſar his ſon, who reigned with his father, as hath been ſaid before: tho' how long he reigned with his father, it be hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus, according to [c] Plutarch. Euſebius makes their beginning far later, namely in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of theſe Ephori, Elalus was the firſt, Theopompus and Polydorus being then joint kings. Theſe Ephori, choſen every year, were comptrollers as well of their ſenators as of their kings, nothing being done without their advice and conſent. For (ſaith Cicero) they were oppoſed againſt their kings, as the Roman tribunes againſt the conſuls. In the time of Ahaz died Æſchylus, who had ruled in Athens ever ſince the fiftieth year of Uzzia. Alcamenon, the thirteenth of the Medontidæ, or governours of the Athenians (ſo called of Medon, who followed Codrus) ſucceeded his father Æſchylus, and was the laſt of their governours: he ruled only two years. For the Athenians changed firſt from kings (after Codrus) to governours for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a magiſtrate whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of burgomaſter, or governour of their city, for ten years.

This alteration Pauſanias in his fourth book begins in the firſt year of the eighth Olympiad. Euſebius and Halicarnaſſæus in the firſt of the ſeventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the firſt of theſe began his ten years rule.

The kingdom of the Latines, governed about three hundred years by the Sylvii, of the race of Æneas, took end in the ſame Ahaz's time: the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus and Remus in the eighth year of the ſame king. Codoman builds it the eleventh of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth (as I think he ſhould) others ſomewhat later, and in the reign of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Oroſius, and others, ſquare the time of the foundation to the third year of the ſixth Olympiad. But Halicarnaſſæus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Euſebius, to the firſt year of the ſeventh: who ſeem not only to me, but to many very learned chronologers, to have kept herein the beſt account.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the antiquities of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

SECT. I.

Of the old inhabitants, and of the name of Italy.

AND here to ſpeak of the more ancient times of Italy, and what nations poſſeſſed it before the arrival of Æneas, the place may ſeem to invite us: the rather becauſe much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of thoſe elder plantations. Italy, before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greeks by divers names; as firſt Heſperia, then Auſonia, the one name ariſing of the ſeat, the other of the Auſones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was alſo Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom [d] Halicarnaſſæus thinks to have been the firſt that brought a colony of Arcadians into that land. Afterwards it was called Italy, of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil ſpeaks thus.

Eſt locus Heſperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glebæ:
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixiſſe, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a land which Greeks Heſperia name,
Ancient, and ſtrong, of much fertility.
Oenotrians held it, but we hear by fame,
That by late ages of poſterity,
'Tis from a captain's name call'd Italy.

Who this captain or king may have been, it is very uncertain. For Virgil ſpeaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued ſo long upon the whole country, and worn out all other denominations, was not at the firſt accepted without good cauſe. Therefore to find out the original of this name, and the firſt planters of this noble country, Reineccius hath made a very painful ſearch, and not improbable conjecture. And firſt of all he grounds upon that of [e] Halicarnaſſæus, who ſpeaks of a colony which the Eleans did lead into Italy, before the name of Italy was given to it: Secondly, upon that of [f] Juſtin, who ſaith, that Brunduſium was a colony of the Etolians: Thirdly, upon that of [g] Strabo, who affirms the ſame of Temeſa, or Tempſa, a city of the Brutii in Italy: Laſtly, upon the authority of [h] Pliny, who ſhews that the Italians did inhabit only one region of the land, whence afterwards the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is ſaid of the Eleans and Etolians, who (as he ſhews) had one original; from them he brings the name of Italy. For the word Italia differs in nothing from Aitolia, ſave that the firſt letter is caſt away, which in the Greek words is common, and the letter [o] is changed into [a]: which change is found in the name of Ethalia, an iſland near Italy, peopled by the Etholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Eolic dialect; of which dialect (being almoſt proper to the Etolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latins, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, Quintilian, and Priſcian the grammarian teach. Hereunto appertains that of Julian the apoſtate, who called the Greeks couſins of the Latins. Alſo the common original of the Greeks and Latins from Javan; and the fable of Janus, whoſe image had two faces, looking eaſt and weſt, as Greece and Italy lay, and was ſtamped on coins, with a ſhip on the other ſide; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, father of the Greeks and Latins: who ſailing over the Ionian ſea, that lies between Ætolia and the weſtern parts of Greece and Italy, planted colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belong'd both to one man, and thereto applies that of Beroſus, who called Cethim Italus; tho' it may ſeem ſtrengthned by the marriage of Dardanus, whilſt he abode in Italy with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments, in my valuation greater and ſtronger, eaſily diſproved. For they, who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moſes: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the ſon of Javan, and nephew of Japheth, the eldeſt ſon of Noah: which antiquity far exceeds the name of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the country, not long before the war of Troy.

Likewiſe Virgil, who ſpeaks of Atlas, and of Dardanus's marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italy; but calleth Electra and her ſiſter Maia (poetically) daughters of the mountain Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the kings of the Aborigines; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus been one perſon.

As for the authority of Beroſus in this caſe, we need the leſs to regard it, for that Reineccius himſelf, whoſe conjectures are more to be valued than the dreams wherewith Annius hath filled Beroſus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italy began long after Atlas, it appears by the verſes of Virgil laſt rehearſed, wherein he would not have ſaid, —— nunc fama minores Italiam dixiſſe, Ducis de nomine, gentem, had that name been heard of ere Dardanus left the country. But ſeeing that, when Hercules, who died a few years before the war of Troy, had left in Italy a colony of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the ſame with the Etolians, as Strabo, Herodotus and Pauſanias teach) then the name of Italy began: and ſeeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian kings, it were no great boldneſs to ſay, that Italus was commander of theſe Eleans. For tho' I remember not, that I have read of any ſuch Greek as was named Italus, yet the name of Ætolus, written in Greek Aitolos, was very famous both among the Etolians, and among the Eleans, he being ſon of a king of Elis, and founder of the Etolian kingdom. Neither is it more hard to derive the name Italus from Ætolus than Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgil's authority ſtand well with the collections of Reineccius; the name of Italy being taken both from a captain, and from the nation of which he and his people were.

SECT. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other inhabitants of Latium, and of the reaſon of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latins and Hetrurians were moſt famous; the Hetrurians having held the greateſt part of it under their ſubjection; and the Latins, by the virtue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, ſubduing all Italy, and in few ages whatſoever nation was known in Europe: together with all the weſtern parts of Aſia, and north of Africk.

The region called Latium, was firſt inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnaſſæus, Varro, and Reineccius, following them, think to have been Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other ſignifications that are ſtrained) imports as much as original, or native of the place, which they poſſeſſed: which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to have always uſurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the moon, becauſe indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponneſus enforced to forſake their ſeats, ſo oft as other Greeks were, who dwelt without that half-iſland, neither had the Arcadians ſo unſure a dwelling as the reſt of the Peloponneſians, becauſe their country was leſs fruitful in land, mountainous and hard of acceſs, and they themſelves (as in ſuch places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of theſe therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, ſtyle themſelves Aborigines, in that language, which either their new ſeat, or their neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians who dwelt ſomewhat far from ſea, and are always noted as unapt men to prove good mariners, ſhould have been authors of new diſcoveries, were a queſtion not eaſy to be anſwered, were it not ſo, that both fruitfulneſs of children, in which thoſe ages abounded, enforceth a ſuperfluous company to ſeek another ſeat, and that ſome expeditions of the Arcadians, as eſpecially that of Evander, into the ſame parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelaſgi, an ancient nation, who ſometimes gave name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long ſince dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glory ſuch in Italy, as could long ſuſtain the name of their own tribe; for they were in ſhort ſpace accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Auſones, Aurunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following diſturb the peace of Latium, which by Saturn was brought to ſome civility, and he therefore canonized as a God.

This Saturn St. Auguſtine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others term him Stercutius, and ſay, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium took his name of Saturn, becauſe he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is queſtionleſs a fable. For as in heatheniſh ſuperſtition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many Gods of whom one fled from another; ſo in the truth of hiſtory, it is well known, that no king reigning in thoſe parts was ſo mighty, that it ſhould be hard to find one country or another, wherein a man might be ſafe from his purſuit. And yet, as moſt [a] fables and poetical fictions were occaſioned by ſome ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of ſpeech or ſome alluſion, they did maimedly and darkly expreſs (for ſo they feigned a paſſage over a river in hell, becauſe death is a paſſage to another life, and becauſe this paſſage is hateful, lamentable, and painful, therefore they named the river Styx of hate, Cocytus of lamentation, and Acheron of pain; ſo alſo becauſe men are ſtony-hearted, and becauſe the Greek λαοὶ people, and λᾶες ſtones, are near in ſound, therefore they feigned in the time of Deucalion ſtones converted into men, as at other times men into ſtones) in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturn's hiding himſelf, was ſome alluſion to that old opinion of the wiſeſt of the heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in Acts xvii. 23. whence alſo [a] Iſaiah of the true God ſays, Tu Deus abdens te. For it cannot be in vain that the word Saturnus ſhould alſo have this very ſignification, if it be derived (as ſome think) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: howbeit I deny not, but that the original of this word Latium, ought rather to be ſought elſewhere.

Reineccius doth conjecture that the Cetean, who deſcended of Cethim, the ſon of Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For theſe Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their war. Strabo interpeting the place of Homer, calls them ſubjects to the crown of Troy. Hereupon Reineccius gathers, that their abode was in Aſia: viz. in agro Elaitico; in the Elaitian territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a city which the Eolians held in Aſia, called Elæa, or Elaia, Pauſanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidæmis, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamis, which name laſt rehearſed hath a very near ſound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greek letter [D] having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to [T H] differing only in the ſtrength or weakneſs of utterance, which is found between many Engliſh words written with the ſame letters. Wherefore that theſe Ceteans being deſcended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the ſon of Javan, who was progenitor of the Greeks, might very well take a denomination from the city and region which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elæites, or Elaites, it is very likely, conſidering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Etolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Eolic tribe, are found the names of the mountain Elæus, the haven Eleas, the people Elaitæ, the cities Elæus, Elaia, and Elateia, of which laſt it were ſomewhat harſh in the Latin tongue to call the inhabitants by any other name than Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetæi and Arcadians had their original from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language and ſimilitude of names, they might nevertheleſs differ in ſound and pronunciation of one and the ſame word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom ſome (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a prince that founded the city Elateia) be named of the Ceteans, Latinus. Reineccius purſuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Euripylus, lord of the Ceteans, being the ſon of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Auge, the daughter of Aleus king of Arcadia, was ſlain by Achilles in the Trojan war: then did Telephus, brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans; who (fearing what evil might befal themſelves by the Greeks, if the affairs of Troy ſhould go ill) paſſed into that part of Italy, where the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reineccius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was firſt Elatinus, and then Latinus; that this name of Elatus may have been taken or impoſed by the Arcadians, it is the more eaſy to be thought, for that there were then two families, the one of Aphidus, the other of Elatus, who were ſons of Arcas king of Arcadia, which gave name to the country: and between theſe two families the ſucceſſion in that kingdom did paſs, almoſt interchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan war it fell into the hand of Hippothous of the race of Elatus, in whoſe poſterity it continued until the laſt. Again, the name Latinus having a derivative ſound, agrees the better with the ſuppoſition of ſuch an accident. This is the conjecture of Reineccius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the leſs reproof, conſidering that it is not eaſy to find either an apparent truth, or fair probability among theſe diſagreeing authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

SECT. III.

Of the ancient kings of the Latins until Æneas's coming.

THE kings which reigned in Latium before the arrival of Æneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus and Latinus. Of Saturn there is nothing remembred, ſave what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greeks, which whether they be appliable to this man, it is for him to judge who ſhall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturn of the Greeks, called by them Κρόνος, or ſome other, ſtyled Saturn by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have been the ſame: but the names [b] Sterces and Stercutius (for it may be this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the ſoil which they laid on their grounds, had that appellation from him) do rather make him ſeem ſome other man.

Of Picus it is ſaid that he was a good horſeman. The fable of his being changed into a bird, which we call a Pye, may well ſeem (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill he had in ſoothſaying, or divination, by the flight and chattering of fowls. Faunus the ſon of Picus reigned after his father. He gave to Evander the Arcadian (who having by miſchance ſlain his father Echemus king of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waſte grounds on which Rome was afterwards built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the ſiſter of Faunus, was alſo his wife, as all hiſtorians agree; ſhe was held a propheteſs, and highly commended for her chaſtity; which praiſe in her muſt needs have been much blemiſhed by her marriage, itſelf being merely inceſtuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his ſiſter any child, neither do we read of any other wife which he had, ſave only that Virgil, Æneid. 7. gives unto him Latinus as his ſon, by a nymph called Marica.

[a] Iſaiah 45. 15. [b] Ezekiel often calls the idols of the heathen Deos ſtercoreos: and hence it may be, that in the evangeliſt we read of Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus Stercoreus: and it may be that after that Saturn became the name of an idol, it pleaſed God that in a like ſenſe this name Stercutius ſhould ſtick unto him.

But who this Marica was it is not found, ſave only that her abode was about the river Liris near Minturnæ.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the ſon of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulyſſes by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. [a] Suidas takes notice only of the ſecond, of whom he ſaith, that his name was Telephus, and the people, anciently named the Cetii, were from his ſurname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reineccius, the difference conſiſting almoſt in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the ſon of Hercules, whereas Reineccius makes him his nephew, by a ſon of the ſame name. This Latinus having obtained the ſucceſſion in that kingdom after Faunus, did promiſe his only daughter and heir Lavinia, to Turnus the ſon of Venilia, who was ſiſter to Amata, Latinus's wife.

But when Æneas arrived in thoſe parts with fifteen ſhips, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allows to the veſſels then uſed, about one thouſand and two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would ſtand beſt with his aſſurance, to make alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great reputation of Æneas, which himſelf had heard of in the war of Troy, gave his daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus; who incenſed herewith, ſought to avenge himſelf by war, which was ſoon ended with his own death.

Of Amata the wife of Latinus, it is very certain, that were ſhe an Italian, ſhe could not have born a daughter marriageable at the arrival of Æneas; unleſs we ſhould wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the father, than to his ſon, who ſerved in the laſt year of the Trojan war. But Reineccius holds her an Aſiatick, and thinks withal that Lavinia was born before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnaſſæus call her, was not proper, but rather a ſurname, it may ſeem by Varro, who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Pallas. Amata, which ſignifieth beloved, or dear, was the name by which the high prieſt called every virgin, whom he took to ſerve as a nun of Veſta; wherefore it is the more eaſily to be thought a ſurname, howſoever Virgil diſcourſe of her and Venilia her ſiſter.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Æneas, the kingdom of Latium, or the greateſt part of that country, was eſtabliſhed in that race: wherein it continued until it was over-grown by the might and greatneſs of the Romans.

SECT. IV.

Of Æneas, and of the kings and governors of Alba.

ÆNEAS himſelf being of the royal blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his wife Creuſa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a ſon called Aſcanius; whoſe ſurname was Julus, having before the ruin of Troy (as Virgil notes) been ſurnamed Ilus. But when Æneas was dead, his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and, fearing the power of this Aſcanius, fled into the woods, where ſhe was delivered of a ſon, called thereupon Sylvius, and ſurnamed Poſthumus, becauſe he was born after his father's funeral. This flight of Lavinia was ſo evil taken by the people, that Aſcanius procured her return, entreated her honourably, and uſing her as a queen, did foſter her young ſon, his half-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occaſions of diſagreement, or delighted with the ſituation of the place; Aſcanius leaving to his mother-in-law the city of Lavinium, which Æneas had built, and called after his new wife's name, founded the city Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reign was, according to ſome, eight and twenty years: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his deceaſe, there aroſe contention between Sylvius the ſon of Æneas, and Julus the ſon of Aſcanius, about the kingdom: but the people inclining to the ſon of Lavinia, Julus was contented to hold the prieſthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the kingdom to Sylvius Poſthumus, whoſe poſterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

Sylvius Numitor.
Ilia, alſo called Rhea and Sylvia.
Romulus, Remus.

The moſt of theſe kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many towns in the borders of Latium: who ſtanding much upon the honour of their original, grew thereby to be called Priſci Latini. Of Tiberinus ſome think that the river Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Æneas into Italy. The mountain Aventinus had name, as many write, from Aventinus king of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwiſe. Julius, the brother of Aventinus, is named by Euſebius as father of another Julius, and grandfather of Julius Proculus; who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder ſon of Procas, was deprived of his kingdom by his brother Amulius; by whom alſo his ſon Ægeſthus was ſlain, and Ilia his daughter made a nun of Veſta, that thereby the iſſue of Numitor might be cut off. But ſhe conceived two ſons, either by her uncle Amulius, as ſome think; or by Mars, as the poets feign; or perhaps by ſome man of war. Both the children their uncle commanded to be drown'd, and the mother buried quick, according to the law; which ſo ordained, when the veſtal virgins broke their chaſtity. Whether it was ſo, that the mother was pardon'd at the entreaty of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or puniſhed as the law required (for authors herein do vary) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preſerved, who afterwards revenged the cruelty of their uncle, with the ſlaughter of him and all his, and reſtored Numitor their grand-father to the kingdom: wherein how long he reigned I find not, neither is it greatly material to know; foraſmuch as the eſtates of Alba and of Latium were preſently eclipſed by the ſwift increaſe of Rome; upon which the computation of time following (as far as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the kingdom of Alba ceaſed; for Numitor left no male iſſue. Romulus choſe rather to live in Rome; and of the line of Sylvius none elſe remained. So the Albanes were governed by magiſtrates; of whom only two dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the days of Tullus Hoſtilius, king of the Romans, making war upon Rome, died in the camp; and Metius Suffetius, the ſucceſſor of Cluilius, who ſurrender'd the eſtate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazard of both ſignories to the ſucceſs of three men on each ſide, who decided the quarrel by combat: in which the three brethren Horatii, the champions of the Romans, prevailed againſt the Curiatii, champions of the Albanes. After this combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hoſtilius with the Albane forces againſt the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his companies out of the battle, hoping thereby to leave the Romans to ſuch an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deal with; Tullus, who notwithſtanding this falſhood obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruel death, cauſing him to be tied to two chariots, and ſo torn in pieces. Then was Alba deſtroyed, and the citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free denizens, the noble families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Cæſar being deſcended, not only gloried in his ancient, royal, and forgotten pedigree, in full aſſembly of the Romans, then governed by a free eſtate of the people; but by his rare induſtry, valour, and judgment, obtained the ſoveraignty of the Roman empire (much by him enlarged) to himſelf and his poſterity; whereby the name of Æneas, and honour of the Trojan and Alban race, was ſo revived, that ſeldom, if ever, any one family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

SECT. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus's birth and death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban kingdom, I may here beſt ſhew the beginnings, which (though ſomewhat uncertain) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the laſt that reigned in Alba. For how not only the bordering people, but all nations between Euphrates and the ocean, were broken in pieces by the iron teeth of this fourth beaſt, it is not to be deſcribed in one place, having been the work of many ages; whereof I now do handle only the firſt, as incident unto the diſcourſe preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius Cato, Calphurnius Piſo, Sempronius, and others, ſeek to derive the Romans from Janus: but Herodotus, Marſylus, and many others of equal credit, give the Grecians for their anceſtors: and as [a] Strabo reporteth in his fifth book; Cæcilius rerum Romanarum ſcriptor eo argumento colligit, Romam a Græcis eſſe conditam, quod Romani, Græco ritu, antiquo inſtituto Herculi rem ſacram faciunt; matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (ſaith he) a Roman hiſtoriographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, becauſe the Romans, after Greekiſh faſhion, by ancient ordinance do ſacrifice to Hercules: the Romans alſo worſhip the mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembers many founders of that city: as Romanus the ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe; Romus the ſon of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from Troy, or that one Romas, a tyrant of the Latines, who drove the Tuſcans out of that country, built it. Solinus beſtows the honour of building Rome upon Evander, ſaying, That it was before-times called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive lady, brought thither by the Grecians: others ſay, that it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars: witneſs St. Auguſtine in his third book de Civitate Dei. But Livy will have it to be the work of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his conforts, Juvenal to a Roman citizen vaunting of their original, anſwered in theſe verſes:

Attamen ut longe repetas, longeque revolvas,
Majorum quiſquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
*Aut paſtor fuit, aut * illud quod dicere nolo.*

Yet tho' thou fetch thy pedigree ſo far;
Thy firſt progenitor, whoe'er he were,
Some ſhepherd was, or elſe, that I'll forbear.

* Meaning either a ſhepherd or a thief.

Now of Romulus's begetting, of his education and preſervation, it is ſaid, that he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars was ſuppoſed to be his father; that he was nurs'd by a wolf, found and taken away by Fauſtula, a ſhepherd's wife. The ſame unnatural nurſing had Cyrus; the ſame incredible foſtering had Semiramis; the one by a bitch, the other by birds. But, as Plutarch ſaith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it ſeemeth to me, that he might have two purpoſes; the one, to deſtroy her, becauſe ſhe was the daughter and heir of his elder brother, from whom he injuriouſly held the kingdom; the other to ſatisfy his appetite, becauſe ſhe was fair and goodly. For ſhe being made a nun of the goddeſs Veſta, it was death in her by the law to break her chaſtity. I alſo find in [b] Fauchet's Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merovée, king of the Francs, was begotten by a monſter of the ſea: but Fauchet ſays, Let them believe it that liſt: Il le croira qui voudra: alſo of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetical inventions: but to anſwer theſe imaginations in general, it is true, that in thoſe times, when the world was full of this barbarous idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were kings, or paſſions of the mind, or as there were of vices and virtues; then did many women, greatly born, cover ſuch ſlips as they made, by proteſting to be forced by more than human power: ſo did Oenone confeſs to Paris, that ſhe had been raviſhed by Apollo. And Anchiſes boaſted that he had known Venus. But Rhea was made with child by ſome man of war or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battle, according to the ſenſe of the time. Oenone was overcome by a ſtrong wit, and by ſuch a one as had thoſe properties aſcribed to Apollo. The mother of Merovée might fancy a ſea captain, to be gotten with young

by

by ſuch an one: as the daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Æneas was a baſtard, and begotten upon ſome fair harlot, called for her beauty Venus, and was therefore the child of luſt, which is Venus. Romulus was nurs'd by a wolf, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the curteſans in thoſe days were called wolfs, Quæ nunc (ſaith Halicarnaſſæus) honeſtiori vocabulo amicæ appellantur; which are now by an honeſter name called friends. It is alſo written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken up into heaven, or rather out of the world by his father Mars, in a great ſtorm of thunder and lightning: ſo was it ſaid that Æneas vaniſhed away by the river Numicus; but thereof Livy alſo ſpeaketh modeſtly; for he rehearſeth the other opinion, that the ſtorm was the fury of the ſenators, but ſeemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many authors agree that there was an unnatural darkneſs, both at his birth and at his death, and that he might be ſlain by thunder and lightning, it is not unlikely. For the emperor Anaſtaſius was ſlain with lightning; ſo was Strabo, the father of Pompey, ſlain with a thunderbolt: ſo Carus the emperor (who ſucceeded Probus) whilſt he lodged with his army upon the river Tigris, was there ſlain with lightning. But a Mars of the ſame kind might end him that begat him; for he was begotten by a man of war, and by violence deſtroyed. And that he died by violence (which deſtiny followed moſt of the Roman emperors) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the ſeventh king after him: who when he had murder'd his father-in-law, commanded that he ſhould not be buried, for (ſaid he) Romulus himſelf died, and was not buried. But let Halicarnaſſæus end this diſpute: whoſe words are theſe. They (ſaith he) who draw neareſt to the truth, ſay that he was ſlain by his own citizens; and that his cruelty in puniſhments of offenders, together with his arrogancy, were the cauſe of his ſlaughter. For it is reported that both when his mother was vaniſhed, whether by ſome man, or by a God, the whole body of the ſun was eclipſed, and all the earth covered with darkneſs like unto night, and that the ſame did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus; whoſe life, hiſtorified by Plutarch, doth contain (beſides what is here already ſpoken of him) the conqueſt of a few miles, which had ſoon been forgotten, if the Roman greatneſs built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very ſtrong of body, patient of travel, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the uſe of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which cauſed him to ſlay his brother, and neglect to revenge the death of Tatius his companion in the kingdom, that he himſelf might be lord alone in thoſe narrow territories. He reigned ſeven and thirty years, firſt alone, then with Tatius, and after his death ſingle, till he was ſlain, as is already ſhewed: after which time the ſoveraignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more prieſt-like than king-like: wherein Rome itſelf in her latter times hath ſomewhat reſembled this king. For having long been ſole governeſs, till Conſtantinople ſhared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek emperor was cruſhed by foreign enemies, and the Latines deſpoiled of imperial power, ſhe fell into the ſubjection of a prelate, ſwelling by degrees from the ſheep-hook to the ſword, and therewith victorious to exceſſive magnificence, from whence by the ſame degrees it fell, being driven from luxury to defenſive arms; and therein having been unfortunate, at length betakes herſelf again to the croſier's ſtaff.

And thus much of Rome in this place, by occaſion of the ſtory of the times of king Ahaz, during whoſe reign in Jewry, the foundations of this famous city were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Ezekia, and his contemporaries.

SECT. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolemies, Nabonaſſar, Nabopolaſſar, and Mardocempadus, with the hiſtory of the bible.

AS the firſt year of Ahaz's reign was confounded with the laſt of his father Jotham, ſo was the latter end of his ſixteen years taken up in the three firſt of Ezekias his ſon. This appears by the reign of Hoſea over Iſrael, which began in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz's fourteenth. But the third of Hoſea was the firſt of Ezekia; ſo it follows, that Ezekia began to reign in his father's fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hoſea, the ſame being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almoſt ſpent when Ezekia began, and ſo the fifteenth year of Ahaz may have been concurrent, for the moſt part, with the firſt of Ezekia.

By ſuppoſing that Hoſea began his kingdom, when the twelfth year of Ahaz was almoſt compleat, ſome would find the means how to disjoin the firſt of Hezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year Ahaz may perhaps have lived not many days. But ſeeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Ezekia may not be removed out of their places, it is vain labour to alter the firſt year.

[a] In the fourteenth of Ezekia, Sennacherib invading Juda, and the countries adjoining, loſt his army by a miraculous ſtroke from heaven, fled home, and was ſlain. The year following it was that God added fifteen years to the life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the ſame year was that miracle ſeen of the ſun's going back; of which wonder (as I hear) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for his skill in aſtronomy, hath by calculation found the very day, which anſwered unto the twenty-fifth of April, in the Julian year, being then Thurſday. I have not ſeen any works of Scultet, but ſurely to find a motion ſo irregular and miraculous, it is neceſſary that he produce ſome record of obſervation made at ſuch a time. Howſoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezekia is agreed upon; and therefore we may not alter the firſt. As for that ſaying, which is uſual in the like caſes, that [b] Ahaz ſlept with his fathers, and Ezekia his ſon reigned in his ſtead, it doth no more prove that Ezekia reigned not with his father, than the like ſaying doth infer the like at the death of Jehoſhaphat, and ſucceſſion of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the ſon to reign whilſt his father liv'd, we have already ſaid enough.

Of this godly king Ezekias, we find, that his very beginning teſtified his devotion and zeal.

[a] 2 Kings 19. 35. [b] 2 Chron. 28. 27.

For

For whether it were ſo that his unfortunate and ungracious father (who had out-worn his reputation) gave way to his ſon's proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather think) the firſt year and firſt month of his reign, wherein [a] Ezekias opened the doors of the temple, were to be underſtood as the beginning of his ſole government; we plainly find it to have been his firſt work, that he open'd the doors of the houſe of the Lord, which Achaz had ſhut up, cleanſed the city and kingdom of the idols, reſtored the [b] prieſts to their offices and eſtates, commanded the ſacrifices to be offered which had been for many years neglected, and broke down the braſen [c] ſerpent of Moſes, becauſe the people burnt incenſe before it, and he called it Nehuſhtan, which ſignifieth a lump of braſs. He did alſo celebrate the paſſover with great magnificence, inviting thereunto the Iſraelites of the ten tribes: many there were even out of thoſe tribes, that came up to Jeruſalem, to this feaſt. But the general multitude of Iſrael did laugh the meſſengers of Ezekiah to ſcorn.

It was not long ere they that ſcorned to ſolemnize the memorial of their deliverance out of the Egyptian ſervitude, fell into a new ſervitude, out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezekiah's reign, Salmanaſſar the ſon of Tiglath, the ſon of Belochus, hearing that Hoſea king of Iſrael had practiſed with Soe king of Egypt, againſt him: invaded Iſrael, beſieged Samaria, and in the 3d year (after the inhabitants had endured all ſorts of miſeries) forced it and carried thence the ten idolatrous tribes into Aſſyria and Media: among whom Tobias and his ſon of the ſame name, and Anna his wife, were ſent to Nineveh, in whoſe ſeats and places the Aſſyrians ſent ſtrangers of other nations, and among them many of the ancient enemies of the Iſraelites, as thoſe of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, beſides Babylonians: whoſe places and nations I have formerly deſcribed in the treatiſe of the Holy Land.

Theſe latter Aſſyrian kings, and the Perſians, which follow'd them, are the firſt, of whom we find mention made both in prophane and ſacred books. Theſe therefore ſerve moſt aptly to join the times of the old world (whereof none but the prophets have written otherwiſe than fabulouſly) with the ages following that were better known, and deſcribed in courſe of hiſtory. True it is, that of Cyrus and ſome other Perſians, we find in the Bible the ſame names by which other authors have recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanaſſar, with other Aſſyrian, Chaldean kings, diverſity of name hath bred queſtion of the perſons. Therefore, whereas the ſcriptures do ſpeak of Salmanaſſar, king of Aſſur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz, and Ezekiah, king of Judah, and Hoſea king of Iſrael, whom he carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolemy makes mention of Nabonaſſar, ſpeaking preciſely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to ſhew, that Salmanaſſar and Nabonaſſar were one and the ſame man. The like reaſon alſo requireth, that it be ſhewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was the ſame, whom Ptolemy calleth Nabopolaſſar.

Of both theſe points Bucholerus hath well collected ſufficient proof from the exact calculations of ſundry good mathematicians. For by them it appears that between Nabonaſſar and the birth of Chriſt, there paſſed 746 years: at which diſtance of time the reign of Salmanaſſar was. One great proof hereof is this, which the ſame Bucholerus alledgeth out of Eraſmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick tables. Mardocempadus king of Babylon (whom Ptolemy, ſpeaking of three eclipſes of the moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the ſame whom the ſcriptures call Merodach, who ſent embaſſadors to Hezekiah king of Juda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, between Merodach and Salmanaſſar, we ſhall find it the ſame which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonaſſar. Likewiſe Functius doth ſhew, that whereas from the deſtruction of Samaria, to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, in the nineenth of Nebuchadnezzar, we collect out of the ſcriptures, the diſtance of 133 years: the ſelf-ſame diſtance of time is found in Ptolemy, between Nabonaſſar and Nabopolaſſar. For, whereas Ptolemy ſeems to differ from this account, making Nabonaſſar more ancient by an hundred and forty years, than the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, we are to underſtand that he took Samaria in the eighth year of his reign; ſo that the ſeven foregoing years added to theſe one hundred thirty-three, make the accounts of the ſcripture fall even with that of Ptolemy. Ptolemy's computation is, that from the firſt of Nabonaſſar to the fifth of Nabopolaſſar, there paſſed one hundred twenty-ſeven years. Now if we add to theſe one hundred twenty-ſeven, the thirteen enſuing of Nebuchadnezzar's years, before the city and temple were deſtroy'd, we have the ſum of one hundred and forty years. In ſo plain a caſe more proofs are needleſs, tho' many are brought, of which this may ſerve for all, that Ptolemy placeth the firſt of Nabopolaſſar one hundred twenty-two years after the the firſt of Nabonaſſar, which agreeth exactly with the ſcriptures. To theſe notes are added the conſent of all mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more ſure than the authority of any hiſtory; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas hiſtorians and mathematical obſervations do ſo throughly concur.

Yet foraſmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth reſt unanſwer'd, whereby he proved Baladan the father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonaſſar, I will not ſpare to loſe a word or two in giving the reader ſatisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obſervations of the heavenly bodies, which Ptolemy recorded, after the time of Nabonaſſar, were in the reign of Mardocempadus; the ſecond year of whoſe reign, is, according to [d] Ptolemy concurrent in part with the twenty-ſeventh of Nabonaſſar. For the ſecond of three ancient eclipſes which he calculates, being in the ſecond year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonaſſar twenty-ſeven years, ſeventeen days, and eleven hours: the account from Nabonaſſar, beginning at high noon the firſt day of the Egyptian month Thot, then anſwering to the twenty-ſixth of February; and this eclipſe being fifty minutes before midnight, on the eighteenth day of that month, when the firſt day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; ſo that the difference of time between the two kings Nabonaſſar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolemy, according to the Egyptian years. But how does this prove, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the ſon of Nabonaſſar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next ſucceſſor, or any way of his lineage? It was enough to ſatisfy me, in this argument, that Scaliger himſelf did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the nephew, than the ſon of Baladan, or Nabonaſſar. For if he might be either the nephew, or the ſon, he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But becauſe our countryman Lidyate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calviſius, who hath drawn into form of chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, do hold up the ſame aſſertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonaſſar: I have taken the pains to ſearch, as far as my leiſure and diligence could reach, after any ſentence that might prove the kindred or ſucceſſion of theſe two. Yet I cannot find in the Almageſt (for the ſcriptures are either ſilent in this point, or adverſe to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this buſineſs) any ſentence more nearly proving the ſucceſſion of Merodach to Nabonaſſar, than the place now laſt rehearſed: which makes no more, to ſhew that the one of theſe was father to the other, than (that I may uſe a like example) the as near ſucceſſion of William the Conqueror declares him to have been ſon or grand-child to Edward the Confeſſor. This conſider'd, we may ſafely go on with our account from Nabonaſſar, taking him for Salmanaſſar; and not fearing, that the readers will be driven from our book, when they find ſomething in it, agreeing with Annius, foraſmuch as theſe kings mention'd in ſcripture, reign'd in Babylon, and Aſſyria, in thoſe very times which by Diodorus and Ptolemy are aſſigned to Beloſus, Nabonaſſar, and Mardocempadus, and the reſt: no good hiſtory naming any others, that reigned there in thoſe ages, and all aſtronomical obſervations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to theſe, or numbred from them.

SECT. II.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judea from Sennacherib.

WHEN Salmanaſſar was dead, and his ſon Sennacherib in poſſeſſion of the empire, in the fourteenth year of Ezechias, he demanded of him ſuch tribute as was agreed on at ſuch time as Tiglath, the grand-father of Sennacherib, and father of Salmanaſſar, invited by Ahaz, invaded Rezen king of Damaſcus, and delivered him from the dangerous war which Iſrael had undertaken againſt him. This tribute and acknowledgment when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, having (as it ſeems) a purpoſe to invade Egypt, ſent one part of his army to lie before Jeruſalem. Now tho' Ezechias (fearing this powerful prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchaſed his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of ſilver, and thirty talents of gold, wherewith he preſented Sennacherib, now ſet down before Lachis in Judea; yet under the colour of better aſſurance, and to force the [a] king of Judea to deliver hoſtages, the Aſſyrian environed Jeruſalem with a groſs army, and having his ſword in his hand, thought it the fitteſt time to write his own conditions.

Ezechias directed his three greateſt counſellors, to parly with Rabſaces, over the wall, and to receive his demands: who uſed three principal arguments to perſuade the people to yield themſelves to his maſter Sennacherib. For though the chancellor, ſteward, and ſecretary, ſent by Ezechias, deſired Rabſaces to ſpeak unto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Jewiſh, yet he with a more loud voice directed his ſpeech to the multitude in their own language. And for the firſt, he made them know, That if they continued obſtinate, and adhered to their king, that they would, in a ſhort time, be enforc'd to eat their own dung, and drink their own urine: Secondly, He altogether diſabled the king of Egypt, from whom the Judeans hoped for ſuccour, and compared him to a [b] broken ſtaff, on which whoſoever leaneth pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, That the Gods who ſhould help them, Hezekiah had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by ſome) the brazen ſerpent, which had been preſerved ever ſince Moſes's time: and withal he bade them remember the Gods of other nations: whom, notwithſtanding any power of theirs, his maſter had conquered and thrown down; and for God himſelf, in whom they truſted, he perſuaded them by no means to rely on him; for he would deceive them. But finding the people ſilent (for ſo the king had commanded them) after a while, when he had underſtood that the king of Arabia was marching on with a powerful army, he himſelf left the Aſſyrian forces in charge to others, and ſought Sennacherib at Lebnah in Judea, either to inform him of their reſolution in Jeruſalem, or to confer with him concerning the army of Terhaca the Arabian. Soon upon this, there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly adviſ'd, and partly threatned to ſubmit himſelf: uſing the ſame blaſphemous outrage againſt the all-powerful God, as before. But Ezechias, ſending thoſe counſellors to the prophet Iſaiah, which had lately been ſent to Rabſaces, received from him comfort, and aſſurance, that this heathen idolater ſhould not prevail; againſt whom the king alſo beſought aid from almighty God, repeating the moſt inſolent and blaſphemous parts of Sennacherib's letter, before the altar of God in the temple, confeſſing this part thereof to be true, [c] That the king of Aſhur had deſtroyed the nations and their lands, and had ſet fire on their gods, for they were no gods, but the work of mens hands, even wood and ſtone, &c.

The reaſon that moved Sennacherib to deſire to poſſeſs himſelf in haſte of Jeruſalem, was that he might thereinto have retreated his army, which was departed, as it ſeemeth, from the ſiege of Peluſium in Egypt, for fear of Terhaca: and tho' the ſcriptures are ſilent of that enterprize (which in theſe books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles, ſpeak but of the affairs of Jews in effect) yet the ancient Beroſus, and out of him Joſephus and St. Jerome, together with Herodotus remember it as followeth. [d] Herodotus calleth Sennacherib king of Arabia and Aſſyria: which he might juſtly do, becauſe Tiglath his grandfather held a great part thereof, which he wreſted from Pekah king of Iſrael: as Gilead over Jordan, and the reſt of Arabia Petræa adjoining: the ſame Herodotus alſo maketh Sethon king of Egypt, to be Vulcan's prieſt, and reporteth that the reaſon of Sennacherib's return from Peluſium in Egypt, which he alſo beſieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of rats had in one night eaten in ſunder the bow-ſtrings of his archers, and ſpoiled the reſt of their weapons in that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Terhaca, remembred by [e] Joſephus and Beroſus, was the more urgent. St. Jerome upon Iſaiah xxxvii. out of the ſame Beroſus, as alſo in part out of [f] Herodotus, whom Joſephus citeth ſomewhat otherwiſe than his words lie, reports Sennacherib's retreat in theſe words. Pugnâſſe autem Sennacherib regem Aſſyriorum contra Ægyptos, &

obſediſſe Peluſium, jamque extructis aggeribus, urbi capiendæ, veniſſe Taracham regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & una nocte juxta Jeruſalem centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Aſſyrii peſtilentia corruiſſe narrat Herodotus: & pleniſſime Beroſus Chaldaicæ ſcriptor hiſtoriæ, quorum fides de propriis libris petenda eſt; That Sennacherib king of the Aſſyrians fought againſt the Egyptians, and beſieged Peluſium, and that when his mounts were built for taking of the city, Tarbacas king of the Ethiopians came to help them, and that in one night near Jeruſalem one hundred and eighty-five thouſand of the Aſſyrian army periſhed by peſtilence. Of theſe things (ſaith Jerome) [a] Herodotus reports: and more at large Beroſus a writer of Chaldean ſtory, whoſe credit is to be taken from their own books. Out of Iſaiah it is gathered, that this deſtruction of the Aſſyrian army was in this manner. [b] Thou ſhalt be viſited of the Lord of hoſts with thunder and ſhaking, and a great noiſe, a whirlwind and a tempeſt, and a flame of devouring fire. But [c] Joſephus hath it more largely out of the ſame Beroſus, an authority (becauſe ſo well agreeing with the ſcriptures) not to be omitted, Sennacheribus autem ab Ægyptiaco bello revertens, oſtendit ibi exercitum, quem ſub Rabſacis Imperio reliquerat, peſte divinitus immiſſa deletum, prima nocte poſteaquam urbem oppugnare cœperat, abſumptis cum ducibus & tribunis, centum octoginta quinque millibus militum, qua clade territus, & de reliquis copiis ſollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum ſuum contendit, ad regiam quæ Ninus dicitur. Ubi paulo poſt per inſidias ſeniorum, e filiis ſuis, Adramelechi, & [d] Selennari, vitam amiſit: occiſus in ipſo templo quod dicitur Araſci; quem præcipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ob patricidium à popularibus pulſis & in Armeniam fugientibus, Aſaracoldas minor filius in regnum ſucceſſit; Sennacherib (ſaith Joſephus) returning from the Egyptian war, found there his army, which he had left under the command of Rabſaces, deſtroyed by a peſtilence ſent from God, the firſt night that he had begun to aſſault the town: one hundred fourſcore and five thouſand of the ſoldiers being conſumed with their captains and colonels. With which deſtruction being terrified, and withal afraid what might become of the reſt of his army, he made great marches into his kingdom, to his royal city, which is called Ninus, where ſhortly after by the treaſon of two of the eldeſt of his ſons, Adramelech, and Selennar or Sharezer, he loſt his life in the temple dedicated to Araſces, or Neſroch: whom he eſpecially worſhipped. Theſe his ſons being for their parricide chaſed away by the people: and flying into [e] Armenia, Aſaracoldas his younger ſon ſucceeded in the kingdom. Who in in the beginning of his reign ſent new troops out of Aſſyria and Samaria, to fortify the colony therein planted by his grandfather Salmanaſſar. What this Neſroch was, it is uncertain: Jerome in his Hebrew traditions hath ſomewhat of him, but nothing poſitively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worſhipped by the Aſſyrians; and ſo was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Euſebius, and Cyrillus witneſs. Many fancies there are, what cauſe his ſons had to murder him; but the moſt likely is, that he had formerly diſinherited thoſe two, and conferred the empire on Aſſarhaddon. Tobit tells us, That it was fifty-five days after Sennacherib's return, ere he was murdered by his ſons; during which time he ſlew great numbers of the Iſraelites in Nineveh, till the moſt juſt God turned the ſword againſt his own breaſt.

SECT. III.

Of Ezechias's ſickneſs and recovery; and of the Babylonian king that congratulated him.

AFTER this marvellous delivery, Ezechias ſickned, and was told by Iſaiah, that he muſt die: but after that he had beſought God with tears for his delivery, Iſaiah, as he was going from him, returned again, and had warrant from the ſpirit of God to promiſe him recovery after three days, and a prolongation of his life for fifteen years. But Ezechias, ſomewhat doubtful of this exceeding grace, prayeth a [f] ſign to confirm him: whereupon, at the prayer of Iſaiah, the ſhadow of the ſun caſt itſelf the contrary way, and went back ten degrees upon the dial of Achaz. The cauſe that moved Ezechias to lament (ſaith St. Jerome) was, becauſe he had as yet no ſon, and then in deſpair that the Meſſias ſhould come out of the houſe of David, or at leaſt of his ſeed. His diſeaſe ſeemeth to be the peſtilence, by the medicine given him by the prophet, to wit, a maſs of figs, laid to the botch or ſore.

This wonder when the wiſe men of Chaldæa had told to Merodach, king of Babylon, the firſt of that houſe, he ſent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cauſe: at which time Ezechias ſhewed him all the treaſure he had, both in the court and in the kingdom: for which he was reprehended by the prophet Iſaiah, who told him; [g] The days are at hand, that all that is in thine houſe, and whatſoever thy fathers have laid up in ſtore to this day, ſhall be carried into Babel; nothing ſhall be left, ſaith the Lord. It may ſeem ſtrange, how Ezekia ſhould have got any treaſure worth the ſhewing: for Sennacherib had robbed him of all the year before. But the ſpoil of the ſame Sennacherib's camp repaid all with advantage, and made Ezekia richer upon the ſudden than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was a ſtrong temptation to boaſting. After this time Ezekia had reſt, and ſpending without noiſe that addition which God had made unto his life, he died, having reigned nine and twenty years. One only offenſive war he made, which was againſt the Philiſtines with good ſucceſs. Among his other acts (ſhortly remembred in Eccleſiaſticus xlviii.) he deviſed to bring water to Jeruſalem.

In two reſpects they ſay that he offended God: the one, that he rejoiced too much at the deſtruction and lamentable end of his enemy; the other, that he ſo much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to ſhew them to ſtrangers. But the reaſon which moved Ezekias (ſpeaking humanly) to entertain the ambaſſadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was becauſe he came to viſit him, and brought him a preſent, congratulating the recovery of his health; as alſo in that Merodach had weakened the houſe of Sennacherib his fearful enemy. For Merodach, who was commander and lieutenant under Sennacherib in Babylon, uſurp'd that ſtate himſelf, in the laſt year of that king, and held it by ſtrong hand againſt his ſon Aſſarhaddon; who was not only ſimple, but impaired in ſtrength, by the moleſtation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach eſpied, and remembring, that their anceſtor Phul Belochus had ſet his own maſter Sardanapalus beſide the cuſhion, thought it as lawful for himſelf to take the opportunity which this king's weakneſs did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make uſe of the other's wickedneſs: and ſo, finding himſelf beloved of the Babylonians, and ſufficiently powerful, he did put the matter to hazard, and prevailed. The aſſertion of this hiſtory is made by the ſame arguments that were uſed in maintaining the common opinion of writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearſe. So of this new race, which cut aſunder the line of Ninus, there were only five kings.

But foraſmuch as the laſt year of Salmanaſſar was alſo the firſt of Sennacherib his ſon, we reckon the time, wherein the houſe of Phul held the Aſſyrian kingdom, to have been an hundred and one years; of which, the laſt five and twenty were ſpent with Ezekia, under Salmanaſſar, Sennacherib, and Aſſarhaddon.

SECT. IV.

The kings that were in Media during the reign of Ezekia: Of the difference found between ſundry authors, in rehearſing the Median kings. Other contemporaries of Ezekia: Of Candaules, Gyges, and the kings deſcended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were ſo, that variety of names, by which theſe kings were called in ſeveral hiſtories, hath cauſed them to ſeem more than indeed they were; or whether the ſons reigning with the fathers, have cauſed not only the names of kings, but the length of time, wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion; or whether the copies themſelves, of Cteſias and Annius's Metaſthenes, have been faulty, as neither of theſe two authors is over-highly commended of truſtineſs; ſo it is, that the names, number, and length of reign, are all very diverſly reported of theſe Median kings, that follow Arbaces: Therefore it need not ſeem ſtrange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile ſo great a difference, as is found in thoſe writers that vary from Euſebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here ſet down the roll of kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as ſundry authors have delivered it.

Annius's Metaſthenes orders them and their reigns thus.

Diodorus Siculus following Cteſias (as perhaps Annius made his Metaſthenes follow Diodore, with ſome little variation, that he might not ſeem a borrower) placeth them thus.

Aſtyabara, Aſtyages.	The continuance of theſe two he doth not mention.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence to reconcile theſe catalogues, and to make them alſo agree with Euſebius. But foraſmuch as it ſeems to me an impoſſible matter, to attain unto the truth of theſe forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Cteſias and Metaſthenes, I will lay the burden upon Euſebius, who lived in an age better furniſhed than ours, with books of this argument. Let it therefore ſuffice, that theſe two kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Euſebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus's Arbianes, I will not ſtay to ſearch. The kings of Media, according to Euſebius, reigned in this order.

Theſe names, and this courſe of ſucceſſion I retain; but add unto theſe Cyaxares, the ſon of Aſtyages, according to Xenophon; and ſometimes follow Herodotus, in ſetting down the length of a king's reign, otherwiſe than Euſebius hath it: of which variations I will render my reaſons in due place.

The twenty-nine years of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four firſt that were choſen governours of Athens for ten years; that is, of Charops, Æſimedes, Elidicus, and Hippomes. Touching the firſt of theſe I hear nothing, ſave that Rome was built in his firſt year; of which perhaps himſelf did not hear. Of the ſecond and third I find only the names. The fourth made himſelf known by a ſtrange example of juſtice, or rather of cruelty, that he ſhewed upon his own daughter. For he finding that ſhe had offended in unchaſtity, cauſed her to be lock'd up with an horſe, giving to neither of them any food; ſo that the horſe conſtrained by hunger, devoured the unhappy woman.

In Rome, the firſt king, and founder of that city, Romulus, did reign both before and ſomewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules, the laſt king, ruled in the ſame age.

This region was firſt called Mæonia. Lydus the ſon of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe ſuch authority as we find. This kingdom was afterwards, by the appointment of an oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Alcæus, the ſon of Hercules, by Jardana, a bond-woman. The race of theſe Heraclidæ continued reigning fifty-five years (in which two and twenty generations paſſed) the ſon continually ſucceeding the father. Candaules, the ſon of Myrſus, was the laſt of his race, who doated ſo much upon the beauty of his own wife, that he could not be content to enjoy enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the ſon of Daſcylus, to behold her naked body; and placed the unwilling man ſecretly in her chamber, where he might ſee her preparing to bedward. This was not ſo cloſely carried, but that the queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and underſtanding the matter, took it in ſuch high diſdain, that ſhe forced him the next day to requite the king's folly with treaſon. So Gyges, being brought again into the ſame chamber by the queen, ſlew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his wife, but with the kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty-eight years, beginning in the laſt of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his ſon Ardys reigned nine and forty years; then Sadyattes, twelve; Halyattes, fifty-ſeven; and finally Crœſus, the ſon of Halyattes, fourteen years; who loſt the kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Perſia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian kings, whom Crœſus, his progenitor, diſpoſſeſs'd, are deduced from Hercules, ſo of the ſame Hercules there ſprang many other kings, which governed ſeveral countries very long; as in Aſia, the Myſians; in Greece, the Lacedemonians, Meſſenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians; as likewiſe from the Corinthians, the Syracuſans: beſides many great and famous, tho' private families.

But of the Heraclidæ, that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubed myſelf to take notice in the time of their ſeveral reigns; for little is found of them beſides the bare names, and the folly of this laſt king Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Iſrael from thence, and the reign of Ezekia in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a league againſt the Aſſyrians.

SECT. I.

That many names of Egyptian kings, found in hiſtory, are like to have belonged only to viceroys. An example proving this out of William of Tyre's Hiſtory of the Holy War.

THE emulation and quarrels ariſing in theſe times, between the mighty kingdoms of Egypt and Aſſyria, do require our pains, in collecting the moſt memorable things in Egypt, and ſetting down briefly the ſtate of that country, which had continued long a flouriſhing region, and was of great power, when it contended with Aſſyria for the maſtery. Of Cham, the ſon of Noah, who firſt planted that country, and of Oſiris, Orus, and other ancient kings that reigned there until the Iſraelites were thence delivered, more hath been ſaid already than I can ſtand to; though I hold it no ſhame to fail in ſuch conjectures. That which I have delivered, in ſpeaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynaſties, muſt here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, that the great number of kings, which are ſaid to have reigned in Egypt, were none other than viceroys or ſtewards, ſuch as Joſeph was, and ſuch as were the ſoldans in latter ages. Therefore, I will not only forbear to ſeek after thoſe, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian prieſts, delivering them by number, without rehearſing their names; but will ſave the labour of marſhalling them in order, whoſe names only are found; the years of their reigns, and other circumſtances, proving them to have been kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not ſeem before-hand to lay an imaginary ground, whereupon after I may build what I liſt; it were not amiſs, to give unto the reader ſuch ſatisfaction in this point, as apparent reaſon and truth of hiſtory doth afford. Firſt therefore, we ought not to believe thoſe numbers of generations, which the lying prieſts have reckoned up, to magnify their antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham, our Saviour Chriſt was removed only forty-two deſcents, which makes it evident, that in far ſhorter time, namely before the Perſian empire, there could not have paſſed away twice as many ſucceſſions in Egypt; eſpecially conſidering, that many of theſe, whoſe continuance is expreſſed, have reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we ſhould ſquare the number of the Egyptian kings, in ſome even proportion, to thoſe which did bear rule in other countries. As for the reſt, whoſe names we find ſcattered here and there, any man that will take the pains to read the nineteenth book of the holy war, written by William archbiſhop of Tyre, may eaſily perſuade himſelf, that it is not hard to find names enough of ſuch as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than regents or viceroys. Yet will I here inſert, as briefly as I can, ſome things making to that purpoſe, for the pleaſure and information of ſuch as will not trouble themſelves with turning over many authors.

When Elhadech the caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerful and a ſubtil man, made himſelf ſoldan, by force and cunning chaſing away Sanar, an Arabian, who was ſoldan before and after him. This Dargan miniſter'd matter of quarrel to Almaricke king of Jeruſalem; and ſuſtained, with little loſs, an invaſion which Almaricke made upon Egypt. Hereupon he grew ſo inſolent and proud, that Sanar the former ſoldan hoped to make his party good againſt him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Sanar ſueth to Noradine, king of Damaſco, for aid, who ſends an army of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, againſt the ſoldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victory was Dargan's, but he enjoyed it not: for in few days after he was ſlain by treaſon, whereby Sanar did recover his dignity: which to eſtabliſh, he ſlew all the kindred and friends of Dargan, that he could find in the great city of Cairo.

To all theſe doings, the caliph Elhadech gave little regard; for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the adminiſtration of the kingdom, whilſt he might have the profit of it, and enjoy his pleaſure. But new troubles preſently ariſe, which (one would think) do nearly touch the caliph himſelf. Syracon with his Turks, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They ſeize upon the town of Belbeis, which they fortify, and there attend the arrival of more company from Damaſco, for the conqueſt of all Egypt. The ſoldan perceives their intent, and finds himſelf not ſtrong enough to expell them, much leſs to repell the Turkiſh army, that was likely to ſecond them. He therefore ſends meſſengers to king Almaricke, of Jeruſalem, whom with large promiſes he gets to bring him aid, and ſo drives out the Turks. Of all this trouble the great caliph hears nothing, or not ſo much as ſhould make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater miſchief ariſeth, concerning the caliph Elhadeth particularly, in his own title. Syracon, captain of the Turks, that had been in Egypt, goes to the caliph of Baldach (who was oppoſite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heir to Mahomet, that falſe prophet, the ſoveraignty over all that were of the Saracen law) and tells him the weakneſs of the Egyptian, with his own ability of doing ſervice in thoſe parts, offering his beſt means for the extirpation of the ſchiſmatical caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the weſtern parts under the ſubjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the eaſtern provinces are up in arms; and Syracon, with a mighty power, deſcendeth into Egypt. The noiſe of this great expedition ſo affrighteth king Almaricke, that with all his forces he haſteth into Egypt; well knowing how nearly it concerned him and his kingdom of Jeruſalem, to keep the Saracens from joining all under one head. Sanar the ſoldan, perceiving the faithful care of the Chriſtians his friends, welcomes them, and beſtirs himſelf in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drove the enemies out of the country. But this victory was not ſo ſoon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which moſt concerns our preſent purpoſe) that of ſo deſperate a danger, the caliph as yet ſeems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been king in title only, who meddled ſo little in the government? The ſoldan, finding that the Chriſtians (without whoſe help all was loſt) could not well ſtay, ſo long as his neceſſities required, makes large offers to king Almaricke, upon condition that he ſhould abide by it. He promiſeth a great tribute (William of Tyre calls it a tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a penſion) which the kings of Jeruſalem ſhould receive out of Egypt, for this behoveful aſſiſtance. But the Chriſtians underſtanding that the ſoldan (how much ſoever he took upon him) was ſubject to an higher lord, would make no bargain of ſuch importance with any other than the caliph himſelf. Hereupon Hugh, earl of Cæſarea, and a knight of the Templars, are ſent unto Elhadech, to ratify the Covenants. Now ſhall we ſee the greatneſs of the caliph and his eſtate.

Theſe embaſſadors were conveyed by the ſoldan to Cairo; where arriving at the palace, they found it guarded by great troops of ſoldiers. The firſt entrance was through dark porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, which, with all diligence, did reverence unto the ſoldan, as he paſſed along. Through theſe ſtreights the warders led them, into goodly open courts, of ſuch beauty and riches, that they could not retain the gravity of embaſſadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they ſaw goodly marble pillars, gilded beams, all wrought over with emboſſed works, curious pavements, fiſh-ponds of marble with clear waters, and many ſorts of ſtrange birds, unknown in thoſe parts of the world, as coming perhaps from the Eaſt-Indies, which then were undiſcovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the caliph's eunuchs conveyed them into other courts within theſe, as far excelling the former, as the former did ſurpaſs ordinary houſes. It were tedious perhaps to rehearſe how, the further they enter'd, the more high ſtate they found, and cauſe of marvel; ſuffice it, that the good archbiſhop, who wrote theſe things, was never held a vain author. Finally, they were brought into the caliph's own lodgings, which were yet more ſtately, and better guarded, where entring the preſence, the ſoldan, having twice proſtrated himſelf, did the third time caſt off his ſword that he wore about his neck, and throw himſelf on the ground, before the curtain, behind which the caliph ſat. Preſently the traverſe, wrought with gold and pearls, was open'd, and the caliph himſelf diſcover'd ſitting with great majeſty on a throne of gold, having few of his moſt inward ſervants and eunuchs about him. When the ſoldan had humbly kiſs'd his maſter's feet, he briefly told the cauſe of his coming, the danger wherein the land ſtood, and the offers that he had made unto king Almaricke, deſiring the caliph himſelf to ratify them, in preſence of the embaſſadors. The caliph anſwered, that he would throughly perform all which was promiſed. But this contented not the embaſſadors: they would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians, that ſtood by, thought an impudent requeſt. Yet his greatneſs condeſcended at length, after much deliberation, at the earneſt requeſt of the ſoldan, to reach out his hand. When the earl of Cæſarea ſaw that the caliph gave his hand, neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, truth ſeeks no holes to hide it ſelf; princes, that will hold covenant, muſt deal openly, nakedly, and ſincerely; give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we ſhall truſt you, for we will make no bargain with your glove. Much ado there was about this: for it ſeem'd againſt the majeſty of ſuch a prince to yield ſo far. But, when it would none otherwiſe be, with a ſmiling chear (tho' to the great grief of his ſervants) he vouchſafed to let the earl take him by the bare hand; and ſo rehearſing the covenants, word by word, as the earl ſpoke them, he ratified all; diſmiſſing finally the embaſſadors, with ſuch rewards as teſtify'd his greatneſs.

In this caliph and his ſoldan, we may diſcern the image of the ancient Pharaoh and his viceroy: we ſee a prince of great eſtate, ſitting in his palace, and not vexing himſelf with the great preparations made againſt him, which terrify his neighbour countries: we ſee his viceroy, in the mean ſeaſon, uſing all royal power; making war and peace, entertaining and repelling armies of ſtrangers; yea, making the land of Egypt tributary to a foreign prince. What greater authority was given to Joſeph, when Pharaoh ſaid unto him, Thou ſhalt be over mine houſe, and at thy word ſhall all my people be armed, only in the kings throne will I be above thee; behold, I have ſet thee over all the land of Egypt?

I do not commend this form of government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians, ever ſince Joſeph's time, have felt the burthen of that ſervitude, which he brought upon them, when he bought them, and their lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgment good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian kings, in taking their eaſe, and ruling by a viceroy, to be part of the ancient cuſtoms, practiſed by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolemies (excepting Ptolemæus Lagi, and his ſon Philadelphus, founder and eſtabliſher of that race) were given, all of them, wholly to pleaſe their own appetites, leaving the charge of the kingdom to women, eunuchs, and other miniſters of their deſires. The pleaſures, which that country afforded, were indeed ſufficient to invite the kings thereof unto a voluptuous life; and the awful regard wherein the Egyptians held their princes, gave them ſecurity, whereby they might the better truſt their officers with ſo ample commiſſion. But of this matter I will not ſtand longer to diſpute. It is enough to have ſhew'd, that the great and almoſt abſolute power of the viceroy's governing Egypt, is ſet down by Moſes, and that a lively example of the ſame is found in William of Tyre; who liv'd in the ſame age; was, in few years after, chancellor of the kingdom of Jeruſalem; and had full diſcourſe with Hugh earl of Cæſarea, touching all theſe matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honour'd with that ſtyle; but reſt contented with a catalogue of ſuch, as we find by circumſtance likely to have reigned in that country; after whom it follows that we ſhould make enquiry.

SECT. II.

Of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Oſymandyas. Of Oſymandyas and his tomb.

IN this buſineſs I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Euſebius from both of them; and late writers, that have ſought to gather the truth out of theſe and others, find no one with whom they can agree. In this caſe Annius would do good ſervice, if a man could truſt him. But it is enough to be beholden to him, when others do either ſay nothing, or that which may juſtly be ſuſpected. I will therefore hold my ſelf contented, with the pleaſure that he hath done me, in ſaying ſomewhat of Oſiris, Iſis, Orus, and thoſe antiquaries remov'd ſo far out of ſight: as for the kings following the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, it ſhall ſuffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Euſebius, have not been ſilent, and that Reineccius hath taken pains to range into ſome good order the names that are extant in theſe, or elſe found ſcattering in others.

From the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, unto the reign of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the ſame that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no diſagreement about the Egyptian kings. Wherefore I ſet down the ſame which are found in Euſebius, and give to every one the ſame length of reign.

Acherres was the firſt of theſe, who ſucceeded unto Chenchres, that periſhed in the Red ſea. This king ſeems to Reineccius to be the ſame whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great king, named Oſymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is ſaid to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Oſymandyas; or elſe that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the diſtance between them was more than eight generations. Mercator judgeth Oſymandyas to have been the husband of Ancheres, Orus the ſecond his daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Joſephus) doth omit his name, and inſert his wife's, into the catalogue of kings, becauſe he was king in his wife's right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to ſignify in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word elſe doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging alſo to Uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the reſt had. I will not vex my brains in the unprofitable ſearch of this and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Oſymandyas, was wrought upon his monument; the moſt thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulouſly expound. For whereas there was pourtray'd a great army, with the ſiege of a town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the conqueror; all this, the Egyptians ſaid to denote the conqueſt of Bactria made by that king: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of work, which Diodore ſo particularly deſcribes, to have been erected for a common place of burial, to the ancient kings and queens of Egypt, and to their vice-roys; whilſt yet they were not ſo ambitious, as every one to have his own particular monument, ſtriving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many ſtatues therein placed, by the wars, the judgment-ſeat, the receiving of tribute, the offering ſacrifice to God, the account of revenues, and plenty of all cattel and food; all which were there curiouſly wrought, ſhewing the ſeveral offices of a governour. On the tomb of Oſymandyas was this inſcription: I am Oſymandyas king of kings; if any deſire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed ſome of my works. Let them, that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But ſince by thoſe words, Or where I lie, it ſhould ſeem that he lay not there interred; we may lawfully ſuſpect that it was Joſeph whoſe body was preſerved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty monument might king Orus, who out-liv'd him, erect in honour of his high deſerts, among the royal ſepulchres. To which purpoſe, the plenty of cattel, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Oſymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; ſeeing Joſeph had one new name given to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, upon further occaſions, have another, to his encreaſe of honour. As for that ſtyle, King of kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkiſh Baſſaes are called, that is, Great above the great.

Now altho' it be ſo, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Joſeph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whoſe viceroy Joſeph was) yet will I hereby ſeek, neither to fortify mine own conjecture, as touching Joſeph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres's being Uchoreus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by ſome ſuch king, as was Gehoar, lieutenant unto the [a] caliph Elcain, who having to his maſter's uſe conquer'd Egypt, and many other countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great city of Cairo (corruptly ſo pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious miſtreſs, tho' he himſelf were a Dalmatian ſlave.

SECT. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameſſes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the lake that bears his name.

WHEN Acherres had reign'd 8 years, Cherres ſucceeded, and held the kingdom 15 years: then reigned Armeus 5 years, and after him Rameſſes 68. Of Armeus and Rameſſes is that hiſtory underſtood by Euſebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danaus and Ægyptus. For it is ſaid that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtain'd the kingdom of Argos: that he had 50 daughters, whom, upon ſeeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brother's 50 ſons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the firſt night; that only Hypermneſtra, one of his daughters, did ſave her husband Lynceus, and ſuffer'd him to eſcape; finally, that for this fact, all the bloody ſiſters, when they died, were enjoin'd this fooliſh puniſhment in hell, to fill a leaking veſſel with water.

The reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus, and Ramaſſes Ægyptus, is more than Reineccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who cauſed the great lake to be made which bears his name. For my own part, as I can eaſily believe, that he, which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of ſuch quality as the ſoldan Sanar, of whom we ſpoke before; ſo do I not find how in ſo ſhort a reign, as 5 years, a work of that labour could be finiſh'd, which was required unto the lake of Myris, and the monuments therein; whereof his own ſepulchre and his wife's being ſome part, it is manifeſt that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other kings, whoſe age is uncertain, and of whoſe reigns we have no aſſurance, I may truly ſay, that their great works are not enough to prove them of the houſe of Pharaoh, ſeeing that greater deeds, or more abſolute, than were thoſe of Joſeph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Gehoar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the country tributary; were performed by none of them.

It ſhall therefore be enough to ſet down the length of their reigns, whom we find to have followed one another in order of ſucceſſion: but in rehearſing the great acts which were perform'd, I will not ſtand to examine, whether they that did them were kings or no.

The lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thouſand ſix hundred furlongs in compaſs, and fifty fathoms deep. It ſerved to receive the waters of Nilus, when the overflow being too great, was harmful to the country; and to ſupply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the river did not riſe high enough. In opening the ſluices of this lake, for the letting in or out of waters; were ſpent fifty talents; but the lake it ſelf defray'd that coſt; ſeeing the tribute impoſed upon fiſh taken therein, was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his wife to buy ſweet ointments, and other ornaments for her body. In the midſt of it was left an iſland, wherein were the ſepulchres of Myris and his wife, and over each of them a pyramid, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fifty paces high; having on the tops their ſtatues, ſitting in thrones. I find not the deſcription of this lake in maps, anſwerable to the report of hiſtorians: yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inſerting one Armeſis (whom Euſebius omits) that ſhould have reign'd one year and odd months of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Rameſſes, his ſon Amenophis held the kingdom 40 years. Some give him only 19 years; and Mercator thinks him to have been the king that was drowned in the Red ſea: whereof I have already ſpoken in the firſt book.

SECT. IV.

Of the kings that reigned in the Dynaſty of the Larthes.

Ethoſis, or Zethus, reigned after his father Amenophis, fifty-five years. To him are aſcribed the famous acts of that ancient Seſoſtris. But the ſtate of the world was not ſuch in theſe times, that ſo great an expedition, as the old Seſoſtris made, could have been either eaſily performed, or forgotten in the countries through which he paſſed, had it now been performed, as any man will perceive if he look upon my chronological table, and conſider who liv'd with this Zethus. With this king began the Dynaſty of the Larthes; which Reineccius conjectures to have had the ſame ſignification, wherein the old kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes (the Hetrurians being iſſued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have ſignified as much as Imperator or General. The wars in which theſe kings were generals, I take to have been againſt the Ethiopians: for ſure I am, that they troubled not the country of Paleſtina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the deſart ſands, on the other hand, to ſeek matter of conqueſt, in the poor countries of Africa. But theſe generals (if the Larthes were ſuch) were not many. Five only had that title; and the laſt of theſe took it, perhaps, as hereditary from the firſt; in ſuch ſort as the Roman emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the moſt unſuitable conditions of Heliogabalus made his ſucceſſors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynaſties (as appears by this particular) took name from the kings; that the kings alſo did adminiſter the government themſelves; and that therefore I am deceived in aſcribing ſo much unto the viceroys. But it is to be conſidered, that what is ſaid of theſe Larthes, depends only upon conjecture, and that the authority of the regents, or viceroys, might be great enough, though ſome few kings took the conduct of armies into their own hands. For ſo we find in John Leo, l. 8. that the ſoldan of Egypt (after ſuch time as the ſoldan Saladine, murdering the caliph, got the ſoveraignty to himſelf) had under him a viceroy, ſtyled Eddaguadare, who had authority to place, or diſplace any magiſtrates, or officers; and that this man's family was almoſt as great as the ſoldan's own. Yet was there alſo the Amir Cabir, or lord-general of the ſoldan's forces, who had the charge of defending the land, and might, as he thought good, ſpend of the ſoldan's treaſure. So might the office of the viceroys continue, tho' the kings themſelves, taking the charge, or title of generals, upon them, did ſomewhat abridge the greatneſs of that ſecond place. As for the names of the Dynaſties, it ſkills not whence they were drawn; whether from their country, as thoſe of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from ſome eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many think, that the ſeventeenth Dynaſty was called of the ſhepherds, becauſe Joſeph governed in part thereof; or from the kings themſelves that reigned; as this was ſaid to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius's Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without kings, foraſmuch as Vaphres and Seſac reign'd therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the buſineſs we left.

Ramſes

Ramſes was king after Zethus, or Sethoſis, threeſcore and ſix years. He is miſtaken for that ſecond Seſoſtris, of whom I have ſpoken in the firſt books. I find nothing worth rehearſal of this Ramſes, or Amenophis, and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the latter ſix and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by theſe as hereditary.

Thuoris, the laſt of the Larthes, reigned only ſeven years; yet is he thought to have been that Proteus of whom Herodotus hath mention, ſaying, that he took Helena from Paris, and after the ſack of Troy, reſtored her to Menelaus. I need ſay no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuoris's reign, laſted not ſo long as from the rape of Helen to her reſtitution.

This Proteus or Getes (as he is named by ſome) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greek writers in this buſineſs, or in other ſuch matters, may ſeem to be under-officers: for ſuch only are like to have had their reſidency about Pharos, and the ſea-coaſt, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is ſaid, that he could fortel things to come, and that he could change himſelf into all ſhapes: whereby is ſignified his crafty head, for which he is grown into a proverb. The poets feigned him a ſea-god, and keeper of Neptune's ſeal-fiſhes, for belike he was ſome under-officer to the admiral, having charge of the fiſhing about the iſle of Pharos, as was ſaid before.

Remphes, the ſon of Proteus, is reckoned the next king by Diodore, as alſo by Herodotus, who calls him Ramſinitus, and tells a long tale, fit to pleaſe children, of his covetouſneſs, and how his treaſure-houſe was robb'd by a cunning thief, that at laſt married his daughter. But of this a man may believe what he liſt. How long this king reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his father did reign at all.

SECT. V.

Of Egyptian kings whoſe names are found ſcattering in ſundry authors, their times being not recorded. The kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Seſac.

MANY other names of Egyptian kings are found ſcattered here and there; as Tonepherſobis, of whom Suidas delivers only the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the ſame that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Evenes, noted by occaſion of a great phyſician that lived under him; Banchyris, recorded by the ſame Suidas, for his great juſtice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his empire extended to the ocean ſea; that he gave name to the iſle of Thule, which ſome take to be Iſeland; and that he conſulted with the devil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, deſiring to know, who before him had been, or after him ſhould be ſo mighty as himſelf. The anſwer or confeſſion of the devil was remarkable; which I find engliſhed in the tranſlation of Pleſſis's work, Of the trueneſs of Chriſtian religion. The Greek verſes are ſomewhat otherwiſe, and much more imperfect in thoſe copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the ſenſe is all one; which is this:

Firſt God, and next The Word, and then The Sprit,
Which three be One, and join in One all three:
Whoſe force is endleſs. Get thee hence frail wight,
The man of life unknown excelleth thee.

I ſhould have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found ſomewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the form of invocation which Thulis uſed, and that clauſe, of his giving name to the iſland: tho' in this laſt point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as alſo Cedrenus is, or, at leaſt, ſeems to me, in giving to this king ſuch profound antiquity of reign. Indeed the very name of that book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Geneſis, is alone enough to breed ſuſpicion of ſome impoſture: but the frierly ſtuff that he alledgeth out of it, is ſuch as would ſerve to diſcredit himſelf, were it not otherwiſe apparent, that he was a man both devout, and of good judgment, in matters that fell within his compaſs. I will here ſet down the liſt of old Egyptian kings delivered by him, and leave the cenſure to others.

The firſt king of Egypt that he ſets down is Mizraim, the ſon of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedigree thus: Nimrod, the ſon of Chus, was alſo called Orion; and further, took upon him the name of the planet Saturn, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own lineage, and by her three ſons; Picus, ſurnamed Jupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chaſing his father out of Aſſyria into Italy, reigned in his ſtead thirty years, and then gave up that kingdom to Juno, his ſiſter and wife, and to Belus his ſon: after which Belus, who reigned only two years, Ninus had the kingdom, and married his own mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italy, to viſit his old father Saturn; Saturn forthwith reſigned the kingdom to him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italy threeſcore and two years, had threeſcore and ten wives or concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lies buried in the iſle of Crete. The principal of Jupiter's ſons were Faunus, Perſeus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the planet Mercury: he reigned in Italy after his father five and thirty years: and then (finding that all his brethren conſpired againſt him) he went into Egypt with abundance of treaſure; where, after the death of Mizraim, he got the kingdom, and held it nine and thirty years. After Mercury, Vulcan reigned in Egypt four years and a half. Then Sol the ſon of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half. There followed in order Soſis, Oſiris, Orus and Thules of whom we ſpake before: the length of their ſeveral reigns is not ſet down. After Thules was the great Seſoſtris king twenty years. His ſucceſſor was Pharaoh, called Narecho, that held the crown fifty years, with which there paſſed from him the ſurname of Pharaoh, to a very long poſterity.

Theſe reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to ſet down as I find them: let their credit reſt upon the author.

Others yet we find, that are ſaid to have reigned in Egypt, without any certain note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curioſity, in the ſearch made after theſe already rehearſed, than of negligence, in omitting ſuch as might have been added.

Vaphres, the father-in-law to Solomon; and Seſac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, lead us again into fair way, but not far. The name of Vaphres is not found in the ſcriptures; but we are beholden to [a] Clemens

Alexandrinus and Euſebius for it. Theſe give us not the length of his reign, but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Solomon. He came into Paleſtina with an army, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, [a] Solomon's wife: tho' for her ſake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Seſac his ſon did favour the enemies of Solomon, who kept ſo many wives and concubines, beſides this Egyptian princeſs. In the life of Reboboam all hath been written that I find of Seſac, excepting the length of his reign, which muſt have been ſix and twenty years, if he were that Smendis with whom Euſebius begins the one and twentieth Dynaſty.

Now foraſmuch as it would ſerve to no great purpoſe, that we knew the length of Seſac's reign, and of theirs that followed him, unleſs therewithal we knew the beginning of Seſac, upon which the reſt have dependance, this courſe I take. From the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Juda, in which Pharaoh Neco was ſlain, I reckon upwards the years of the ſame Neco, and of his predeceſſors, unto the beginning of Seſac: by which account the firſt year of Seſac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Solomon's reign, and the twenty-ſixth of Seſac with the fifth of Reboboam: wherein Seſac ſpoiled the temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his ſacrilege no longer, than Joas the Iſraelite and Craſſus the Roman did; who, after him, ſpoiled the temple of Jeruſalem.

To fill up the time between Seſac and Necho, I have rather taken thoſe kings that I find in the Greek hiſtorians, than them which are in Euſebius's catalogue. For of theſe that are delivered by Euſebius, we find no name nor act recorded elſewhere, ſave only of Bocchoris, who is remember'd by Diodore, Plutarch, and others; much being ſpoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a king. Hereunto I may add, that the ſucceſſion is often interrupted, in Euſebius, by Ethiopians, which got the kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwiſe it appears by the prophet Eſay, that the counſellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flouriſhing continuance of that houſe, inſomuch that they ſaid of Pharaoh, [b] I am the ſon of the wiſe, I am the ſon of the ancient king. But that, which overthrows the reckoning of Euſebius, is the good agreement of it with his miſtaken times of the kings of Juda. For tho' it pleaſe him well to ſee how the reigns of Joſias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed mars all; the reign of Joſias being miſplaced. This error grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the kings of Juda with theirs of Iſrael: by which occaſion Joram, king of Iſrael, is made to reign three years after Ahazia of Juda; Samaria is taken by Salmanaſſar, before Hezekia was king: and in a word, all, or moſt of the kings have their beginnings placed in ſome other year of their collaterals, than the ſcriptures have determined.

SECT. VI.

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other kings recited by Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezekia.

FOllowing therefore the Greek hiſtorians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, firſt in the rank of thoſe that were kings after Seſac. He reigned fifty years, and built the greateſt of the three pyramids, which was accounted one of this world's wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the ſhape, in that it reſembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom upwards, narrower and narrower, to the top. This of Chemmis, being four-ſquare, had a baſe of ſeven acres every way, and was above ſix acres high. It was of a very hard and durable ſtone, which had laſted, when Diodore ſaw it, about a thouſand years, without complaining of any injury that it had ſuffered by weather in ſo long a ſpace. From the reign of Chemmis, unto the age of Auguſtus Cæſar, wherein Diodore lived are, are indeed a thouſand years; which gives the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other pyramids, late writers teſtify, that they have ſeen them yet ſtanding.

After Chemmis, [c] Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his ſon Chabreus ſucceeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. Theſe are ſaid to have been brethren; but the length of their reigns may argue the latter to have been ſon to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty years, Cephrenes fifty-ſix. Theſe were, as Chemmis had been, builders of pyramids, whereby they purchaſed great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themſelves in erecting the firſt. Theſe pyramids were ordained to be tombs for thoſe that had raiſed them; but the malice of the Egyptians is ſaid to have caſt out their bodies, and to have called their monuments by the name of an herdſman, that kept his beaſts thereabouts. It may be, [d] that the robbing them of their honour, and entitling a poor fellow to their works, was held to be the caſting out of their bodies: otherwiſe it is hard to conceive, how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoid the like ſlavery laid upon them by the younger brother, or ſon, ſhould have power or leiſure to take ſuch revenge upon his predeceſſor. To the like malice may be aſcribed the tale deviſed againſt Cheops's daughter; that her father, wanting money, did proſtitute her, and that ſhe, getting of every man that accompanied her one ſtone, did build with them a fourth pyramis, that ſtood in the midſt of the other three. Belike ſhe was an inſolent lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her ſake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raiſing a monument, with the ſuperfluity of her father's proviſions.

Mycerinus, the ſon of Cephrenes, reigned after his father ſix years. He would have built as his foregoers did, but, prevented by death, finiſhed not what he had begun. The people thought him a good king, for that he did ſet open the temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept ſhut. But an oracle threaten'd him with a ſhort life of ſix years only, becauſe of this his devotion; For (ſaid the oracle) Egypt ſhould have been afflicted an hundred and fifty years, which thy predeceſſors knew, and performed for their parts, but thou haſt releaſed it, therefore ſhalt thou live but ſix years. It is very ſtrange, that the gods ſhould be offended with a king for his piety; or that they ſhould decree to make a country impious, when the people were deſirous to ſerve them; or, that they having ſo decreed, it ſhould lie in the power of a king to alter deſtiny, and make the ordinance of the gods to fail in taking full effect. But theſe were Egyptian gods. The true God was doubtleſs more offended with the reſtitution of ſuch idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows, whether Chemmis did not learn ſomewhat at Jeruſalem, in the laſt year of his father Seſac, that made him perceive, and deliver to thoſe that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian ſuperſtition? Moſt ſure it is, that his reign, and the reigns of Cheops and Cephrenes were more long and more happy, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the oracle, revelled away both days and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into days, and ſo doubled the time appointed: a ſervice more pleaſing to the devil, than the reſtitution of idolatry durſt then ſeem, when it could ſpeed no better. I find in Reineccius fifty years aſſigned to this king; which I verily believe to have been ſome error of the print, tho' I find it not corrected among other ſuch overſights: for I know no author that gives him ſo many years, and Reineccius himſelf takes notice of the oracle, that threaten'd Mycerinus with a ſhort life, as is before ſhewed.

Bocchorus is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who ſpeaks no more of him than this, that he was a ſtrong man of body, and excelling his predeceſſors in wit. He is ſpoken of by divers authors, as one that loved juſtice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Suidas commends in that kind: Euſebius reckons four and forty years of his reign.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Ethiopian follows, in the catalogue of Diodore; but certain ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Aſychis; who made a ſharp law (as it was then held) againſt bad debtors, that their dead bodies ſhould be in the creditors diſpoſition till the debt was paid. This Aſychis made a pyramis of bricks, more coſtly and fair, in his own judgment, than any of thoſe that the former kings had raiſed. Beſides this Aſychis, Herodotus placeth one Anycis, a blind man, before the Ethiopian. The reigns of theſe two are perhaps thoſe many ages, which the Egyptians, to magnify their antiquities, accounted between Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but ſix years; and ſo long doth Funccius, ſo long doth Reineccius hold, that theſe two kings, between them both, did govern. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it improbable, that the reigns of two kings ſhould have been ſo ſoon ſpent, he may do it by taking ſome years from Sethon or Pſammeticus, and adding them to either of theſe: To add unto theſe, without ſubtracting from ſome other, would breed a manifeſt inconvenience; foraſmuch as part of Seſac's reign muſt have been in [a] the fifth of Rehoboam; as alſo the laſt of Pharaoh Neco was the fourth of Jehoiakim, and the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part, I like it better to allow ſix years only to theſe two kings, than to loſe the witneſs of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the ſcriptures, doth ſpeak of Sennacherib's war; at which time Sethon was king of Egypt. I will not therefore add years unto theſe obſcure names; for by adding unto theſe men three years, we ſhall thruſt the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the ſcriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Egyptian kings. Otherwiſe it were a matter of no great envy, to leave both Aſychis and Anyſis out of the roll; which were eaſily done, by placing Seſac lower, and extending his life yet ſix years further, or more (if the like abridgment ſhall be required of Pſammeticus's reign) into the years of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Ethiopian, who took the kingdom from Anyſis, it is agreed by the moſt, that he reign'd 50 years. He was a merciful prince, not puniſhing all capital offences with death, but impoſing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whoſe toil he both got much wealth into his own hands, letting out their ſervice to hire, and perform'd many works, of more uſe than pomp, to the ſingular benefit of the country. Zonaras calls this king Sua, the ſcriptures call him So. Hoſea, the laſt king of Iſrael, made a league with him againſt Salmanaſſar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendſhip could not preſerve the Iſraelite from deſtruction.

It ſeems, that the encroaching power of the Aſſyrian, grew terrible to Egypt about theſe times; the victories of Tiglath Phulaſſar, and Salmanaſſar, having eaten ſo far into Syria, in the reign of this one king So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his days (for his reign began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himſelf did make the firſt entrance into Paleſtina. This cauſed So to animate the half ſubdued people, againſt their conquerors; but the help which he and his ſucceſſor gave them was ſo faint, that Sennacherib's embaſſador compar'd the Egyptian ſuccour to a broken ſtaff of reed. Such indeed had Hoſea found it, and ſuch Ezekia might have found it, had he not been ſupported by the ſtrong ſtaff of him, that rules all nations with a rod of iron. It appears by the words of Rabſake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, [a] for chariots and horſemen; but this power, whatſoever it was, grew needful within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it ſelf, which So left unto Sethon his ſucceſſor, having now fulfilled the 50 years of his reign. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian prieſts, concerning the departure of this king; ſaying, that he left the country, and willingly retired into Ethiopia, becauſe it was often ſignified unto him in his dreams, by the god which was worſhipped at Thebes, that his reign ſhould be neither long nor proſperous, unleſs he ſlew all the prieſts in Egypt; which rather than to do, he reſign'd his kingdom. Surely theſe Egyptian gods were of a ſtrange quality, that ſo ill rewarded their ſervants, and invited kings to do them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewiſe did) worſhip dogs as gods, when their chief gods had the property of dogs, which love their maſters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the prieſts ſhould have feign'd this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be ſome device of the fearful old man, who ſeeing his realm in danger of an invaſion, ſought an honeſt excuſe for his departure out of it, and withdrawing himſelf into Ethiopia, where he had been bred in his youth. What if one ſhould ſay, that the Ethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the king (perhaps at the inſtigation of this man) raiſed an army againſt Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt, within two or three years after? But I will not trouble my ſelf with ſuch enquiry. This I hold, that So or Sabacus, was not indeed an Ethiopian (for in his time lived the prophet Iſaiah, who mentioneth the antiquity of Pharaoh's houſe) but only ſo ſurnam'd for his education, and becauſe iſſuing from thence, he got the kingdom from Anyſis, who was his oppoſite. The quiet and mild form of his government; his holding the kingdom ſo long without an army; and many other circumſtances argue no leſs. But whether finally he betook a private life, or whether he forewent his life and kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and ſpeak of Sethon his next ſucceſſor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a ſure token of his having been king.

SECT. VII.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezekia, and ſided with him againſt Sennacherib.

THE firſt year of Sethon's reign falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fifth of Sennacherib. It was a troubleſome age, and full of danger; the two great kingdoms of Aſſyria and Egypt, being then ingaged in a war, the iſſue whereof was to determine, whether of them ſhould rule or ſerve. The Aſſyrian had the better men of war; the Egyptian, better proviſion of neceſſaries: the Aſſyrian, more ſubjects; the Egyptian, more friends; and among the new conquered half ſubjects of Aſſur, many that were Egyptian in heart, tho' Aſſyrian in outward ſhew.

Of this laſt ſort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concern'd Pharaoh, to protect them againſt his own great enemy, preferred the friendſhip of ſo near and mighty a neighbour, before the ſervice of a terrible, yet far remov'd king. But herein was great difference, between Ezekia and his ſubjects: for the good king, fixing his eſpecial confidence in God, held that courſe of policy, which he thought moſt likely to turn to the benefit of his country: the multitude of Judea, looking into the fair hopes which this Egyptian league promiſed, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was ſafe, and that now they ſhould not need to fear any more of thoſe injuries, which they had ſuffer'd by the Aſſyrians, and ſo became forgetful of God, [a] taking counſel but not of him. The prophet Iſaiah complain'd much of this preſumption; giving the people of Juda to underſtand, that [b] the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their horſes fleſh, and not ſpirit; that God himſelf ſhould defend Iſrael upon repentance, and that Aſſur ſhould fall by the ſword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (ſaid the prophet) they are vanity, and they ſhall help in vain, their ſtrength is to ſit ſtill.

According to the prophets words it came to paſs. For in the treaty of confederacy that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and aſſurance was given to the Jews, by Sethon, or his agents, who fill'd them with ſuch reports of horſes and chariots, that they did not look (as ſaith Iſaiah xxxi. 1, 2.) unto the holy one of Iſrael, nor ſeek unto the Lord. But he yet is wiſeſt.

After a while came Sennacherib with his army, and waken'd them out of theſe dreams; for Sethon their good neighbour, as near as he was, did ſeem far off, being unready, when his help was moſt needful. It may ſeem that he purpoſed, rather to make Paleſtina than Egypt the ſtage, whereon this great war ſhould be acted, and was not without hope, that the Aſſyrians and Jews, weakening one another, ſhould yield unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with money; for he ſent horſes and camels laden with treaſure, to hire the Arabians, whom [c] Iſaiah calleth a people that cannot profit. Theſe Arabians did not profit indeed; for (beſides that it ſeems by the ſame place of Iſaiah, that the rich treaſures miſcarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any help appear'd from Tirhaca) all the ſtrong cities of Juda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Jeruſalem it ſelf, which were in ſore diſtreſs, till the ſword of God, and not of man, defeated the Aſſyrian, who did go, [d] for fear, to his tower, that is, he fled to Nineveh, where he was ſlain.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it; that it was purpoſed againſt Egypt, where the men of war, being offended with Sethon their king, who had taken away their allowance, refuſed to bear arms in defence of him and their country: that Sethon being Vulcan's prieſt, bemoan'd himſelf to his god, who by dream promis'd to ſend him helpers: that hereupon Sethon, with ſuch as would follow him (which were craftsmen, ſhop-keepers, and the like) march'd towards Peluſium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the camp of Sennacherib by night, did ſo gnaw the bows, quivers, and ſtraps of his mens armour, that they were fain the next day to fly away in all haſte, finding themſelves diſarm'd. In memory hereof (ſaith Herodotus) the ſtatue of this king is ſet up in the temple of Vulcan, holding a mouſe in his hand, with this inſcription: Let him that beholds me, ſerve God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian prieſts, wherein how far they ſwerved from the truth, being deſirous to magnify their own king, it may eaſily be perceiv'd. It ſeems that this image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus's time, or elſe perhaps, the prieſts did forbear to tell it him (which cauſed him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jews was then well known to the world, whereof every child could have told, how much falſehood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this hiſtory ageeable to the ſcriptures, thus far forth: that Sennacherib king of the Aſſyrians and Arabians (ſo Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure ſome borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made war upon Egypt, and was miraculouſly driven home. As for that exploit of the mice, and the great pleaſure that Vulcan did unto his prieſt; happy it was (if Sethon were a prieſt) that he took his god now in ſo good a mood. For within three or four years before this, all the prieſts in Egypt ſhould have been ſlain, if a merciful king had not ſpar'd their lives, as it were half againſt the god's will. Therefore this laſt good turn was not enough to ſerve as an example, that might ſtir up the Egyptians to piety, ſeeing that their devotion, which had laſted ſo long before, did bring all the prieſts into danger of ſuch a bad reward. Rather I think, that this image did repreſent Sennacherib himſelf, and that the mouſe in his hand, ſignified hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expreſſing things) the ſhameful iſſue of his terrible expedition, or the deſtruction of his army, by means which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, ſhewed upon this ungodly king, was indeed a very good motive to piety. But the emblem, together with the temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief temple in that town where this image was erected) might give occaſion to ſuch a fable; the devil helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robb'd of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the devil, I hold it very likely, that Sethon, finding himſelf in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had moſt devotion. But ſo had other of his predeceſſors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained ſuccour by the like miracle? Surely the Jews (even ſuch of them as moſt were given to idolatry) would have been aſhamed of the confidence which they repoſed, [a] in the chariots of Egypt, becauſe they were many, and in the horſemen, becauſe they were very ſtrong; had it been told them, that Sethon, inſtead of ſending thoſe horſemen and chariots, was beſeeching Vulcan, to ſend him and them good luck, or elſe (for theſe alſo were Egyptian gods) addreſſing his prayers to ſome onyon or cat. Howſoever it was, doubtleſs the prophecy of Iſaiah took effect, which ſaid, They ſhall be all aſhamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good; but ſhall be a ſhame, and alſo a reproach. Such is commonly the iſſue of human wiſdom, when reſting ſecure upon proviſion that it ſelf hath made, it will no longer ſeem to ſtand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have been ſet down by Euſebius, under the name of Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reign of Sethon. Theſe have well obſerv'd, that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mention'd in the ſcriptures, not as a king of Egypt, but as a friend to that country, or at leaſt an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war laſt ſpoken of: the Ethiopians (as they are Engliſhed) over which he reigned, being indeed Chuſites or Arabians. Hereupon they ſuppoſe aright, that Euſebius hath miſtaken one king for another. But whereas they think, that this Tarachus or Tirhaka, is placed in the room of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his reign over Egypt, by Euſebius's account, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezekia, in the firſt year of Manaſſes king of Juda. Therefore he, or his years, have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Functius peremptorily, citing no author, nor alledging reaſon for it, ſets him down 33 years; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not careful to examine his continuance. In this caſe, I follow that rule which I propounded unto my ſelf at the firſt, for meaſuring the reigns of theſe Egyptian kings. The years which paſs'd from the fifth of Reboboam, unto the fourth of Jehoiakim, I ſo divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the author in whom he is found, the reſt is to be conferred upon him whoſe length of reign is uncertain; that is, upon this Sethon. By this account I find the 33 years that are ſet down by Functius, to agree very nearly, if not preciſely, with the time of Sethon's reign; therefore I conform my own reckoning to his, tho' I could be content to have it one year leſs. The reaſon of this computation I ſhall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Pſammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the courſe of this hiſtory will ſhortly bring me; the Egyptian affairs growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manaſſes, and his contemporaries.

SECT. I.

The wickedneſs of Manaſſes. His impriſonment, repentance, and death.

MANASSES, the ſon of Ezekias, forgetting the piety of his father, and the proſperity which followed him, ſet up, repaired, adorned, and furniſhed all the altars, temples, and high places, in which the devil was by the heathen worſhipped. Beſides, he himſelf eſteemed the ſun, the moon, and the ſtars, with all the hoſt of heaven, as gods, and worſhipped them: and of all his acts the moſt abominable was, that he burnt his ſons for a ſacrifice to the devil Moloch, or Melchor, in the valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of ſacrifice to the devils.

He alſo gave himſelf to all kind of witchcraft and ſorcery, accompanied and maintained thoſe that had familiar ſpirits, and all ſorts of enchanters: beſides, he ſhed ſo much innocent blood, as Jeruſalem was repleniſh'd therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverend prophet [b] Iſaiah (who was alſo of the king's race, and, as the Jews affirm, the father-in-law of the king) he cauſed the prophet near unto the fountain of Siloe, to be ſawn in ſunder, with a wooden ſaw, in the 80th year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monſtrous than hath been heard of. The ſcriptures indeed are ſilent hereof, yet the fame is confirm'd by Epiphanius, Iſidore, Euſebius, and others, too many to rehearſe, and too good to be ſuſpected. [c] Therefore the Lord brought upon them the captains of the hoſt of the kings of Aſſur, which took Manaſſes, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: when after he had laid 20 years as a captive, and deſpoil'd of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continual prayer, the God of infinite mercy had reſpect, and mov'd the Aſſyrians heart to deliver him.

It is alſo likely that Merodach, becauſe he loved his father Ezekias, was the eaſilier perſuaded to reſtore Manaſſes to his liberty and eſtate. After which, and when he was again eſtabliſh'd, remembring the miſeries which follow'd his wickedneſs, and God's great mercies towards him, he chang'd form, deteſted his former fooliſh and deviliſh idolatry, and caſt down the idols of his own erecting, prepar'd the altar of God, and ſacrific'd thereon. He repair'd a great part of Jeruſalem: and died after the long reign of 55 years. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manaſſes was held in a caſe of iron by the Aſſyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may believe as it ſhall pleaſe their fancies.

SECT. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reign of Pſammiticus.

THAT the wickedneſs of king Manaſſes was the cauſe of the evil, which fell upon his kingdom and perſon, any Chriſtian muſt needs believe: for it is affirmed in the ſcriptures. Yet was the ſtate of things in thoſe parts of the world ſuch, at that time, as would have invited any prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled God's pleaſure, upon reſpect born to his own ends) deſirous of enlarging his empire, to make attempt upon Judah. For the kingdom of Egypt, which was become the pillar whereon the ſtate of Judah leaned, about theſe times was miſerably diſtracted with civil diſſenſion, and, after two years, ill amended by a diviſion of the government between twelve princes. After ſome good agreement between theſe, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally ſubdued by him, who made himſelf abſolute king of all. This interregnum, or mere anarchy, that was in Egypt, with the diviſion of the kingdom following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, between the reigns of Sabacus, and Pſammiticus: but Herodotus doth ſet the ariſtocracy, or twelve governours immediately before Pſammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occaſion of this diſſenſion ſeems to have been the uncertainty of title to that kingdom (for that the crown of Egypt paſſed by ſucceſſion of blood, I have often ſhewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, tho' things were not ſettled, until one had obtained the ſoveraignty.

Theſe twelve rulers governed fifteen years, in good ſeeming agreement, which to preſerve, they made ſtrait covenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their eſtate, becauſe an oracle had foretold, that one of them ſhould depoſe all the reſt, noting him by this token, that he ſhould make a drink-offering, in Vulcan's temple, out of a copper goblet. Whilſt this unity laſted, they joined together in raiſing a monument of their dominion, which was a labyrinth, built near unto the lake of Meris; a work ſo admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could give it commendation anſwerable to the ſtatelineſs of the work it ſelf. I will not here ſet down that imperfect deſcription, which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to ſay, that he prefers it far before the pyramids, one of which (as he ſaith) excelled the temple of Diana at Epheſus, or any of the faireſt works in Greece. Diodorus reports this labyrinth to have been the work of Marus, or Menides, a king which lived five generations before Proteus, that is, before the war of Troy, and from this labyrinth, ſaith he, Dædalus took the pattern of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to have been Annemenes, who reigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dædalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was king. Belike Reineccius, deſiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Chæremon, and others, that are found in [a] Joſephus touching Amenophis and his children, to the ſtory of Amaſis, and Actiſanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it conſequent, after he had conjectured Manethon's Amenophis to be Diodorus's Amaſis, that Sethon ſhould be Actiſanes, and that Annemenes ſhould be Marus. If in this caſe I might intrude a conjecture; the times which we now handle, are thoſe, about which Reineccius hath erred in making ſearch; Amaſis was Anyſis; Actiſanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of thoſe twelve princes, to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous labyrinth. For Actiſanes the Ethiopian depoſed Amaſis, Sabacus the Ethiopian depoſed Anyſis; Actiſanes governed well, and was mild in puniſhing offenders; ſo likewiſe was Sabacus; Marus, the next king after Actiſanes, built this labyrinth; and the next (ſaving Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the ſame work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the truth, as living near to the age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore believed the prieſt might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their kings, and boaſting of their antiquities. Here I might add, that the twelve great halls, parlours, and other circumſtances remembred by Herodotus, in ſpeaking of this building, do help to prove, that it was the work of theſe twelve princes. But I haſten to their end.

At a ſolemn feaſt in Vulcan's temple, when they were to make their drink-offerings, the prieſt forgetting himſelf, brought forth no more than eleven cups. Hereupon Pſammiticus, who ſtanding laſt had not a cup, took off his brazen helmet, and therewith ſupplied the want. This cauſed all the reſt to remember the oracle, and to ſuſpect him as a traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon ſet purpoſe, or ill intent, they forbare to kill him; but, being jealous of their eſtate, they baniſhed him into the mariſh countries by the ſea-ſide. This oracle, and the event, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I believe to have been no other: in the reſt Herodotus and Diodore agree, ſaying, that Pſammiticus hired ſoldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whoſe aid he vanquiſhed his companions, and made himſelf ſole king.

The years of his reign, according to Herodotus, were fifty-four; according to Euſebius forty-four; Mercator, to reconcile theſe two, gives forty-four years to his ſingle reign, and ten to his ruling jointly with the princes before ſpoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a man grown (for he cannot in reaſon be ſuppoſed to have been then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve governours, muſt be thought to have lived unto extream old age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threeſcore and nine years. I therefore yield rather to Euſebius, but will not adventure to cut five years from the ariſtocracy: tho' peradventure Pſammiticus was not at firſt one of the twelve, but ſucceeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of ſome prince that died, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another ſcruple there is, tho' not great, which troubles this reckoning. The years of theſe Egyptians, as we find them ſet down, are more by one than ſerve to fill up the time between the fifth of Rehoboam, and the fourth of Jehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we muſt abate one year from Sethon's reign, that was of uncertain length; or elſe (which I had rather do; becauſe Functius may have followed better authority than I know, or than himſelf alledgeth, in giving to Sethon a time ſo nearly agreeing with the truth) we muſt confound the laſt year of one reign, with the firſt of another. Such a ſuppoſition were not inſolent. For no man can ſuppoſe, that all the kings, or any great part of them, which are ſet down in chronological tables, reigned preciſely ſo many years, as are aſcribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to think, that the ſurpluſage of one man's time, ſupplied the defect of another's. Wherefore I confound the laſt year of thoſe fifteen, wherein the twelve princes ruled, with the firſt of Pſammiticus; who ſurely did not fall out with his companions, fight with them, and make himſelf lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this king, it is recorded, that he was the firſt in Egypt, who entertained any ſtrait amity with the Greeks; that he retained in pay his mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large rewards and poſſeſſions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian ſoldiers, by beſtowing them in the left wing of his army, whilſt his mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Upon this diſgrace, it is ſaid, that his ſoldiers, to the number of two hundred thouſand, forſook their natural country of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind meſſages, nor by the king himſelf, who over-took them on the way; but when he told them of their country, their wives and children, they anſwered, that their weapons ſhould get them a country, and that nature had enabled them to get other wives and children.

It is alſo reported of him, that he cauſed two infants to be brought up in ſuch ſort as they might not hear any word ſpoken; by which means he hoped to find out, what nation or language was moſt ancient; foraſmuch as it ſeemed likely, that nature would teach the children to ſpeak that language, which men ſpoke at the firſt. The iſſue hereof was, that the children cried Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to ſignify bread in the Phrygian tongue, ſerved greatly to magnify the Phrygian antiquity. Goropius Becanus makes no ſmall matter of this, for the honour of his Low Dutch; in which the word Becker ſignifies (as baker in Engliſh) a maker of bread. He that will turn over any part of Goropius's works, may find enough of this kind, to perſuade a willing man, that Adam and all the patriarchs uſed none other tongue than the Low Dutch, before the confuſion of languages at Babel; the name itſelf of Babel being alſo Dutch, and given by occaſion of this confuſion; for that there they began to babble and talk one knew not what.

But I will not inſiſt upon all that is written of Pſammiticus. The moſt regardable of his acts was the ſiege of Azotus in Paleſtina, about which he ſpent nine and twenty years. Never have we heard (ſaith Herodotus) that any city endured ſo long a ſiege as this; yet Pſammiticus carried it at the laſt. This town of [a] Azotus had been won by Tartan, a captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it ſeemeth, relieved, but in vain, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out ſo well.

SECT. III.

What reference theſe Egyptian matters might have to the impriſonment and enlargement of Manaſſes. In what part of his reign Manaſſes was taken priſoner.

WERE it certainly known, in what year of his reign Manaſſes was taken priſoner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty; I think we ſhould find theſe Egyptian troubles to have been no ſmall occaſion both of his captivity and enlargement: God ſo diſpoſing of human actions, that even they, who intended only their own buſineſs, fulfilled only his high pleaſure. For either the civil wars in Egypt that followed upon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the kingdom as it were into twelve pieces, or the war between Pſammiticus and his colleagues; or the expedition of Pſammiticus unto Syria, and the ſiege of Azotus might miniſter into the Babylonian, either ſuch cauſe of hope, to enlarge his dominion in the ſouth parts; or ſuch neceſſity of ſending an army into thoſe parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him to make ſure work with the king of Judah. The ſame occaſions ſufficed alſo to procure the delivery of Manaſſes, after he was taken. For he was taken (as [b] Joſephus hath it) by ſubtilty, not by open force, neither did they, that apprehended him, win his country, but only waſte it. So that the Jews having learned wit, by the ill ſucceſs of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to be more circumſpect in making their bargain upon ſuch another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters preſented more weighty arguments of hope and fear, than the little kingdom of Juda could afford) had no reaſon, to ſpend his forces in purſuing a ſmall conqueſt, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he ſhould compel his mighties enemies to come to ſome good agreement; when by quitting his preſent advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manaſſes's reign, wherein he was taken priſoner; or concerning his captivity it ſelf, how long it laſted; the ſcriptures are ſilent, and Joſephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus's three opinions, the one of Bellarmine, who thinks that Manaſſes was taken in the fifteenth year of his reign; the other of the author of the greater Hebrew chronology, who affirms, that it was in his twenty-ſeventh year; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi upon Ezekiel, who ſaith, that he was forty years an idolater, and lived fifteen years after his repentance. The firſt of theſe conjectures is upheld by Torniellus, who rejects the ſecond, as more improbable, and condemns the third as moſt falſe. Yet the reaſons alledged by Torniellus in defence of the firſt, and refutation of the laſt opinion, are ſuch as may rather prove him to favour the cardinal, as far as he may (for where need requires, he doth freely diſſent from him) than to have uſed his accuſtomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgment. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon, the ſon of Manaſſes, is ſaid by Joſephus to have followed the works of his father's youth; the other, that, had Manaſſes grown old in his ſins, it is not like that he ſhould have continued as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of theſe arguments, I ſee no reaſon why the ſins of Manaſſes might not be diſtinguiſhed from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve years old; tho' it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) until he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the ſecond; howſoever it be a fearful thing to caſt off unto the laſt thoſe good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, that the ſins which are not forſaken before the age of two and fifty years, ſhall be puniſhed with final impenitency. But againſt theſe two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of ſcripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, that Manaſſes continued longer in his wickedneſs, than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the ſecond book of Kings, the evil which Manaſſes did is remember'd at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; ſo that his amendment may ſeem to have taken up no great part of his life, the ſtory of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth chapter. [a] Concerning the reſt of the Acts of Manaſſes, and all that he did, and his ſin that he ſinned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Juda. The other place is in the four and twentieth chapter of the ſame book, where, in rehearſing the calamities, with which that nation was puniſhed in the time of Jehoiakim, the great grand-child of this Manaſſes, it is ſaid; [b] Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his ſight, for the ſins of Manaſſes, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he ſhed (for he filled Jeruſalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Whoſo conſiders well theſe places, may find ſmall cauſe to pronounce it moſt falſe, that the repentance and amendment of Manaſſes was no earlier than fifteen years before his death; or moſt probable, that when he was twenty-ſeven years old, he repented, and becoming a new man, lived in the fear of God forty years after. I will no longer diſpute about this matter, ſeeing that the truth cannot be diſcovered. It ſufficeth to ſay, that two years of civil diſſenſion in Egypt, fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that kingdom was weaken'd, by partition of the ſoveraignty; the war of Pſammiticus againſt his aſſociates; and four and twenty years, of the nine and twenty, wherein the ſiege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manaſſes, did leave no one part of his reign (after the firſt fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppreſſed by the Babylonian, whoſe men of war had continual occaſions of viſiting his country. All which I will add hereto is this, that the fifteenth of Manaſſes was the laſt year of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach's reign, or (accounting from the death of Aſarhaddon) the twentieth: The ſeven and twentieth of Manaſſes was the tenth of the twelve princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth was the twenty-third of Pſammiticus, and the fifth of Nabulaſſar, the ſon of Merodach in Babylon: but which of theſe was the year of his impriſonment, or whether any other, I forbear to ſhew mine opinion, leſt I ſhould thereby ſeem to draw all matters over-violently to mine own computation.

This was the firſt great maſtery that the Babylonians had of the kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promiſed tribute to Salmanaſſar, yet Ezekias never paid it. True it is, that he hoped to ſtay [c] Sennacherib's enterpriſe againſt him, by preſenting him with three hundred talents of ſilver, and thirty of gold, beſides the plate which covered the doors and pillars of the temple.

But Manaſſes being preſſed with greater neceſſity, could refuſe no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impoſe upon him; among which it ſeems, that this was one (which was indeed a point of ſervitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilſt they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with men of war all the ſtrong cities of Juda after his return (which was rather againſt Pſammiticus, whoſe party he had forſaken, than againſt the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controverſy) but likewiſe by that oppoſition, which Joſias made afterwards to Pharaoh Neco, in favour of Nabulaſſar, which had been againſt all reaſon and policy, if it had not been his duty by covenant. Of this I will ſpeak more in convenient place.

SECT. IV.

Of the firſt and ſecond Meſſenian wars, which were in the reigns of Ezekia and Manaſſes, kings of Juda.

NOW concerning ſuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about theſe times of Manaſſes, the moſt remarkable were the Meſſenian wars; which happened in this age, and being the greateſt action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Perſian wars, deſerve not to be paſſed over with ſilence.

The firſt Meſſenian war began and ended in the days of Ezekia; the ſecond in the reign of Manaſſes: but to avoid the trouble of interrupting our hiſtory, I have thought it beſt to rehearſe them both in this place. Other introduction is needleſs, than to ſay, that the poſterity of Hercules, driving the iſſue of Pelops, and the Acheans, out of their ſeats, divided their lands between themſelves, and erected the kingdoms of Lacedemon, Argos, Meſſene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and ſought one another's ruin with bloody wars, whereof theſe Meſſenian were the greateſt.

The pretended grounds of the Meſſenian war are ſcarce worth remembrance; they were ſo ſlight. Ambition was the true cauſe of it; wherewith the Lacedemonians were ſo tranſported, that any thing ſerved them as a colour, to accompliſh their greedy deſires. Yet other matter was alledged; namely, that one Polychares, a Meſſenian, had ſlain many Lacedemonians, for which the magiſtrates of Sparta, deſiring to have him yielded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Meſſenians on the other ſide, excuſed Polychares, for that he was grown frantick, thro' injuries received from Euæphnes a Lacedemonian. This Euæphnes had bargained to give paſture to the cattle of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increaſe: but not contented with the gain appointed, he ſold the cattle, and ſlaves that kept them, to merchants; which done, he came with a fair tale to his friend, ſaying, that they were ſtolen. Whilſt the lie was yet ſcarce out of his mouth, one of the ſlaves that had eſcaped from the merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedemonian being thus deprehended, confeſſed all, and promis'd large amends; which to receive, he carried the ſon of Polychares home with him, but having him at home, he villanouſly ſlew him. Wherefore the Lacedemonians having refuſed, after long ſuit made by the wretched father to do him right againſt this thief and murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrel out of thoſe things, which he did in that madneſs, whereinto they themſelves had caſt him. So ſaid the Meſſenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromiſe, or to ſtand unto the judgment of the Amphictyones, who were as the general council of Greece, or to any other fair courſe. But the Lacedemonians, who had a great deſire to occupy the fair country of Meſſene, that lay cloſe by them, were not content with ſuch allegations. They thought it enough to have ſome ſhew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and ſo, without ſending any defiance, ſecretly took an oath, to hold war with Meſſene, till they had maſter'd it; which done, they ſeized upon Amphia, a frontier town of that province, wherein they put all to the ſword without mercy, very few eſcaping.

Hereupon the Meſſenians took arms, and were met by the enemy. A furious battle was fought between them, which ended not until dark night, with uncertain victory. The Meſſenians did ſtrongly encamp themſelves; the Lacedemonians, unable to force their camp, returned home. This war began in the ſecond year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the firſt of the fourteenth Olympiad, having laſted twenty years. The two enemy nations tried the matter for a while with their proper forces, the Lacedemonians waſting the inland parts of Meſſene, and the Meſſenians the ſea-coſt of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends on both ſides were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, took part with Meſſene; the Spartans had, beſides many ſubjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired ſoldiers out of Crete. So a ſecond, third, and fourth battel were fought with as great obſtinacy as the firſt; ſaving that, in the fourth battle, the Lacedemonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the victory was ſtill uncertain, tho' in one of them the Meſſenians loſt Euphaes, their king, in whoſe ſtead they choſe Ariſtodemus.

Many years were ſpent, ere all this blood was ſhed; for peſtilent diſeaſes, and want of money to entertain ſoldiers, cauſed the war to linger. And for the ſame reaſons did the Meſſenians forſake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, which was a mountain with a town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to do. But, as [a] ſome authors tell us, the Lacedemonians were ſo obſtinate in this war, becauſe of their vow, that having abſented themſelves ten years from Sparta, their wives ſent them word, that their city would grow unpeopled, by reaſon that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they ſent back all their ableſt young men, promiſcuouſly to accompany the young women, who got ſo many of them with child, as they became a great part of their nation, and were called Parthenians. [b] Diodorus refers the begetting of theſe Parthenians to a former time. But in proceſs of this Meſſenian war, when the devil in an oracle had adviſed the Meſſenians to ſacrifice a virgin of the ſtock of [c] Egyptus, that ſo they might be victorious againſt the Lacedemonians; the lot falling upon the daughter of one Lyciſcus, Ephibolus the prieſt, willing to ſave her, ſaid ſhe was only a foſter'd child, and not born of the wife of Lyciſcus: which anſwer giving delay to the execution of the maid, Lyciſcus ſecretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Ariſtodemus, which afterwards was king, voluntarily offered his own daughter: but a young nobleman, being in love with the maid, when otherwiſe he could not prevail, ſaid openly that ſhe was no virgin, but that he had defloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the father in a rage ripped up his innocent daughter's belly, to diſprove the lover's ſlander: at the grave of which daughter of his, afterwards falling by other ſuperſtitions into deſpair of prevailing againſt the Lacedemonians, he ſlew himſelf, to the great hurt of his country, which he loved moſt dearly. For after his death the Meſſenians loſt their courage, and finding themſelves diſtreſſed by many wants, eſpecially of victuals, they craved peace; which they obtained under moſt rigorous conditions. Half the yearly fruits of their land they were bound to ſend unto Sparta; and they, with their wives, to make ſolemn lamentations, at the death of every Spartan king; they were alſo ſworn to live in true ſubjection to the Lacedemonians; and part of their territory was taken from them, which was given to the Aſmæi, and ſuch as had followed the Spartans in this war.

This peace being made upon ſo uneven terms, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Meſſenians not finding how to help themſelves) and then broke out into a new and more furious war than the former. The able young men, that were grown up in the room of thoſe Meſſenians, whom the former war had conſumed, began to conſider their own ſtrength and multitude, thinking themſelves equal to the Lacedemonians, and therefore ſcorning to ſerve ſuch maſters, as had againſt all right oppreſſed their fathers. The chief of theſe was Ariſtomenes, a noble gentleman, of the houſe of Egyptus, who perceiving the uniform deſires of his countrymen, adventured to become their leader. He therefore ſounding the affections of the Argives, and Arcadians, which he found throughly anſwerable to his purpoſe, began open war upon the ſtate of Lacedemon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedemonians haſted to quench the fire before it ſhould grow too hot, with ſuch forces as they could raiſe of their own, without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies ere any ſuccour were lent them. So a ſtrong battle was fought between them, and a doubtful one; ſave that the Meſſenians were pleaſed with the iſſue, foraſmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud lords to think them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Ariſtomenes appeared ſuch in this fight, that his people would have made him their king: but he, refuſing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their general. Within one year another battle was fought, whereunto each party came better provided. The Lacedemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and ſome other friends to help: the Meſſenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This alſo was a long and bloody fight; but Ariſtomenes did ſo behave himſelf, that finally he made the enemies run for their lives. Of ſuch importance was this victory, that the Lacedemonians began to bethink themſelves of making ſome good agreement. But one Tyrtæus, an Athenian poet, whom by appointment of an oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-inforced their ſpirits with his verſes. After this, Ariſtomenes took by ſurpriſe a town in Laconia, and vanquiſhed in fight Anaxander king of Sparta, who did ſet upon him, in hopes to have recovered the booty.

But all theſe victories of Ariſtomenes periſhed in the loſs of one battle, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or ſurely the profit, fell unto the Lacedemonians, through the treaſon of Ariſtocrates, king of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Meſſenians expoſed to a cruel butchery. The loſs was ſo great, that all Andania, their principal city, and the towns in Meſſene, ſtanding too far from the ſea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be ſafe abroad, was conveyed, as into a place of ſafety. Here the Lacedemonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For beſides that Era it ſelf was a ſtrong piece, Ariſtomenes with three hundred ſtout ſoldiers did many incredible exploits that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the ſiege. He waſted all the fields of Meſſene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away corn, wine, cattel, and all proviſions, neceſſary for his own people; the ſlaves and houſhold-ſtuff he changed into money, ſuffering the owners to redeem them. To remedy this miſchief, the Lacedemonians made an edict, that neither Meſſene, nor the adjoining parts of their own country, ſhould be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almoſt undone by it. Yet the poet Tyrtæus appeas'd this uproar with pleaſing ſongs. But Ariſtomenes grew ſo bold, that he not only ranged over all the fields, but adventured upon the town, ſurpriſed and ſack'd Amyclæ, and finally cauſed the enemies to encreaſe and ſtrengthen their companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing theſe and other ſervices, thrice Ariſtomenes was taken priſoner; yet ſtill he eſcaped. One eſcape of his deſerves to be remembred, as a thing very ſtrange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to ſet upon both the kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up ſenſeleſs, and carried away priſoner, with 50 of his companions. There was a deep natural cave into which the Spartans uſed to caſt headlong ſuch as were condemn'd to die for the greateſt offences. To this puniſhment were Ariſtomenes and his companions adjudg'd. All the reſt of theſe poor men died with their falls; Ariſtomenes (howſoever it came to paſs) took no harm. Yet was it harm enough to be impriſoned in a deep dungeon, among dead carcaſſes, where he was like to periſh through hunger and ſtench. But after a while he perceived by ſome ſmall glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a fox that was gnawing upon a dead body. Hereupon he bethought himſelf, that this beaſt muſt needs know ſome way, to enter the place and get out. For which cauſe he made ſhift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the tail with one hand, ſaved himſelf from biting with the other hand, by thruſting his coat into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, until the way was too ſtrait for him, and then diſmiſs'd it. The fox being looſe, ran thro' a hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Ariſtomenes delve ſo long with his nails, that at laſt he claw'd out his paſſage. When ſome fugitives of Meſſene brought word to Sparta, that Ariſtomenes was return'd home, their tale ſounded alike, as if they had ſaid, that a dead man was reviv'd. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to help the Lacedemonians in the ſiege of Era, were cut in pieces, their captains ſlain, and their camp taken; then was it eaſily believed that Ariſtomenes was alive indeed.

Thus 11 years paſs'd whilſt the enemies hovering about Era, ſaw no likelihood of getting it; and Ariſtomenes with ſmall forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the laſt, a ſlave, that had fled from Sparta, betray'd the place. This fellow had entic'd to lewdneſs the wife of a Meſſenian, and was entertain'd by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happen'd in a rainy winter night, that the husband came home unlook'd for, whilſt the adulterer was within. The woman hid her paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was return'd ſo ſoon. He told her, that the ſtorm of foul weather was ſuch, as had made all his fellows leave their ſtations, and that himſelf had done as the reſt did; as for Ariſtomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad; neither was it to be fear'd, that the enemies would ſtir, in ſuch a dark rainy night as this was. The ſlave that heard theſe tidings, roſe up ſecretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian camp with the news. There he found Emperamus his maſter, commanding in the king's abſence. To him he utter'd all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the army into the town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the alarm was preſently taken; and the extreme darkneſs, together with the noiſe of wind and rain, hindred all directions. All the next day was ſpent in moſt cruel fight; one part being incited, by mere hope of ending a long work; the other inrag'd by mere deſperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenſed partly by the aſſiſtance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of ſervitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowneſs of the ſtreets and other paſſages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Meſſenians were in continual toil; their enemies fought in courſe, refreſhing themſelves with meat and ſleep, and then returning, ſupplied the place of their weary fellows, with freſh companions. Ariſtomenes therefore, perceiving that his men, for want of relief, were no longer able to hold out (as having been three days, and three nights, vexed with all miſeries, of labour, watching, fighting, hunger and thirſt, beſides continual rain and cold) gather'd together all the weaker ſort, whom he compaſs'd round with armed men, and ſo attempted to break out thro' the midſt of the enemies. Emperamus, general of the Lacedemonians, was glad of this: and to further their departure, cauſed his ſoldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair paſſage to theſe deſperate madmen. So they iſſued forth, and arrived ſafe in Arcadia, where they were moſt lovingly entertained.

Upon the firſt bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themſelves to the reſcue: but Ariſtocrates their falſe-hearted king, ſaid it was too late, for that all was already loſt. When Ariſtomenes had placed his followers in ſafety, he choſe out 500 the luſtieſt of his men, with whom he reſolv'd to march in all ſecret haſte to Sparta, hoping to find the town ſecure, and ill manned, the people being run forth to the ſpoil of Meſſene. In this enterpriſe, if he ſped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedemonians would be glad to recover their own, by reſtitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worſt that could happen. There were 300 Arcadians that offer'd to join with him; but Ariſtocrates mar'd all, by ſending ſpeedy advertiſement thereof, to Anaxander king of Sparta. The epiſtle which Anaxander ſent back to Ariſtocrates, was intercepted, by ſome that miſtruſted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falſehood, which being publiſhed in open aſſembly, the Arcadians ſtoned him to death, and caſting forth his body unburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with a note, that the perjurer cannot deceive God.

Of Ariſtomenes no more is remaining to be ſaid, than that committing his people to the charge of his ſon Gorgus and other ſufficient governours, who ſhould plant them in ſome new ſeat abroad, he reſolv'd ſolv'd himſelf to make abode in thoſe parts, hoping to find the Lacedemonians work at home. His daughters he beſtow'd honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus who reign'd in the iſle of Rhodes took to wife, being willed by an oracle to marry the daughter of the beſt man in Greece. Finally, Ariſtomenes went with his daughters to Rhodes, whence he purpoſed to have travelled unto Ardys the ſon of Gyges king of Lydia, and to Phraortes king of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians were invited by Anaxilas (whoſe great grandfather was a Meſſenian and went into Italy after the former war) being lord of the Rhegians in Italy, to take his part againſt the Zancleans in Sicily, on the other ſide of the ſtraits. They did ſo; and winning the town of Zancle, called it Meſſene, which name it keeps to this day.

This ſecond Meſſenian war ended in the firſt year of the 28th Olympiad. Long after which time, the reſt of that nation, who ſtaying at home ſerv'd the Lacedemonians, found means to rebel; but were ſoon vanquiſh'd, and being driven to forſake Peloponneſus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewiſe, after few ages, they were expelled by the Lacedemonians, and then followed their ancient countrymen into Italy and Sicily; ſome of them went into Africa, where they choſe unto themſelves a ſeat.

It is very ſtrange, that during 280 years, this baniſh'd nation retain'd their name, their ancient cuſtoms, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forſaken country, with a deſire to return to it. In the third year of the 102d Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, having tam'd the pride of the Lacedemonians, revok'd the Meſſenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponneſus. There did Epaminondas reſtore unto them their old poſſeſſion, and help them in building a fair city; which, by the name of the province, was called Meſſena, and was held by them ever after, in deſpight of the Lacedemonians, of whom they never from thenceforth ſtood in fear.

SECT. V.

Of the kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manaſſes reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the book of Judith. Of the hiſtory of Judith.

ARDYS king of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are ſpoken of by Pauſanias, as reigning ſhortly after the Meſſenian war. Ardys ſucceeding unto his father Gyges, began his reign of 49 years, in the 2d of the 25th Olympiad. He follow'd the ſteps of his father, who encroaching upon the Ionians in Aſia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys won Priene, and aſſailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reign, the Cimmerians, being expell'd out of their own country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Aſia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this man's grand-child, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but won the city of Sardes; tho' the caſtle or citadel thereof was defended againſt them, and held ſtill for king Ardys; whoſe long reign was unable, by reaſon of this great ſtorm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not king until the third year of the 29th Olympiad, which was 6 years after the Meſſenian war ended; the ſame being the laſt year of Manaſſes's reign over Juda.

Deioces, the father of this Phraortes, was king of Media, three and fifty of theſe five and fifty years in which Manaſſes reign'd. This Deioces was the firſt that ruled the Medes in a ſtrict form, commanding more abſolutely than his predeceſſors had done. For they following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people ſo much licence, as cauſed every one to deſire the wholſome ſeverity of a more lordly king. Herein Deioces anſwered their deſires to the full. For he cauſed them to build for him a ſtately palace; he took unto him a guard for defence of his perſon; he ſeldom gave preſence, which alſo when he did, it was with ſuch auſterity, that no man durſt preſume to ſpit or cough in his ſight. By theſe and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awful regard, and highly upheld the majeſty, which his predeceſſors had almoſt letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his royal office, he did uprightly and ſeverely adminiſter juſtice, keeping ſecret ſpies to inform him of all that was done in the kingdom. He car'd not to enlarge the bounds of his dominion, by encroaching upon others; but ſtudied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this king, and ſuch as were before him, ſeems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus, l. 1. delivers, that Deioces was the firſt who reign'd in Media.

This was he that built the great city of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he ſhould be that king Arphaxad, mention'd in the ſtory of Judith, as alſo Ben Merodach, by the ſame account, ſhould be Nabuchodonoſor the Aſſyrian, by whom Arphaxad was ſlain, and Holophernes ſent to work wonders, upon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other countries. For I reckon the laſt year of Deioces to have been the 19th of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwiſe, ſome earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, ſome later, in the reign of Nabulaſſar, who is alſo called Nabuchodonoſor.

In fitting this book of Judith to a certain time, there hath much labour been ſpent, with ill ſucceſs. The reigns of Cambyſes, Darius, Hyſtaſpis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been ſought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times foregoing the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, have been thought upon, and this age that we have now in hand, choſen by Bellarmine, as agreeing beſt with the ſtory; tho' others herein cannot (I ſpeak of ſuch as fain would) agree with him. Whilſt Cambyſes reign'd, the temple was not rebuilt, which in the ſtory of Judith, is found ſtanding and dedicated. The other Perſian kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonoſor, whoſe part they refuſed to take, and who ſent to deſtroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath ſome conveniences, aptly fitting this hiſtory; and above all the opinion of a few ancient writers (without whoſe judgment the authority of this book were of no value) having placed this argument in the Perſian monarchy, inclines the matter to the reign of this vain-glorious king. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitled him to the buſineſs. Manifeſt it is, and granted, that in the time of this hiſtory, there muſt be a return from captivity lately foregoing; the temple rebuilt; Jehoachim high prieſt; and a long peace, of threeſcore and ten years, or thereabout, enſuing. All theſe were to be among the Jews. Likewiſe on the other ſide, we muſt find a king that reign'd in

Nineveh,

Nineveh, eighteen years at the leaſt; that vanquiſhed and ſlew a king of the Medes; one whom the Jews refuſed to aſſiſt; one that ſought to be generally adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples of ſuch as were accounted gods to be deſtroyed; one whoſe viceroy or captain-general knew not the Jewiſh nation, but was fain to learn what they were, of the bordering people.

Of all theſe circumſtances; the prieſthood of Joachim, with a return from captivity, are found concurring, with either the time of Manaſſes before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reign of Xerxes; the reſt of circumſtances requiſite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the captivity of the Jews and deſolation of the city. Wherefore the brief deciſion of this controverſy is, that the book of Judith is not canonical. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was poſſible in ſo deſperate a caſe. For he ſuppoſeth, that under Xerxes there were other kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps reſtored and re-edified the city of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonoſor might be another. This granted, he adds, that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſor, that is, five or ſix years, the abſence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Grecian expedition (which he ſuppoſeth to have been ſo long) might give occaſion unto Arphaxad of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonoſor having vanquiſhed and ſlain Arphaxad, might then ſeek to make himſelf lord of all by the army which he ſent forth under Holofernes. So ſhould the Jews have done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their ſoveraign lord, and reſiſting one that rebelled againſt him; as alſo the other circumſtances rehearſed before be well applied to the argument. For in theſe times, the affairs of Jewry were agreeable to the hiſtory of Judith, and ſuch a king as this ſuppoſed Nabuchodonoſor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we ſhall need to think him. But the ſilence of all hiſtories takes away belief from this conjecture: and the ſuppoſition itſelf is very hard, that a rebel, whoſe king was abroad, with an army conſiſting of ſeventeen hundred thouſand men, ſhould preſume ſo far, upon the ſtrength of twelve hundred thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand archers on horſeback, as to think that he might do what he liſts, yea, that there was none other God than himſelf. It is indeed eaſy to find enough that might be ſaid againſt this device of Torniellus; yet if there were any neceſſity of holding the book of Judith to be canonical, I would rather chuſe to lay aſide all regard of profane hiſtories, and build ſome defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all do, the text itſelf. That Judith lived under none of the Perſian kings, Bellarmine (whoſe works I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That ſhe lived not in the reign of Manaſſes, Torniellus hath proved very ſubſtantially, ſhewing how the cardinal is driven, as it were, to break thro' a wall, in ſaying that the text was corrupted, where it ſpake of the deſtruction of the temple foregoing her time. That the kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonoſor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of mere phantaſy, it is ſo plain, that it needs no proof at all. Wherefore we may truly ſay, that they, which have contended about the time of this hiſtory, being well furniſhed of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themſelves (like naked men in a ſtony field) have chas'd Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, extra anni ſoliſque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Surely to find out [a] the borders of Japheth, which were towards the ſouth, and over-againſt Arabia, or the countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofornes's his way; I think it would as much trouble coſmographers, as the former queſtion hath done chronologers. But I will not buſy my ſelf herewith; having already ſo far digreſſed, in ſhewing who lived not with Manaſſes, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearſe what others I find to have had their part in the long time of his reign.

Of other princes and actions that were in theſe times.

THE firſt year of Manaſſes was the the laſt of Romulus; after whoſe death, one year the Romans wanted a king. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabin choſen; a peaceable man and ſeeming very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had emyloyed only in wars, to ſome good civility, and a more orderly faſhion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with ſuperſtition; as perſuading them, that he had familiarity with a nymph called Egeria, who taught him many ceremonies, which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all theſe devices of Numa were, in his own judgment, no better than mere deluſions, that ſerved only as rudiments, to bring the ſavage multitude of thieves and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to ſome form of milder diſcipline, than their boiſterous and wild natures was otherwiſe apt to entertain. This appeared by the books that were found in his grave, almoſt ſix hundred years after his death, wherein the ſuperſtition taught by himſelf was condemned as vain. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belong'd to one L. Petilius a ſcribe. Two coffins or cheſts of ſtone were in it, with an inſcription in Greek and Latin letters, which ſaid that Numa Pompilius the ſon of Pompo, king of the Romans lay there. In the one coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly conſumed. In the other were his books wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own conſtitutions ſeven, and other ſeven of philoſophy. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner freſh and new. The prætor of the city deſiring to have a ſight of theſe books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refuſed to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a ſolemn oath, that they were againſt the religion then in uſe. Hereupon the ſenate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It ſeems that Numa did mean to acquit himſelf into wiſer ages which he thought would follow, as one that had not been ſo fooliſh as to believe the doctrine wherein he inſtructed his own barbarous times. But the poiſon wherewith he had infected Rome when he ſat in his throne had not left working, when he miniſtred the antidote out of his grave. Had theſe books not come to light, until the days of Tully and Ceſar, when the miſt of ignorance was ſomewhat better

diſcuſſed; likely it is that they had not only eſcaped the fire, but wrought ſome good (and peradventure general) effect. Being as it was, they ſerved as a confutation, without remedy, of idolatry that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and forty years in continual peace. After him Tullus Hoſtilius the third king choſen, in the ſix and fortieth year of Manaſſes, and reigned two and thirty years, buſied, for the moſt part in war. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cauſe to fear, that might grow unto them from the Thuſcanes, cauſed them to bethink themſelves of a courſe, whereby, without effuſion of ſo much blood as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who ſhould command, and who obey.

There were in each camp three brethren twins born at one birth (Dionyſius ſays, that they were couſin-germans) of equal years and ſtrength, who were appointed to fight for their ſeveral countries. The end was, that the Horatii, champions for the Romans, got the victory, tho' two of them firſt loſt their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livy tells it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their oppoſites were ſlain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reaſon of their hurts could not follow him with equal ſpeed, to follow him at ſuch diſtance one from another, that returning upon them, he ſlew them, as it had been in ſingle fight, man after man, ere they could join together, and ſet upon him all at once. Dionyſius reports it ſomewhat otherwiſe, telling very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and ſaying, that firſt one of the Horatii was ſlain, then one of the Curatii, then a ſecond Horatius, and laſtly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly ſever the one from the other, as is ſhewed before.

This is one of the moſt memorable things in the old Roman hiſtory, both in regard of the action it ſelf, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, againſt Alba, and in reſpect of the great increaſe which thereby the Roman ſtate obtained. For the city of Alba did immediately become ſubject unto her own colony, and was ſhortly after, upon ſome treacherous dealing of their governour, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome, where they were made citizens. The ſtrong nation of the Latins, whereof Alba, as the mother city, had been chief, became ere long dependant upon Rome, tho' not ſubject unto it, and divers petty ſtates adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were ſmall, yet many, I will forbear to rehearſe (as being the works of ſundry ages, and few of them remarkable conſidered apart by themſelves) until ſuch time as this fourth empire, that is now in the infancy, ſhall grow to be the main ſubject of this hiſtory.

The ſeventh year of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the firſt of Manaſſes. Alſo the three laſt governors for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the ſame king's time. Of theſe I find only the names, Leocrates, Apſander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly rulers were elected.

Theſe governors for ten years were alſo of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was ſhortned, and from term of life reduced unto ten years; it being thought likely, that they would govern the better, when they knew, that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow [a] Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, in applying their times unto thoſe years of the Olympiads, wherein the chronological table, following this work, doth ſet them. For he not only profeſſeth himſelf to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted always the years of the Greeks, how they did anſwer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of his hiſtory. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the firſt year of the ſeventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the ſame was the firſt year of Charop's government in Athens; I hope I ſhall not need excuſe, for varying from Pauſanias, who ſets the beginning of theſe Athenians ſomewhat ſooner.

In the reign of Manaſſes it was, that Midas, whom the poets feigned to have had aſſes ears, held the kingdom of Phrygia. Many fables were deviſed of him; eſpecially that he obtain'd of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he ſhould touch, might immediately be chang'd into gold: by which means he had like to have been ſtarv'd (his meat and drink being ſubject to the ſame tranſformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from this miſerable faculty, by cauſing him to waſh himſelf in the river Pactolus, the ſtream whereof hath ever ſince forſooth abounded in that precious metal. Finally it is ſaid, he died by drinking bulls blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flouriſh'd that Antimachus, who (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obſerv'd the moon's eclipſe at the foundation of Rome.

The Mileſians, or (as Euſebius hath it) the Athenians, having obtain'd ſome power by ſea, founded Macicratis a city on the eaſt of Egypt. Pſammiticus herein ſeems to have aſſiſted them, who uſed all means of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his ſureſt ſtrength. For neither Miletus, nor Athens, were now of power ſufficient to plant a colony in Egypt by force.

About this time, Archias with his companion Miſcellus, and other Corinthians, founded [b] Syracuſe in Sicily: a city in after-times exceeding famous.

The city of Nicomedia, ſometime [c] Aſtacus, was inlarg'd and beautify'd in this age, by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sibylla of Samus according to Pauſanias lived much about this time.

About theſe times alſo was Croton founded upon the bay of Tarentum by Miſcellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracuſe: Strabo makes it ſomewhat more ancient, and ſo doth Pauſanius.

About the ſame time, the Parthenians, being of age, and baniſhed Lacedemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy, where it is ſaid they founded Tarentum: but [d] Juſtin and Pauſanias find it built before, and by them conquer'd and amplify'd. Alſo about the ſame time, Manaſſes yet living, the city Phaſelis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the region of the Umbri, now called Urbin in Italy. About which time alſo Chalcedon in Aſia, over-againſt Byzantium (now Conſtantinople) was founded by the Megarenſes: who therefore were upbraided as blind, becauſe they choſe not the other ſide of Boſphorus. It were a long work to rehearſe all that is ſaid to have been done in the five and fifty years of Manaſſes: that which hath already been told is enough: the reſt, being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reſerving only Ben Merodach and Nabulaſſar, to the buſineſs that will ſhortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manaſſes to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

SECT. I.

Of Ammon and Joſias.

AMMON the ſon of Manaſſe, a man no leſs wicked than was his father before his converſion, reſtored the exerciſe of all ſorts of idolatry: for which [a] God harden'd the hearts of his own ſervants againſt him: who ſlew him after he had reigned two years: Philo, Euſebius and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

Joſias ſucceeded unto Ammon, being but a child of eight years old. He began to ſeek after the God of David his father; and in his twelfth year he purged [b] Juda and Jeruſalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten images: and they broke down in his ſight the altars of Baalim. He cauſed all the images, as well thoſe which were graven, as molten, to be ſtamp'd to powder, and ſtrew'd on their graves that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his dominions. He alſo ſlew thoſe that ſacrified to the ſun and moon, and cauſed the chariots and horſes of the ſun to be burnt. Of Joſias it was propheſied, in the time of Jeroboam the firſt, when he erected the golden calf at Bethel, that a child ſhould be born unto the houſe of David, Joſias by name, and [c] upon thee (ſaid the prophet ſpeaking to the altar) ſhall he ſacrifice the prieſts of the high places, that burn incenſe upon thee. A prophecy very remarkable.

In the 18th year of his reign, he rebuilt and repaired the temple, at which time Helkiah the prieſt found the book of Moſes called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which he ſent to the king: which when he had cauſed to be read before him, and conſidered of the ſevere commandments therein written, the proſperity promiſed to thoſe that obſerve them, and the ſorrow and extirpation to the reſt, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to ask counſel of the propheteſs Huldah, or Olda, concerning the book, who anſwered the meſſengers in theſe words: [d] Thus ſaith the Lord, behold I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curſes that are written in the book, which they have read before the king of Juda, becauſe they have forſaken me, and burnt incenſe to other Gods. Only for the [e] king himſelf, becauſe he was a lover of God and of his laws, it was promis'd that this evil ſhould not fall on Juda and Jeruſalem in his days, but that he himſelf ſhould inherit his grave in peace.

Joſias aſſembled the elders, cauſed the book to be read unto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and cauſed all that were found in Jeruſalem and Benjamin to do the like, promiſing thereby to obſerve the laws and commandments in the book contained.

The execution done by Joſias upon the altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the falſe prophets, at Bethel, argueth his dominion to have extended unto thoſe countries, that had been part of the kingdom of the ten tribes. Yet I do not think, that any victory of Joſias in war got poſſeſſion of theſe places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Sennacherib, when Merodach oppoſed himſelf againſt Aſarhaddon, did uſe the advantage which the faction in the north preſented unto him, and laid hold upon ſo much of the kingdom of Iſrael, as he was able to people. Otherwiſe alſo it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himſelf unable to deal with Pſammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raiſe the ſiege of Azotus, tho' the town held out 29 years) did give unto Manaſſes, together with his liberty, as much in Iſrael as himſelf could not eaſily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the kings of Juda had ſo long held with thoſe of Egypt, by caſting a bone between them, and withal by this benefit of enlarging their territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendſhip of the Jews, which had been loſt by injuries done, in ſeeking to bereave them of their own. When it is ſaid, that Manaſſes did after his deliverance from impriſonment, [f] put captains of war in all the ſtrong cities of Juda; it may be that ſome ſuch buſineſs is intimated, as the taking poſſeſſion, and fortifying of places deliver'd into his hands. For though it be manifeſt that he took much pains, in making Jeruſalem it ſelf more defenſible; yet I ſhould rather believe, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortify himſelf againſt the Egyptians, whoſe ſide he had forſaken, than that he travelled in making ſuch proviſions, only for his mind's ſake. The earneſtneſs of Joſias in the king of Babel's quarrel doth argue, that the compoſition which Manaſſes had made, with that king or his anceſtor, was upon ſuch friendly terms, as required not only a faithful obſervation, but a thankful requital. For no perſuaſions could ſuffice to make Joſias ſit ſtill, and hold himſelf quiet in good neutrality, when Pharaoh Neco king of Egypt paſſed along by him, to war upon the countries about the river of Euphrates.

The laſt year of Joſias's it was, when as Neco, the ſon of Pſammiticus, came with a powerful army towards the border of Judea, determining to paſs that way being the neareſt towards [g] Euphrates, either to ſtrengthen the paſſages of that river about Carchemiſh or Cercuſium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Diocleſian is ſaid by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done) or perhaps to invade Syria it ſelf. For it ſeemeth that the travel of Pſammiticus had not been idlly conſumed about that one town of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in poſſeſſion of no ſmall part of Syria, eſpecially in thoſe quarters, that had formerly belonged unto the Adads kings of Damaſco.

Neither was the induſtry of Neco leſs than his father's had been, in purſuing the war againſt Babel. In which war, two things may greatly have avail'd the Egyptians, and advanc'd their affairs and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better ſoldiers than Egypt could of it ſelf afford; and the danger wherein Aſſyria ſtood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more abſolute princes began to feel it ſelf better, and to ſhew what it could do. Theſe were great helps, but of ſhorter endurance than was the war; as in place more convenient ſhall be noted. At the preſent it ſeems, that either ſome preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or ſome diſability of theirs to make reſiſtance, did invite the king of Egypt into the countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharaoh Neco aſcended with a mighty army.

Theſe two great monarchs, having their ſwords drawn, and contending for the empire of that part of the world, Joſias adviſed with himſelf to which of theſe he might adhere, having his territory ſet in the mid way between both, ſo as the one could not invade the other, but that they muſt of neceſſity tread upon the very face and body of his country: now tho' it were ſo, that Neco himſelf deſired by his embaſſadors [a] leave to paſs along by Judea, proteſting that he directed himſelf againſt the Aſſyrians only, without all harmful purpoſe againſt Joſias; yet all ſufficed not, but the king of Iſrael would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught what little good the friendſhip of Egypt could bring to thoſe that had affiance therein: as that of Hoſea, the laſt king of Iſrael, who, when he fell from the dependance of the Aſſyrian, and wholly truſted to Sabacus or Sous, king of Egypt, was utterly diſappointed of his hopes, and in concluſion loſt both his life and eſtate, which the Aſſyrian ſo rooted up, and tore in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or re-planted. The calamities alſo, that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezekia, whilſt that good king and his people relied upon Sethon, and more lately, the impriſonment of Manaſſes, were documents of ſufficient proof, to ſhew the ill aſſurance, that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (near neighbours tho' they were) were always unready, when the neceſſities of their friends required their aſſiſtance. The remembrance hereof might be the reaſon why Neco did not ſeek to have the Jews renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to ſit ſtill, and behold the paſtime between him and the Aſſyrians. This was an eaſy thing to grant, ſeeing that the countenance of ſuch an army, as did ſoon after this out-face Nabulaſſar, upon his own borders, left unto the Jews a lawful excuſe of fear, had they forborn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I believe, that this religious and virtuous prince Joſias was not ſtirred up only by politick reſpects, to ſtop the way of Neco, but thought himſelf bound in faith and honour, to do his beſt in defence of the Babylonian crown; whereunto his kingdom was obliged, either by covenant made at the enlargement of Manaſſes, or by the gift of ſuch part as he held in the kingdom of the ten tribes. As for the princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occaſion to ſhew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendſhip was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some think, that this action of Joſias was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the prophet; which I do not find in the prophecy of Jeremy, nor can find reaſon to believe. Others hold opinion, that he forgat to ask the counſel of God: and this is very likely, ſeeing he might believe that an enterpriſe grounded upon fidelity and thankfulneſs, due to the king of Babel, could not but be diſpleaſing unto the Lord. But the wickedneſs of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken ſuch root, as all the care of Joſias in reforming the land could not pluck up) was queſtionleſs far from hearkening how the matter would ſtand with God's pleaſure, and much farther from enquiring into his ſecret will, wherein it was determined, that their good king, whoſe life ſtood between them and their puniſhment, ſhould now be taken from among them, and that in ſuch ſort, as his death ſhould give entrance to the miſeries enſuing. So Joſias, levying all the ſtrength he could make, near unto Megiddo, in the half tribe of Manaſſes, encounter'd Neco: and there he received the ſtroke of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jeruſalem, brought him to the ſepulchres of his anceſtors. His loſs was greatly bewailed of all the people and princes of Juda, eſpecially of Jeremy the prophet; who inſerted a ſorrowful remembrance thereof in his book of [b] Lamentations.

SECT. II.

Of Pharaoh Neco, that fought with Joſias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim, kings of Juda.

OF theſe wars, and particularly of this victory, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Necco. He tells us of this king, that he went about to make a channel, whereby ſhips might paſs out of Nilus into the Red ſea. It ſhould have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two gallies to row in front. But in the midſt of the work, an oracle foretold that the barbarians ſhould have the benefit of it, which cauſed Neco to deſiſt when half was done. There were conſumed in this toilſome buſineſs twelve hundred thouſand Egyptians; a loſs great enough to make the king forſake his enterpriſe, without troubling the oracle for admonition. Howſoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a fleet, and levied a great army, wherewith he marched againſt the king of Babel. In this expedition he uſed the ſervice, as well of his navy as of his land forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, ſave only this victory againſt Joſias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolus, and the Jews Syrians; which is a ſmall error, ſeeing that Judea was a province of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have been the ſame place (though diverſly named) in which this battle was fought. After this, Necus took the city of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemiſh, by Euphrates, and made himſelf lord in a manner of all Syria, as [c] Joſephus witneſſeth.

Particularly we find, that the Phenicians, one of the moſt powerful nations in Syria, were his ſubjects, and that by his command they ſurrounded all Africa, [d] ſetting ſail from the gulf of Arabia, and ſo paſſing along all the coaſt, whereon they both landed, as need required, and ſowed corn for their ſuſtenance, in that long voyage which laſted three years. This was the firſt navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called of good hope, was diſcovered; which after was forgotten, until Vaſco de Gama, the Portugueſe, found it out, following a contrary courſe to that which the Phenicians held; for they, beginning in the eaſt, ran the way of the ſun, ſouth and then weſtward, after which they returned home by the pillars and ſtreights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the ſtreights of Gibraltar, having Africk ſtill on the right-hand: but the Portugueſe, beginning their voyage not far from the ſame ſtreights, leave Africk on the larboard, and bend their courſe unto the eaſt. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durſt not believe, how the ſun in this journey was on their right-hand, that is, on the north ſide of them, is a matter of neceſſary truth; and the obſervation then made hereof makes me the better to believe, that ſuch a voyage was indeed performed.

But leaving theſe diſcourſes of Neco's magnificence, let us tell what he did in matters more importing his eſtate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were buſy at Carchemiſh, had made Jehoahaz their king, in the room of his father Joſias. The prophet [a] Jeremy calls this new king Shallum by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the ſhort reign of Shallum king of the ten tribes: for Shallum of Iſrael reigned but one month, Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldeſt ſon of Joſias. Wherefore it may ſeem that he was ſet up as the beſt affected unto the king of Babel; the reſt of his houſe being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appears by the ſequel. An idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had diſpatched his buſineſs in the north parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Judea. This country was now ſo far from making any reſiſtance, that the king himſelf came from Riblath in the land of Hamath, where the matter went ſo ill on his ſide, that Neco did caſt him into bonds, and carry him priſoner into Egypt, giving away his kingdom to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This city of Riblath, in after-times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the kings and princes of Juda, as may be obſerv'd in divers examples. Yet here Jehoiakim, together with his new name, got his kingdom; an ill gain, ſince he could no better uſe it. But however Jehoiakim thrived by the bargain, Pharaoh ſped well, making that kingdom tributary, without any ſtroke ſtricken, which three months before was too ſtout to give him peace, when he deſired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to waſte his forces upon Judea: but now the reputation of his good ſucceſs at Megiddo and Carchemiſh, together with the diſſenſion of the princes Joſias's ſons (of whom the eldeſt is probably thought to have ſtormed at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to do even what ſhould pleaſe himſelf. Yet he did forbear to make a conqueſt of the land; perhaps upon the ſame reaſon which had made him ſo earneſt in ſeeking to hold peace with it. For the Jews had ſuffered much in the Egyptians quarrel, and being left by theſe their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven to forſake that party, and join with the enemies; to whom if they ſhew'd themſelves faithful, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them, ſeeing they were ſuch a people, as would not upon every occaſion ſhift ſide, but endure more than Pharaoh, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth ſhould lay upon them: ſo good a patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheleſs he laid upon them a tribute of an hundred talents of ſilver, and one talent of gold; that ſo he might both reap at the preſent ſome fruit of his pains taken, and leave unto them ſome document, in the future, of greater puniſhment than verbal anger, due to them, if they ſhould rebel. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate king Jehoahaz, who died in his captivity.

The reign of Jehoahaz was included in the end of his father's laſt year; otherwiſe it would hardly be found, that Jehoiakim his ſucceſſor did reign ten whole years, whereas the ſcriptures give him eleven; that are current, and incompleat. If any man will rather caſt the three months of this ſhort reign into the firſt year of the brother, than into the father's laſt; the ſame arguments that ſhall maintain his opinion, will alſo prove the matter to be unworthy of diſputation; and ſo I leave it.

Jehoiakim, in impiety, was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his crown at the hand of Pharaoh. The wickedneſs of theſe laſt kings, being expreſſed in ſcripture none otherwiſe than by general words, with reference to all the evil that their fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poiſon wherewith Ahaz and Manaſſes had infected the land, was not ſo expelled by the zealous goodneſs of Joſias, but that it ſtill cleaved unto the chief of the people, [b] Yea unto the chief of the prieſts alſo; and therefore it was not ſtrange that the kings had their part therein. The royal authority was much abaſed by the dangers wherein the country ſtood, in this troubleſome age: the princes did in a manner what they liſted; neither would the kings forbear to profeſs, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him inſolent and cruel; as we find by that example of his dealing with Uria the prophet: tho' herein alſo the princes do appear to have been inſtigators. This holy man denounced God's judgments againſt the city, and temple, in like ſort as other prophets had formerly done, and did in the ſame age. The king, with all the men of power, and all the princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poor man fled into Egypt: but ſuch regard was had unto Jehoiakim, that Uria was delivered unto his ambaſſador, and ſent back to the death; contrary to the cuſtom uſed, both in thoſe days and ſince among all civil nations of giving refuge unto ſtrangers, that are not held guilty of ſuch inhuman crimes, as for the general good of mankind ſhould be exempted from all privilege.

It concerned Pharaoh to give all contentment poſſible to Jehoiakim; for the Aſſyrian lion, that had not ſtirred in many years, began about theſe times, to roar ſo loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatning to make himſelf lord of all the foreſt. The cauſes that hitherto had withdrawn the houſe of Merodach from oppoſing the Egyptian in his conqueſts of Syria, require our conſideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Carchemiſh, where ſhortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

SECT. III.

Of the kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to paſs that the kings of Babel could not give attendance on their buſineſs in Syria; which cauſed them to loſe that province.

Merodach the ſon of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Sennacherib's miſadventure and death, together with the diſſenſion between his children preſented, made himſelf king of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerful enemy Aſarhaddon the ſon of Sennacherib, reigning over the Aſſyrians in Nineveh; from whom whilſt he could not any other way divert his cares, he was fain to omit all buſineſs in Syria, and (as hath been formerly ſhewed) to make over unto Ezekia ſome part of the kingdom of the ten tribes. From this moleſtation, the death of Aſarhaddon did not only ſet him free, but gave unto him

[a] Jer. 22. 32. [b] 2 Chron. 36. 14.

ſome part of Aſſyria, if not (as is commonly but leſs probably thought) the whole kingdom. How greatly this was to the liking of the Aſſyrians, I will not here ſtand to enquire; his long reign following, and his little intermeddling in matters of Syria make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or eſtabliſhing that which he had gotten. Joſephus gives him the honour of having won Nineveh it ſelf; which we may believe; but ſurely he did not hold it long. For in the times ſoon following, that great city was free, and vanquiſhed Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon ſome capitulation: and refuſed afterwards to continue ſubject when the king being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Aſſyrian king whoſe captains took Manaſſes priſoner; but I rather believe thoſe that hold the contrary; for which I have given my reaſons in due place. To ſay truth, I find little cauſe why Merodach ſhould have looked into thoſe parts, as long as the Jews were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the northern empire, held themſelves quiet at home, which was until the time of Pſammiticus, about the end of this king's reign, or the beginning of his ſon.

Ben Merodach the ſon and ſucceſſor of this king, is not mentioned in the ſcriptures; yet is he named by good conſent of authors, and that ſpeak little of his doings. The length of his reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years, for ſo much remaineth of the time that paſſed between the beginning of his father's and his nephew's reigns (which is a known ſum) deducting the years of his father, and of his ſon Nabulaſſar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manaſſes priſoner, and releas'd him. He ſped ill in Syria, where Pſammiticus, by virtue of his mercenary Greeks, did much prevail. This may have been ſome cauſe that he releaſed Manaſſes, and did put into his hands ſome part more of the kingdom of Samaria: which is made probable by circumſtances alledged before.

Nabulaſſar, that reigned in Babylon after his father Ben Merodach, had greater buſineſs in his own kingdom, than would permit him to look abroad; inſomuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or overſight of Pſammiticus and Neco, that they did not occupy ſome good part of his dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes king of the Medes invaded Aſſyria, and beſieged Nineveh; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulaſſar, but conſtrained to remove by the coming of Scythians, who in theſe agaes did overflow thoſe parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could maſter by ſtrong hand. Of theſe Scythians, and the lordſhip that they held in Aſia, it is convenient that I ſpeak in this place; ſhewing briefly aforehand, how the Medes, upon whom they firſt fell, were buſied in the ſame times with hopes of conquering Aſſyria.

Phraortes, the ſon of Deioces, king of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his dominions, conceived at length a fair poſſibility of making himſelf lord of Nineveh.

That city (as [a] Herodotus reports it) having been a ſoveraign lady, was not forſaken of all her dependants; yet remained in ſuch caſe, that of herſelf ſhe was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howſoever Merodach had gotten poſſeſſion of this imperial ſeat, and made it ſubject as was the reſt of the country; yet it found the means to ſet it ſelf at liberty: as after this again it did appear, when it had been regained by Nabulaſſar his grand-child.

Sharp war, and the very novelty of ſudden violence, uſe to diſmay any ſtate or country, not inur'd to the like: but cuſtom of danger hardneth even thoſe that are unwarlike. Nineveh had been the palace of many valiant kings lately reigning therein; it had ſuffered, and reſiſted all the fury, wherewith either domeſtic tumults between the ſons of Sennacherib, or foreign war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leſs wonderful, that Phraortes did ſpeed ſo ill in his journey againſt it. He and the moſt of his army periſhed in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumſtances (perhaps he undervalued their forces, and brought a leſs power than was needful.) It is enough that we may herein believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares, the ſon of Phraortes, a braver man of war than his father, won as much of Aſia the leſs, as lay eaſtward from the river of Halys; he ſought revenge upon the Aſſyrians for the death of his father, and beſieged Nineveh it ſelf, having a purpoſe to deſtroy it. I rather believe Euſebius, That he took the city and fulfilled his diſpleaſure upon it, than Herodotus, That the Scythian army came upon him whilſt he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictory (as Euſebius, tho' far later than Herodotus, yet having ſeen other authors, that are now loſt, is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it beſt, to yield unto the beſt likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whilſt he lay before Nineveh, were to accuſe him of greater improvidence, than ought to be ſuſpected in one commended as a good ſoldier. But to ſuppoſe that he was fain to leave the town, when a war ſo dangerous fell upon his own country, doth well agree both with the condition of ſuch buſineſs as that Scythian expedition brought into thoſe parts, and with the ſtate of the Chaldean and Aſſyrian affairs enſuing.

The deſtruction of this great city is both foretold in the book of Tobit, and there ſet down as happening about theſe times; of which book whoſoever was the author, he was ancient enough to know the ſtory of thoſe ages, and hath committed no ſuch error in reckoning of times, as ſhould cauſe us to diſtruſt him in this. As for the prophecy of Nahum, tho' it be not limited to any certain term, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the final deſtruction of Nineveh by Nabuchodonoſor, according to the common opinion. For the prophet hath mention of a conqueſt of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will ſpeak in due place. Some that aſcribe more authority, than the reformed churches yield, to the book of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of neceſſity, to affirm, that about theſe times Nineveh was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it, to Ben Merodach: a needleſs conjecture, if the place of Euſebius be well conſidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulaſſar the ſon of Ben Merodach did ſeize upon it, and place a king or viceroy therein, about ſuch time as the country of Aſſyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian war overwhelmed Media. For then was the conqueſt wrought out ready to his hand; the ſwelling ſpirits of the Ninevites were allay'd, and their malice to Babylon ſo much aſſwaged, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nubulaſſar, appointing unto them a peculiar king, took him and them into protection: though afterwards, to their confuſion, this unthankful people and their king rebelled again, as ſhall be ſhewed in the reign of Nabuchodonoſor.

SECT. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Aſia eight and twenty years.

† I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I have ſhewed, what impediment was given by the Aſſyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much diſabled to perform any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I ſpeak of that great Scythian expedition, which grievouſly afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the countries adjacent, in ſuch wiſe that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themſelves. Of the Scythian people in general, Herodotus makes very large diſcourſe, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many fables; of this expedition he tells many particulars, but ill agreeing with conſent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleſs to recite them, for they are far enough diſtant from the buſineſs in hand. The computation of times, which by inference out of his relations, may ſeem very ſtrange, needeth ſome anſwer in this place: leſt otherwiſe I ſhould either ſeem to make my ſelf too bold with an author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale, or elſe to be too forgetful of my ſelf, in bringing to act upon the ſtage thoſe perſons which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years he ſaith that the Scythians reign'd in Aſia, before Cyaxares delivered the country from them. Yet he reports a war, between Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the ſiege of Nineveh; the ſiege of Nineveh being ere the Scythians came. And further he tells, how the Scythians, having vanquiſhed the Medes, did paſs into Syria, and were encounter'd in Paleſtina by Pſammiticus king of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. Theſe narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true, tho' not in ſuch order of time as he hath marſhal'd them. For Pſammiticus was dead, before Cyaxares began to reign: and Cyaxares had ſpent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was king of Lydia; ſo that he could not, after thoſe Lydian wars, reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Euſebius doth alſo call Pſammis, the ſon of Pharaoh Neco, by the name of Pſammiticus; and this king Pſammis may, by ſome ſtrain'd conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians; for he lived with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Euſebius himſelf refers all that buſineſs of the Scythian eruption into Paleſtina, to Pſammiticus the father of Neco, whom he leaves dead before the reign of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not rely upon Herodotus in this matter, otherwiſe than to believe him, that ſuch things were in theſe ages, though not in ſuch order as he ſets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can thoſe memorials which I find of this expedition ſcattered in divers places; a work neceſſary, for that the greatneſs of this action was ſuch, as ought not to be omitted in a general hiſtory; yet not eaſy, the conſent of thoſe that have written thereof being nothing near to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reign of Ardys, king of Lydia, the Cimmerians over-ran that kingdom, and were not expelled, until Halyattes, the nephew of Ardys, got the upper hand of them. In theſe times therefore of Ardys, Sadyattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Aſia. Now foraſmuch as Pſammiticus the Egyptian had ſome dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their proſperity, we muſt needs allow more than one or two of his laſt years unto this their dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes's reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years compleat after the death of Pſammiticus, leaves the ſpace very ſcant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, neceſſarily ſuppoſed before they could meet the Egyptian in Syria, or for thoſe many loſſes, which they muſt have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increaſe this difficulty, the victorious reign of Nabuchodonoſor in Babylon is of no ſmall moment. For how may we think it poſſible, that he ſhould have adventured the ſtrength of his kingdom againſt the Egyptians and Jews, had he ſtood in daily fear of loſing his own; to a more mighty nation, that lay upon his neck? To ſpeak ſimply; as it appears to me, the victories aſcribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes, over theſe warlike people, were not obtained againſt the whole body of their army, but were the defeatures of ſome troops, that infeſted their ſeveral kingdoms; other princes, and among theſe, Nabulaſſar having the like ſucceſs, when the pleaſures of Aſia had mollified the courage of theſe hardy northern lads. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almoſt the laſt of Nabulaſſar's reign, in compaſs whereof their power was at the greateſt. This is all that I can ſay of the time, wherein Aſia ſuffered the violence of theſe oppreſſors.

† II.

What nations they were that broke into Aſia; with the cauſe of their journey.

TOuching the expedition it ſelf, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians, being driven out of their country by the Scythians, invaded and waſted ſome part of Aſia; and that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the world, ſo (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this purſuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and baſe people; the Scythians, as miſchievous and fooliſh; or elſe Herodotus, and ſome other of his countrymen, great ſlanderers of thoſe by whom their nation had been beaten, and Jonia more than once grievouſly ranſack'd. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is ſo well known, and their many conqueſts ſo well teſtified in hiſtories of divers nations, that the malice of the Greeks is inſufficient to ſtain them with the note of cowards. Theſe were the poſterity of Gomer, who peopled the greateſt part of our weſtern world, and whoſe re-flow did overwhelm no ſmall portion of Greece and Aſia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now intreat. He that would more largely inform himſelf of their original and actions, may peruſe Goropius Becanus's Amazonica; of many things in which book, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is ſaid to have ſpoken of all Goropius's works, That it is eaſy to laugh at them, but hard to confute them. There we we find it proved, by ſuch arguments and authorities as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one lineage and nation, howſoever diſtinguiſhed in name, by reaſon of their divers tribes, profeſſions, or perhaps dialect of ſpeech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whoſe country whether he placeth in the weſt, as near unto the ocean and bounds of the earth, or in the north, as being far from the ſun, and covered with eternal darkneſs, certain it is that he would have them near neighbours to hell; for he had the ſame quarrel to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them ſeem a kind of goblins. It was the manner of this great poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to inſert into his works the names of ſuch as lived in his own times, making ſuch mention of them, as the good or ill, done by them to himſelf, deſerved. And for this reaſon it is proved by Euſtathius, that the Cimmerians were ſo diſgraced by him, becauſe they had waſted his country. Perhaps, that invaſion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus's diſcourſe with Helen, was the very ſame, which Euſebius noteth to have happen'd ſomewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons together invaded Aſia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Aſia; which tho' it be not in expreſs terms written, that they did with joint forces, yet ſeeing they invaded the ſelf-ſame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned alſo by Euſebius, was by the ſtreights of the Cimmerians, as we find in [a] Diodore, who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them aſſiſtance. [b] The ſame author, before his entry into thoſe diſcourſes of the Amazons, which himſelf acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been wives of the Scythians, and no leſs warlike than their husbands; alledging the example of that queen, who is ſaid to have ſlain the great Perſian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wives along with them to the wars, and how deſperate the courage was of thoſe women, the terrible deſcent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proof ſufficient. I will not here enter into a diſcourſe of the Amazons; another place will give me better leiſure to ſpeak of them: but ſeeing that they are noted by divers hiſtorians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Goropius's concluſion, that theſe three nations were one, at leaſt that they were near allies.

Now as concerning the expulſion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the ſending a colony of them forth into Aſia, with an army of Scythians to help them, in purchaſing a new ſeat, and eſtabliſhing the plantation.

The Sarmatians alſo were companions in this journey. For the city of Novograd in Ruſſia (which country is the ſame that was call'd Sarmatia) ſtood in their way homewards, as ſhall anon be further ſhew'd. So that all the north was up in arms: and therefore it is no marvel, though many countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the ſame people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encounter'd by the Romans. For they iſſued from the parts about the lake Mæotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted (ſaith [c] Plutarch in the moſt likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their army above three hundred thouſand fighting men, beſides a huge multitude of women and children; they wander'd over many countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have ſettled themſelves in Italy, they divided their company, for the more eaſy paſſage thither, and were conſum'd in three terrible battels by the Roman conſuls. Mere neceſſity enforc'd theſe poor nations to trouble the world, in following ſuch hard adventures. For their country, being more fruitful of men than of ſuſtenance, and ſhut up on the north ſide with intolerable cold, which denied iſſue that way to their overſwelling multitudes; they were compelled to diſcharge upon the ſouth, and by right or wrong to drive others out of poſſeſſion, as having title to all that they had power to get, becauſe they wanted all, that weaker, but more civil, people had. Their ſturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardineſs, gave them great advantage over ſuch as were accuſtom'd unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thouſand ſuperfluities. Wherefore moſt commonly they prevail'd very far; their next neighbours giving them free paſſage, that they might the ſooner be rid of them; others giving them, beſides paſſage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great preſents; ſo as the farther they went on, the more pleaſant lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

† III.

Of the Cimmerians war in Lydia.

THE firſt company of theſe, conſiſting for the moſt part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine ſeas, which they had ſtill on the right hand; leaving on the other ſide, and behind them, the great mountains of Caucaſus. Theſe having paſs'd thro' the land of Colchis, that is now call'd Mengrelli, enter'd the country of Pontus, and being arrived in [d] Paphlagonia, fortify'd the promontory whereon Sinope, a famous haven town of the Greeks, was after built. Here it ſeems that they beſtow'd the weakeſt and moſt unſerviceable of their train, together with the heavieſt part of their carriages, under ſome good guard: as drawing near to thoſe regions, in conqueſt whereof they were to try the utmoſt hazard. For in like ſort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I ſpoke even now) diſpoſe of their impediments, leaving them in a place of ſtrength, where Antwerp now ſtands, when they drew near unto Gaul, upon which they determin'd to adventure themſelves in the purchaſe. From Sinope, the way into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was fair and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of mountains or any deep rivers to ſtay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already paſſed.

What battels were fought between theſe invaders and the Lydians, and with what variable ſucceſs the one or other part won and loſt, I find not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got poſſeſſion of Sardes the capital city of Lydia; only the caſtle holding out againſt them. Further I obſerve, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys kings of Lydia, before this invaſion, and by Halyattes and Cræſus in the times following; all that Ardys did againſt the Cimmerians, and all, ſave burning the Mileſians corn-fields, that was done in 12 years by Sadiattes his ſon (who perhaps had his hands ſo full of this buſineſs, that he could turn them to nothing elſe) is quite omitted: whereby it may ſeem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in thoſe wars, but were glad enough that they did not loſe all.

Certainly, the miſeries of war are never ſo bitter and many, as when a whole nation, or great part of it, forſaking their own ſeats, labour to root out the eſtabliſh'd poſſeſſors of another land, making room for themſelves, their wives and children. They that fight for the maſtery are pacify'd with tribute, or with ſome other ſervices and acknowledgments, which had they been yielded at the firſt, all had been quiet, and no ſword bloodied. But in theſe migrations, the aſſailants bring ſo little with them, that they need all which the defendants have, their lands and cattel, their houſes and their goods, even to the cradles of the ſucking infants. The mercileſs terms of this controverſy arm both ſides with deſperate reſolution: ſeeing the one part muſt either win, or periſh by famine; the other defend their goods, or loſe their lives without redemption. Moſt of the countries in Europe have felt examples hereof; and the mighty empire of Rome was overthrown by ſuch invaſions. But our iſle of Britain can beſt witneſs the diverſity of conqueſts; having, by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all civil arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but ſlenderly inſtructed therein before; whereas the iſſue of the Saxon and Daniſh wars, was, as were the cauſes, quite contrary. For theſe did not ſeek after the dominion only, but the entire poſſeſſion of the country, which the Saxons obtain'd, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the Britiſh race, and defacing all memorial of the ancient inhabitants thro' the greater part of the land. But the Danes (who are alſo of the Cimmerian blood) found ſuch end of their enterpriſe, as may ſeem that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Aſia, did arrive unto. So that by conſidering the proceſs of the one, we ſhall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battels the Danes won; yet none of ſuch importance, as ſuffic'd to make them abſolute conquerors: many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not ſo great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firm footing. But in courſe of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred ſuch acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both theſe people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their diſagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduc'd into one mild temper, no ſmall number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great ſlaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own country wide enough to receive them, as having diſburthened it ſelf of many thouſands, that were ſent to ſeek their graves abroad. And ſuch (as I think) was the end of the Cimmerian war in Lydia; whereunto tho' ſome victory of Halyattes may have haſten'd the concluſion, yet the weariſome length of time ſeems to have done moſt in compelling them to deſire of reſt. I know not why I ſhould fear to add hereunto my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was ſo compounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the river of Halys ſhould divide their territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the eaſtern-ſide of the river was the country of the Amazons, that is indeed of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people, whoſe wives and daughters theſe warlike women are ſuppoſed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrel enſuing, between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is ſaid) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median ſought revenge. And it ſtands with reaſon, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weaken'd with mutual ſlaughters, ſhould have join'd in a league of mutual defence, for their common ſafety: though otherwiſe it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his kingdom ſo far weſtward, whatſoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon ſuch as had ſpoil'd each of their countries. As for that occaſion of the war between theſe two kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little weight, and leſs propability. He tells of Scythians, that being chas'd out of their country by faction, came unto Cyaxares; who committed unto them certain boys, to be inſtructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of archery. Now it ſo fell out (ſaith he, lib. 1.) that theſe Scythians uſing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home ſomewhat with them, did nevertheleſs otherwhiles miſs of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the king being froward and cholerick, bitterly revil'd them; and they, as impatient as he, kill'd one of the boys that was under their charge, whom, dreſſing like veniſon, they preſented unto him; which done they fled unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a war that laſted ſix years between the Medes and Lydians; the one king demanding theſe fugitives to be deliver'd into his hand; the other refuſing to betray ſuch men as were become his ſuppliants. To this I will ſay no more, than that I ſee no cauſe that might induce the Scythians to betake themſelves to either of theſe kings, unto whom their nation had wrought ſo much diſpleaſure. Particularly they had reaſon to diſtruſt Cyaxares, for the treachery that he ſhew'd in the maſſacring of their countrymen, that were in his kingdom; of whom it is now meet that we ſhould ſpeak.

† IV.

The war of the Scythians in the higher Aſia.

AS the Cimmerians held their courſe weſterly, along the ſhores of the Euxine ſea: ſo the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caſpian ſea on their left hand, paſſed between it and Caucaſus through Albania, Colthene, and other obſcure nations, where now are the countries of Servan and Georgia, and ſo they enter'd into Media. The Medes encounter'd them in arms; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any ageement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilſt Pſammiticus reign'd in Egypt. If it were in the 6th year of Nabuiaſſar's reign over Babylon (ſuppoſing him to have reigned 35; otherwiſe we muſt allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then do the 28 years of their dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonoſor was king; ſo giving him good leave to provide ſecurely, for the invaſion of Syria, which expedition he began while his father yet liv'd, as Joſephus out of Beroſus relates the hiſtory.

Now the Medes, deſirous to ſave themſelves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no luſt to a ſecond trial of the ſword, refuſed not to undergo the burthen of a tribute, but thought thought nothing diſhonourable, that would ſerve to remove theſe troubleſome gueſts into ſome other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding ſtill the countries pleaſanter and better, the further that they marched into the ſouth, did ſuffer themſelves to be perſuaded, that a little more travel would add a great deal more to their content. For they rely'd ſo much upon their own valour, that they feared no reſiſtance; and being the braveſt men, they thought it reaſon that they ſhould dwell in the beſt region. That Phraortes perſuaded them into Egypt, I do not think: Babylon was near enough; whither if he could ſend theſe locuſts to graze, then ſhould not his unfriendly neighbours have cauſe to laugh at his misfortune. What ſhift Nabulaſſar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not read. But it is well known, that his dominions lay in the midſt between Media and Egypt; as alſo, that they made all thoſe parts of Aſia tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they water'd their horſes in his rivers, and that he alſo was content to give them provender.

Pſammiticus hearing of their progreſs (like the jealous husband of a fair wife) took care that they might not look upon Egypt; leſt the ſight thereof ſhould more eaſily detain them there, than any force or perſuaſion, that he could uſe, would ſend them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, preſuming more on the great gifts which he meant to beſtow upon them, than on his army that ſhould keep them back. Egypt was rich; and half the riches thereof had not been ill ſpent in ſaving all. Yet Pſammiticus took the moſt likely courſe, whereby to make his part good againſt them by ſtrong hand, in caſe they had been ſo obſtinate as to refuſe all indifferent compoſition. For he lay cloſe upon the edge of the wilderneſs in Gaza (as I take it) the ſouthermoſt border of Paleſtina: whence he never advanc'd to meet with the Scythians; but gave them leave to feel as much of the ſcalding ſun-beams, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat upon them. When they were come as far as Aſcalon, the next city to Gaza, then did he aſſay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work ſo much the better, by how much the worſe they were pleaſed with the heat of a climate ſo far different from their own. Pſammiticus had at his back a vaſt wilderneſs, over the ſcorching ſands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary diſtempers, could ill have indured to purſue him, thro' unknown ways, had they fought with him and prevailed; eſpecially the kingdom of Egypt being ready to entertain him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, return'd back to viſit their acquaintance in the high countries. The Egyptian king (beſides that he preſerv'd his own eſtate from a dangerous adventure, by hiring this great army to depart from him) found all his coſt well repay'd in the proceſs of his wars in Syria, where the nations beyond Euphrates had no power to moleſt him, being more than ever troubled themſelves, with the return of their oppreſſors. For the Scythians, reſolving now to ſeek no further, began to demand more than the tribute formerly impoſed. And not contented to fleece the naturals with grievous exactions, they preſumed to live at diſcretion upon the country, taking what they liſted from the owners; and many times (as it were to ſave the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This tyrannous dominion they long uſed over the higher Aſia, that is, over the country lying between the Caſpian and Red ſeas, and between India and Aſia the leſs. Happy it was for the poor people, that in ſo large a ſpace of ground, there was room enough for theſe new comers; otherwiſe the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon thoſe private men, to whoſe wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in general upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it ſeems that the heavieſt burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitful country not far from their own home, and lay under a climate well agreeing with the conſtitution of their bodies; there alſo it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their inſolent rule was taken from them.

[a] Cyaxares king of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his land lay unmanured and waſte, through the negligence of his people that were out of heart by daily oppreſſions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, reſolved to prove what might be done by ſtratagem. The managing of the buſineſs is thus delivered in brief; that he, and his Medes, feaſted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and ſlew them, recovering hereby the poſſeſſion of all that they had loſt.

Such another ſlaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their countrymen, with greater cruelties than ever they had practiſed before. That the Scythians, which eſcaped this bloody feaſt, made any ſtir in Media, I do not find; neither do I read, that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invaſion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more ſtrange, for that the army returning home out of Media was very ſtrong, and encountred with oppoſition (as [b] Herodotus reports it) no leſs than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares, to free his country, took good effect, with leſs bloodſhed than hath been ſuppoſed. For if he ſurpriſed all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compoſition. Many of them doubtleſs in 28 years had ſo well ſettled themſelves, that they were deſirous of reſt, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remain in the country; many (of whom I ſhall ſpeak anon) having done what they could in the buſineſs, for which they came forth, were willing to return home with what they had gotten; ſuch as were not pleaſed with either of theſe two courſes, might go join with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or ſeek their fortunes in other provinces among their own companions. Whereas all the families of the north are ſaid to have been with Nebuchadnezzar, it may be underſtood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or deſire to keep what they had already gained, were content to become ſubject unto Nabulaſſar: mens love of their wealth being moſt effectual, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certain, that [c] Nebuchadnezzar, as ever after, ſo in his firſt beginning of war, did beat the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had been accuſtomed to deal with the Babylonians after another faſhion: and this new ſucceſs of that king may be imputed, in regard of human means, to ſuch addition as this of new forces.

Of the Scythian army returning out of Media, divers authors report a ſtory, which confirms me in the opinion, that this company went forth to aſſiſt their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new ſeat, and eſtabliſhing their plantation. For theſe had left their wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian women, to comfort themſelves in their husbands abſence, became bedfellows to their ſlaves. Theſe got a luſty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with fathers-in-law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were only the children of ſlaves which compounded an army (as Herodotus would have it, who tells us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it muſt needs be that they were very boys, or elſe that the women did very little while continue chaſt. Wherefore I rather believe the tale as it is told by the Ruſſes themſelves, who agreeing in the reſt with the conſent of hiſtories, make that report of their anceſtors returning homewards, which I will ſet down, as I find it, in [a] Doctor Fletcher's exact diſcourſe of the Ruſſe Common-wealth. They underſtood by the way that their cholopey, or bond-ſlaves whom they left at home, had in their abſence poſſeſſed their towns, lands, houſes, wives, and all. At which news being ſomewhat amazed, and yet diſdaining the villany of their ſervants, they made the more ſpeed home: and ſo not far from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching againſt them. Whereupon adviſing what was beſt to be done, they agreed alſo to ſet upon them with no other ſhew of weapon but with their horſe-whips (which, as their manner is, every man rideth withal) to put them in remembrance of their ſervile condition, thereby to terrify them, and abate their courage. And ſo marching on, and laſhing all together with their whips in their hands, they gave the onſet; which ſeemed ſo terrible in the ears of their villains, and ſtruck ſuch a ſenſe into them of the ſmart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like ſheep before the drivers. In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever ſince ſtamped their coin (which they call Novogrodskoy, current through all Ruſſia) with the figure of a horſeman ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may ſeem, that all the women in that country, have fared the worſe ever ſince, in regard of this univerſal fault: for ſuch a pudkey or whip, as terrified thoſe ſlaves, curiouſly wrought by her ſelf, is the firſt preſent that the Muſcovian wife, even in time of wooing, ſends to him that ſhall be her husband, in token of ſubjection; being well aſſur'd to feel it often on her own loins. But this was a document unto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Novograd ſtands in the country that was call'd Sarmatia) to beware of abſenting themſelves any more ſo long from their wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to ſet down of the Scythian Expedition; not only becauſe it is the moſt memorable act perform'd abroad by that nation, famous in hiſtories, and terrible to many countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cauſe of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judea, which continues yet a while the centre of our diſcourſe.

SECT. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries in theſe Ages.

HAving thus far digreſſed from the matters of Juda, to avoid all further occaſion of doing the like, I will here inſert a note of ſuch kings and men of mark, as were between the death of Manaſſes, and the ruin of Jeruſalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have ſpoken as much as I thought needful. In Rome, Tullus Hoſtilius held the kingdom, until the one and twentieth year of Joſias; at which time Ancus Marcius ſucceeding, reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priſcus, a new come ſtranger, but very rich, prevail'd ſo far by his graciouſneſs among the people, that he got the kingdom to himſelf, diſappointing the ſons of Ancus, over whom he was tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely in the ſecond year of the thirtieth olympiad, that the Lacedemonians, bethinking them how to be aveng'd of the Arcadians, who gave ſuccour to the Meſſenians againſt them in the former war, enter'd the territory, took the city of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their garriſons were ſoon after beaten out. Cypſelus expelling the race of the Bacidæ made himſelf lord of Corinth about theſe times, and govern'd it in peace thirty years; leaving for ſucceſſor his ſon Periander, one of the ſeven ſages, but a cruel tyrant: who, among other vile acts, ſlew his own wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, ſtripped all the Corinthian women ſtark naked, burning their apparel, as an acceptable offering to her ghoſt. Hereby we may perceive that the wiſdom of the Greeks, was not excellent in thoſe days; when ſuch a one as this could be admired as excelling all the country.

In theſe times alſo were Zaleucus, and Draco, famous law-givers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the city of Athens. The laws of Draco were ſo rigorous, that he was ſaid to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every ſmall offence with death. Wherefore his conſtitutions were ſoon abrogated, and power given to Solon by the Athenians to make new in their ſtead. But the laws of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbad any gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one bond-woman attending on her, unleſs it were when ſhe was drunk; or to go forth of the town by night, unleſs it were to ſome ſweet-heart's bed; or to dreſs herſelf up in immodeſt bravery, unleſs it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleaſant ordinances, he affected his deſire: for none would ſeem, in breaking the ſtatutes, to be in ſuch caſe as challenged the diſpenſation. It is noted in this man as a ſingular example of juſtice, that when his own ſon had committed adultery, and was therefore to loſe both his eyes, he did not cauſe him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his own to ſave the young man (who alſo loſt one) from utter blindneſs.

I ſhall not henceforth need ſo far to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in purſuing of actions collateral to the hiſtory, for inſerting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will ſoon fall under the Perſians; the Perſians, ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks with the Romans; the Romans with many nations. Concerning all theſe, as they ſhall ſucceſſively preſent themſelves, in their flouriſhing eſtate, it will be enough to recapitulate the moſt memorable accidents, that befel them in their minority. But in the long ſpace of more than thirteen hundred years, which paſſed between the calling of Abraham, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, we find little matter, wherein the hiſtory of Iſrael had any dealing with other nations, than the very neareſt borderers. Yet read we of many kingdoms, that in theſe many ages were erected and thrown down; as likewiſe, many memorable acts were perform'd in Greece and elſewhere, though not following one another at any near diſtance; all which muſt have been quite omitted, or elſe reſerved unto a very unſeaſonable rehearſal, had they not been diſpoſed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the neceſſity.

SECT. VI.

The oppreſſion of Judea, and deſtruction of Jeruſalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to return to the Jewiſh ſtory, from whence we have ſo far digreſſed. In the third year of Jehoiakim, Nabuchodonoſor the ſecond, his Father yet living, enter'd Judea with a great Army, who beſieging and forcing Jeruſalem, made Jehoiakim his vaſſal in deſpight of Necho that had eſtabliſhed him king, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Ananias, Miſael, and Azarias. Alſo he took a part of the church-treaſures; but ſtay'd not to ſearch them throughly; for Necho haſted to the ſuccour of Jehoiakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonoſor in Judea: wherein this great Babylonian had no diſpoſition to hazard himſelf and his army, it being a country of an evil affection towards him, as alſo far off from any ſuccour or ſure place of retreat. If he had, as may be ſuppoſed, any great ſtrength of Scythian Horſemen in his army; it was the more wiſely done of him, to fall back, out of that rough, mountainous, and over-hot country, into places that were more even and temperate. But beſides all theſe reaſons, the death of his father happening at the ſame time, gave him juſt occaſion to return home; and take poſſeſſion of his own kingdom, before he proceeded further in the ſecond care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reaſonable good leiſure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him ſo far and to bid him battle, until the new year came in; which was the fourth of Jehoiakim, the firſt of Nabuchodonoſor, and the laſt of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the bank of Euphrates (his own territory bounding it on the north-ſide) attended the arrival of Necho. There, after a reſolved ed contention for victory, Necho was ſlain, and his army remaining forced to ſave it ſelf, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victory Nabuchodonoſor ſo well purſued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatſoever the Egyptians held out of their proper territory towards the north. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the preſent diſcouraged, Jehoiakim held himſelf quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptian; yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the year before, who contented with ſuch profit as he could then readily make, had forborn to lay any tribute upon Juda. But this cool reſervedneſs of Jehoiakim was, on both ſides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian king Pſammis, who ſucceeded unto Necho, began to think upon reſtoring Jehoahaz, taken priſoner by his father, and ſetting him up as a domeſtic enemy, againſt his ungrateful brother. Againſt all ſuch accidents the Judean had prepared the uſual remedy, practiſed by his fore-fathers: for he had made his own ſon [a]Jechonia king with him long before, in the ſecond year of his own reign, when the boy was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoahaz's return; the prophet Jeremy foretold, that it ſhould prove idle, ſaying: [b]He ſhall not return thither, but he ſhall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and ſhall ſee this land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having ſpent all their mercenary forces, and receiv'd that heavy blow at Carchemiſh, had not remaining ſuch proportion of ſharp ſteel, as of fair gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Pſammis. Apries, who reigned after Pſammis, did once adventure to ſhew his face in Syria; but after a big look, he was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battle. Wherefore this decaying nation fought only with brave words, telling ſuch frivolous tales, as men, that mean to do nothing, uſe, of their glorious acts forepaſſed, againſt Joſias and Jehoahaz. In this caſe it was eaſy for Jehoiakim to give them ſatisfaction, by letting them underſtand, the ſincerity of his affection towards them; which appear'd in time following. But Nabuchodonoſor went to work more roundly. He ſent a peremptory meſſage to Jehoiakim, willing him not to ſtand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himſelf a ſubject, and pay him tribute: adding hereunto ſuch fearful threats, as made the poor Judean lay aſide all thought of [c]Pharaoh, and yield to do, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonoſor three years. At this time Jeremy the prophet cried out againſt the Jews, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to repentance, but becauſe they had ſtop'd their ears againſt him, and the reſt of the prophets, he now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that they ſhould endure the yoke of bondage full 70 years. The ſame calamity he threaten'd to all the neighbouring nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the reſt; foretelling that they ſhould all drink out of the Babylonian pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forſaken, and after the ſeventy years expir'd, that the [d]Babylonians themſelves ſhould taſte of the ſame cup, and be utterly ſubverted by the Medes and Judeans permitted to return again into their own fields and cities. The firſt impriſonment of the prophet Jeremy ſeems to have been in the fourth year of this Jehoiakim, at which time Baruch the ſcribe wrote all his prophecies out of his mouth, whom he ſent to read them unto the people, and afterward to the princes, who offer'd them to the king; but fearing the king's fury they had firſt ſet Jeremy at liberty, and adviſed him and Baruch to hide themſelves.

Jehoiakim after he heard a part of it and perceiv-ed the ill news therein delivered, made no more ado but did cut the book in pieces and caſt it into the fire. All which Jeremy cauſed to be new written, with this addition; that the dead body of Jehoiakim, ſhould be caſt out, expoſed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the froſt, and that there ſhould be none of his ſeed to ſit on the throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehoiakim reſted ſecure of all danger, as tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty city of Tyre oppoſed it ſelf againſt the Chaldean forces; and upon juſt confidence of her own ſtrength, deſpiſed all preparation that could be made againſt her. Now foraſmuch as the term of ſeventy years, was preſcribed unto the deſolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jeruſalem, and other towns and countries; it is apparent, that they which refer the expugnation of this city unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonoſor, have ſure Authority for their warrant.

Whereupon

Whereupon likewiſe it follows of neceſſity, that the ſiege thereof began in the ſeventh of his reign; as having laſted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the ſeveral beginnings that are reckoned of this great prince's rule, whereupon hath riſen much diſputation. The third year of Jehoiakim was the laſt of Nabulaſſar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of ſuch as had revolted from him unto Pharaoh Necho, and ſent this noble prince, his ſon, with an army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was [a] Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the ſame year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehoiakim, was the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar; which [b] Jeremy affirmeth in expreſs words, and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquer'd Egypt, and then began to reign as a great monarch, finding none that durſt offend him. The ſecond from this year it was, wherein he ſaw that viſion, of the image conſiſting of ſundry metals; which did prefigurate the ſucceſſion of great kingdoms, that ſhould rule the earth, before the coming of Chriſt. I will not ſtand to diſpute about this, which is the beſt concluſion, that I find, of long diſputations; but return unto the ſiege of Tyre, which began in the ſeventh of his reign.

The city of Tyre covered all the ground of an iſland, that was divided from the main by a deep and broad channel of the ſea. The Chaldeans had no fleet, and were no ſeamen; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly ſhips, and skill to uſe them, excelled all other nations; and every wind, from one part or other, brought needful proviſions into the city. Wherefore neither force nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheleſs the judgments of God (denounced againſt it by [c] Iſaiah, Jeremy, Ezekiel) had threaten'd the deſtruction; and the obſtinate reſolution of Nabuchodonoſor had fully determined to perform it. This high-minded king, impatient of reſiſtance, undertook a vaſt piece of work; even to fill up the ſea, that parted the iſland from the continent. The city of old Tyrus, that ſtood oppoſite to the new, upon the firm land, and the mountain of Libanus near adjoining, that was loaden with cedars and abundance of other trees, might furniſh him with materials. Thirteen years were ſpent in this laborious and almoſt hopeleſs buſineſs. Which needeth not ſeem ſtrange; for Alexander, working upon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonoſor's pier, and being withal aſſiſted by a ſtrong fleet, was yet ſeven months ere he could make way into the city. Wherefore, if the raging of the ſea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander labour'd to cover a ſhelve; with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were conſume the work of Nabuchodonoſor, who laid his foundations in the bottom of the deep; ſtriving, as it were, to fill the empty belly of this cormorant; whereas the Macedonian did only ſtop the throat of it. Every man knows, God could have further'd the accompliſhment of his own threats againſt this place (tho' it had not pleaſed him to uſe either miracle, or ſuch of his more immediate weapons, as are earthquakes and the like) by making at leaſt the ſeas calm, and adding the favourable concurrence of all ſecond helps. But ſo it pleaſeth him oftentimes, in chaſtiſing the pride of man, to uſe the hand of man; even the hand of man ſtriving, as may ſeem, againſt all reſiſtance of nature and fortune. So in this exceſſive labour of the Chaldeans, [d] every head was made bald, and every ſhoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonoſor would not give over till he was maſter of the town.

When he was enter'd upon this deſperate ſervice, whether it were ſo, that ſome loſſes received, ſome mutiny in his army, or (which is moſt likely, and ſo [e] Joſephus reports it) ſome glorious rumours of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evil-willers; Jehoiakim renounced his ſubjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonoſor gave him no leiſure to do much hurt; but with part of his army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed king made ſo little reſiſtance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were in a dream) that he enter'd Jeruſalem, and laid hands on Jehoiakim; whom he firſt bound, and determin'd to ſend to Babylon, but changing counſel, he caus'd him to be ſlain in the place, and gave him the ſepulchre of an aſs, to be devoured by beaſts and ravenous birds, according to the former prophecies: leaving in his place Jehoiakim or Jechonias his ſon; whom after three months and ten days Nabuchodonoſor removed, and ſent priſoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochæus, and Joſedech, the high-prieſt. The mother of Jechonias, together with his ſervants, eunuchs, and all the ableſt men, and beſt artificers of the land, were alſo then carried away captives. This Jechonias, following the counſel of Jeremy the prophet, made no reſiſtance, but ſubmitted himſelf to the king's will: wherein he both pleaſed God, and did that which was beſt for himſelf; tho' at the preſent it might ſeem otherwiſe, to ſuch as conſider'd the evil that befell him, rather than the greater evil that he thereby avoided. This only particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it ſeems that he was partaker, at leaſt of his father's faults, if not an inſtigator: which was the cauſe, that his ſubmitting himſelf to God's pleaſure did not preſerve his eſtate: for ſo we read in general words, that he did evil in the ſight of the Lord, according to all that his father had done. In his ſtead Nabuchodonoſor eſtabliſhed Mathania his uncle in the kingdom of Juda, and call'd him Zedekias, which is as much as to ſay, the juſtice of God. For like as Necho king of Egypt, had formerly diſplaced Jehoahaz, after his father Joſias was ſlain, and ſet up Jehoiakim the ſon of another mother; ſo Nabuchodonoſor ſlew Jehoiakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his ſon Jechonias priſoner to Babel, gave the kingdom to this Zedekias, that was whole brother to that Jehoahaz, whom Necho took with him into Egypt. From Zedekias he required an oath for his faithful obedience, which Zedekias gave him, and called the living God to witneſs in the ſame, that he would remain aſſured to the kings of Chaldea.

In the firſt year of Zedekias, Jeremy ſaw and expounded the viſion of the ripe and rotten grapes, the one ſignifying thoſe Judeans that were carried away captive, the other thoſe that ſtay'd and were deſtroyed.

In the fourth year of Zedekias, Jeremy wrote in a book all the evil that ſhould fall upon Babylon, which book or ſcroll he gave to Sheraia, when he went with the king Zedekias to Babylon, to viſit Nabuchodonoſor; willing him firſt to read it to the captive Jews, and then to bind it to a ſtone, and caſt it into Euphrates, pronouncing theſe words: Thus ſhall Babel be drowned, and ſhall not riſe from the evil that I will bring upon her. This journey of Zedekias to Babel is probably thought to have been in way of viſitation, carrying ſome preſents. But I further think that he had ſome ſuit there to make which his lordly maſter refuſed to grant, and ſent him away diſcontented. For at his return all the bordering princes ſent meſſengers to him, inciting him (as it ſeems) to thoſe unquiet courſes, from which [a]Jeremy dehorted both him and them. The prophet, by God's appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his own neck, others he ſent unto the five kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon, by thoſe meſſengers which came to viſit Zedekias: making them know, that if they and the kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they ſhould then poſſeſs and enjoy their own countries; if not, they ſhould aſſuredly periſh by the ſword, by fire, and by peſtilence.

He alſo foretold them, that thoſe veſſels, which as yet remained in Jeruſalem, ſhould alſo travel after the reſt, and at length they ſhould be reſtored again.

The ſame year Ananias the falſe prophet took off the wooden chain which Jeremy wore in ſign of the captivity of the Jews, and brake it: vaunting, that in like manner, after two years, God would break the ſtrength of Babel, and the yoke which he laid on all nations; reſtore Jechonias, and all the Jews, with the veſſels and riches of the temple, and give an end to all theſe troubles. But Jeremy, inſtead of his wooden yoke, wore a collar of iron: and in ſign that Ananias had given a deceitful and falſe hope to the people, he foretold the death of this cold prophet, which ſeized upon him in the ſecond month. After this, when Zedekias had wavered long enough between faith and paſſion, in the eighth year of his reign he practiſed more ſeriouſly againſt Nabuchodonoſor, with his neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promiſed great aids of the Egyptians: in confidence of whoſe reſiſtance, he determined to ſhake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonoſor had knowledge, he march'd with his army in the dead of winter, toward Jeruſalem, and beſieged it. Jeremy perſuaded Zedekias to render the city and himſelf: but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being perſuaded by his counſellors, and falſe prophets, that it was impoſſible that the kingdom of Juda ſhould be extirpate, until the coming of Silo (according to the prophecy of [b]Jacob) he deſpiſed the words of [c]Jeremy and impriſoned him. For Jeremy had told the king, that the city ſhould be taken and burnt; that the king ſhould not eſcape, but be taken priſoner, and brought to the preſence of Nabuchodonoſor; that he ſhould not periſh by the ſword, but being carried to Babel, die his natural death.

Jeruſalem being, the following year, ſurrounded by Nabuchodonoſor's army; the king of Egypt, Pharaoh Hophra according to [d]Jeremy (Herodotus calleth him Apries) enter'd the border of Juda, with his army, to ſuccour Zedekias, of whoſe revolt he had been the principal author. But Jeremy gave the Jews faithful counſel, willing them not to have any truſt in the ſuccours of Egypt: for he aſſured them, that they ſhould return again, and in no ſort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jeruſalem to encounter the Egyptians, theſe vanting patrons abandon'd their enterpriſe, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, return'd into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poor people of Jeruſalem to their deſtin'd miſeries.

In the mean while the Jews, who, in their firſt extremity, had manumiſed their [e]Hebrew bondmen (as God's law required at the year of Jubilee) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now, upon the breaking up of the Chaldean army, repent them of their charity: and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former ſlavery. But the Chaldees being return'd to the ſiege, the prophet [f]Jeremy, when the ſtate of Jeruſalem began now to grow to extremity, counſelled [g]Zedekias to render himſelf unto them; aſſuring him of his own life, and the ſafety of the city, if he would ſo do. But his obſtinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and perjury, had provided for him.

Three and twenty months (as ſome do reckon it) or according to Joſephus eighteen; the [h]Babylonian army lay before Jeruſalem, and held it exceeding ſtraitly beſieged. For [i]they built forts againſt it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum; they ſurrounded the city with wooden towers, ſo as the beſieged could neither ſally out, nor receive into the city any ſupply of men or victuals. [k]Joſephus reports, that they over-top'd the walls, with high towers raiſed upon mounts; from which they did ſo beat upon the wall with their engines, that the defendants were compelled to forſake their ſtations. Now although it were ſo that the beſieged alſo raiſed counter-buildings like unto theſe, yet the great king of Babel, who commanded all the regions thereabouts, and had the woods and rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the citizens endeavours; and to beat down as faſt from without, as they raiſed from within; the body and foundation of his own works being guarded, by the walls of Jeruſalem interpoſed; and theirs within, laid open to their enemies diſturbance. Beſides, both famine and peſtilence (which commonly accompany men ſtraitly beſieged) grew on faſt upon them, whereby, when the number, ſtrength, and courage of the Jews failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their princes did ſeat themſelves, as lords of the town, in the middle gate. Zedekias beholding this uncomfortable ſight, and finding no remedy of the danger preſent, loſt both his courage and his hope at once; and ſhifted himſelf, together with his wives, children, princes, and principal ſervants, out of the city, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guideleſs people, to the mercileſs ſwords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the prophet perſuaded him to render himſelf, deſpiſed both the counſel of God, and the force of Nabuchodonoſor, uſed now that remedy, which Wolpius truly termeth, triſte turpe, & inſelix, woful, ſhameful, and unfortunate.

By this ſecret ſubterrane vault, Zedekias making his ſtealth, recover'd (by the help of the dark night) the plains or deſarts of Jerecho: but by reaſon of the train that followed him and his (every one leading with him thoſe whom they held moſt dear unto them) he was eaſily traced and purſued. How great ſoever the company was that attended on him, yet, as [l]Joſephus reports it, they on whoſe fidelity he moſt repoſed himſelf, no ſooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandon'd his defence, and ſhifted themſelves into the deſarts as they could. For whom God had forſaken, no man follow'd, but the miniſters of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias, being made priſoner, with his children and princes, he was conveyed to Rebla or Reblath, a city (as ſome think) of Nepthalim, where Nabuchodonoſor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jeruſalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to do.

Now after Nabuchodonoſor had laid before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferr'd upon him, together with the notable falſhood and perjury wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his children, princes and friends to be ſlain before his face. This being done, to the end that ſo lamentable a ſpectacle ſhould be the laſt that ever he ſhould behold in the world, he cauſed his eyes to be torn out of his head, and ſo carried him in a ſlaviſh manner to Babel, where he conſumed the reſt of his wretched life in perpetual impriſonment. Herein this moſt marvelous prophecy of Ezechiel was perform'd; [a] Adducam eum in Babylonem, & ipſam non videbit; I will bring him into Babylon, and he ſhall not ſee it.

Thus in the eleventh and laſt year of Zedekias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſor, the Chaldeans enter'd the city by force, where ſparing no ſex nor age, they committed all to the ſword that they therein found.

In the year next following, [b] Nabuzaradan, general of the army, burnt the king's palace, and the reſt of Jeruſalem: and after this fire had laſted from the ſeventh to the tenth day, he alſo burnt the temple of God to the ground, when it had ſtood four hundred thirty and one years.

After this, upon a ſecond ſearch, Nabuzaradan (not yet ſatiated with blood) commanded ſeventy and two others to be ſlaughtered, which had hidden themſelves from the firſt fury, to wit, the chief and the ſecond prieſt, two commanders of Zedechias his men of war, five of his houſhold-ſervants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ableſt of the people throughout all Judea, and leaving the pooreſt labouring ſouls, with ſome that followed the party of Nabuchodonoſor, to till the ground: over whom he left governour, Godolia the nephew of that Saphan whom Joſias had formerly employed in the reformation of religion, who is, for his juſtice and equity, by Joſephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by nation, left Zedechias, as it ſeemeth, in the beginning of the war; and by Jeremy's deſire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the ſame advice, which the prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was, to ſubmit himſelf altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordained by God to exerciſe his juſtice, was therefore reſiſtleſs. The prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldea, or elſewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jews that were left under his charge, promiſing them favour and liberty, ſo long as they remain'd obedient ſubjects to Nabuchodonoſor, by whom he was eſtabliſh'd provincial governour of his own nation.

But ere that year was expir'd, a prince of the late king's houſe (who, during the ſiege of Jeruſalem, had kept himſelf out of the ſtorm, with Baalis king of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other choſen men, while Godoliah feaſted them in Maſpha or Mitſpa, the city of his reſidence, traiterouſly ſlew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jews that accompany'd him. This done, he made an eſcape, and in his way encountering with eighty perſons, repairing towards Godoliah with preſents, he ſlew the moſt of them, and ſpared the reſt, becauſe they promiſed to diſcover unto him ſome treaſures hidden in the fields during the war. He alſo took with him a daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonoſor. This practice and intent of Iſmael had been formerly diſcovered unto Godoliah by Johanan, one of the leaders of the few remaining Jews; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a governour (for Iſmael durſt not take it upon him, but retired himſelf, or rather fled as faſt as he could to the Ammonites) the reſidue of the Jews, fearing the revenge of the Chaldeans, reſolved to fly away into Egypt, and beſought Jeremy to ask counſel of God for them: who readily made them anſwer, That if they remained in Judea God would provide for them and ſhew them mercy; but if they ſought to ſave themſelves in Egypt, that they ſhould then undoubtedly periſh. Notwithſtanding this advice, the Jews held their determination; and deſpiſing the oracle of God, and conſtraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permiſſion of Pharaoh, near unto Tophnes, where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their idolatry, foretelling both the deſtruction of themſelves, and the Egyptians alſo, he was by theſe his own hard-hearted and ungrateful countrymen ſtoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reverenced him, buried near the ſepulchre of their own kings.
